sampler's books, assay certificates, assay records, sample maps, the assay and routine records of the McKisson mill, with the head assays, tail assays, concentrate assays, records of tonnage handled, plus the daily records of mill operation, smelter settlement sheets and mint returns, all reports from officers or employees at the properties, all ore reserve estimates including tonnage and grade calculations and maps relative thereto, all records of receipts and disbursements pertaining to any of said properties, including payroll records, material and equipment purchases, maintenance accounts and segregation records showing segregation of receipts and disbursements against development, mining, milling, selling or other costs; the general journal and general ledger of the company concerning said properties, all said records being for the period from January 1, 1934, to October 31, 1937."

The appellants failed to appear, advising the Commission's representative that they would refuse to respond to the subpoena until so ordered by the court. The order subsequently made by the trial court required the production of the documentary evidence called for in the subpoena.

It is urged that the application for the production order was defective in that it did not allege that any complaint or statement of facts respecting the claimed violation of the statute had been filed with the Commission. It is said that § 20(a) requires such complaint or statement as prerequisite to an investigation. This court, in Woolley v. United States, 9 Cir., 97 F.2d 258, has held otherwise. § 20(a) provides that "whenever it shall appear to the Commission, either upon complaint or otherwise, that the provisions of this title [subchapter], or of any rule or regulation prescribed under authority thereof, have been or are about to be violated, it may, in its discretion, either require or permit such person to file with it a statement in writing under oath, or otherwise, as to all the facts and circumstances concerning the subject matter which it believes to be in the public interest to investigate, and may investigate such facts." If the Commission is in possession of facts affording reasonable grounds for the belief that a violation of the act has occurred or is threatened, it may order an investigation. The form of the information or its source is not material.

The appellants do not deny that sales were made and solicited, or that the mails and the means and instruments of communication in interstate commerce were used for this purpose. They say, however, that the sales were made by appellant Tyler of his personally owned stock, independently of the company. The Commission had substantial evidence to the contrary. Letters soliciting sales or encouraging purchases were written on the stationery of the corporation, and in some instances the signers designated themselves as corporate officers. The proceeds of the securities sold were in part loaned or contributed to the corporation and were used to keep the properties in operation, thereby enabling more stock sales to be effected. Certainly, the facts in the possession of the Commission justified an investigation to determine whether the sales were in truth the individual transactions of Tyler, or were made on behalf or at the behest of the corporation.

It appears to be the view of appellants that virtually conclusive evidence of a violation of the act must be in the possession of the Commission before an investigation can be ordered. If this were so there would be no point in conducting an investigation. The very purpose of the inquiry authorized by § 20(a), 15 U.S.C.A. § 77t(a), is to investigate the accuracy of information in the possession of the Commission tending to show a violation, and to aid the Commission in determining whether the facts justify injunction proceedings or the placing of the matter before the Attorney General for the institution of criminal prosecutions. See § 20(b), 15 U.S.C.A. § 77t(b); In re Securities and Exchange Commission, 2 Cir., 84 F.2d 316.

It is urged that the investigation is a "fishing expedition" of the sort condemned in Federal Trade Commission v. American Tobacco Company, 264 U.S. 298, 44 S.Ct. 336, 68 L.Ed. 696, 32 A.L.R. 786; also, that the order for the production of the documents called for is so harsh, sweeping and summary in its terms as to violate the rights of appellants under the Fourth Amendment to the constitution, U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 4, citing Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616, 6 S.Ct. 524, 29 L.Ed. 746.

We are unable to agree that the order invades the constitutional immunities of the appellants. The materiality of the documentary evidence called for is apparent. The reports of the company's engineers as to the extent of its ore reserves, the values disclosed by assays made, the records of the company relating to the economy and efficiency of its milling operations and to its mining costs, and the records of returns from concentrates and from sales to the mint, are all pertinent to the subject matter of the investigation. All bear on the truth or falsity of the representations shown to have been made on behalf of the corporation in effecting sales of its securities. The case made out by the Commission abundantly discloses the propriety of the order for the production of these records. From them it may be determined whether the stock-selling campaign was in fact based on representations which were materially false or misleading, and whether the corporation and its officers had acted in bad faith. Newfield v. Ryan, 5 Cir., 91 F.2d 700; McMann v. Securities and Exchange Commission, 2 Cir., 87 F.2d 377, 109 A.L.R. 1445. Compare Smith v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 245 U.S. 33, 38 S.Ct. 30, 62 L.Ed. 135; Wheeler v. United States, 226 U.S. 478, 483, 33 S.Ct. 158, 57 L.Ed. 309; Brown v. United States, 276 U.S. 134, 48 S.Ct. 288, 72 L.Ed. 500.

Investigations of the sort here under consideration are analogous to those of a grand jury. In re Securities and Exchange Commission, supra; Woolley v. United States, supra. The scope of the inquiries of a grand jury, it has been said, is "not to be limited narrowly by questions of propriety or forecasts of the probable result of the investigation, or by doubts whether any particular individual will be found properly subject to an accusation of crime. As has been said before, the identity of the offender, and the precise nature of the offense, if there be one, normally are developed at the conclusion of the grand jury's labors, not at the beginning." Blair v. United States, 250 U.S. 273, 39 S.Ct. 468, 471, 63 L.Ed. 979; see, also, Norcross v. United States, 9 Cir., 209 F. 13.

WALLACE v. MAYOR OF RENO

Supreme Court of Nevada, 1903.

27 Nev. 71, 73 P. 528, 63 L.R.A. 337, 103 Am.St.Rep. 747.

TALBOT, J. Among other things, the petitioner alleges that on the 15th day of May, 1903, he paid for and received a license from the city of Reno to conduct the business of retail liquor dealer for the period of three months; that on or about the 3d day of last June he received a request from the respondents to attend a meeting on the same evening, and to give them all the information he possessed relative to an alleged charge that he was conducting his business in such a manner as to be a nuisance, or detrimental to public peace or morals; that he complied with this request, and stated he would do all he could to protect his patrons; that later, and on or about the 3d day of June, he was served with a citation issued by the respondents, ordering him to appear before the council on the 4th day of June, and show cause why his license should not be revoked; that the citation did not state the grounds upon which it was proposed to revoke the license; that no due and legal proceedings or investigation were had, and no evidence relevant, competent, or material was introduced tending to prove the truth of the charge; that the council then adjourned until June 6th, at 6 p. m., when, on motion, the license of petitioner was revoked, withdrawn, and discontinued; that during the investigation respondent Luke stated that he had received information relative to the charge at a time other than their regular open meeting, but when sworn as a witness on behalf of petitioner he refused to divulge the names of his informants. It is further asserted in the petition that respondents acted in excess of their jurisdiction because their proceedings were arbitrary, and petitioner did not have an opportunity to make a fair, full, legal, and complete defense to the charge; and, further, that they had no legal power or authority to conduct such investigation, or to issue citation to petitioner, or to revoke his license, unless upon a complaint or petition being first filed with them.

Respondents demur to the petition on the ground that it fails to state sufficient facts in different respects.

We deem it necessary to consider only one of the objections raised, as that goes to the merits and is conclusive. It may be assumed from the allegations of the petition, and it was conceded on the argument, that the city council voted unanimously in favor of revoking the license.

Section 20, subd. 8, of the act incorporating the city of Reno (St. 1903, p. 189), specifies that the city council shall have power "to fix and regulate a license upon, and regulate all characters of business conducted within the corporate limits, and to license, regulate, prohibit or prescribe the location of saloons or barrooms." Sections 1 and 3 of an act approved March 10, last (St. 1903, p. 81), authorizes all city councils and licensing boards "to revoke, withdraw and discontinue any business license, where there is reason to believe that such business is a nuisance, a menace to public health or detrimental to the peace or morals: provided, that such revocation, withdrawal or discontinuance shall, when the action is taken on motion of, or at the instance of a member of the board, be by unanimous consent." This language does not suggest any notice to the licensee, and, so far as the statute is concerned, it is apparent that none is necessary when the license is revoked on the motion of a member and by unanimous vote of the board, and that they may act ex parte and arbitrarily, and the only protection to the innocent holder of a license lies in the unanimity required for its revocation, and in the honesty, confidence, and efficiency of the members of the board as public officials, and the probability that it would be restored upon a showing that it had been unjustly or improperly annulled. Regardless of the requirements and validity of the statute, it is fairer and better that notice be given as was done in this case. By appearing the petitioner waived notice, but, as he objects to the sufficiency of the citation, we prefer to treat the case on the merits, and as if there had been no notice or appearance.

Section 2 of the act last mentioned provides another method of revocation, and for an investigation by the board, on the petition of a taxpayer, supported by 10 per cent. of the freeholders, but is also silent regarding notice to the licensee.

It becomes pertinent to determine whether the petitioner has a vested or contract right in his license, of which he cannot be deprived without formal process of law by the Legislature, or the city council through those statutory enactments, under the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, providing that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or under the limitations of our state Constitution. In the latter document, section 2 of article 1 proclaims the fundamental truth that all political power is inherent in the people, that government is instituted for their protection, security, and benefit, and that they have the right to alter and reform the same whenever the public good may require. Section 20 of article 4 prohibits the Legislature from passing local or special laws for the assessment and collection of taxes, and article 10 requires the Legislature to provide for a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation and for a just valuation of all property. As held by this court in Ex parte Robinson, 12 Nev. 263, 28 Am. Rep. 794, and Ex parte Cohn, 13 Nev. 427, these limitations apply to taxes, and not to licenses, leaving the Legislature to regulate the latter with a free hand where they do not encroach and discriminate in relation to taxes as properly and ordinarily understood, and without other restraint except the responsibility of the legislators to their constituents.

Questions kindred to the main one here have been carefully considered by a number of courts in our sister states, and by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the reasoning and conclusions reached are peculiarly applicable and convincing.

In State v. Schmidt, 65 Iowa 556, 22 N.W. 673, this language is used in the decision: "The law under which the permit was issued provides in express terms that if the defendant sold liquors for unlawful purposes the permit should be revoked. He received and accepted the permit under such condition. He was not, therefore, deprived of property when the permit was revoked. Hurber v. Baugh, 43 Iowa, 514. Therefore it cannot be said that the defendant has been deprived of property without due process of law."

We quote extensively from La Croix v. County Commissioners, 49 Conn. 591:

"In the case of Calder v. Kurby, 5 Gray, 597, a license to sell intoxicating liquors had been granted for a certain period. Before the period had expired the license was annulled. It was urged upon the argument in behalf of the plaintiff that the license was a contract and within the protection of the Constitution of the United States. But the court overruled the claim. Mr. Justice Bigelow in giving the opinion says: 'The whole argument of the counsel for the plaintiff is founded on a fallacy. A license authorizing a person to retail spirituous liquors does not create any contract between him and the government. It bears no resemblance to an act of incorporation, by which, in consideration of the supposed benefits to the public, certain rights and privileges are granted by the Legislature to individuals, under which they embark their skill, enterprise, and capital. The statute regulating licensed houses has a very different scope and purpose. The effect of a license is merely to permit a person to carry on the trade under certain regulations and to exempt him from the penalties provided for unlawful sales. It therefore contained none of the elements of a contract. The sum paid for it was merely nominal, and there was no agreement, either express or implied, that it should be irrevocable. On the contrary, it is manifest that this statute, like those authorizing the licensing of theatrical exhibitions and shows, sales of fireworks and the like, was a mere police regulation, intended to regulate trade, prevent injurious practices, and promote the good order and welfare of the community, and liable to be modified and repealed whenever, in the judgment of the Legislature, it failed to accomplish these objects.'"

In Martin v. State, 23 Neb. 377, 36 N.W. 557, Reese, C. J., delivering the opinion of the court, says: "But it is contended that, before the mayor and council can legally revoke the license, notice must be given to the licensee, in order that he may show cause, if any exists, why the license should not be revoked. In support of this contention, it is insisted that the license is a franchise, or public right, vested in the individual, and for which he has paid a consideration, and therefore it has all the necessary elements of property, under the provision of the Constitution that 'no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.'"

In Commonwealth v. Kinsley, 133 Mass. 579, the court states: "A license had been duly granted to the defendant, and it had been revoked by the selectmen without giving him notice of their intention to revoke it. The keeping of a pool table for hire is one of many things affecting the public morals, which the Legislature can either absolutely prohibit or can regulate, and one common form of regulation is by requiring a license. A licensee takes his license subject to such conditions as the Legislature sees fit to impose, and one of the statutory conditions of this license was that it might be revoked by the selectmen at their pleasure. Such a license is not a contract, and a revocation of it does not deprive the defendant of any property, immunity, or privilege, within the meaning of these words in the Declaration of Rights, art. 12. . . ."

History tells us that from the early days of Egypt, Greece, and Rome the leading nations of the world have maintained restrictions upon the use of wine. The common law of England regulated the sale of ardent spirits, and the same policy has been pursued in this country from colonial days. Custom from time immemorial and the cases cited indicate that the Legislature, in the exercise of police power belonging to the state, could prohibit entirely, or impose such conditions as it deemed best for the issuance and annulment of permits to sell intoxicating liquors. They saw fit to authorize the city council to revoke licenses for the reasons and in the manner stated before. The one in question was granted to and accepted by the petitioner under these conditions and after their enactment. It is the rule that, where parties contract or act in contemplation of a statute then in force, its provisions are deemed to constitute a part of the agreement, just as though they had been incorporated in it. Hutchins v. Town, 118 N.C. 468, 24 S.E. 723, 32 L.R.A. 706, citing Koonce v. Russell, 103 N.C. 179, 9 S.E. 316; Cooley, Const.Lim. p. 265; McCless v. Meekins, 117 N.C. 34, 23 S.E. 99; Strickland v. Pennsylvania, etc. (Pa.) 26 Atl. 431, 21 L.R.A. 224.

From a general review of the authorities it appears that a license for the sale of liquors may be revoked before the expiration of the time for which it has been granted by act of the Legislature directly, or by the will of a majority of the voters expressed at an election, or by the board or mayor in their or his discretion, and with or without notice to the licensee, if statutory authority and conditions be pursued. It is apparent that the respondents acted within the letter and requirements of these statutory provisions, and that they are not unconstitutional.

The demurrer to the petition is sustained for the reasons indicated, and the costs of this proceeding are taxed against the petitioner.

NOTES

1. The federal Administrative Procedure Act 1946, § 9 (b), reads:

"Licenses.—In any case in which application is made for a license required by law the agency, with due regard to the rights or privileges of all the interested parties or adversely affected persons and with reasonable dispatch, shall set and complete any proceedings required to be conducted pursuant to sections 7 and 8 of this Act or other proceedings required by law and shall make its decision. Except in cases of willfulness or those in which public health, interest, or safety requires otherwise, no withdrawal, suspension, revocation, or annulment of any license shall be lawful unless, prior to the institution of agency proceedings therefor, facts or conduct which may warrant such action shall have been called to the attention of the licensee by the agency in writing and the licensee shall have been accorded opportunity to demonstrate or achieve compliance with all lawful requirements. In any case in which the licensee has, in accordance with agency rules, made timely and sufficient application for a renewal or a new license, no license with reference to any activity of a continuing nature shall expire until such application shall have been fully determined by the agency."

SECTION 14. PUBLICITY

EXAMPLES OF PUBLICITY PROVISIONS

1. In Hanna and Turlington, "The Securities Act of 1933", 28 Ill.L.Rev. 482 (1933), the authors say: "The central idea in the Securities Act is to protect the investor by imposing upon the seller responsibility for full disclosure in advance of the sale. This notion of publicity as a safeguard is also basic to the British Companies' Act of 1929 to which frequent reference was made in the debates on the American legislative proposals."

2. N.Y. Personal Property Law, § 46, as added by N.Y.Laws, 1934, c. 738, § 1, amended by Laws, 1937, c. 700, § 1, Laws 1943, c. 588, subdivision (1):

Wage Assignments; when valid; amount collectible thereunder

1. No assignment of or order for the payment of any salary, wages, commissions, or other compensation for services to be earned in the future, securing or relating to any indebtedness aggregating less than one thousand dollars, shall be valid for any purpose whatsoever unless: (a) such assignment or order shall be contained in a separate written instrument in which all printed matter is in at least eight point type and which shall have written or printed thereon in a size equal to at least ten point bold type the following title: "Assignment of Wages, Salary, Commissions or Other Compensation for Services," and shall have written or printed at the bottom thereof just above the place reserved for the signature of the assignor in a size equal to at least ten point bold type the following: "This is an Assignment of Wages, Salary, Commissions or Other Compensation for Services"; (b) such assignment or order shall, either in its text or in a writing permanently attached thereto, identify specifically and describe fully the transaction to which it relates, said description to include the name and address of the assignee, the identity of the merchandise sold or services rendered or other basis of the indebtedness, the date on and place at which payments are to be made; and on the back of the instrument shall be a summary of section forty-six of the personal property law; (c) such assignment or order is security only for the transaction or series of transactions identified specifically and described therein and no other such assignment or order exists in connection with the same transaction or series of transactions; (d) the salary, wages, commissions, or other compensation for services of the assignor amounts at least to the sum of fifteen dollars per week if the assignor is employed in a city with a population of two hundred and fifty thousand or more, and at least to the sum of twelve dollars per week if the assignor is employed elsewhere, and (e) the assignment or order is personally executed by the assignor and a copy of the assignment or order and of any papers attached thereto together with a copy or copies of any papers executed by the assignor pertaining to the transaction or series of transactions described in the assignment or order are delivered to the assignor.

3. N.Y. Stock Corporation Law, § 77:

§ 77. Financial statement to stockholders. Stockholders owning three per centum of the shares of any corporation other than a moneyed corporation may make a written request to the treasurer or other fiscal officer thereof for a statement of its affairs, under oath, embracing a particular account of all its assets and liabilities, and the treasurer shall make such statement and deliver it to the person making the request within thirty days thereafter, and keep on file in the office of the corporation for twelve months thereafter a copy of such statement, which shall at all times during business hours be exhibited to any stockholder demanding an examination thereof; but the treasurer shall not be required to deliver more than one such statement in any one year. The supreme court, or any justice thereof, may upon application, for good cause shown, extend the time for making and delivering such statement. For every neglect or refusal to comply with the provisions of this section the corporation shall forfeit and pay to the person making such request the sum of fifty dollars, and the further sum of ten dollars for every twenty-four hours thereafter until such statement shall be furnished.

4. N.Y. Correction Law, § 271, as added by N.Y. Laws 1931, c. 455; amended Laws 1933, c. 151, § 4; and sec. 272, as added by Laws 1931, c. 455, § 1.

§ 271. Board of visitors. There shall continue to be a board of visitors of each [such] reformatory, consisting of seven members who shall be appointed by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the senate. Of the members of the board of visitors of the reformatory at Bedford Hills, two shall be women and one a physician of at least ten years' practice in his profession. The full term of office of each visitor shall be seven years. The present members of each such board are hereby continued in office until the expiration of the terms for which they were appointed managers or visitors, unless sooner removed as herein provided. Each such board of visitors shall appoint from among its members, a president and a secretary. Such visitors shall receive no compensation for their services, but shall receive their reasonable traveling and other official expenses.

§ 272. General powers and duties of boards of visitors. Boards of visitors, with respect to the reformatories for which they are respectively appointed, shall have the powers and duties expressly conferred or imposed on them by this article and shall be directly responsible to the commissioner of correction with such other powers and duties, not inconsistent with law, as may be prescribed by rules of the department. Each board shall

1. Subject to the rules and statutory powers of the department, take care of the general interest of the reformatory and see that its design is carried into effect; have general supervision of the inmates with such powers as are delegated by the commissioner of correction; have general supervision of the grounds and buildings; and exercise supervision of the appointments and discharges of employees recommended by the superintendent.

2. Maintain an effective inspection of the reformatory, for which purpose the board, or a majority of its members, shall visit and inspect the reformatory at least once each month. Each board shall make a written report to the department within ten days after each inspection, such report to be signed by each member making the inspection. Such report shall state in detail the condition of the reformatory and of its inmates, and such other matters pertaining to the management and affairs thereof as in the opinion of the board should be brought to the attention of the department and may contain recommendations as to needed improvement in the reformatory or in its management.

3. Keep in a book provided for that purpose a fair and full record of their doings, which shall be open at all times to the inspection of the commission of correction and its members and authorized representatives of the department.

4. Hold regular meetings at least once each month.

5. Enter in a book, kept at the institution for that purpose, the date of each visit of each visitor.

6. Make from time to time such reports and furnish such information to the department as the commissioner of correction shall require.

7. Investigate, hear and ascertain the truth of all charges made against the superintendent or other officer or employee of the reformatory, issue subpoenas, take and hear testimony in respect to such charges and make its recommendations thereon to the authority having the power to discharge or remove. A witness attending before such board shall be entitled to the same fees as a witness attending before a court of record or a judge thereof, which shall be paid as other institutional charges. The resident officers shall admit such visitors into every part of the reformatory and its buildings, and exhibit to them on demand all the books, papers, accounts and writings belonging to the reformatory, or pertaining to its business, management, discipline or government, and furnish copies, abstracts and reports whenever required by them.

THE KANSAS MILLING COMPANY v. FRANK J. RYAN

Supreme Court of Kansas, 1940. 152 Kan. 137, 102 P.2d 970.

THIELE, J. This is an original proceeding in mandamus brought to compel the secretary of state to file a certificate of amendment of plaintiff's charter as a corporation and to issue a certified copy thereof to be recorded in the office of the register of deeds.

The motion for the writ alleges that plaintiff is a corporation duly organized under the laws of Kansas with its principal place of business at Wichita, and that defendant is the secretary of state of the state of Kansas; that plaintiff is authorized to and is engaged in the manufacture, sale and distribution of wheat products; that in 1939 the legislature of Kansas passed a new general corporation code, reference being made to certain sections hereafter mentioned; that the congress of the United States passed a new food, drug and cosmetic act which provides that a food shall be deemed to be misbranded if in package form unless it bears a label containing the name and place of business of the manufacturer (U.S.C.A. Tit. 21, § 343[e]), and it is alleged that under regulations promulgated under that act a trade name can be used by the manufacturer if the trade name has legally recognized identity, and legal recognition to do business under such trade name has been accorded to the manufacturer; that the plaintiff corporation has been using the names hereafter mentioned. That plaintiff is known to the public and its trade in connection with the sale of its products by those names in connection with its business, and, in order to comply with the federal act mentioned, to amend its charter authorizing its use of the names so that they will have a legally recognized identity. That, in accordance with statutory requirements, it was voted by the stockholders to amend its articles of incorporation by adding a new subdivision, reading as follows:

"That this corporation shall have the power to conduct the affairs and business of the corporation under the trade names of:

Marion Milling Company, Wichita, Kan.; Marion Milling Company, Marion, Ohio; St. Johns Mills, St. John, Kan.; The Lassen-Jackman Milling Company, Wichita, Kan.; Southern Milling Company, Wichita, Kan.; and Cereal Research Laboratories, and all such other trade names as the board of directors may, from time to time, determine."

And thereafter on December 11, 1939, the amendment was duly certified as required by statute and tendered to the secretary of state together with a copy to be certified by him for filing with the register of deeds of Sedgwick county, with the requisite statutory fees; that the secretary of state refused to file the certificate of amendment, for the asserted reason the general corporation code did not contemplate such an amendment, and that the trade names set out in the amendment do not appear to be trade names. After making allegation that it had no adequate, plain and complete remedy at law, that it was entitled as a matter of right to have the certificate of amendment filed by the secretary of state, etc., and that it would suffer irreparable damage if it did not obtain relief, it prayed for a writ of mandamus to compel the secretary of state to file the certificate of amendment and to furnish it with a certified copy, etc. . . . It was later stipulated that the secretary of state does not contend that plaintiff is seeking to amend its charter to permit it to use additional names with fraudulent intent or to deceive persons dealing with it.

Plaintiff filed its motion for judgment on the pleadings on the ground the answer does not state a defense to the alternative writ, and the cause is submitted to us on the motion. . . .

Plaintiff's contention is that it has been using the suggested names in connection with its business in certain localities and that by reason thereof the names have legally recognized identity; that natural persons may lawfully transact business under trade names (Badger Lumber Co. v. Collinson, 97 Kan. 791, syl. ¶ 3, 156 P. 724) and the corporation may lawfully do likewise, and therefore it has the right to amend its articles of incorporation to so state. As a specific reason, it pleads the federal food, drug and cosmetic act, referred to above, and contends that if its trade names have legally recognized identity and there is legal recognition of its right to do business under those trade names, then its use of them may be continued with consequent nonviolation of the federal act. However persuasive the last contention argued may be, it is not controlling in determining whether or not it is entitled to the relief it seeks. That depends on the state law.

It is apparent that plaintiff is not seeking to use the names to identify certain containers in which its products are marketed, for if that were the case it could obtain ample protection by complying with G.S. 1935, ch. 81, pertaining to registration of trademarks, names, etc. It is apparent that what it desires is to use different names at different places in a sort of series of alter egos.

We note the contention of the defendant that the names are not trade names. A discussion of whether the names have the attributes of trade-marks, trade slogans, trade-mark names or trade names would lead into a field in which there is great confusion, and any conclusion reached would hardly be decisive of the question before us. Discussions may be found in Hopkins on Trade-marks, etc., 4th ed., page 10, § 4; Nims on Unfair Competition & Trade-marks, 3d ed., 124, ch. 5; 26 R.C.L. 828; 63 C.J. 308-322. For our purposes we shall consider the names as being those properly applicable to business concerns doing a milling business at the locations mentioned for such length of time they were generally known and recognized, and trade names in that sense.

Without attempting a complete discussion, it may be said that in the field of corporation law generally there has been diversity of views concerning the right of a corporation to use an assumed or trade name in lieu of its legal name and its rights and liabilities where such a name has been used, as is indicated in 6 Fletcher's Cyclopedia Corporations (Perm. ed.), page 87 et seq. § 2442 . . .

And a discussion of the subject will also be found in 14 C.J. 307 et seq., 18 C.J.S. 560 et seq., 7 R.C.L. 126 et seq., and 13 Am.Jur. 268 et seq. And see the annotation in 56 A.L.R., 450.

We are of the opinion that whether the plaintiff is entitled to the relief it seeks is to be determined from our general corporation code, and the general policy of it as declared by or inferred from its provisions. The general corporation code has no provision expressly prohibiting the use of trade names, and whether a corporation may do so is to be determined from the code generally. . . . It is true that generally individuals may use assumed or trade names, and that two or more persons may associate themselves together to conduct a business under such names, but it does not follow that three or more persons may associate to establish a corporation for the transaction of any business for which natural persons may associate and have the right to use assumed or trade names, for the reason that the right to incorporate is regulated and limited by the provisions of the general corporation code. In the case of the individual or partnership, there is generally unlimited liability for debt, but as to the stockholders of the corporation that is not true. The individual may change the name or title under which he does business as often as he chooses, so long as fraud, deceit, etc., are not involved. (See Badger Lumber Co. v. Collinson, supra.) Obviously, a corporation cannot do that, or if it can, the provisions of the code for amending its name and title are meaningless. If it be said that the corporation may have the right to use trade names without change of its corporate title, and that such names may be included in its articles of incorporation, either originally or by amendment, then the question arises as to the effect of designation of its resident agent under section 11C, and under what name or names the agent is to be designated. The articles of incorporation or any amendment must be recorded in the office of the register of deeds of the county where the registered office is located in this state, as is provided in sections 13 and 129. One of the names plaintiff seeks to use is "St. Johns Mills, St. John, Kansas." That designation would lead to the belief the concern was in Stafford county, Kansas, but an inquirer would search in vain in the office of the register of deeds of that county to find the articles of incorporation or any amendment thereto or the designation of any resident agent. Under section 18, the articles of incorporation must state the place where its registered office is located and the name and address of its registered agent, as it is required to have by section 142. Under section 143, it is required that every corporation have its name, not names, conspicuously displayed in large letters in its registered office, and following sections provide for change of location of its registered office and designation of its registered agent, and for the filing of certificates in the office of the register of deeds in the county where the new office is located. Certainly this does not contemplate that a corporation may be domiciled in one county and comply with the requirements of the statute insofar as its primary legal name and title is concerned, and then transact its business there and elsewhere under a series of names entirely different from its corporate name, and especially is this true where the trade name has a geographical connotation. If it be argued that the amendment setting forth the names will be filed in the county where the registered office is located, and that the public will then have notice, we direct our attention to the latter part of the proposed amendment, where after setting forth six specific trade names, the corporation is also to have power to transact business under "all such other trade names as the board of directors may, from time to time, determine." If the provision for recording the articles of incorporation or amendments means anything, it would be futile with respect to "such other trade names," for no public record would disclose them. It may be observed, also, that if a corporation may include legally one or five or six trade names in its articles of incorporation, then it may just as legally include a score or more of them. We do not think the statutes contemplate or permit that such a thing be done.

If it be assumed that a corporation may have more than one name in which it is legally authorized to do business by reason of the inclusion of additional names in its articles of incorporation, then those names must, in order to comply with the provisions of section 11, be followed by the word "Incorporated" or the abbreviation "Inc." and those included in the proposed amendment are not.

To sum up, we are of the opinion that the general corporation code not having in it any permission for it so to do, a corporation may not, either in its articles of incorporation or by amendment thereto, obtain the right to conduct its business under a trade name or series of trade names in addition to its corporate name and title.

The writ of mandamus is denied.

2. Matter of Birdwell, 268 App.Div. 642, 53 N.Y.S.2d 77 (1945):

"UNTERMYER, J. The petitioner Russell Birdwell is a public relations counsel of wide reputation, who maintains offices both in the United States and Europe. In August, 1944, he tendered to the County Clerk of New York County for filing a certificate in alleged compliance with section 440 of the Penal Law reciting the transaction of business under the designation 'Russell Birdwell and Associates', notwithstanding that the certificate revealed that no other person was associated in business with him. The County Clerk refused to file the certificate, but upon application to the Special Term the certificate was directed to be filed as not in contravention of any provision of law. From that determination the County Clerk appeals.

"Even if it be assumed that the name under which the petitioner intends to do business is not expressly prohibited by section 924 of the Penal Law nor by section 82 of the Partnership Law, the County Clerk should not be required under legal compulsion to accept a certificate which is misleading to the public. (Cf. People ex rel. Blossom v. Nelson, 46 N.Y. 477; People ex rel. Davenport v. Rice, 68 Hun 24, 22 N.Y.S. 631.) The certificate offered for filing, by which the petitioner would conduct business as 'Russell Birdwell and Associates', although concededly he has no 'Associates', would inevitably have such a tendency. The statutes which expressly prohibit the use of the designations 'and company' or 'and Co.', do not imply that all other designations, no matter how misleading, are permissible. (Barker v. Koenig, 135 App.Div. 16, 119 N.Y.S. 777.)

"The petitioner asserts that the County Clerk has accepted for filing a certificate authorizing him to do business as 'Russell Birdwell Associates'. He maintains that there is no substantial difference between that designation and 'Russell Birdwell and Associates' and, accordingly, that the County Clerk should not have rejected the certificate which is the basis of this appeal. We are inclined to agree with the petitioner that the difference between these two forms of designation is unsubstantial and almost imperceptible. However, the right to file under the designation 'Russell Birdwell Associates' is not before us on this appeal and, therefore, need not be considered by us.

"The order should be reversed, with twenty dollars costs and disbursements, and the application denied."

3. Shattls v. Watson, 295 N.Y. 582, 64 N.E.2d 285 (1945):

Appeal from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court in the first judicial department, entered June 1, 1945, which affirmed, by a divided court, two orders of the Supreme Court at Special Term (Cohalan, J.), entered in New York County, one denying petitioner's motion to compel the Clerk of the County of New York to accept for filing under section 440 of the Penal Law two certificates of doing business under assumed names and the other adhering, upon reargument, to the original disposition of the motion. By the certificates tendered for filing petitioner sought to use the assumed names of "The Insurance Counselor" and "The Insurance Counselor's Organization". The remedy in the nature of mandamus was denied in the courts below. In the Court of Appeals petitioner contended that respondent's refusal was arbitrary and unreasonable because (1) no statute prohibited an individual from using a trade name with the word "insurance" in it, (2) that the use of the two assumed names sought did not violate any provision of law, and (3) that the prohibition contained in section 666 of the Penal Law limited the use of the word "insurance" only in a corporate title and not by an individual and was intended to implement the prohibition contained in section 9 of the General Corporation Law applying to corporations. Respondent argued that he should not be required to accept a certificate which is misleading to the public, citing Matter of Birdwell, 268 App.Div. 642, 53 N.Y.S.2d 77.

Order affirmed, with costs; no opinion.

Concur: Loughran, Ch. J., Lewis, Conway, Thatcher and Dye, JJ. Desmond and Medalle, JJ., dissent and vote to reverse and remit the proceeding to Special Term with instructions to grant the mandamus order prayed for, on the ground that the County Clerk has no discretion as to whether or not to accept for filing a certificate of doing business under an assumed name, where, as here, the use of the assumed name shown on the certificate does not appear to violate any law.

SECTION 15. SOME PREVENTIVE DEVICES

MARGARET V. LYBOLT, A PUBLIC ENEMY LAW FOR NEW YORK

(A Study Prepared for the New York Law Revision Commission.)
N.Y.Leg.Doc. (1935) No. 60 (K), 7-36. 1935 Rep.Rec., St.Law Rev.Comm. 593-622.

In the last few weeks the public has been aroused by a clamorous press to the necessity for "putting teeth" in the New York public enemy law. This statute, which was enacted to permit the harassing of professional criminals who could not be convicted of any specific offense, requires proof of an unlawful purpose on the part of the accused. Because it is impossible for the State to secure such proof, the statute has failed of its purpose, and hence the demand for its revision. Public enemy laws in other states have been more stringent, but two of them have been declared unconstitutional.¹ Their fate warns us of the necessity for proceeding cautiously in any revision of the New York law.

The Vagrancy Laws

Public enemy laws are the modern offshoots of the statutes prohibiting vagrancy. Both may be justified more as preventive than as punitive measures. They are aimed at a course of conduct more or less innocent in itself because it will in all probability lead to crime.² Both are couched in broad and indefinite terms. In Anglo-American law, the vagrancy statute dates from the feudal period, when it was used to punish the fugitive serf.³ By 1597, however, it had assumed its modern role of a preventive. The statute of that year, 39 Eliz. c. 4, included in its definition of rogues and vagabonds all wandering persons and common laborers, able in body and refusing to work for the wages commonly given.⁴

The act 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, passed in 1824, still remains on the statute books in England. It extended the definition of vagrancy to include offenses against public decency and acts which while not criminal, nevertheless verged on criminality. One of its broader provisions is as follows:

Every suspected person or reputed thief, frequenting any river, canal, or navigable stream, dock, or basin, or any quay, wharf, or warehouse near or adjoining thereto, or any street, highway, or avenue leading thereto, or any place of public resort, or any avenue leading thereto, or any street with intent to commit felony . . . shall be deemed a rogue and vagabond. . . .⁵

The New York Vagrancy Statute

Before the enactment of the New York public enemy act, there existed in this state statutes under which many professional criminals might have been apprehended. Under Section 898-a of the Code of Criminal Procedure, a person who has been convicted as a thief, burglar, pickpocket, counterfeiter or forger and attends a gathering of people for an unlawful purpose is a disorderly person and may be imprisoned for not more than one hundred days. Under Section 512 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, one who has been adjudged an habitual criminal, if found in possession of tools used for the commission of crime or when found under circumstances which would lead to a belief that he is intending to commit some crime, is liable to punishment as a disorderly person if he cannot give a satisfactory account of himself to the magistrate. Under Section 887(10) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, "a person who has been more than once convicted as a pickpocket, thief, or burglar, and having no visible means of support, found loitering about steamboat landings, railroad stations, banking institutions, crowded thoroughfares, cars, omnibuses, hotels, or any public gatherings or assembly, and unable to give a satisfactory explanation of his presence" is declared a vagrant. All these sections, however, are too narrow to convict a person without a record, and require special circumstances which might not always be present or might be difficult to prove.

Section 887(1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure is broader in defining as a vagrant "a person who, not having visible means to maintain himself, lives without employment." The constitutionality of this subdivision of the New York statute is none too clear. It would not be held void for indefiniteness, since the term "without visible means of support" is the classical phrase employed in vagrancy statutes in almost every state, and has so often been construed that its meaning is well-defined.¹¹⁶ An objection that might be urged, however, is that it deprives the accused of due process in punishing mere idleness. It penalizes a state of being which the accused may, in times of unemployment, be helpless to remedy. The New York law, unlike the statutes upheld in *Ex parte Strittmatter*¹¹⁷ and Ex parte Karnstrom,¹¹⁸ does not require any act such as "loitering" or "wandering" to accompany the state of being without visible means of support. In sustaining the validity of the statute prohibiting "tramping or wandering from place to place" without visible means of support, the court in the Karnstrom case remarked that it did not penalize mere poverty and that one going from place to place seeking employment was not within its terms. If the New York statute is to be construed to mean that it does not include persons without visible means of support who have made an honest effort to procure employment, it is defective in not so providing. To insure its constitutionality, subdivision 1 might be amended to include a provision like that appearing in the statutes of sixteen other states to the effect that the prohibition does not extend to those who make an honest effort to procure employment.¹¹⁹ The California statute might well be used as a model since it could not easily be attacked as unconstitutional for indefiniteness. It reads as follows:

Every person without visible means of living who has the physical ability to work, and who does not seek employment, nor labor when employment is offered him, is a vagrant.¹²⁰

Prosecution under Subdivision 1 of the vagrancy statute should prove as effective in curbing organized crime as a statute penalizing consorting. A defendant convicted under this section may receive a sentence of six months as in the case of conviction under Section 722.¹²¹ Trial for vagrancy is summary.¹²² As an objection to the enforceability of Subdivision 1, however, it has been contended that magistrates of New York City refuse to convict under it if the defendant is in the possession of money when arrested. Authority on the possession of funds as a defense to a charge of vagrancy is meager, but it would seem that the requirement of visible means of maintenance refers to a source of income over a period of time. A dictum to the effect that possession of money is not a good defense in a prosecution for vagrancy is contained in the concurring opinion of People v. Cramer.¹²³ In support of this contention is an article in Justice of the Peace, where it is said of the defendant,

It then becomes less a question of how many coppers he has upon him than of what is his mode of life, whether he works, lives on his friends, enjoys a private income or is unable to say how he lives.¹²⁴

While possession of money should not be a defense, it is possible that prosecution of professional criminals under the vagrancy statute might be defeated by incorrect rulings. To eliminate this possibility, a provision that possession of funds is not a defense might be inserted in Section 887 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. Should this amendment be made, it would seem that all the undesirables included in the terms of Section 722(11) might be apprehended under this subsection of the vagrancy statute. Only those criminals who could prove a lawful means of support would have a valid defense, but those same defendants would in all probability have sufficient means to forfeit bail and avoid conviction under Section 722.

If a new public enemy law is adopted, it will take the form either of a vagrancy statute or of a statute prohibiting consorting. Of the two, the former is preferable. Its constitutionality is less doubtful than that of a statute penalizing mere association, and if well drafted, it should prove equally enforceable. Statutes aimed at consorting are rare in the United States and those enacted have been held invalid. The vagrancy statute, on the other hand, has in its favor the force of tradition and the respectability of long use.

Is a Public Enemy Act Desirable?

Before amending Section 722 of the Penal Law or prosecuting professional criminals under the vagrancy law, it should seriously be considered whether any such step is wise or necessary. In general the press is in favor of strengthening Section 722(11).¹²⁵ The New York Herald Tribune, however, has expressed its disapproval of the bill making consorting prima facie evidence of unlawful purpose. The concluding paragraph of an editorial appearing in that paper on February 9, 1935, after a roundup of criminals by the New York City police reads as follows:

. . . The Brownell bill would now eliminate the safeguard as to unlawful purpose. One cannot help regarding this with mistrust. It is true that prohibition is now past; it is true that the present administration of the Police Department has earned great public confidence, and it is still true that the immunity of our prominent criminals is a chief scandal of the times. But dropping the safeguard opens such patent opportunities to police corruption and tyranny under an incompetent administration that one must pause; while this very "round-up" is itself a pretty bad advertisement of the rough-and-ready character of police justice. It is not easy to believe that all 646 ought to be given six-month sentences, and it is harder to believe that the police can always discriminate properly. Nor can one welcome what is, at best, only a palliative for deep-seated diseases of our penal system which the public and the lawmakers between them are still too lazy to face.

Both the vagrancy law and Section 722(11) in its present form, may find ample justification in the fact that they tend to prevent crime. That has always been the defense of the vagrancy statutes, and that defense can be applied as forcibly to statutes prohibiting consorting for unlawful purpose. The crime menace would be reduced inestimably both in amount and violence if the professional criminal were forced to play a lone hand. Nevertheless it is undeniable that the immediate object of the public enemy laws is not prevention of future crime but punishment for past. They are used as a cheap substitute for prosecution of more specific offenses. As such, they are a reflection on our criminal procedure. They are comparable to the federal income tax statute when used as a weapon against some of our notorious gangsters. They tend to make the law the object of derision. It is somewhat absurd to sentence a defendant to six months for vagrancy or disorderly conduct when he is unpunished for extortion, robbery or homicide. Prosecution for the specific crime of which the defendant is guilty is always more effective than reliance on a statute which penalizes the accused for what he is, rather than for what he has done.

STATE OF MINNESOTA ex rel. PEARSON v. PROBATE COURT

Supreme Court of the United States, 1940.

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE HUGHES delivered the opinion of the Court.

Appellant, Charles Edwin Pearson, petitioned the Supreme Court of Minnesota for a writ of prohibition commanding the Probate Court of Ramsey County, and its Judge, to desist from proceeding against him as a "psychopathic personality" under Chapter 369 of the Laws of Minnesota of 1939. A proceeding under the statute had been brought in the Probate Court for the commitment of appellant and an order for his production and examination had been issued.

Appellant contended that the statute violated the due process and equal protection clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution, U.S.C.A. After hearing upon an alternative writ, the Supreme Court overruled these contentions and quashed the writ. 205 Minn. 545, 287 N.W. 297. The case comes here on appeal. Jud. Code Sec. 237(a), 28 U.S.C. § 344(a), 28 U.S.C.A. § 344(a).

The statute, in Section 1, defines the term "psychopathic personality" as meaning "the existence in any person of such conditions of emotional instability, or impulsiveness of behavior, or lack of customary standards of good judgment, or failure to appreciate the consequences of his acts, or a combination of any such conditions, as to render such person irresponsible for his conduct with respect to sexual matters and thereby dangerous to other persons".

Section 2 provides that, except as otherwise therein or thereafter provided, the laws relating to insane persons, or those alleged to be insane, shall apply with like force to persons having, or alleged to have, a psychopathic personality. There is a proviso that before proceedings are instituted the facts shall first be submitted to the county attorney who if he is satisfied that good cause exists shall prepare a petition to be executed by a person having knowledge of the facts and shall file it with the judge of the probate court of the county in which the "patient" has his "settlement or is present". The probate judge shall set the matter down for hearing and for examination of the "patient". The judge may exclude the general public from attendance. The "patient" may be represented by counsel and the court may appoint counsel for him if he is financially unable to obtain such assistance. The "patient" is entitled to compulsory process for the attendance of witnesses in his behalf. The court must appoint two duly licensed doctors of medicine to assist in the examination. The proceedings are to be reduced to writing and made parts of the court's records. From a finding of the existence of psychopathic personality, the "patient" may appeal to the district court.

READ & MACDONALD U.C.B.LEG.

After setting forth the general principles which governed its determination, the state court construed the statute in these words [205 Minn. 545, 287 N.W. 297, 302]: "Applying these principles to the case before us, it can reasonably be said that the language of Section 1 of the act is intended to include those persons who, by a habitual course of misconduct in sexual matters, have evidenced an utter lack of power to control their sexual impulses and who, as a result, are likely to attack or otherwise inflict injury, loss, pain or other evil on the objects of their uncontrolled and uncontrollable desire. It would not be reasonable to apply the provisions of the statute to every person guilty of sexual misconduct nor even to persons having strong sexual propensities. Such a definition would not only make the act impracticable of enforcement and, perhaps, unconstitutional in its application, but would also be an unwarranted departure from the accepted meaning of the words defined".

This construction is binding upon us. Any contention that the construction is contrary to the terms of the Act is unavailing here. For the purpose of deciding the constitutional questions appellant raises we must take the statute as though it read precisely as the highest court of the State has interpreted it. Supreme Lodge Knights of Pythias v. Meyer, 265 U.S. 30, 32, 44 S.Ct. 432, 68 L.Ed. 885; Guaranty Trust Company v. Blodgett, 287 U.S. 509, 513, 53 S.Ct. 244, 245, 77 L.Ed. 463; Hicklin v. Coney, 290 U.S. 169, 172, 54 S.Ct. 142, 144, 78 L.Ed. 247; Georgia Railway & Electric Co. v. Decatur, 295 U.S. 165, 170, 55 S.Ct. 701, 703, 79 L.Ed. 1365. Moreover, as it was the manifest purpose of the court to determine definitely the meaning of the Act, we accept the view presented by the Attorney General of the State at this bar, that the court used the word "include" as defining the entire class of persons to whom the statute applies and not as describing merely a portion of a larger class. In advance of a decision by the state court applying the statute to persons outside that definition, we should not adopt a construction of the provision which might render it of doubtful validity. Stephenson v. Binford, 287 U.S. 251, 277, 53 S.Ct. 181, 189, 77 L.Ed. 288, 87 A.L.R. 721.

This construction of the statute destroys the contention that it is too vague and indefinite to constitute valid legislation. There must be proof of a "habitual course of misconduct in sexual matters" on the part of the persons against whom a proceeding under the statute is directed, which has shown "an utter lack of power to control their sexual impulses", and hence that they "are likely to attack or otherwise inflict injury, loss, pain or other evil on the objects of their uncontrolled and uncontrollable desire". These underlying conditions, calling for evidence of past conduct pointing to probable consequences, are as susceptible of proof as many of the criteria constantly applied in prosecutions for crime. Nash v. United States, 229 U.S. 373, 377, 33 S.Ct. 780, 781, 57 L.Ed. 1232; Fox v. Washington, 236 U.S. 273, 277, 278, 35 S.Ct. 383, 384, 59 L.Ed. 573; Omaechevarria v. Idaho, 246 U.S. 343, 348, 38 S.Ct. 323, 325, 62 L.Ed. 763; United States v. Wurzbach, 280 U.S. 396, 399, 50 S.Ct. 167, 168, 74 L.Ed. 508. Appellant's criticisms are drawn from his interpretation of the statute and find no warrant in the statute as the state court has construed it.

Equally unavailing is the contention that the statute denies appellant the equal protection of the laws. The argument proceeds on the view that the statute has selected a group which is a part of a larger class. The question, however, is whether the legislature could constitutionally make a class of the group it did select. That is, whether there is any rational basis for such a selection. We see no reason for doubt upon this point. Whether the legislature could have gone farther is not the question. The class it did select is identified by the state court in terms which clearly show that the persons within that class constitute a dangerous element in the community which the legislature in its discretion could put under appropriate control. As we have often said, the legislature is free to recognize degrees of harm, and it may confine its restrictions to those classes of cases where the need is deemed to be clearest. If the law "presumably hits the evil where it is most felt, it is not to be overthrown because there are other instances to which it might have been applied." Miller v. Wilson, 236 U.S. 373, 384, 35 S.Ct. 342, 344, 345, 59 L.Ed. 628, L.R.A.1915F, 829; Lindsley v. Natural Carbonic Gas Co., 220 U.S. 61, 78, 79, 31 S.Ct. 337, 55 L.Ed. 369, Ann.Cas.1912C, 160; Semler v. Dental Examiners, 294 U.S. 608, 610, 611, 55 S.Ct. 570, 571, 79 L.Ed. 1086; West Coast Hotel Co. v. Parrish, 300 U.S. 379, 400, 57 S.Ct. 578, 585, 81 L.Ed. 703, 108 A.L.R. 1330.

There remains the question whether, apart from definition and classification, the procedure authorized by the statute adequately safeguards the fundamental rights embraced in the conception of due process. In this relation it is important to note that appellant has challenged the proceeding in limine by seeking to prevent the probate judge from entertaining it. To support such a challenge, the statute in its procedural aspect must be found to be invalid on its face and not by reason of some particular application inconsistent with due process. In that light the argument on this branch of the case also fails.

As we have seen, the facts must first be submitted to the county attorney who must be satisfied that good cause exists. He then draws a petition which must be "executed by a person having knowledge of the facts". The probate judge must set the matter for hearing and for examination of the person proceeded against. Provision is made for his representation by counsel and for compelling the production of witnesses in his behalf. The court must appoint two licensed doctors of medicine to assist in the examination. The argument that these doctors may not be sufficiently expert in this type of cases merely invites conjecture. There is no reason to doubt that qualified medical men are usually available. Laws as to proceedings where persons are alleged to be insane are made applicable. Appellant says that the patient cannot be released on bail. The State contests this, insisting that he may be so released pending hearing or on appeal, pointing to Mason's Minnesota Statutes, 1938 Supplement, Section 8992-178. Appellant contends that if the court finds the patient to be within the statute, he must be committed "for the rest of his life to an asylum for the dangerously insane." Mason's Minn.Stat., 1938 Supp., Sec. 8992-176. The State also contests this conclusion, maintaining that the commitment is without term and subject to the right of the patient, or any one interested in him, to petition the committing court for release at any time. Mason's Minn.Stat., 1938 Supp., Sec. 8992-143; Laws of 1935, Chap. 72, Sec. 143, as amended by Laws of 1939, Chap. 270, Sec. 8. The statute gives a right of appeal from the finding of the probate judge upon compliance with certain specified provisions of the Minnesota laws. Appellant contends that this excludes other provisions of laws relating to appeals in insanity cases. Again, appellant's position is contested by the State upon the ground that there is no express limitation or exclusion in the language of the statute and that other provisions governing appellate procedure apply. These various procedural questions and others suggested by appellant, do not appear to have been passed upon by the state court.

We fully recognize the danger of a deprivation of due process in proceedings dealing with persons charged with insanity or, as here, with a psychopathic personality as defined in the statute, and the special importance of maintaining the basic interests of liberty in a class of cases where the law though "fair on its face and impartial in appearance" may be open to serious abuses in administration and courts may be imposed upon if the substantial rights of the persons charged are not adequately safeguarded at every stage of the proceedings. But we have no occasion to consider such abuses here, for none have occurred. The applicable statutes are not patently defective in any vital respect and we should not assume, in advance of a decision by the state court, that they should be construed so as to deprive appellant of the due process to which he is entitled under the Federal Constitution. Plymouth Coal Co. v. Pennsylvania, 232 U.S. 531, 546, 34 S.Ct. 359, 363, 58 L.Ed. 713; Utah Power & Light Co. v. Pfof, 286 U.S. 165, 186, 187, 52 S.Ct. 548, 554, 76 L.Ed. 1038; Stephenson v. Binford, supra. On the contrary, we must assume that the Minnesota courts will protect appellant in every constitutional right he possesses. His procedural objections are premature.

The judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed.

FORM OF LAWMAKING: THE PARTS OF A STATUTE

SECTION 1. BILL OR RESOLUTION

1. PETITION TO PARLIAMENT AND RESPONSE

14 Edw. III, Rot.Parl. ii 122-3.

(Translation by Faith Thompson, Ph.D.)

The tenure of the petition of Mr. Geffrey de Staunton' brought into this parliament some diverse torts and delays, according to that which is supposed, done to him not duely against the law by the justices of the Common Bench, in the plea, which is before them by the writ of the king, between the said Mgr. Geffrey, plaintiff, and Mr. Johan de Staunton of Eyleston', knight, and Amye his wife, defendants, of fifteen (land) oxen with the possessions in Eyleston, etc.

31. To our Lord the King and his council, his liege Bacheler Geffrey de Staunton' shows how he has plead for a long time before the justices of the Common Bench, Johan de Staunton, knight, and Amye his wife, concerning certain properties in Eyleston; and through the default of the said Johan the said Amye was received to defend his right, and after several impediments of the Services of Our Lord the King, and other delays, the said Amye vouched for her said baron as guarantor, which voucher the said Geffrey for a certain cause counter-plead, and awaited judgment: And since through protests, and in other manner not duely made in the suit of the said Amye, the said parties were put off until a fortnight from the Trinity last passed. Concerning which adjournment and delay the said Geffrey filed petition in the last parliament before Our Lord the King, together with the tenure of the record and lawsuit of the said plea. Which there seen and examined, the said petition was signed and answered in said parliament in the following manner:

The council is advised that by the law of the land the said Geffrey de Staunton, who is strange to the territory, is entitled to the property which he holds because he is not thrown out of this property by statute, nor by any other law; therefore the court should judge according to what the parties have plead, and it has delayed to the risk of both parties. And as to the last point of the record, there Amye said that if the court holds that she has to respond besides, she is ready to do this: It is agreed that she cannot obtain another response by the law of the land, nor any other response by protest to save him, from the hour that the parties had all agreed to decide in judgment, as it appears in the record, of which this petition makes mention. And upon this either the writ orders to the justices of the Bench, or the plea is, that they should go to judgment in the said plea, according to the aforesaid opinion and advice, notwithstanding the aforesaid protest, as more fully appears by the said petition which remains in the chancellery. And of that petition and the endorsement of it the transcript is underwritten and begins as follows:

To Our Lord the King and his council shows Geffrey, son of William de Staunton, etc. Upon which petition and the endorsement of it a writ of the Great Seal was sent to the said justices of the Common Bench. Of which letter the transcript is undersigned and begins as follows:

Edward, by the grace of God, King of England and France, and Lord of Spain, to his justices of the Bench, etc. Together with the said transcript of the said petition and the endorsement of it, and the transcript of the tenure of the aforesaid record and lawsuit, of which the copy is undersigned and begins as follows:

Plea with Westm' in the presence of J. de Stonore and his fellow justices of the Bench of the King, on the day of St. Michael in a fortnight, in the year of the reign of King Edward III, from the 13th conquest, title xvii. Geffrey, son of William de Staunton, etc. Who having seen the same record and lawsuit, and the aforesaid petition and endorsement, if in the said plea the action was such, that then they should proceed to render judgment according to the aforesaid advice and agreement, and should grant by letter under the Privy Seal of which the copy is underwritten and begins as follows:

Edward, by the grace of God, Ruler of England and France, and Lord of Ireland, to the justices of the Common Bench, etc. And since because they did not want to do anything, notwithstanding the writs, or because they might show cause, etc., why they still have not wanted to do anything, or show cause, by which one believes and understands that they will still make adjournment to the great damage of the said Geffrey, and through the delay to cause his disinheritance. When he begged the said council that, for the sake of God, they might want to have consideration for the things above said, and to order the said justices that they should go to render judgment according to the cause plead before them, having consideration for the opinion of the said parliament and above said orders, before the session is completed, they should order that there should not be caused any other adjournment or delay to his disinheritance: Or they should order the justices to send their rolls and the said record and lawsuit into said parliament; that there, by assent of the parliament and of all, can be granted the judgment, and the judgment rendered, either for or against him, before the said session adjourns, considering the statutes made that no common law should be delayed or the judgment postponed through difficulty or opinions, but justice done to all, as Our Lord the King is held by his oath.

The response of this petition made in the said parliament follows:

Seen and read in the midst of parliament the said petition and the said transcript of the petition presented in the last parliament and the endorsement of it, and made the aforesaid transcripts of the tenure of the said record of the said plea which comes to the chancellery, and of the writs of the Great Seal and Privy Seal made upon this and sent to the said justices, who are underwritten; it is assented to by all in the midst of parliament and ordered by the prelates, courts, barons, and others of the parliament, to Sir Thomas de Drayton, clerk of parliament, that he should go to Mr. Johan de Stonore and to his associates, justices of the Common Bench, and tell them that they should proceed to render judgment according to the cause plead before them, before the session adjourns, without adjourning or delaying the parties any more. And in case that they cannot accede, through difficulty of another cause, that then the said Sir Johan should bring with him the rolls and the record of the same plea to parliament, there to take final counsel what judgment will have to be made. Which Sir Johan and his associates brought to parliament, the next Monday before the feast of St. Margaret, the rolls and the record of the said plea. And assembled there chancellor, treasurer, justices of both Benches, barons of the Exchequer, and others of the king's council, and in said parliament seen and read the said lawsuit and record, and the same record plead and inscribed according to the cause, and in said parliament diligently debated, and examined in the same parliament, it is finally granted that the aforesaid Geffrey, who does not belong to the said territory, nor is heir of the party, but entirely foreign, should be received to aver that the said Thomas never had any claim in the said property; and that the said Amye as guarantor of the aforesaid Johan, her baron, does not have the aforesaid possession; what she before refused should not now be received, notwithstanding the protest contained in the said record. And if the opinion in the court should be, etc., but that the said Geffrey should recover seisin of the same lands. Therefore, in said parliament it is ordered to the justices, that they should go to their Bench to render judgment upon the things that were plead before them by the parties, and of which they sat in judgment, notwithstanding that the said Amye now asks to be received to the aforesaid property, which she expressly refused before; they should order that the said Geffrey should recover his seisin against the aforesaid Johan and Amye, etc.

2. ORDER TO PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEES

14 Edw. III, Rot.Parl. ii 113.

7. Concerning which petitions and conditions, by command of Our Lord the King and agreement of the prelates, counts, barons, and commons being in said parliament, the hereinafter written were summoned to sit (have their sessions) until such time as they should have discussed them and put it (the conclusions reached) into a statute, to wit the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of Duresme and Cestr', and the treasurer; . . . the Counts of Derby, Arundell, and Hunteyngdon; . . . the Lords of Wake, and Percy, Mr. Rauf de Nevill, Mr. Geffrai de Scrop', Mr. Johan de Stonore, Mr. Robert de Sadyngton, and Robert Parnyng, with twelve knights of the counties, whom the commons wanted to select. And let those very ones be summoned to decide upon the conditions and petitions affecting the clergy and to put them into a statute. And it is agreed that six citizens and burghers may be with them for discussion of the aforesaid things. And the names of the knights, citizens, and burghers follow; to wit, Roger de Chaundos, Piers Tylel, Johan de Orreton, Johan Turney, Edward de Seint, Thomas de Marleberwe, Rogier de Leuthe, Johan de Hayton', William Gramary, knights; and Th' de Wycombe, Robert de Morewode, Philip de Cayly, Johan de Rattelefden', Johan de Preston', Th' But, citizens and burghers. Which archbishops, bishops and the others thus summoned, heard and selected the said petitions by general assent and accord of all, putting into a statute the points and the articles which are perpetual. Which statute Our Lord the King, by assent of all present in said parliament, ordered to be engrossed and sealed and firmly observed throughout the Kingdom of England; and which statute begins, "To the honour of God, etc."

8. And concerning the points and articles which are not perpetual, but for a time, so has Our Lord the King, by assent of the nobles and commons caused to be done and sealed, his letters patent which begin in this manner, "Edward, etc., May you know that as prelates, counts, etc."

3. STATUTE

14 Edw. III. st. 1 and Cap. V.

Statutes made at Westminster Anno 14 Edw. III, Stat. 1 and Anno primo of his Reign of France, and Anno Dom. 1340: To the Honour of God and of Holy Church, by the Assent of the Prelates, Earls, Barons, and others assembled at the Parliament holden at Westminster the Wednesday next after Midlent, in the Fourteenth Year of the Reign of our Lord King Edward the Third of England, and the First Year of his Reign of France; the King, for the Peace and Quietness of his People, as well great as small, doth grant and establish the Things underwritten, which he will to be holden and kept in all Points perpetually to endure.

Delays of Judgment in other Courts shall be redressed in Parliament; ITEM. Because divers Mischiefs have happened for that in divers Places, as well in the Chancery, as in the King's Bench, the Common Bench, and in the Exchequer before the Justices assigned, and other justices to hear and determine deputed, the Judgments have been delayed, sometime by Difficulty and sometime by divers Opinions of the Judges, and sometime for some other cause; (2) it is assented, established, and accorded, That from henceforth at every Parliament shall be chosen a Prelate, two Earls, and two Barons, which shall have Commission and Power of the King to hear by Petition delivered to them, the Complaints of all those that will complain them of such Delays or Grievances done to them; (3) and they shall have Power to cause to come before them at Westminster, or else where the Places of any of them shall be, the Tenor of Records and Processes of such Judgments so delayed, and to cause the same Justices to come before them, which shall be then present, to hear their cause and reasons of such Delays; (4) which Cause and Reason so heard, by good Advice of themselves, the Chancellor, Treasurer, the Justices of the one Bench and of the other, and other of the King's Council, as many and such as they shall think convenient, shall proceed to take a good Accord, and make a good Judgment; (5) and according to the same Accord so taken, The Tenor of the said Record, together with the Judgment which shall be accorded, shall be remanded before the Justices, before whom the Plea did depend, and that they hastily go to give Judgment according to the same Record; (6) and in case it seemeth to them, that the Difficulty be so great, that it may not well be determined without assent of the Parliament, that the said Tenor or Tenors shall be brought by the said Prelate, Earls, and Barons, unto the next Parliament, and there shall be a final Accord taken what Judgment ought to be given in this Case; (7) and according to this Accord it shall be commanded to the Judges, before whom the Plea did depend, that they shall proceed to give Judgment without Delay. (8) And to begin to do Remedy upon this Ordinance, it is assented, that a Commission and a Power shall be granted to the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Earls of Arundel and Huntington, the Lord of Wake, and the Lord Ralph Baffet, to endure till the next Parliament. (9) And though the Ministers have made an Oath before this Time, yet nevertheless to remember them of the same Oath, it is assented, that as well the Chancellor, Treasurer, Keeper of the Privy Seal, the Justices of the one Bench and of the other, the Chancellor, Barons of the Exchequer, as the Justices assigned, and all they that do meddle in the said Places under them, by the Advice of the same Archbishop, Earls, and Barons, shall make an Oath well and lawfully to serve the King and his People. (10) And by the Advice of the said Prelate, Earls and Barons, be it ordained to increase the Number of the Ministers when Need shall be, and them to diminish in the same Manner; (11) and so from Time to Time, when Officers shall be newly put in the said Offices, they shall be sworn in the same Manner.

NOTE

For the origin and historical development of the use of "petitions" or "bills" in the English Parliament, see Gray, "The Influence of the Commons on Early Legislation", 34 Harvard Historical Studies (1932). The author says at p. 47: "A measure introduced for parliamentary consideration was throughout the (fifteenth) century called indifferently a petition or a bill. . . . Indeed from the early years of the reign of Edward III petitions were called bills."

VISOR v. WATERS

Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 1936. 320 Pa. 406, 182 A. 241.

The opinion of President Judge Hargest is as follows:

This case comes before us upon a petition for mandamus and the return thereto.

The return raised some questions which were abandoned at the argument, and it is now conceded that the court should pass upon the merits of the petitioners' claim. The facts averred in the petition are admitted, and a stipulation has been filed showing that the petitioners all performed clerical services, except the Sergeant at Arms.

The petitioners, along with others, were appointed in the House of Representatives January 17, 1933, and their compensation was fixed by the Act of July 1, 1919, P.L. 717 (46 P.S. § 21 et seq.), upon a per diem basis. They served during the 1933 regular session. On November 27, 1934, they each received a letter from the chief clerk of the House of Representatives notifying them that the General Assembly would convene Tuesday, January 1, 1935, saying, "Under the law, you are a returning officer, Session of 1935. You will please report for services on above date. If not reelected you will, for this service, receive round trip mileage and per diem pay for 10 days, or until your successor is elected."

The petitioners returned to perform their duties on January 1, 1935. On that date the House of Representatives adopted a resolution, in part, as follows: "That all officers and positions of employment in the House of Representatives be declared vacant with the following named exceptions." The petitioners were not within those excepted from the operation of the resolution. Their successors were not elected until January 14, 1935. They claim compensation at their per diem rate, for twelve days, until their successors were elected. The defendants contend that they are entitled to one day only.

Section 10 of article 3 of the Constitution of Pennsylvania provides, in part: "The General Assembly shall prescribe by law the number, duties and compensation of the officers and employees of each House."

Article 6, § 4, provides, in part: "Appointed officers, other than judges of the courts of record and the Superintendent of Public Instruction, may be removed at the pleasure of the power by which they shall have been appointed."

The Act of July 1, 1919, P.L. 717 (46 P.S. § 21 et seq.), providing for the election and appointment of officers and employees of the General Assembly and fixing their compensation and duties, provides in paragraph 2 of section 1 (46 P.S. § 21, par. 2), for the clerical and other positions in the House of Representatives, and provides with certain exceptions, that they shall be elected by the House of Representatives.

Section 2 of the act (46 P.S. § 22) provides: "All officers and employees of the General Assembly shall be elected or appointed in the odd-numbered years, at the opening of each regular biennial session, and shall serve until ten days after the opening of the next General Assembly or until their successors are selected and have qualified."

Section 3 (46 P.S. § 23) provides for the compensation of the various clerks and other employees, some at a salary and others on a per diem basis.

Section 5 (46 P.S. § 25) provides: "All the officers and employees provided for in this act shall return as such to the next regular biennial session of the Legislature following that for which they were elected or appointed, and those who shall not be reelected or reappointed or elected or appointed to some other office in the Legislature shall be allowed their regular per diem compensation, except the assistant clerks, the journal clerks, assistant journal clerks, reading clerks, assistant reading clerk, executive clerk, desk clerks, and message clerks, who shall each receive ten dollars per diem for ten days or until their successors are duly elected or appointed and have qualified."

There are several interesting and somewhat difficult questions which arise in this controversy: (1) Are the petitioners included in those for whom the act provides a ten-day compensation upon returning to the next legislative session? (2) Are they officers within the meaning of article 6, section 4 of the Constitution, removable at the pleasure of the appointing power? (3) Is their relation to the state one of contract? (4) Is there any constitutional provision prohibiting the Legislature from fixing the terms of those who are not officers?

(3) It is also contended by the petitioners that if the resolution dismissing them has the effect of releasing the commonwealth from liability for their pay, that resolution would be unconstitutional, since it would impair the obligation of the contract between them and the commonwealth. There is no merit in this contention. While it is settled that the contract clause of the Federal Constitution prohibiting any state from passing a law violating the obligation of a contract applies to a state as well as to individuals (6 R.C.L. 33, paragraph 325; 12 Corpus Juris 996, paragraph 608), it is also settled by a multitude of decisions that the employment by the state of officers and agents to carry on the functions of government does not constitute a contract which cannot be abrogated by the state. In Commonwealth v. Tice, 282 Pa. 595, 597, 128 A. 506, 507, it is said: "The Legislature may deal with such offices absolutely as it pleases, and may even abolish them altogether, since they are not grants, contracts, or obligations which cannot be impaired by an act of the Legislature. It necessarily follows that it may abridge or extend the terms, change the duties, and increase or reduce the compensation of persons already in office." 8 Cyc. 954. See, also, 12 Corpus Juris 1017. . . . The incumbent of a legislative office has no vested rights therein and may be entirely deprived of the same by an abolition of the office." So "it may also shorten or lengthen the term of service," Newton v. Mahon- ing County Commissioners, 100 U.S. 548, 559, 25 L.Ed. 710, even though "this may include a part of the term of the office then unexpired." Fisk v. Jefferson Police Jury, 116 U.S. 131, 134, 6 S.Ct. 329, 330, 29 L.Ed. 587; Butler v. Pennsylvania, 10 How. 402, 13 L.Ed. 472; Robertson v. Miller, 276 U.S. 174, 48 S.Ct. 266, 72 L.Ed. 517; United States v. Fisher, 109 U.S. 143, 3 S.Ct. 154, 27 L.Ed. 885.

But the Legislature has not attempted to do any of these things, the attempt is made only by the House of Representatives.

(4) As already pointed out, section 10, article 3, of the Constitution provides that "The General Assembly shall prescribe by law the number, duties and compensation of the officers and employees of each House." Without this constitutional provision, it would be clear that each House could fix the number, duties, compensation and terms of its own officers and employees. With this constitutional provision, it takes some action as a General Assembly, and not the action of each individual House, to fix them. This constitutional provision has found expression in the act of 1919 which fixes the number, compensation, duties, and terms of the officers and employees, and provides in the cases of the employees in question that they shall be elected by the House of Representatives. The purpose of the act in fixing the term of service of those elected at the beginning of one session to run ten days or until their successors are appointed into the next session, is apparent. It was intended that the new session of the Legislature should be organized with persons skilled in the duties so that the machinery of government should operate as smoothly as possible. Here then is a positive statutory provision. Is this statutory provision to be overcome and the statute ignored because there is a settled rule of law that, generally speaking, the appointing power has the right to dismiss? Was section 4, article 6, of the Constitution, which provides that appointed officers, other than judges of the courts of record and the superintendent of public instruction, may be removed at the pleasure of the power by which they shall have been appointed, intended to extend that well-settled principle, applicable to employees, to appointed public officers? Did the Constitution refer only to officers because the right of removal of employees was too plain to be expressed in the fundamental law? As against this suggestion, is not the proper construction of section 4 of article 6 of the Constitution that it intended to leave open the right of the Legislature to regulate both the appointment and removal of all public employees below the grade of officers? Where the Legislature is not inhibited by any constitutional prohibition, it is always free, by statutory enactment, to change the settled principles of law. It is also free to regulate by law the machinery for running the government, municipal or state. The Legislature can determine when and under what circumstances a municipality (a subordinate agency of the state) may or may not discharge its employees. That being so, it is not beyond question that each constituent House of the Legislature may join in an Act of Assembly surrendering the right of that House, in the interest of governmental efficiency, to the discharge without cause of its employees, and agreeing that a term should be fixed for them? This is illustrated in the civil service acts. Commonwealth v. Hasskarl, 21 Pa. Dist. R. 119.

It is a settled rule that one Legislature may not bind another, and no action by one House could bind a subsequent session of that same House, but when the constituent bodies have united in a statute, a single House, by a mere resolution, cannot set aside and nullify the positive provisions of a law. Commonwealth v. Bitner, 294 Pa. 549, 144 A. 733; 54 Corpus Juris, 720, 722. A new law can do that, but nothing less than a law can. Butler v. Pennsylvania, 10 How. 402, 13 L. Ed. 472.

Argued before FRAZER, C. J., and KEPHART, SCHAFFER, MAXEY, DREW, LINN, and BARNES, JJ.

PER CURIAM. The judgment in this case is affirmed on the full and comprehensive opinion of the learned president judge of the lower court.

Judgment affirmed at appellants' costs.

UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION

Article I, § 7.

All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills.

Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his objections, to that house in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their journal and proceed to reconsider it. If after such reconsideration two thirds of that house shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other house, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two thirds of that house it shall become a law. But in all such cases the votes of both houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the persons voting for and against the bill shall be entered on the journal of each house respectively. If any bill shall not be returned by the President within ten days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress by their adjournment prevent its return, in which case it shall not be a law.

Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill.

UNITED STATES REVISED STATUTES

Title I, § 8.

Resolving Clause. The resolving clause of all joint resolutions shall be in the following form: "Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled."

NOTE

In Hawes & Co. v. Wm. R. Trigg & Co., 1909, 110 Va. 165, at p. 201, 65 S.E. 538, Cardwell, J., said: "The difference between an Act of Congress and a joint resolution is, that the former governs all persons under the jurisdiction of the enacting power, while the latter is but a rule for the guidance of the agents and servants of the sovereign."

L. LITTLEJOHN & CO. v. UNITED STATES.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1926.
270 U.S. 215, 46 S.Ct. 244, 70 L.Ed. 553.

MR. JUSTICE McREYNOLDS delivered the opinion of the Court.

The court below sustained a challenge to its jurisdiction, and this direct appeal followed.

October 9, 1919, in New York Harbor the steamships Antigone and Gaelic Prince collided. Serious injury resulted to the latter and its cargo. February 19, 1921, relying upon the Suits in Admiralty Act of March 9, 1920 (chapter 95, 41 Stat. 525 [Comp.St.Ann.Supp.1923, §§ 1251 $\frac{1}{4}$ –1251 $\frac{1}{4}$ l]), the owners seek to recover damages. The Act of March 3, 1925, c. 428, 43 Stat. 112 (Comp.St.Supp. 1925, §§ 1251 $\frac{3}{4}$ —1 to 1251 $\frac{3}{4}$ —10), is not applicable. They allege that the collision resulted from the fault of the Antigone. Also that—

At all times mentioned herein prior to the 13th day of October, 1919, and particularly on the 9th day of October, 1919 the date of the collision hereinafter mentioned, the steamship Antigone was owned by a private person or merchant who was solely entitled to the immediate and lawful possession, operation, and control of said vessel. At no time prior to said 13th day of October, 1919, was the said steamship Antigone owned, either absolutely or pro hac vice, by the United States of America, nor by any corporation in which the United States of America or its representatives owned the entire outstanding capital stock, nor lawfully in the possession of the United States of America or of such corporation, nor lawfully operated by or for the United States of America or such corporation. On the 13th day of October, 1919, the respondent United States of America became, ever since has been, and now is in the lawful possession of the steamship Antigone, but at no time has the United States of America held the legal title to or been the absolute owner of said steamship Antigone.

The United States appeared specially and suggested that when the collision occurred they owned, possessed, and controlled, the Antigone, and therefore the court was without jurisdiction. This was denied, and evidence was taken upon the consequent issue. Having considered the evidence, the court held that the United States owned the vessel and were navigating her, with a crew employed by the War Department, in transporting supplies and troops. The libels were accordingly dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

If the established facts show such ownership, possession, and control, then, under the doctrine of The Western Maid, 42 S.Ct. 159, 257 U.S. 419, 66 L.Ed. 299, to which we adhere, the decree is clearly right.

The history of the matter is this. The Antigone—then the privately-owned German merchantman Neckar—took refuge within the United States prior to April 6, 1917, when war with Germany was declared. By Joint Resolution of May 12, 1917, c. 13, 40 Stat. 75, being Comp.St.1918, Comp.St.Ann.Supp. 1919, §§ 8146rr, 8146s (copied in the margin,¹) Congress authorized the President to take over to the United States the immediate possession and title of any vessel within their jurisdiction which at the time of coming therein was owned by any corporation, citizen or subject of an enemy nation, or was under register of any such nation. By Executive Order of June 30, 1917, the President affirmed that the Neckar was such a vessel, and ordered that "the possession and title" be taken over through the United States Shipping Board. He further authorized that board to repair, equip, man, and operate her. It accordingly took her, July 17, 1917, and thereafter a naval board appraised her. Subsequently she was transferred to the Navy Department, renamed the Antigone, and later transferred to the Army Transport Service. October 9, 1919, she sailed under a master, officers and crew of the United States Transport Service from New York bound for Brest, from which port she was to return with troops.

¹ Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to take over to the United States the immediate possession and title of any vessel within the jurisdiction thereof, including the Canal Zone and all territories and insular possessions of the United States except the American Virgin Islands, which at the time of coming into such jurisdiction was owned in whole or in part by any corporation, citizen, or subject of any nation with which the United States may be at war when such vessel shall be taken, or was flying the flag of or was under register of any such nation or any political subdivision or municipality thereof; and, through the United States Shipping Board, or any department or agency of the government, to operate, lease, charter, and equip such vessel in any service of the United States, or in any commerce, foreign, or coastwise.

Sec. 2. That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint, subject to the approval of the President, a board of survey, whose duty it shall be to ascertain the actual value of the vessel, its equipment, appurtenances, and all property contained therein, at the time of its taking, and to make a written report of their findings to the Secretary of the Navy, who shall preserve such report with the records of his department. These findings shall be considered as competent evidence in all proceedings on any claim for compensation.

Appellants say that the rules of international law as recognized by the United States forbade them from confiscating German vessels within their jurisdiction at outbreak of the war, and that the Resolution of May 12, 1917, should be so interpreted as to harmonize with these rules. They further insist that thus interpreted the Resolution only gave authority to detain and operate the Antigone as enemy property, leaving title in the original German owners and the vessel subject to ordinary maritime liens. Our attention is called to the course pursued by the British government and to certain decisions of their courts. The Chile, 1 Br. & Col. Prize Cases, 1; The Gutenfels, 2 Br. & Col. Prize Cases, 36; The Prinz Adalbert, 3 Br. & Col. Prize Cases, 70, 72; The Blonde [1922] L.R. 1 A.C. 313, 334.

Both Great Britain and Germany were parties to Convention VI of the Second Hague Peace Conference, 1907,² and the action of the former, referred to by counsel, was taken in view of obligations thus assumed. The United States did not approve that convention, and the cited cases involved problems wholly different from the one here presented.

It is unnecessary to consider how far the ancient rules of international law concerning confiscation of enemy property have been modified by recent practices. In the absence of convention every government may pursue what policy it thinks best concerning seizure and confiscation of enemy ships in its harbors when war occurs. The Hague Conference (1907) recognized this and sought by agreement to modify the rule. The Blonde, supra, page 326. Our problem is to determine the result of action taken under a joint resolution of Congress whose language is very plain and refers only to enemy vessels. It authorized the President to take "possession and title," and, obeying, he took them. We do not doubt the right of any independent nation so to do without violating any uniform or commonly accepted rule of international law; and Congress had power to authorize the action irrespective of any general views theretofore advanced in behalf of this government. Certainly courts within the United States must recognize the legality of the seizure; the duly expressed will of Congress when proceeding within its powers is the supreme law of the land.

² Article 1. When a merchant ship belonging to one of the belligerent powers is at the commencement of hostilities in an enemy port it is desirable that it should be allowed to depart freely, either immediately, or after a reasonable number of days of grace, and to proceed, after being furnished with a pass, direct to its port of destination or any other port indicated.

The same rule should apply in the case of a ship which has left its last port of departure before the commencement of the war and entered a port belonging to the enemy while still ignorant that hostilities had broken out.

Art. 2. A merchant ship unable, owing to circumstances of force majeure, to leave the enemy port within the period contemplated in the above article, or which was not allowed to leave, cannot be confiscated.

The belligerent may only detain it, without payment of compensation, but subject to the obligation of restoring it after the war, or requisition it on payment of compensation.

Brown v. United States, 8 Cranch, 110, 122 (3 L.Ed. 504):

"That war gives to the sovereign full right to take the persons and confiscate the property of the enemy wherever found, is conceded. The mitigations of this rigid rule, which the humane and wise policy of modern times has introduced into practice, will more or less affect the exercise of this right, but cannot impair the right itself. That remains undiminished, and when the sovereign authority shall choose to bring it into operation, the judicial department must give effect to its will. But until that will shall be expressed no power of condemnation can exist in the court."

The decree of the court below is affirmed.

WATTS v. UNITED STATES

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, 1947. 161 F.2d 511.

MCCORD, CIRCUIT JUDGE. W. W. Watts was convicted on two counts of an information which charged that he had willfully and unlawfully sold certain automobiles at prices in excess of ceilings fixed by Maximum Price Regulation No. 540 as amended, in violation of the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, as amended, and the Price Control Extension Act of 1946, 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix, § 901 et seq. On each count Watts was fined $1,000 and sentenced to imprisonment for one year, the sentences of imprisonment to run concurrently. . . .

After the motions for a continuance, for dismissal of the information, and for a bill of particulars had been denied, defendant moved to stay the proceedings in order that he might file complaint against the Price Administrator in the Emergency Court of Appeals under Title 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix, § 924. In the motion, defendant's basis of attack was that the sales had been made in August, 1946, and that the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942 had expired and the Price Control Extension Act of 1946 was ineffectual to extend it. On appeal, as on the trial, appellant attacks the Act of 1942 as being unconstitutional, and further contends that in any event an extension of the Act could not constitutionally be accomplished by passage of a joint resolution, approved by the President. The constitutionality of the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942 had been upheld prior to defendant's complaint. Yakus v. United States, 321 U.S. 414, 64 S.Ct. 660, 88 L. Ed. 834. Moreover, the joint resolution, approved by the President, was an effective constitutional method for extending the Act. A joint resolution of the House and Senate, when approved by the President, has the effect of law. Constitution, Art. I, Sec. 7; *United States ex rel. Levey v. THE CONSTITUTION OF MINNESOTA, Article 4.

Section 12. No money shall be appropriated except by bill. Every order, resolution or vote requiring the concurrence of the two houses, (except such as relate to the business or adjournment of the same,) shall be presented to the governor for his signature, and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or being returned by him with his objections, shall be repassed by two thirds of the members of the two houses, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in case of a bill.

Section 13. The style of all laws of this state shall be: "Be it enacted by the legislature of the state of Minnesota." No law shall be passed unless voted for by a majority of all the members elected to each branch of the legislature, and the vote entered upon the journal of each house.

ST. PAUL & CHICAGO RAILWAY CO. v. BROWN

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1877. 24 Minn 517.

This action was brought in the district court for Ramsey County, pursuant to a joint resolution of the state legislature approved March 11, 1873, (Laws 1873, p. 283), against the defendants Brown and others as trustees of the Minnesota Hospital for the Insane, and against the defendant C. K. Davis, as governor of the state, to establish the title of the plaintiff to a large quantity of swamp lands, granted to the state by act of Congress. The joint resolution was as follows:

Whereas, By an act of the legislature of the state of Minnesota entitled "An act granting lands to aid the Saint Paul and Pacific Railroad Company in the construction of their branch railroad from Saint Paul to Winona," approved March 6, 1863, there was granted to said railroad company swamp lands of the state of Minnesota to the amount of fourteen full sections to the mile of said branch road, to aid in the construction thereof; and

Whereas, By an act of the legislature of said state, entitled "An act to appropriate swamp lands to educational and charitable institutions therein named, and for the purpose of erecting a state prison," approved February 13, 1865, swamp lands of the state, not otherwise disposed of prior to the passage of said act, were directed to be selected and set apart for certain state institutions therein named, large amounts of which lands have been under act so selected and set apart; and

Whereas, The title to the said lands so selected and set apart for said institutions is disputed by the Saint Paul and Chicago Railway Company; therefore

Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota:

Section I. That the Minnesota Hospital for Insane, the Deaf, Dumb and Blind Asylum, the State Prison, and each of the normal schools of this state, by and in their respective names, or in the names of the trustees or other officers having the superintendence or control of said institutions, and the Saint Paul and Chicago Railway Company in its corporate name, are hereby empowered to institute and defend all such actions and legal proceedings in the proper courts of this state as may be necessary to try and determine all questions concerning the title to any swamp lands granted to, or selected or set apart for, any of said institutions, or said Saint Paul and Pacific Railroad Company for its Winona branch, under any act of the legislature of this state; and all of the above-named institutions and Saint Paul and Chicago Railway Company, under and by the names aforesaid, shall have the same power to sue and be sued, to defend and be defended in the courts of this state, in reference to any questions concerning the title to such lands, as if they were natural persons.

Section II. That the actions and legal proceedings hereby authorized to be commenced and defended, may be either upon an agreed case, or be conducted in the usual way of civil actions; and the decision and judgment of the court therein, so far as respects the title to said lands, or any portion thereof, and the right to their use, enjoyment and disposition is concerned, shall be binding upon the parties to said action or proceedings, and upon the state of Minnesota, in the same manner and to the same extent as in other civil actions; but no order, decision or judgment shall be rendered in any such proceeding or action against any such institution for any costs, charges or disbursements incurred therein, nor for the recovery of any damages for the withholding of any of said real property or lands, nor for the rents, issues or profits thereof, nor in any manner affecting any property other than such lands belonging to any such institution or to the state, nor creating or declaring any liability or obligation for the payment of any money against the said state, or any such institution.

The defendants being only the executive agents and trustees of the state, and the plaintiff attacking them in their official capacity, the plaintiff is not entitled to bring or maintain this action against them, for the reason that the court has no jurisdiction over them in the capacity in which they are sued. This is, in legal effect, a suit against the state, and no state can be sued—certainly not unless it waive its sovereignty, and authorize the suit by an act having the full force and effect of law. The joint resolution of 1873 has no such effect, for the constitution (Art. 4, s. 13,) requires that the style of all laws shall be "Be it enacted," etc. When new laws are to be passed or existing laws repealed, it must be done by bill, in the style and form prescribed by the constitution, and duly enacted into law. The joint resolution is at most merely a formal expression of the sense or sentiment of the legislature.

GILFILLAN, C. J. The case comes here upon appeal from an order sustaining demurrers to the complaint . . . Demurrers were interposed on the part of the governor, on the ground that the court has not jurisdiction over him . . . ; and on the part of the trustees, on the ground that the court has no jurisdiction of the persons or of the subject of the action . . .

The demurrer on the part of the governor was properly sustained, on the ground that the court has no jurisdiction over him. The duties of the governor sought to be enforced are duties belonging to him as executive of the state, and not as an individual. Rice v. Austin, 19 Minn. 103. He is not subject to the control of the judiciary in the performance of such duties, and no action or proceeding before any court will lie against him to compel such performance. Nor can the joint resolution of the legislature, referred to in the complaint, bring him under such control. The independence of each of the three departments of the government—the executive, legislative and judicial—rests upon the constitution, Article 3, and cannot be affected by any legislative act, although it may be approved by the governor at the time it passes.

The same ground of demurrer taken by the trustees is not well founded. The exemption from control by the judiciary on the part of the governor, does not extend to mere administrative agents, who are created, and their powers and duties defined, by the legislature. The courts may entertain suits against them as against any merely ministerial officers.

The subject-matter of the action is property belonging to the state, and the action, though nominally against the trustees, is virtually against the state, to determine its right in the property involved. The exemption of the state from actions by its citizens is not based on any constitutional provision, but merely on grounds of public policy. A waiver of such exemption does not trench upon the independence of any department of the government. There can be no doubt that the legislature may waive such exemption, nor that its consent to do so may be expressed by joint resolution, passed in the manner prescribed by the constitution as effectually as in the more formal mode by bill. It is to matters of this character that Section 12, Article 4 of the constitution relates. The joint resolution of 1873 is an answer to the objection that the action is virtually against the state. . . .

The order appealed from, so far as it sustains the demurrer of the defendant Davis, is affirmed. So far as it sustains the demurrer of the other defendants, it is reversed, but without costs.

NOTE

In Kennedy, "Drafting Bills for the Minnesota Legislature," (1946), pp. 22-23, the author says: "Until recent years differentiation between the several types of resolutions, memorials as well, was very vague in Minnesota legislative practice, but there is at present being evolved an agreement upon the functional jurisdiction of each style of measure which is generally observed."

"Joint Resolution. A Joint Resolution is a high form of expression of the legislative will, the passage of which may be affected only by roll call, as in the case of a Bill, and approval by the Governor. A Joint Resolution is not, in itself, a law, but for a number of limited purposes it has the force of law. It is often employed for purposes, short of law, in which it is expedient or necessary to express the joint will and action of the Legislature and the Governor. It may be and has been used for the ratification of amendments to the Federal Constitution, but the proper vehicle for the exercise of this purely legislative function is the Concurrent Resolution. It is frequently employed to express the state's attitude and recommendation with respect to matters of national or general concern.

"Concurrent Resolution. A Concurrent Resolution is an expression of facts, principles, opinions, or the legislative will with respect to subjects or matters not requiring executive approval. It may be introduced in either House, but passage requires concurrence by the other. It is the proper vehicle for the ratification of proposed amendments to the Federal Constitution; for directing actions by State departments; for authorizing legislative investigations participated in by both Houses, where no appropriation of public funds is involved, and for any other procedure to which both Houses are parties. It is often employed to express sorrow over the death of a person who has served in both Houses of the Legislature.

"Resolution. A Resolution (simple resolution) is an expression of the will, wish, view, or opinion of the House adopting it. Concurrent action is not required. It may be employed by the House which has acted last to request return of a measure from the other House or from the Governor, for correction, amendment, or reconsideration. It is the customary vehicle for expression with respect to the death of members of the body adopting it. For any purpose not requiring action by both Houses it may be used in the same manner as the Concurrent Resolution.

"Memorial. A Memorial is a petition or prayer, usually addressed to the President, the Congress, or some official or department of the United States government, requesting an action which is within the jurisdiction of the official or body addressed. The procedure with respect to the passage of Joint, Concurrent, and simple Memorials is the same as for resolutions, except that a roll call is not required for the adoption of any memorial. A Joint Memorial calls for the Governor's signature, and therefore becomes an expression of the mutual or joint desire of the legislative and executive authorities."

SWANN v. BUCK

High Court of Errors and Appeals for Mississippi, 1866. 40 Miss. 268, ELLETT, J., delivered the opinion of the Court.

The defendant in error, who was elected in October, 1862, to the office of district-attorney of the third judicial district, composed of the counties of Tunica, Coahoma, Bolivar, Washington, Issaquena, and Warren, instituted this proceeding in the Circuit Court of Hinds county, against the auditor of public accounts, to obtain a writ of mandamus requiring the auditor to issue a warrant on the treasurer for the sum of $2,407, the amount claimed by the appellee to be due to him on account of his salary from October, 1863, to May 22, 1865. On the hearing of the case a peremptory mandamus was awarded, and from this judgment a writ of error is prosecuted. . . .

The present case, then, being in its general character a proper one for the application of this writ, the issuance of it is resisted, on the ground that a legislative prohibition exists against it.

By the "act concerning the salaries of officers," (Rev. Code, 140 article 1), it is enacted, "that the following annual salaries shall be allowed, and paid in quarterly payments, after being audited according to law, to the several officers hereinafter named, to wit: to each district-attorney the sum of $1,500." By article 32, Rev. Code, 108, it is made the duty of the auditor of public accounts "to examine, state, settle, and audit, all accounts, claims or demands whatsoever against the State, arising under any act or resolution of the legislature, and to grant to every claimant, authorized to receive the same, a warrant on the state treasury," etc.

If the rights of the relator depended exclusively upon these provisions, the propriety of awarding a peremptory mandamus would be quite apparent. But at the last session of the legislature various acts and resolutions were adopted, bearing directly upon this subject, among which is a joint resolution, approved October 25, 1865, in the following words: "Resolved, by the legislature of the State of Mississippi—That the auditor of public accounts be, and he is hereby directed to issue no more warrants upon the treasurer for the payment of money, until further orders."

This joint resolution, though it takes the form of a mere mandate to the officer, must, if entitled to have any effect at all, be construed as a repeal, or at least as a suspension of the provisions of the code on the subject of the issuance of warrants, and as taking away from the auditor all power to issue a warrant on the treasury for the payment of money until otherwise authorized by law.

The relator contends that this resolution forms no defense to his application for a mandamus, for the following reasons, to wit:

1. That it is void for want of an enacting clause, in the language prescribed by the constitution.
2. That it was not required to be read or passed with the forms prescribed in case of a bill, and therefore cannot operate to repeal a law formally enacted, not being of equal dignity.
3. That if otherwise valid, it would impair the obligation of the contract between himself and the State, and would take away his vested rights under that contract; and
4. That it did not take effect at all until after the date of the judgment in his favor in the court below, and therefore can have no application.

1. The first question is whether the resolution is void for want of a sufficient enacting clause; and this involves another question, to wit, whether the legislature has the constitutional power to pass a joint resolution at all, to have the force and effect of a law.

By the fourth section of the third article of the constitution, the legislative power of the State is vested in the two branches, which constitute the legislature, and it is ordained that "the style of their laws shall be: Be it enacted by the legislature of the State of Mississippi." As the style of this resolution is, "Resolved by the legislature of the State of Mississippi," if a literal adherence to the formula prescribed by the constitution is required, it would follow that the resolution is wholly void. The question is one that does not seem to have received a judicial decision, so far as we have been able to discover; but in a work cited on the law and practice of legislative assemblies, by Mr. Cushing, the opinion is expressed that this form of enactment must be strictly pursued, and that no equivalent language will be sufficient. In the absence of any authoritative adjudication, we are not prepared to adopt this conclusion. The argument against requiring a literal compliance with any form of words in the enacting clause, as a condition of giving effect to a statute, would be very strong on the score of convenience; for the plainest expressions of the legislative will, and the most urgent in their character, would be constantly liable to be defeated by the slightest omission or departure from the established phraseology. No possible good could be achieved by such strictness, and the greatest evil might result from it. There are no exclusive words in the constitution negating the use of any other language, and we think the intention will be best effectuated by holding the clause to be directory only. It is necessary that every law should show on its face the authority by which it is adopted and promulgated, and that it should clearly appear that it is intended by the legislative power that enacts it that it should take effect as a law. These conditions being fulfilled, all that is absolutely necessary is expressed. The word "resolved" is as potent to declare the legislative will as the word "enacted." It is true that a resolution may or may not take effect as a law, depending upon the occasion and object of its use. It may be resorted to as a vehicle to convey the opinions or wishes of the legislature on any subject, without prescribing any rule of conduct to be observed. But whenever a joint resolution does undertake to lay down a rule of conduct for any portion of the people of the State, it becomes a law, and will take effect as such, notwithstanding the use of the word "resolved" in its style, instead of the word "enacted." The requirement of the constitution is thereby substantially complied with, and the will of the legislature sufficiently declared.

Joint resolutions, having all the force and effect of laws, are common in the legislative practice of this State, and are to be found among the acts of almost every session, and applicable to almost every variety of subjects. Appropriations of money from the treasury to various objects have frequently been passed in this form, and no objection has ever been raised to their validity. They are expressly recognized by the constitution, which provides that they shall be presented to the governor and be approved by him, before they take effect, or, if disapproved, shall be repassed by both houses, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in case of a bill (article 5, section 16.) By the separate rules of each branch of the legislature, they are required as acts and addresses to be signed by the presiding officers; and by the joint rules of the two houses, they are required to be enrolled, examined and signed, and presented to the governor for approval, in the same manner, and by the same committee, as in the case of bills. Though generally, but not universally, confined to administrative, and local or temporary matters, they form nevertheless one of the known and recognized modes of legislation.

The Constitution of the United States contains the very same provisions in reference to the presentment of bills, orders, resolutions, and votes to the President for his approval, that are found in the State constitution. In reference to "bills," this approval is necessary "before it become a law," and in reference to orders, resolutions, and votes, "before the same shall take effect;" upon which a distinction was attempted to be founded in the argument. Yet the constant practice of the congress has been to enact important measures of legislation, chiefly of the character before referred to, by joint resolution. Both Constitutions contain the same clause, "that no money shall be drawn from the treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law." And the constant practice, both in Congress and the legislature, has been to make important appropriations of public money from the treasury, by joint resolution; thereby showing, that in the usage and practice of these assemblies, a resolution is regarded as a law, and is in all respects of equal force and effect.

Such a practical interpretation of the constitution, sanctioned by long usage and acquiescence, and hitherto, so far as we can discover, wholly unquestioned, is entitled to great weight, and ought not to be departed from unless under circumstances of the most imperative character.

The constitutions of a number of the States contain the provision, that "every law enacted by the legislature shall embrace but one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title;" and among these States are Louisiana and California. In the construction of this clause, the courts of the former State have held it to be improper to give it too vigorous and technical a construction. By following in its applications the rules of a nice and fastidious verbal criticism, the action of the legislature would often be frustrated, without fulfilling the intentions of the framers of the Constitution. [Municipality No. 3 v. Michoud] 6 La. Ann. 605, 608. In California this section of the Constitution is regarded as merely directory. Such was the contemporaneous exposition adopted and acquiesced in by the legislature, and tacitly assented to by the courts. Washington v. Murray, 4 California, 388. These observations we think justly apply to the clause of our Constitution prescribing the enactment clause of laws, which was no doubt intended to promote uniformity and precision, without being designed as a condition, upon the strict and literal fulfillment of which, the validity of the law should depend.

2. In support of the second objection, it was urged that as the constitution does not mention resolutions, in prescribing the forms and ceremonies to be observed in the passage of bills, therefore a resolution is not of equal dignity with a bill, and cannot be employed to repeal a general law.

We cannot perceive the force of this position. All legislative acts, duly enrolled, signed by the presiding officers of both houses, and approved by the governor, it appears to us, must stand on an equal footing as to dignity, and must equally prevail as the act of the sovereign power of the State, whether they be "enacted," or only "resolved."

It was insisted also that by a joint rule of the two houses of the legislature, joint resolutions are only required to be read on two several days, and therefore the court must presume that this resolution was passed after two readings only, and hence did not become a law. On the production of the rules of the legislature, no such rule was found to exist, and the foundation of the argument fell to the ground. But if the fact had been otherwise, we could not have indulged the presumption insisted upon, for in the case of Green v. Weller, 32 Miss. 650, in reference to this very question, this court, after stating the provisions of the constitution requiring bills to be signed by the presiding officers of the two houses, and to be approved and signed by the governor, and the statutory regulation that all bills thus authenticated shall be deposited in the office of the secretary of state, say—"When an act of the legislature has passed through these forms, which are shown upon its face to have been complied with, and it is filed in the secretary's office, it becomes a record, and has all the legal incidents of a record, by the rules of the common law; and all the effect, as evidence of the authenticity and validity of the act, which the parliament rolls of statutes had in England." And again, "it must of necessity have been intended that the act so sanctioned, and required to be preserved, shall constitute a record, with the incidents, appertaining to such a record at common law, importing absolute verity which no evidence is allowed to contradict, and a compliance with all the forms necessary to its validity." Having established the proposition that the act thus authenticated and preserved, is a record, and upon settled principles of evidence, incapable of contradiction, the court go on to rule, that if this were not so, yet this court cannot take judicial notice of the journals of the legislature in order to ascertain the true state of facts. . . .

Reversed and petition of relator dismissed.

NOTES

1. In Hoyt v. Sprague, 103 U.S. 613 at pp. 635-6 (1880), Bradley, J., referring to a joint resolution of the Rhode Island legislature, said: "But another objection to the validity of the joint resolution is that it was not in proper form, in not being preceded by the proper enacting clause. The constitution declares that the style of the laws shall be: 'It is enacted by the General Assembly as follows.' If this requirement is anything more than directory, it cannot be decreed to apply to that species of enactments which are usually denominated joint resolutions, and which are often used to express the legislative will in cases not requiring a general law. The practice of the Congress of the United States, and of almost every legislative body in the country, may be adduced to show that a resolution of the nature now under consideration could not have been within the intent of the provision referred to."

2. State v. Cunningham, 39 Mont. 197, 103 P. 497 (1909), held void a joint resolution which had no enacting clause. The Montana Constitution contained a provision declaring: Article 5, sec. 20, "The enacting clause of every law shall be as follows: 'Be it enacted by the Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana.' " The court construed the Constitutional provision as "mandatory and prohibitory because there is no exception to their requirements expressed anywhere in the Constitution".

SECTION 2. THE TITLE

A. Introductory

U. M. ROSE, TITLES OF STATUTES

5 A.B.A.Rep. 221, 222-228 (1882).

. . . It is of course well known to you all that, until within a comparatively recent period, the title of a statute was only a name, having no further significance than a mark of identification, and that at present such titles have acquired a fixed place in the constitutional law of a large majority of the American states.

To a casual observer, nothing might seem more arbitrary, or even capricious, than such a result; but a very brief review will serve to show that it is the orderly outgrowth of natural causes of the most lasting character, and wholly inseparable from the conditions in which they take their rise.

Lord Coke commends certain statutes for being shortly penned; and says that "it was the wisdom of ancient parliaments to comprehend much matter in few words."¹

Another characteristic might be referred to as serving to distinguish the old statutes mentioned. They had no titles; for it is said that the title of an act is but a new usage, dating from about the 11th Henry VII.² At first the title was usually framed by the clerk of that house in which the bill first passed, and it was seldom read more than once. Being commonly written in red ink, these titles were for a time called rubrics.³

Evidence might be adduced to show either that the clerks were somewhat careless in the discharge of this duty, or that they did not conceive any necessary connection as existing between the contents of a statute and the title or name by which it was to be called.

At any rate, it is clear that the courts could not rely upon a title thus affixed by a mere ministerial officer as affording any evidence of what the legislature meant. For the purposes of interpretation, the clerk had no special advantages over those possessed by the courts; he was also without judicial training, and without the salutary influence derived from the responsibility attached to the judicial office.

After the practice had changed, and when titles had come to be affixed to bills in the way that is customary at the present time, the courts continued to disregard them as means of interpretation. Chief Justice Holt said:

³ Poulter's Case, 11 Rep. 29.

"It is true that the title of an act of Parliament is no part of the law or enacting part, no more than the title of a book is part of the book; for the title is not the law, but the name or description given to it by the makers."⁴

This comparison of the title of an act with the name of a book was perhaps more forcible at the time it was made than it would be now; for in the time of Lord Holt the fashion of giving conceited and far-fetched titles to books was extremely prevalent. At any rate, the title was regarded as affording "no legislative import."⁵

Gradually, however, in the development of the law, titles of statutes have come to be considered as aids to interpretation, at least in cases of great doubt. But their position as such is quite subordinate, and is not very well defined.

Mr. Dwarries admits that the title is a part of a statute in a popular sense, but will not consent that it shall be so considered in a legal sense. The distinction is not important; the only practical question being as to what weight, if any, shall be given to the title in the process of construction. But here, as in many other things, it would seem that there is a fair prospect that popular views will ultimately prevail.

That the title of a statute may be referred to in order to ascertain the intent of the legislature, in case of serious doubt is now well settled, both in England and in this country.⁶

Probably less effect is given to the titles of acts of Congress than to the acts of other legislative bodies, growing out of the custom of Congress to insert in the same statute the most incongruous provisions, having no reference to the matter specified in the title. In Hadden v. Collector,⁷ the court cites a number of acts of Congress of that kind. In the case of appropriation bills, it is common in Congress to insert a variety of the most dissimilar matters in one bill. In respect of these the title must be disregarded wholly, each clause requiring a separate scrutiny, and a construction according to its own separate merits.⁸

Mr. Sedgwick, after mentioning the gradual change in the law in respect of the influence of titles on interpretation, says:

"It seems to me on the whole, however, that the original rule is the true one. The title is rarely a matter of legislative debate or scrutiny; and though it may, and doubtless does, give a general idea of the purpose of the act, still it is precisely in cases of nicety and doubt that it cannot with safety be relied upon." ⁹

The suggestion is certainly an acute one, as it may well be inferred that the same carelessness or want of skill in the use of language which would serve to render the enacting part of a statute ambiguous, would also pervade the title, which is usually the work of the same author. Yet as the works of men are commonly by no means of uniform quality, cases may well arise of doubtful enactments annexed to titles of extreme clearness. The spirit of modern jurisprudence tends to discountenance general and sweeping rules for discarding testimony which may result at times in willful blindness. . . .

One serious difficulty in giving much weight to titles is to be found in the fact that many of the titles of acts are designed to conceal rather than to explain their contents; devised with a view to obtain the support of careless or confiding legislators, who may be induced to vote for a bill simply because its title recommends it as being promotive of a praiseworthy object. Statutes of this kind are very common—statutes of which it might be said, in the language of the Shakespearean drama, that their

Hang loose about them, like a giant's robes

Upon a dwarfish thief."—Mach., act v., sc. 2.

An instance of this kind may be found in a bill said to have been lately introduced in Congress, under the title of "A Bill for an Act to Reduce Taxation." This title was sufficiently captivating, but on examination it was found that the bill, if enacted, would increase the rate of taxation on every article of taxation mentioned in it.

It is clear that if the courts could qualify laws procured in this fraudulent manner, by softening the rigor of the enacting part by the fine qualities of their titles, the real intent of the majority of the legislature voting for them might be reached in a roundabout way; but usually this could not be done without giving greater weight to the title than to the enacting part. . . .

B. Constitutional Requirements

STATE v. TOWNSHIP COMMITTEE OF NORTHAMPTON

Supreme Court of New Jersey, 1888. 50 N.J.L. 496, 14 A. 587.

DEPUE, J. This writ brings up the proceedings of the township committee of the township of Northampton, in the county of Burlington, for paving Mill street, in the town of Mount Holly. The improvement was authorized and executed, and the assessments therefor made, under a statute passed March 27, 1882. Supp.Revision,

1058. The act provides that whenever the citizens of any township of this state shall, at any special or annual town meeting, pass a resolution by a two-thirds vote ordering the paving or macadamizing of any street or streets, road or roads, or part or parts thereof, within the bounds of said township, and shall specifically appropriate money for that purpose, the township committee shall cause the same to be paved or macadamized in accordance with such resolution. The act authorizes the township committee to fix grades, to decide the kind and quality of pavement or roadbed, to cause streets to be curbed, to contract for the work, to make assessments for benefits to defray the cost of the improvement, sell lands for the collection of assessments, etc. The Twenty-eighth section provides that nothing therein contained should give the township committee of any township any control of or supervision over any road or roads, or part of the same, lying and being within the limits or boundaries of any incorporated town, borough, or city, being within the limits or bounds of any township, and which road or roads are now by law under the control and supervision of the municipal authorities of any such town, borough, or city. The act is entitled "An act authorizing the township committees, in any township in this state not containing an incorporated city or borough wholly or in part within its limits, to pave or macadamize any street or streets, road or roads, or part or parts thereof, within said township," etc.

Mount Holly is not an incorporated city or borough. It is an incorporated town lying and being within the bounds of the township of Northampton, incorporated for special and limited purposes, without any control or supervision over roads within its corporate limits. It is a municipality created for special and limited purposes, of the character of that which was under consideration in State v. Troth, 34 N.J.L. 377-386, on error, 36 N.J.L. 422. Within the principles laid down by this court in that case, and approved by the court of errors, though the decision of this court was reversed on other grounds, Mount Holly is, for the purposes of control, and supervision over roads, part of the township of Northampton. The objection that this act does not apply to roads in Mount Holly, because the town is not mentioned in the title, is without foundation. It may be added that section 28 may be rejected without impairing the legal effect or efficiency of the act; for it is inconceivable that a town, borough, city or other municipality having by its charter complete control of its streets should be affected by a law on the subject of roads relating to townships because such borough, city, or municipality happened to be within the bounds of a township.

An objection arising upon the construction of this act, in connection with its title, is more formidable. Upon such a construction, it is contended that the act is a local and special law, within paragraph 11, § 7, art. 4, of the constitution, which declares that the legislature shall not pass private, local, or special laws in any of the following enumerated cases, among which is enumerated "laying out, opening, altering, and working roads or highways," and which enjoins upon the legislature to pass general laws providing for the cases enumerated. The body of the act applies to all the townships of this state. A law embracing all cities or all townships is a general law, within the meaning of this clause of the constitution; for, as was said by Mr. Justice Dixon in State v. City of Trenton, 42 N.J.L. 487, these bodies, because of their marked peculiarities, are by common consent regarded as distinct forms of municipal government, and so constituting classes by themselves. This principle has been repeatedly adopted and acted upon. . . . But the enacting part of the act is qualified and restrained by the title. In the title the legislature announces its purpose to legislate, not for all the townships of this state, but only with respect to such of them as do not contain an incorporated city or borough either wholly or in part within the limits of the township. The constitutional mandate that the object of every law shall be expressed in its title, has given the title of an act a twofold effect. It has added additional force to the title, as an indication of legislative intent, in aid of the construction of a statute couched in language of doubtful import, and it also operates as a constitutional limitation upon the enacting part of the law. The enacting part of a statute, however clearly expressed, can have no effect beyond the object expressed in the title. To maintain any part of such a statute, those portions not embraced within the purview of the title must be excised; and, if the superaddition to the declared object cannot be separated and rejected, the entire act must fail. . . . To maintain this act in any particular, it must be construed as a law applicable only to such townships as do not contain any incorporated city or borough wholly or in part within the township limits. The act as construed, in subordination to its title, sufficiently designates the townships to which its provisions were intended to apply. But designation, by description or otherwise, will not fulfill the essential qualities of a general law, within this constitutional provision. The only classification allowed is that which embraces a group of objects distinguished by qualities and characteristics sufficiently marked and important, having regard to the purposes of the legislation, to make them a class by themselves, including all, excluding none, which pertain to the class. This rule has been so frequently enunciated that a citation of the authorities would be superfluous. The classification on which this act rests, is a classification setting apart townships not having an incorporated city or borough within the township bounds from the other townships in this state. The subject of the legislation—grading, making, and working roads—is one that is common to all the townships of this state, as well as to the townships set apart for this scheme of legislation. There is no quality which distinguishes the townships so circumstanced from the other townships of this state, or the roads in such localities from other highways in this state. A classification of this character is plainly insufficient to answer the essentials of a general law. It is conceded by counsel that, under the classification adopted, the act would apply to Northampton township, which has within its boundaries the incorporated town of Mount Holly, and not to the neighboring township of Pemberton, for the reason that the latter township has an incorporated borough within its boundaries,—a condition of inequality in the application of this law that would arise in many of the counties of this state. For the reasons given, the proceedings under review should be set aside.

NOTES

1. All except the following seven states have constitutional provisions similar to that invoked in the principal case: Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, North Carolina, Rhode Island and Vermont.

2. In People of State of New York v. Parker, 16 N.J.Misc. 471, 1 A.2d 54 (1936), the statute in question was entitled "An Act to secure attendance of witnesses from without the state in criminal proceedings." It was held that the title did not apply to compulsory attendance of witnesses who are within the state at criminal proceedings without the state. The court said: "Assuredly a title which is misleading, by reason of its specific and limited reference to one definite object where another is embraced in the act, is faulty. True, the title of a statute meets the constitutional requirement when it mentions the subject matter generally and is accompanied with a succinct indication of the legislation concerning it. The title of this statute is not expressive of such a general subject as to create the inference that the statute, under such title, contains provisions requiring witnesses from within this state to appear and testify in some other state."

RADER v. TOWNSHIP OF UNION

Supreme Court of New Jersey, 1877. 30 N.J.L. 509.

The opinion of the court was delivered by

BEASLEY, CHIEF JUSTICE. The plaintiff alleges that he did certain work on the public streets in the township of Union, county of Union, under a contract made with him by the road board incorporated in the name of "The Southeasterly Road District of the township of Union, in the county of Union," by the act of 29th of March, 1871, and that the obligation to pay this debt was transferred to the present defendant, the township committee of the township of Union, by the act which repeals the previous one, and which latter act was approved 1st of April, 1872. It is obvious that the plaintiff's right of action rests on one or both of these legislative enactments, and that if both of them are inoperative, such action must fail as against this demurrer. Both of these laws are called in question in this connection, and although the same objection is made to the two, still it will tend to perspicuity to treat them in turn. It should, however, be premised, that although this case has been before this court on previous occasions, the questions now to be disposed of have, for the first time, been placed before us for consideration.

The exception now taken to these statutes is, that they are in conflict with Placitum 3, of Section 7, of Article IV, of the constitution of this state, which is in these words, viz., "To avoid improper influences, which may result from intermixing in one and the same act such things as have no proper relation to each other, every law shall embrace but one object, and that shall be expressed in the title."

The purpose of this provision is plainly two-fold; first, to ensure a separate consideration for every subject presented for legislative action; second, to ensure a conspicuous declaration of such purpose. By the former of these requirements, every subject is made to stand on its own merits, unaffected by "improper influences" which might result from connecting it with other measures having no proper relation to it; and, by the latter, a notice is provided, so that the public, or such part of it as may be interested, may receive a reasonable intimation of the matters under legislative consideration. These are the intents which the court, in its application of this clause of the constitution, is called upon to further, and, as far as may be practicable, to carry into effect. Let us see, then, how these two acts now sub judice will bear these tests.

The first of these laws was approved on the 29th of March, 1871, and it is entitled thus: "An act in relation to streets in Union township, in Union county." By its first section it sets off, by designated boundaries, a certain part of Union township, and then declares that the inhabitants of such part—to use its own language—"shall be, and they are hereby created, a body politic and corporate, to be called the 'Southeasterly Road District of the township of Union, in the county of Union,' for the purpose of laying out, opening and improving streets, roads, highways and public parks within the said boundaries, and for exercising the rights, powers and franchises conferred by this act, and shall be capable of suing and being sued, and of having and using a corporate seal." The next section directs that there shall be a board, to consist of five persons, to be called commissioners of public roads, whose duty it is made to exercise the powers therein conferred, and to whom is given exclusive control over the roads and highways within such district. In subsequent sections this board is clothed with full and exclusive authority "to lay out streets, avenues and public parks within the said district"—to enter upon and take lands for these purposes; the necessary machinery for assessing damages and benefits being provided. In a special section, power is given to connect any sewer in this district with any sewer to be built in the city of Elizabeth, and the act concludes with a provision for the annual election of the members of the board of commissioners. These are the substantial contents of the act in question.

There are two objections under this head, in the brief of the counsel of the defendants, that seem to me to be especially worthy of consideration and criticism.

The first is, that the act in question relates to more objects than one, some of which are not expressed in the title. The object of legislation is described to be streets in Union township, and in the body of the act power is given to construct a sewer and make public parks, and it is said such improvements are things by themselves, and have no relation to the general legislative project. With regard to the first of these specifications, I am inclined to think that the objection is not well founded. The making of a sewer may be said to be comprehended in a description purporting to relate to streets. A street can be, and usually is, devoted in part to this use, and it would, therefore, seem that the introduction of this provision does not violate the unity of statutory object that is required to prevail. The principles laid down in the well-considered case of State, ex rel. Walter, v. Town of Union, 4 Vroom 351, appear fully to countenance this feature of the present act.

But the second point, I think, is more intractable, and cannot be brought into subjection to the same rule. The making and control of streets is a thing entirely different from the making of parks; the two have no connection, and neither is an adjunct to the other, and it is impossible, as it seems to me, to logically hold that a description of one embraces both. The rules that there must be a substantial unity in the statutable object as indicated by the title, is, in this instance, obviously violated. But I do not, on this account, conclude, as counsel appears to have done, that by reason of this illegality this entire statute is to be treated as a nullity. Such is not the legal rule, and no such consequence is denounced by the constitutional article in question, which merely prohibits, without defining the effect of, its infraction. It will answer every purpose of law, and of public policy, to declare, in such cases as the one now under advisement, the unlawful super-addition to the declared object of the statute to be inoperative and void. This can always be done when the objectionable feature stands by itself, and is separable, as a distinct thing, from the body of the act, and there is no reason to suppose that the portion thus eliminated constituted an essential motive to the enactment of the law. This I understand to be the usual rule of law regulating this subject, and, by its application to this case, it will be only the power to make parks that will be affected by the present objection, the body of the act being beyond its scope. This question was the subject of judicial consideration in Alabama, and was determined in a manner that is in harmony with the view just expressed. The case to which I refer is that of Walker v. State, reported in 49 Ala. 329, the statute then in question being entitled "An act to restrict the sale of personal property in certain cases," and which, in its body, contained a provision making punishable as a misdemeanor the wilful destruction of personal property on which there was an unsatisfied lien, and the result reached by the court was, that the constitutional provision that required but one subject to be embraced in a statute, was violated, but that, notwithstanding this illegality, the whole act was not void, but only the unlawful interpolations, they being severable from the other parts of the law.

But the other point on this same subject raised by counsel, has a wider scope, and, therefore, is of a more serious character, such point being, that the title of this statute does not truly express the object of the legislation which it embodies.

After a careful consideration of this subject, I have concluded that this exception is well taken, for I have failed to discover what effect is to be given to this constitutional provision, if it is not, in this case, to have the effect of annulling this law. It has been already said that the purpose of the provision requiring the object of the proposed law to be expressed in its title, is to give notice of and publicity to the proposed legislation, and such purpose would be thoroughly frustrated, if a rule should be sanctioned having a scope sufficiently wide to embrace and to validate the present act. The title of this act is, "An act in relation to streets in Union township, Union county," and it will, on a moment's thought, be perceived how general such an allusion to the legislative purpose is. It is true, that it may be difficult to indicate, by a formula, how specialized the title of a statute must be; but it is not difficult to conclude that it must mean something in the way of being a notice of what is doing. Unless it does this, it can answer no useful end. It is not enough that it embraces the legislative purpose—it must express it; and where the language is too general, it will accomplish the former, but not the latter. Thus, a law entitled, "An act for a certain purpose," would embrace any subject, but would express none, and, consequently, it would not stand the constitutional test. And so, a law entitled "An act in relation to silk goods," would not indicate, in the faintest outline, a purpose to incorporate a body for the manufacture of such fabrics. Such titles would be idle and inefficacious for every purpose. And yet the latter example of a nugatory title is not unlike the one prefixed to the act under consideration. It is described as being in relation to streets in Union township, but its immediate purpose is to create a corporation to take charge of such streets. These streets, before the passage of this law, were in the hands of the officers of the township; the new scheme was to supersede such supervision, and to transfer it to a corporate board organized for that purpose. This was an important change, most materially affecting the property and personal rights of the inhabitants of the district embraced in the law; and yet it is certain the title of this statute would not have conveyed to such persons any intelligible intimation of the project in contemplation. This statute relates to the streets only because the organization it establishes is to have the control of them, but the object of the act is the establishment of such organization. Such object not being expressed in the title, I think the entire act is void.

But this resolution, with respect to this first point, is not conclusive of the issue on this demurrer. The questions touching the legality and effect of the act of the 1st of April, 1872, remain to be disposed of.

This statute is entitled "An act to repeal an act entitled 'An act in relation to streets in Union township, in Union county,' approved March 29th, 1877," and it effects the purpose thus indicated, by repealing the act already criticised. In its subsequent sections, it provides that such repeal shall not affect or impair any legal contracts made under the original act, and it authorizes and empowers the township committee of the township of Union, and their successors, to compromise and settle, if possible, with such contractors, and "to pay all just debts contracted by said commissioners for improvements under said act;" and to enable the township committee to execute these trusts and powers, such committee is "authorized to borrow such sums of money as may be necessary for that purpose, and to provide for the payment of said sums so borrowed, by the issue of the bonds of said township." And it further enacts that the expenses for improvements may be assessed and collected in the mode appointed in the act repealed, and makes valid assessments already laid.

It is argued that this repealing act is void by reason of the same imperfection which has been found exists in the primary law, that is to say, that its title does not fairly express its object. The specification under this exception is, that the body of the act comprises objects not expressed in the title to the law.

I do not concur in this view. The objects which, it is insisted, are not indicated in the title, are the powers conferred on the township committee of Union, looking to the payment of debts due under the repealed statute. But I think such powers and their incidents are the necessary concomitants and dependencies of the repeal of this act. A provision for the payment of the existing debts was an inseparable accompaniment of a repealing law, for such a law could not be legally passed without some such provision being made. Nor could there be any doubt as to who would be responsible for such debts. The road district was a part of the township, and when, therefore, the organization of the district was abolished, the township organization revived, and it followed almost as a matter of course, that the latter would fall heir to the obligations of the former. All these things seem to follow in train on the repeal of this law, and, therefore, it was not necessary to indicate them in the title of the repealing law. If we look at this matter practically, we will see, I think, that in this instance the constitutional principle in question was not, in substance, infringed. This work upon the public streets, which forms the ground of this action, had been done; the inhabitants of this locality had the the benefit of such work, and were liable, by the express terms of the original act, to pay for it; when, consequently, they were notified by the title of the second law, that the former one would be repealed, they could not reasonably draw the conclusion that they were to be exonerated from those debts which had theretofore been incurred in their favor; nor could they have been surprised to find that they, as inhabitants of the township, were not relieved from the burthen that had rested on a portion of them as inhabitants of the road district. This clause of the constitution does not require the methods by which the object of the statute is to be effected, to be stated in its title; and the liquidation of the debts of a corporation whose charter is repealed, is an essential part of the process of the repeal of its charter. It may be true that this charging the entire township with the expense of the work done on the roads of a particular district, is a departure from the ordinary practice in this state, but whether such a departure shall occur is a matter for legislative discretion. I can have no doubt that the legislature could formally have declared that certain roads to be made in a township, should, contrary to the usual custom, be borne by the body of the township; and, granting this power, it seems impossible to deny the right to transfer to such corporation the burthen of paying for roads which may have been theretofore made in a particular district of such township.

This second statute is not, in my opinion, obnoxious to the charge of unconstitutionality. . . .

Let judgment be entered on this demurrer, for the plaintiff.

In accord: Warren v. Walker, 167 Tenn. 505, 71 S.W.2d 1057 (1934).

H. L. SHAFFER & CO. v. PROSSER

Supreme Court of Colorado, 1936. 99 Colo. 335, 62 P.2d 1161.

BURKE, JUSTICE. Plaintiff in error is hereinafter referred to as the Shaffer Company, defendant in error as Prosser, and the United States Bond Company as the Bond Company.

Prosser revoked the license of the Shaffer Company as a dealer in securities. The district court sustained that action, and to review its judgment this writ is prosecuted.

Prior to October, 1930, Shaffer was president and manager of the Bond Company, and for a considerable time thereafter was a member of its board of directors, and was, and is, in control of the Shaffer Company. For all the purposes of this cause he was these respective companies and we so consider him.

The license in question was issued under the provision of chapter 95, p. 352, L.1931. Section 3, thereof, p. 355, provides for its issuance by the Secretary of State, and by section 5, p. 358, of the same act it might be canceled by the same officer. These powers and duties were transferred to the Attorney General by paragraph 2, § 13, art. 5, of chapter 37, p. 222, L.1933. These provide that the officer must find that the applicant for a license "is of good business repute," and that a license once issued may be revoked if it is shown that the licensee "is not of good business repute." . . .

2. It is contended that the act of 1931 because of defective title violates section 21 of article 5 of the State Constitution which provides that no bill shall be passed "containing more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title." Here the title is, "An Act Relating to Fraudulent Practices in Respect to Stocks, Bonds and Other Securities," and the point presented is that this gives no hint of licensing. In support of their position counsel rely upon In re Breene, 14 Colo. 401, 24 P. 3, and other Colorado cases. With none of these do we disagree. However, so varied is the practice of entitling legislative acts, and so divergent the questions raised under said section 21, that adjudicated cases are rarely helpful save as they announce broad general . . . rule that "particularity is neither necessary nor desirable; generality is commendable." . . . If the legislation "is germane to the general subject expressed in the title; if it is relevant and appropriate to such subject, . . . it does not violate this provision of the Constitution." Tested by these rules, as well as by others laid down by the adjudicated cases in this jurisdiction, we doubt not this title is sufficient.

The judgment is accordingly affirmed.

LIEN v. BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS

IN RE HEGNE-HENDRUM DITCH NO. 1

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1900 80 Minn 58, 82 N W 1094.

BROWN, J. This is a proceeding for the establishment and construction of a ditch under and pursuant to the provisions of chapter 97, Gen.Laws 1887. . . . Counsel for appellants do not question the regularity of the proceedings or the sufficiency of the evidence. They attack the constitutionality of the law under which the proceedings are conducted, and assign some errors in the refusal of the trial court to give some requests for instructions, which, because the evidence is not before us, are of minor importance. They contend that the statute is unconstitutional upon the grounds and for the reasons (1) that it authorizes the taking of private property for a private use; (2) that it provides for the levy of taxes which are not uniform or based upon the value of the property; (3) that the subject of the act is not expressed in its title; (4) that the act is void, because it is superseded by chapter 98. Gen.Laws 1887. These constitutional objections present the principal questions in the case.

The authority of the legislature to enact drainage laws is derived from the police power, the right of eminent domain, or the taxing power, and is undoubted. 10 Am. & Eng.Enc.Law (2d Ed.) 223. It is founded in the right of the state to protect the public health, and provide for the public convenience and welfare. . . .

Counsel for appellants contend that the act, construed from the standpoint of its title, has for its purpose and object the interests of private individuals, and not the public welfare or convenience. And, further, that, if it be construed as in the interests of the public good, it is void, because no such object or purpose is expressed in the title of the act. The title of the act is as follows: "An act to enable the owners of lands to drain and reclaim them when the same cannot be done without affecting the lands of others; prescribing the powers and duties of county commissioners and other officers in the premises, and providing for the repair and enlargement of such drains, and repealing certain acts therein specified, and declaring an emergency."

1. There can be no question but that the act is in the interests of the public, and for exclusively public purposes. No ditch can be established or laid out thereunder unless the county commissioners expressly find that it will be of "public utility, or conducive to public health or of public benefit or convenience." Section 1 of the act clearly shows that the intent and purpose of the legislature was to further and promote the public interests, and section 9 makes a finding of such public purpose an essential to the jurisdiction of the commissioners to proceed. This is clearly conclusive against appellants' contention that the objects of the statute are in furtherance of private interests. It does not matter that in accomplishing the public objects of the act private interests are advanced. Such a result is merely incidental, and does not affect the validity of the law. In determining the purpose of a statute, we must look to all its parts, not merely the title; and upon the whole statute, title and all, we hold that it should be sustained as a proper exercise of police power or of the right of eminent domain. It is immaterial upon which ground we place it.

2. Neither can there be any serious question as to the sufficiency of the title. It is not fatal that the objects and purposes of the act are not expressed in full in the title. Our constitution does not require the title of an act of the legislature to be so broad. It requires the subject of each act to be so expressed, but not the "purposes" or "objects" of the proposed statute. The objects of an act may not always appear from the subject as expressed in the title. Suth.St.Const. § 83; State v. Cassidy, 22 Minn. 312. And to require the objects to be there fully conveyed and expressed would lead to prolix titles, and tend to embarrass and inconvenience legislation. The object of requiring the title to express the subject of the act is to furnish the legislature with short and concise information concerning the proposed enactment. And if the subject, as expressed and named, be sufficiently broad and comprehensive to indicate the general purposes of the act, it is sufficient. Burnside v. County Court, 86 Ky. 423; Ex parte Burnside, 6 S.W. 276. Says the supreme court of Illinois: "The provision does not require that the subject of the bill shall be specifically and exactly expressed in the title; hence we conclude that any expression in the title which calls attention to the subject of the bill, although in general terms, is all that is required." Johnson v. People, 83 Ill. 436. A variety of instances where the title to statutory enactments is not near as expressive as the one under consideration is found in the books. Suth.St.Const. 92. In Indiana a drainage statute was entitled "An act concerning drainage," and it was held sufficient. Wishmier v. State, 97 Ind. 160. The title of the act in question is much broader than that of the Indiana statute, and that case is directly in point. See, also, Supervisors v. Heenan, 2 Minn. 330 (Gil. 281); Bright v. McCullough, 27 Ind. 223. In State v. Cassidy, 22 Minn. 312, the court, after citing some Minnesota cases, says: "The rule of construction established by these cases is still unquestioned in this court, and must, if adhered to, be decisive of the case now before it. Under such rule, as exemplified by these cases, if the legislature is fairly apprised of the general character of an enactment by the subject as expressed in its title, and all its provisions have a just and proper reference thereto, and are such as, by the nature of the subject so indicated, are manifestly appropriate in that connection, and as might reasonably be looked for in a measure of such character, then the requirement of the constitution is complied with." Although the title of this act is not as complete as it might have been made, we think that, within the rule laid down by these cases, there is a sufficient compliance with the requirement of the constitution. The objections made by appellants' counsel are not, however, wholly without merit; but, reading the entire title, together and in connection with the act itself, there is no doubt in our minds as to its sufficiency, and we sustain it.

3. The claim made by appellants that the act in question was superseded and repealed by chapter 98, Gen.Laws 1887, is untenable. That act was passed at the same session of the legislature, and some six days later than the act in question. It is very true that a revised statute which covers and embraces the subject-matter of a prior statute, and which was evidently intended by the legislature as a substitute for it, operates as a repeal of the prior statute, whether it contains a repealing clause or not. The law on this subject is correctly summed up in 23 Am. & Eng.Enc.Law, 485: "Where two acts are not in express terms repugnant, but the later act covers the whole subject-matter of the earlier, not purporting to amend it, and plainly showing that it was intended as a substitute for the earlier, it will operate as a repeal thereof, though all the provisions of the two may not be repugnant. But there must be unmistakable intent manifested on the part of the legislature to make the new act a substitute for the old, and to contain all the law on the subject; for mere similarity in the provisions of the two statutes is not enough to effect a repeal, even though the similarity may be such as to cause confusion or inconvenience." By taking notice of the legislative journals, which we have the right to do, we find these two statutes before the legislature at one and the same time. Chapter 98 was introduced in the house of representatives on January 28th; but chapter 97, which appellants contend was repealed by said chapter 98, was not introduced until February 20th following. Chapter 98, having been first prepared and introduced, could not possibly have been intended as a substitute for, or a revision of, chapter 97, the bill for the enactment of which had not then ever been before the legislature. The conclusion is inevitable that both acts were intended as independent statutes. . . .

Order affirmed.

NOTES

1. In a footnote to Manson, "The Drafting of Statute Titles," 10 Ind.L.J. 155 (1934) at pp. 156-157, the author states:

"The constitutions of Louisiana, Michigan, New Jersey, Virginia, and West Virginia use the word 'object'; thirty-four use 'subject'; and those of Georgia and Mississippi use a combination of 'subject-matter' and 'subject.' In the beginning, 'subject' and 'object' were of about equal choice in usage. In 1845 the Constitution of Texas contained an 'object' clause (Article VII, Sec. 24), which was changed to the 'subject' clause as it now stands. The Supreme Court of Texas has held that the change of words did not change the essential meaning of the provision—Adams v. San Angelo Water Works Co., 86 Tex. 485, 25 S.W. 605. The first Constitution of California (1849) contained an 'object' clause; the title-body clause as introduced into the 1878 Constitutional Convention contained 'subject'; the Committee on the Legislative Department and the Convention in its debates were not aware of any change and referred to the clause as being precisely the same as the wording of their 1949 Constitution, so the substitution was inadvertent—Debates and Proceedings of the Constitutional Convention of California of 1879.

"It is sometimes attempted to distinguish between 'object' title-body clause provisions and 'subject' title-body clause provisions on this basis: that the 'object' of an act is its aim or purpose, while the 'subject' of an act is the matter to which it relates or with which it deals—Louisiana v. Ferguson, 104 La. 49, 28 So. 917, 81 Am.St.Rep. 123; see: State v. Steinwedel, 203 Ind. 457, 180 N.E. 865. This attempted classification is misleading. All efforts to differentiate between 'object' and 'subject' in connection with title-body clause provisions are confusing and useless—See: Bowman v. Virginia State Entomologist, 128 Va. 351, 105 S.E. 141, 12 A.L.R. 1121, and Fahcy v. State, 21 Tex.App. 146, 11 S.W. 108, 11 Am.St.Rep. 182; Spencer v. Hunt, 109 Fla. 248, 147 So. 282, and Pinder v. Board of Sup'rs, 146 So. (La. App.) 715.

"Rather, judicial interpretation has rendered 'object,' 'subject,' 'general object,' 'general subject,' and 'general purpose' equivalents. These terms are used interchangeably and without distinction by the courts. The decisions of other jurisdictions are quoted and relied upon without distinction because of the wording of the title-body clause involved. 'Object' and 'subject' are so interwoven that courts often misquote the particular wording of the title-body clause of their own jurisdiction—State v. County Judge, 2 Iowa 280; Board of Education v. Straub, 182 Mich. 665, 148 N.W. 716. In Cote v. Village of Highland Park, 173 Mich. 201, 139 N.W. 69, the court says that 'provisions requiring the object of an act to be expressed in its title and limiting the act to one subject are embodied in the constitutions of many of our States.' There has never been such a title-body clause provision. The conclusion is that it is immaterial whether the title-body clause contains 'object,' 'subject,' or 'subject-matter.' All such provisions receive like treatment. They were all adopted to accomplish the same results; and this difference in wording was not meant to indicate different means for accomplishing these results."

Can you reconcile Rader v. Township of Union and In re Hegne-Hendrum Ditch No. 1, supra, with the author's conclusion?

2. In the Permanent Rules of the Minnesota House of Representatives, rule 4b, reads, in part:

"The title of every bill must give its single subject and briefly state its purpose as far as practicable."

STATE v. PROBATE COURT OF RAMSEY COUNTY

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1939. 205 Minn. 545, 287 N.W. 297.

GALLAGHER, CHIEF JUSTICE. On April 27, 1939, James A. Cook, a police officer of the city of St. Paul, filed in the probate court of Ramsey county a petition verified on information and belief, charging one Charles Edwin Pearson with being a psychopathic personality as defined by c. 369, Session Laws of Minnesota, 1939, and praying for his commitment according to law. On certification by the county attorney of his satisfaction that good cause existed for the institution of the proceedings, the probate court issued an order requiring the sheriff of Ramsey county forthwith to bring the said Pearson before the court and another order fixing a hearing on the petition for May 5, 1939, at two o'clock P.M.

Before the service of these orders, relator applied to this court for a writ of prohibition and on his verified petition attacking the constitutionality of the act under which the proceedings were instituted we issued a temporary writ prohibiting the probate court from proceeding with the hearing until the further order of this court. The matter is now here on relator's application to make the writ permanent.

Because of a recognized need for legislation to deal with sex offenders and a belief, shared in by medical authorities and others, that sex crimes are committed because of a weakness of the will as well as of the intellect, the 1939 legislature enacted c. 369 entitled: "A Bill For An Act relating to persons having a psychopathic personality." Section 1 of the act reads: "The term 'psychopathic personality' as used in this act means the existence in any person of such conditions of emotional instability, or impulsiveness of behavior, or lack of customary standards of good judgment, or failure to appreciate the consequences of his acts, or a combination of any such conditions, as to render such person irresponsible for his conduct with respect to sexual matters and thereby dangerous to other persons." . . .

2. It is urged by relator that c. 369, L.1939, is void because in violation of Article 4, § 27, of the constitution of Minnesota, which reads: "No law shall embrace more than one subject, which shall be expressed in its title." Cases of two kinds arise under this and similar constitutional provisions: (1) Those in which it is claimed that the title is so general in its terms that it does not fairly express the subject of the act, and (2) those in which it is claimed that the subject as expressed in the title excludes, by implication, certain provisions of the act. The instant case is of the first type. . . .

A title broader than the statute, if it is fairly indicative of what is included in it, does not offend the constitution. State ex rel. Young v. Standard Oil Co., 111 Minn. 85, 126 N.W. 527; Seamer v. Great Northern R. Co., 142 Minn. 376, 172 N.W. 765. Whether or not a title is expressive of the subject matter of an act must be determined with reference to practical considerations, the purpose of the constitutional provision, the approach adopted by this court to the problem in the past, and the disposition of other cases involving titles of similar brevity.

It is true that the term "psychopathic" is not a part of the working vocabulary of most people. Yet the reasonably well-informed recognize it as having reference to mental disorders. (See The American Illustrated Medical Dictionary, Fifteenth Edition, by Dorland, supra.) To those concerned with mental cases, it connotes a condition of the mind causing the person afflicted to be hopelessly immoral. In either case, the fact that the law deals with the sexually irresponsible would not come as a surprise to legislators or members of the public who might have occasion to read its title.

Since the title indicates that the act deals with persons of abnormal minds, the manner in and the mode by which the law is to operate are clearly germane to the subject expressed. That the statute is essentially the same in these respects as are the laws of this state which apply to insane, idiots and inebriates appears sufficiently to indicate this fact. . . .

Turning to recent decisions from other states having similar constitutional provisions, we find that the following titles have been considered not too general in a constitutional sense: "An Act Relating to Marriage and Divorce" (Titus v. Titus, 96 Colo. 191, 41 P.2d 244); "An Act Relating to Corporations" (759 Riverside Ave., Inc., et al. v. Marvin, 109 Fla. 473, 147 So. 848, 849); "An Act relating to disputes concerning terms and conditions of employment." (Fenske Bros. v. Upholsterers' Union, 358 Ill. 239, 193 N.E. 112, 114, 97 A.L.R. 1318); "An Act concerning husband and wife, and declaring an emergency" (Clark v. Clark, 202 Ind. 104, 172 N.E. 124, 126); "An act relating to cities of the first class" (City of Wichita v. Board of Com'rs of Sedgwick County, 110 Kan. 471, 204 P. 693, 694); "An Act relating to crimes and punishments" (Allen v. Commonwealth, 272 Ky. 533, 114 S.W.2d 757, 759); "An act concerning the welfare of children" (Richardson v. State Board of Control, 98 N.J.L. 690, 121 A. 457, 458, affirmed in 99 N.J.L. 516, 123 A. 720); "An act relating to warehouse receipts" (Commonwealth v. Rink, 267 Pa. 408, 110 A. 153).

We conclude, therefore, that the constitutional mandate is not violated by the title here in question. Its defects may offend the principles of legislative draftsmanship but not those of constitutional law.

KEDZIE v. TOWN OF EWINGTON

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1893. 54 Minn. 116, 55 N.W. 864.

COLLINS, J. The constitutionality of certain legislation is put in question by this appeal. In 1883 there was passed by the legislature an act (Sp.Laws 1883, c. 135) entitled "An act for a township drainage act, authorizing the supervisors of townships in Kittson, Marshall, Polk, Norman, Cass, and Wilkin [counties] to issue bonds for certain purposes." The names of these counties were again mentioned in the first and fifth sections of the act. In 1887 there was passed an act entitled "An act to amend chapter one hundred and thirty-five (135) of the Special Laws of Minnesota of one thousand eight hundred and eighty-three, (1883.)" Sp.Laws 1887, c. 80. This last act, by means of its first section, attempted to amend the first by inserting among the counties specified in the first and fifth sections of the latter the names of 21 additional counties in this state, so that all of the provisions of the statute of 1883 would be made to apply to the townships in these last-mentioned counties. The bonds on which this action is founded were issued by one of these townships. As we regard the case, the claim made by respondent's counsel that the original act was unconstitutional, because the subject of the same was not expressed in its title, becomes of secondary importance, and need not again be alluded to. That the subject of the legislation attempted to be covered by the amendatory act of 1887 was not expressly in its title is so patent that any discussion in support of this assertion would be a waste of time. The amendment could not have been incorporated, and the counties therein named could not have been included, in the original statute, under its title, under the requirement found in article 4, § 27, of the state constitution, and the amendment in no manner enlarged the title of that statute. Of the numerous cases on this subject decided by this court, that of Boom Co. v. Prince, 34 Minn. 79, 24 N.W. Rep. 361, is probably the most in point. Order affirmed.

STATE ex rel. SHISSLER v. PORTER

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1893. 53 Minn. 279, 55 N.W. 134.

COLLINS, J. The relator seeks by this proceeding to obtain immediate possession of the office of judge of the municipal court of the city of Mankato; he having been elected to that office at the city election held April 4, 1893. His claim is that the term of office of the respondent—who was last elected to the same office at the election held in 1891, duly qualified, and has since discharged the duties—expired on Monday, the 10th day of April, 1893. The question is whether the respondent's term of office is two or three years. The facts are that the city of Mankato was chartered and organized long prior to the year 1885. A municipal court for the city was created by Sp.Laws 1885, c. 119; the same being an act of the legislature entitled "An act to establish a municipal court in the city of Mankato, Blue Earth county, Minnesota." This was an independent act, providing for the establishment of the court, and defining its powers and jurisdiction, and was similar in all respects to like acts which have passed the legislature from time to time under the authority of that section of the constitution which provides for certain named courts, and for the creation of "such other courts, inferior to the supreme court, as the legislature may . . . establish by a two-thirds vote." It is conceded that this act has never been referred to directly by the legislature, except in an amendatory act now known as chapter 78, Sp.Laws 1887; the amendment relating simply to the salary of the judge of the court. By section 2 of the original enactment of 1885 it was provided that the qualified electors of the city of Mankato, at the city election to be holden on the first Tuesday in April of that year, and on the day of the city election every third year thereafter, should elect a judge of the court, who should hold his office for the term of three years, and until his successor was elected and qualified. By section 3 it was provided that there should also be elected a special judge of said court, whose manner of election, term of office, powers, duties, and qualifications, should be the same as those of the judge. Both of these officers were required to be residents and qualified electors of the city, persons learned in the law, and duly admitted to practice as attorneys in this state. By the terms of sections 2 and 3, vacancies in either of these offices were to be filled by appointment by the governor; the appointees to be qualified persons, and to hold office until the next annual city election occurring more than 30 days after the vacancy should have happened, when a judge or a special judge, or both, as the case might be, should be elected for a term of three years. We call attention to some of those provisions for the purpose of showing the painstaking care of the legislature when establishing the court, which is a court of record, having civil jurisdiction in cases where the amounts in controversy do not exceed $500. Its criminal jurisdiction is that of a justice of the peace, and is exclusive in the city. The respondent was first elected in April, 1888. There was no attempt made to elect a municipal judge from that time until the annual city election of 1891, when he was re-elected, as before stated. So it will be seen that respondent held the office for three years under his first election.

In the year 1887 an act was passed, (Sp.Laws 1887, c. 8,) entitled "An act to amend and consolidate the charter of the city of Mankato, state of Minnesota." This was really a new charter for the city. We find no reference to the municipal court, or the judges thereof, except in section 2, subc. 2, where it is provided that the elective officers of the city shall be a mayor, a municipal judge, treasurer, and city recorder. The recorder and treasurer are to be elected for two years, and "all other elective officers . . . shall hold their offices for one year, or until their successors are elected and qualified." There was also a provision which had the effect to continue in office all persons then holding office under the prior charter until the expiration of the terms for which they were elected or appointed. It is claimed by the relator that by this act the term of office of municipal judge was reduced from three years to one, and that, when respondent was elected in 1888, he was elected for but one year.

In the year 1889 various amendments were made to the act of 1887, by an act entitled "An act entitled 'An act to amend the charter of the city of Mankato in the state of Minnesota,' " now Sp.Laws 1889, c. 12. In section 2 of the act the elective officers of the city—mayor, municipal judge, etc.—were named, the same as in section 2 of the statute of 1887. An election was provided for the year 1889, and for every two years thereafter, and the term of office of every officer elected under the act was to commence on the second Tuesday of April of the year in which he was elected, and was to continue for two years. The only substantial change in the amendment of 1889, relating to elections or terms of office, was to substitute biennial for annual elections, and to make the terms of office for the respective officers two years, instead of one. It will have been noticed that a municipal judge was not elected in 1889. In the year 1891, Sp.Laws 1891, c. 47, another act was passed, entitled "An act to amend chapter 8 of the Special Laws of the State of Minnesota for the year 1887, entitled 'An act to amend and consolidate the charter of the city of Mankato, state of Minnesota,' as amended by chapter 12 of the Special Laws of the State of Minnesota for the year 1889, entitled 'An act entitled an act to amend the charter of the city of Mankato, in the state of Minnesota.' " This was, in substance, as was chapter 8, supra, a new charter. An election was provided for the first Tuesday in April, 1891, and every two years thereafter. The elective officers were to be a mayor, municipal judge, a special judge, treasurer, and recorder. These officers, it was provided, should be elected for two years, and until their successors were elected and qualified. The municipal court was not mentioned in this act, nor were the judges thereof, except as above stated. Our attention has not been directed to any other legislation bearing upon the subject, and the relator rests his claim to immediate possession of the office on the amendatory statutes of 1887, 1889, and 1891, before mentioned, and in which he contends the term of the office in question was first reduced to one year, to take effect in the year 1888, when respondent was first elected, and then enlarged to two years, taking effect, as to respondent's second term, in the year 1891, when he was last elected.

It is the position of the respondent that the term of the judge of the municipal court, as fixed by the act of 1885, establishing the court, has not been changed or shortened by the so-called amendatory acts, because, if the language used therein could be given that effect, it would prove ineffectual; the subject-matter of such legislation not having been expressed, it is claimed, in the title to either of these various acts, as required by paragraph 27, art. 4, of the constitution, which provides that no law shall embrace more than one subject, which shall be expressed in its title. The main argument of counsel for the relator seems to be based upon their contention that the act of 1885, establishing the court, was an amendment to the then existing city charter, and upon its passage became incorporated into and a part of it, so that the subsequent enactments of the legislature amendatory of the charter affected the act. The city charter was not mentioned, and to create this court it was not necessary that it should be. That such an act might be styled as amendatory of a charter, or might be made a part of a city charter, either originally or by legislation subsequent to the granting of corporate powers, we do not now question, although the policy and wisdom of establishing such tribunals by independent and distinctive legislation are strongly suggested by the fact that they can only be lawfully created, under the constitution, by a two-thirds vote of the legislature, while acts relating to offices purely municipal need but a majority vote. But we are not to consider what might have been enacted as a part of the original charter, but what was enacted; so that, taking it for granted that a municipal court might have been provided and created in the charter act, without special reference to such court in the title, it was not. The city charter was wholly silent on the subject, and covered only such subjects as are ordinarily found in a charter. Nor was there anything in the act of 1885, establishing the court, indicating an intention to add it to, or make it a part of, the charter, or to amend any of the charter provisions; and whether that could have been done legally, under its title, may well be questioned. Of course the functions of the newly-constituted court were to be exercised within the limits of the municipality; and it was established, undoubtedly, at the instance and for the convenience of its residents. That its judges were to be chosen by ballot, by and from among the electors of the city, and that the city recorder was to be clerk of the court, was not significant, or of any greater effect than would have been a requirement that from among the qualified electors of the city the governor should appoint those officers. These provisions simply pointed at, and specified, the means and methods by which the court has to be equipped with its proper complement of officials. Prior to the passage of Sp.Laws 1885, c. 119,—an act to establish a municipal court in the city of Mankato, according to its title,—that city had been chartered by the legislature. The act or bill for the charter was full and complete, and the subject embraced therein was tersely, but clearly, expressed in its title. It is probable that the subject-matter covered by said chapter 119 might have been incorporated into this original legislation, or, with a proper and suggestive title, the act creating the court might have been lawfully passed as an amendment to the charter. But this was not the course which was pursued. Instead of adopting a title which would have indicated a purpose to amend the charter, or make the new law a part of it, the exact object of the legislation was expressed. Two laws were then in force, separate and distinct enactments,—one creating and chartering a city, but making no provision for a municipal court, nor was it essential that it should; the other establishing such a court, and not referring at all to the city charter. The fact that the law establishing a judicial tribunal might have been made a part of the charter originally, or by amendment, does not affect the fact that such was not the course of the legislature. Nor can it have weight when considering the legislation through which it is urged the term of office of the municipal judge, as fixed in chapter 119, has been reduced to the term of two years.

The constitutional requirement as to the entitling of laws has often been discussed in the opinions of this court. The substance of what has been said, so far as we need to repeat it at this time, is that an amendatory law is for the amendment, not of what might have been enacted under the title of the original statute, but of what was enacted. Hence the sufficiency of the title of an act merely declared to be amendatory of a prior law, to justify the legislation which may be enacted under it, depends, not alone upon the fact that the title of the original statute was so comprehensive that the legislation in question might have been properly enacted in such prior law, but it depends also upon the nature and extent of the prior enactment, to amend which is the declared purpose or subject of the later act. And when the title of an act is such that the legislature can be deemed to have been fairly apprised of its general character by its subject, as expressed in such title, and all the provisions of such act have a just and proper reference thereto, and are such as, by the nature of the subject so indicated, are manifestly appropriate in that connection, and might reasonably be looked for in a measure of such a character, the title is sufficient. State v. Cassidy, 22 Minn. 312; State v. Klein, Id. 328; State v. Smith, 35 Minn. 257, 28 N.W.Rep. 241. Applying this language to the case at bar, it will be seen that it is of no materiality that the matter found in and covered by the act establishing the court might have been germane to the subject embraced in the original charter, and have been sufficiently expressed in the title to that law, for the nature and extent of the charter itself must be consulted. And when we are examining the title to the amendatory act of 1891, under which relator claims his right to an immediate possession of the office, and the titles to the acts of which that was an amendment, we are to inquire whether the legislators were fairly informed by such titles of the nature and character of the proposed legislation. In view of the independent charter provisions in existence at the time of the enactment of the law establishing the court, and the title of that law, would amendments to the latter be looked for in measures which, if dependence could be placed upon their titles, related solely to the charter? We think not. The titles to these amendatory acts, if the legislation embraced therein was designed to affect the provisions of chapter 119, were very misleading, and well calculated to accomplish the mischief the constitutional requirement was expressly designed to prevent. As the subject of that part of the legislation heretofore referred to in Sp. Laws 1887, c. 8, Sp. Laws 1889, c. 12, and Sp. Laws 1891, c. 47, was not expressed in the titles of either of these acts, the term of office of the judge of the municipal court for the city of Mankato remains at three years. Order to show cause discharged.

STATE ex rel. OLSON v. ERICKSON

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1914. 125 Minn. 238, 146 N.W. 364.

DIBELL, C. On January 5, 1914, the relator tendered to the respondent, the county auditor of Hennepin county, his affidavit of candidacy for the office of representative from the 33d legislative district of the state on a party ticket at a primary election to be held September 15, 1914. The auditor refused to receive and file the affidavit. He is the officer with whom filings are made. An alternative writ of mandamus was issued. By Laws 1912, c. 2, § 2, amending R.L.1905, § 182 (Gen.St.1913, § 336), candidates for judicial offices, county superintendents of schools and municipal officers in cities of the first class were nominated upon separate ballots designated as nonpartisan ballots. By Laws 1913, c. 389, § 2, amending R.L.1905, § 182, as amended by Laws 1912, c. 2, § 2, members of the Legislature are also nominated upon separate nonpartisan ballots. By R.L.1905, § 181, and Laws 1912, c. 2, § 1, the general primary election for 1914 would be held on Tuesday, seven weeks preceding the general November election, that is, on September 15, 1914. By Laws 1913, c. 389, § 1, amending R.L.1905, § 182, as amended by Laws 1912, c. 2, § 1, the date of the general primary is changed to the third Tuesday in June preceding the general November election. There are other changes made in the primary law some of which will be noted as we proceed. The court quashed the alternative writ and the relator appeals. The question is whether chapter 389, Laws 1913, is constitutional. . . .

1. The Constitution, art. 4, § 27, is as follows:

"No law shall embrace more than one subject, which shall be expressed in its title."

Similar constitutional provisions are found in other states. Sometimes the word object instead of subject is used. If there is a difference in the application of them the word subject is less restrictive than the word object. Lien v. Board, 80 Minn. 58, 82 N.W. 1094; State v. Cassidy, 22 Minn. 312, 21 Am.Rep. 765.

The title of Laws 1913, c. 389, is as follows:

"An act to amend sections 181 and 182 of the Revised Laws 1905, as amended by chapter 2 of the General Laws, Special Session 1912, section 184 of the Revised Laws 1905, as amended by chapter 226, General Laws 1907, and chapter 95, General Laws 1909, and chapter 2, General Laws, Special Session 1912, section 187, Revised Laws 1905, section 200, Revised Laws 1905, section 213, Revised Laws 1905, and section 217, Revised Laws 1905, all as amended by chapter 2, General Laws, Special Session 1912, and to repeal a part of section 18 of chapter 2, Special Session 1912."

The Revised Laws have no title as that term is generally understood. The amendment of 1913 could not have referred to them by title. It could have added the words, "relating to primary elections," or similar words, and had it done so no question would likely be made as to the sufficiency of the title. The body of law included in Revised Laws 1905 was the result of a revision by an official commission. The revision was adopted by an act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate and codify the general laws," approved April 18, 1905. The title was appropriate. State v. Great Northern R. Co., 100 Minn. 445, 111 N.W. 289, 10 L.R.A., (N.S.,) 250. This act provided that the revision should be known as Revised Laws 1905. The sections amended by the act of 1913 are a part of chapter 6 of the revision. The sections referring to primary elections were enacted under a general head of "Nominations by direct vote." The section headings, as they now appear in the revision, were in the revision as enacted by the Legislature. By Laws 1905, c. 218, providing for the editing and annotating of the revision, the sections were required to be numbered consecutively throughout. Before they were numbered by chapter. As the revision went through the Legislature section 181, under a different number, was a part of chapter 6, and under the general head of "Nominations by direct vote," and with the section heading as is now indicated in the revision. The same is true of the other sections. Chapter 6 referred to elections and completely covered the subject of general elections and primary elections. The revised laws are required to be designated as "Revised Laws 1905." R.L.1905, § 5504.

There are two definite purposes of the constitutional provision herebefore quoted. One is to prevent fraud upon the public and the Legislature by permitting the passage of acts the nature of which their titles do not disclose. Another is to prevent the passage of unrelated measures by a combination of interests each particularly concerned with one or more and careless of the others. . . .

Illustrations are plentiful in territorial days of legislation induced by one or both of the motives against which the constitutional provision is directed. In State v. Shevlin-Carpenter Co., 99 Minn. 158, 108 N.W. 935, 9 Ann.Cas. 634, the present Chief Justice, in considering the purpose of this provision of the Constitution, and as an illustration of the practices which the Constitution sought to avoid, referred to Laws 1855, c. 24, where, under an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Root River Valley and Southern Minnesota Railroad Company," the Legislature incorporated the railroad, located the county seat of Fillmore county, declared Wright county duly organized, and provided for the appointment of certain officers for it. This illustration may be supplemented by reference to an act a year earlier, Laws 1854, c. 42, entitled "An act relative to sheep and swine," which, after regulating the running at large upon the open commons of the animals of the kind mentioned, provided that "no person shall be eligible to hold any office under the laws of this territory, who has not been a resident of this territory for six months preceding his election or appointment." These are exaggerated instances, but they are practical illustrations of the legislation with which the framers of the Constitution were familiar.

With the purpose of the constitutional provision in view we come directly to a consideration of the single question whether the title of an amendatory act referring by number to the sections of the revision, as such revision is amended by specified chapters of subsequent session laws, and repealing certain session laws, without reciting by descriptive words the matter to which the revision or the amendatory act itself relates, or giving the titles of the session laws, is constitutionally sufficient. In support of the view that such an amendment is constitutional as against the claim that its subject is not expressed in its title, we cite as typical a statute of Maryland entitled "An act to amend article ninety-five of the Code of Public General Laws by adding an additional section thereto," which was upheld in Second German, etc., Ass'n v. Newman, 50 Md. 62, where the court said:

"It was not necessary to state in the title, that the section to be added to the Code, related to the subject of usury; the reference to the particular article in the Code, which relates only to the subject of usury, clearly indicated the subject of the law." . . .

. . . The weight of authority undoubtedly is that an amendatory act, such as chapter 389, is not unconstitutional because of a failure to state the subject in the title more precisely than by a reference to the statutes and laws amended. We adopt such view.

C. Titles and Section Headings As Aids to Interpretation

CAMINETTI v. UNITED STATES

Supreme Court of the United States, 1916.

242 U.S. 470, 37 S.Ct. 192, 61 L.Ed. 442, L.R.A.1917F, 502, Ann.Cas.1917B, 1168.

MR. JUSTICE DAY delivered the opinion of the court: . . .

In the Caminetti Case, the petitioner was indicted in the United States district court for the northern district of California, upon the 6th day of May, 1913, for alleged violations of the act. The indictment was in four counts, the first of which charged him with transporting and causing to be transported, and aiding and assisting in obtaining transportation for a certain woman from Sacramento, California, to Reno, Nevada, in interstate commerce, for the purpose of debauchery, and for an immoral purpose, to wit, that the aforesaid woman should be and become his mistress and concubine. A verdict of not guilty was returned as to the other three counts of this indictment. As to the first count, defendant was found guilty and sentenced to imprisonment for eighteen months and to pay a fine of $1,500. Upon writ of error to the United States circuit court of appeals for the ninth circuit, that judgment was affirmed. 136 C.C.A. 147, 220 F. 545. . . .

It is contended that the act of Congress is intended to reach only "commercialized vice," or the traffic in women for gain, and that the conduct for which the several petitioners were indicted and convicted, however reprehensible in morals, is not within the purview of the statute when properly construed in the light of its history and the purposes intended to be accomplished by its enactment. In none of the cases was it charged or proved that the transportation was for gain or for the purpose of furnishing women for prostitution for hire, and it is insisted that, such being the case, the acts charged and proved, upon which conviction was had, do not come within the statute. . . .

Where the language is plain and admits of no more than one meaning, the duty of interpretation does not arise, and the rules which are to aid doubtful meanings need no discussion. Hamilton v. Rathbone, 175 U.S. 414, 421, 44 L.Ed. 219, 222, 20 S.Ct. 155. There is no ambiguity in the terms of this act. It is specifically made an offense to knowingly transport or cause to be transported, etc., in interstate commerce, any woman or girl for the purpose of prostitution or debauchery, or for "any other immoral purpose," or with the intent and purpose to induce any such woman or girl to become a prostitute or to give herself up to debauchery, or to engage in any other immoral practice. . . .

In United States v. Bitty, 208 U.S. 393, 52 L.Ed. 543, 28 S.Ct. 396, it was held that the act of Congress against the importation of alien women and girls for the purpose of prostitution "and any other immoral purpose" included the importation of an alien woman to live in concubinage with the person importing her. . . .

But it is contended that though the words are so plain that they cannot be misapprehended when given their usual and ordinary interpretation, and although the sections in which they appear do not in terms limit the offense defined and punished to acts of "commercialized vice," or the furnishing or procuring of transportation of women for debauchery, prostitution, or immoral practices for hire, such limited purpose is to be attributed to Congress and engrafted upon the act in view of the language of § 8 and the report which accompanied the law upon its introduction into and subsequent passage by the House of Representatives.

In this connection, it may be observed that while the title of an act cannot overcome the meaning of plain and unambiguous words used in its body . . . the title of this act embraces the regulation of interstate commerce "by prohibiting the transportation therein for immoral purposes of women and girls, and for other purposes." It is true that § 8 of the act provides that it shall be known and referred to as the "White Slave Traffic Act," and the report accompanying the introduction of the same into the House of Representatives set forth the fact that a material portion of the legislation suggested was to meet conditions which had arisen in the past few years, and that the legislation was needed to put a stop to a villainous interstate and international traffic in women and girls. Still, the name given to an act by way of designation or description, or the report which accompanies it, cannot change the plain import of its words. If the words are plain, they give meaning to the act, and it is neither the duty nor the privilege of the courts to enter speculative fields in search of a different meaning.

Reports to Congress accompanying the introduction of proposed laws may aid the courts in reaching the true meaning of the legislature in cases of doubtful interpretation. . . .

But, as we have already said, and it has been so often affirmed as to become a recognized rule, when words are free from doubt they must be taken as the final expression of the legislative intent, and are not to be added to or subtracted from by considerations drawn from titles or designating names or reports accompanying their introduction, or from any extraneous source. In other words, the language being plain, and not leading to absurd or wholly impracticable consequences, it is the sole evidence of the ultimate legislative intent. See Mackenzie v. Hare, 239 U.S. 299, 308, 60 L.Ed. 297, 300, 36 S.Ct. 106.

The fact, if it be so, that the act as it is written opens the door to blackmailing operations upon a large scale, is no reason why the courts should refuse to enforce it according to its terms, if within the constitutional authority of Congress. Such considerations are more appropriately addressed to the legislative branch of the government, which alone had authority to enact and may, if it sees fit, amend the law. . . .

The judgment in each of the cases is affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE MCKENNA, dissenting:

Undoubtedly, in the investigation of the meaning of a statute we resort first to its words, and, when clear, they are decisive. The principle has attractive and seemingly disposing simplicity, but that it is not easy of application, or, at least, encounters other principles, many cases demonstrate. The words of a statute may be uncertain in their signification or in their application. If the words be ambiguous, the problem they present is to be resolved by their definition; the subject matter and the lexicons become our guides. But here, even, we are not exempt from putting ourselves in the place of the legislators. If the words be clear in meaning, but the objects to which they are addressed be uncertain, the problem then is to determine the uncertainty. And for this a realization of conditions that provoked the statute must inform our judgment. Let us apply these observations to the present case.

The transportation which is made unlawful is of a woman or girl "to become a prostitute or to give herself up to debauchery, or to engage in any other immoral practice." Our present concern is with the words "any other immoral practice," which, it is asserted, have a special office. The words are clear enough as general descriptions; they fail in particular designation; they are class words, not specifications. Are they controlled by those which precede them? If not, they are broader in generalization and include those that precede them, making them unnecessary and confusing. To what conclusion would this lead us? "Immoral" is a very comprehensive word. It means a dereliction of morals. In such sense it covers every form of vice, every form of conduct that is contrary to good order. It will hardly be contended that in this sweeping sense it is used in the statute. But, if not used in such sense, to what is it limited and by what limited? If it be admitted that it is limited at all, that ends the imperative effect assigned to it in the opinion of the court. But not insisting quite on that, we ask again, By what is it limited? By its context, necessarily, and the purpose of the statute.

For the context I must refer to the statute; of the purpose of the statute Congress itself has given us illumination. It devotes a section to the declaration that the "act shall be known and referred to as the 'White Slave Traffic Act.'" And its prominence gives it prevalence in the construction of the statute. It cannot be pushed aside or subordinated by indefinite words in other sentences, limited even there by the context. It is a peremptory rule of construction that all parts of a statute must be taken into account in ascertaining its meaning, and it cannot be said that § 8 has no object. Even if it gives only a title to the act, it has especial weight. United States v. Union P. R. Co., 91 U.S. 72, 82, 23 L.Ed. 224, 229. But it gives more than a title; it makes distinctive the purpose of the statute. The designation "white slave traffic" has the sufficiency of an axiom. If apprehended, there is no uncertainty as to the conduct it describes. It is commercialized vice, immoralities having a mercenary purpose, and this is confirmed by other circumstances. . . .

This being the purpose, the words of the statute should be construed to execute it, and they may be so construed even if their literal meaning be otherwise. . . .

It is hardly necessary to say that the application of the rule does not depend upon the objects of the legislation, to be applied or not applied as it may exclude or include good things or bad things. Its principle is the simple one that the words of a statute will be extended or restricted to execute its purpose. . . .

Language, even when most masterfully used, may miss sufficiency and give room for dispute. Is it a wonder, therefore, that when used in the haste of legislation, in view of conditions perhaps only partly seen or not seen at all, the consequences, it may be, beyond present foresight, it often becomes necessary to apply the rule? And it is a rule of prudence and highest sense. It rescues from crudities, excesses, and deficiencies, making legislation adequate to its special purpose, rendering unnecessary repeated qualifications, and leaving the simple and best exposition of a law the mischief it was intended to redress. Nor is this judicial legislation. It is seeking and enforcing the true sense of a law notwithstanding its imperfection or generality of expression.

There is much in the present case to tempt to a violation of the rule. Any measure that protects the purity of women from assault or enticement to degradation finds an instant advocate in our best emotions; but the judicial function cannot yield to emotion—it must, with poise of mind, consider and decide. It should not shut its eyes to the facts of the world and assume not to know what everybody else knows. And everybody knows that there is a difference between the occasional immoralities of men and women and that systematized and mercenary immorality epitomized in the statute's graphic phrase "white slave traffic." And it was such immorality that was in the legislative mind, and not the other. The other is occasional, not habitual,—inconspicuous,—does not offensively obtrude upon public notice. Interstate commerce is not its instrument as it is of the other, nor is prostitution its object or its end. It may, indeed, in instances, find a convenience in crossing state lines, but this is its accident, not its aid.

There is danger in extending a statute beyond its purpose, even if justified by a strict adherence to its words. . . .

I am authorized to say that the CHIEF JUSTICE and MR. JUSTICE CLARKE concur in this dissent.

MACKEY v. MILLER

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, 1903. 126 F. 161.

[This case appears supra, p. 406.]

STATE ex rel. EMERSON v. ERICKSON

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1924. 159 Minn. 287, 198 N.W. 1000.

DIBELL, J. Alternative writ of mandamus issued by the Hennepin district court on the relation of Irving H. Greenberg, a minor, by Ray G. Emerson, his guardian ad litem, commanding Al. P. Erickson, the county auditor, to issue a hunting and trapping license to the relator. The court sustained the demurrer of the county auditor to the writ and the relator appeals.

1. Section 21, c. 426, p. 634, Laws 1923, provides that no person shall hunt or trap without first having procured a license. Section 28 provides that "no license shall be required of any person under twenty-one years of age." This section is headed "Fees." It establishes a schedule of fees. It is the contention of the relator that it should be construed as if there were after the word "license" the word "fee." We cannot sustain this contention. The language is plain. It is not inconsistent with section 21. It does not require construction. 3 Dunnell, Minn.Dig. sec. 8938. The relator places stress upon the word "fees" placed at the head of the section as supporting his view that it refers only to fees and not at all to licenses. This word does not appear in the engrossed act nor in the various headlines of the sections of the chapter. Section headlines are inserted by the secretary of state under legislative authority as a matter of convenience of reference. G.S.1913, sec. 4942. They do not determine construction. . . .

The trial court was right in holding that section 28 must be read as excepting minors from the necessity of procuring licenses; that the exception is unconstitutional as class legislation granting a privilege to favored persons; that only the exception is unconstitutional, and that the other portions of the act, among them the requirement of a license, apply to minors.

Order affirmed.

BROTHERHOOD OF RAILROAD TRAINMEN v.
BALTIMORE & O. R. CO.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1947.
331 U.S. 519, 67 S.Ct. 1387, — L.Ed. —.

MR. JUSTICE MURPHY delivered the opinion of the Court.

Our concern here is with the intervention rights of representatives of railroad employees in a suit brought against the railroad under § 16(12) of the Interstate Commerce Act, 49 U.S.C. § 16(12), 49 U.S. C.A. § 16(12).

The origin of this suit is to be found in an order issued by the Interstate Commerce Commission on May 16, 1922. Chicago Junction Case, 71 I.C.C. 631. The Commission there approved the purchase by the New York Central Railroad Co. (Central) of all the capital stock of the Chicago River & Indiana Railroad Co. (River Road); it also authorized the leasing to River Road of all the properties of the Chicago Junction Railway Co. (Junction) for 99 years and thereafter, at the lessee's option, in perpetuity. Among the properties in question were trackage and switching facilities at the Union Stock Yards, Chicago, Illinois, connecting with various trunk lines. Prior to the Commission order, the practice had been for the trunk line railroads to use their own power and crews to move their empty and loaded livestock cars over these tracks to and from the loading places in the Union Stock Yards. For the privilege of so moving their cars, the railroads were charged $1.00 per car, loaded or empty.

The Commission made various conditions to its approval of the proposed transactions. The third condition provided: "The present traffic and operating relationships existing between the Junction and River Road and all carriers operating in Chicago shall be continued, in so far as such matters are within the control of the Central." 71 I.C.C. at 639. This condition is still in effect, the Commission's decision and order having been found to be valid and binding on all parties in a proceeding in the District Court in 1929.

The trunk line railroads have continued to use their own power and crews in moving their livestock cars over the trackage operated by River Road and have paid River Road the amount of $1.00 per car. But on January 25, 1946, Central and River Road notified the railroads that on and after February 1, 1946, the cars would be moved over this trackage by means of the power and crews of River Road and that the handling charge would be $12.96 per outbound loaded car. Soon after this new practice went into effect, the trunk line railroads (appellees herein) brought this suit for preliminary and permanent injunctions under § 16(12) of the Interstate Commerce Act against Central, River Road and Junction. . . .

A stipulation of facts was then filed. After describing the change in handling the cars, it pointed out that this change resulted from a settlement between the River Road and the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen of a labor dispute over the work involved in these livestock car movements. The Brotherhood was the bargaining agent under the Railway Labor Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq., for the River Road trainmen. . . . The Brotherhood thereafter filed its motion to intervene generally as a party defendant, alleging that the primary purpose of the suit was to nullify its agreement with River Road and to deprive the Brotherhood members of the work they were performing under that agreement and that the Brotherhood members were therefore indispensable parties. The contention was made that the Brotherhood had an unconditional right to intervene by virtue of § 17(11) of the Interstate Commerce Act and Rule 24(a) (2) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 28 U.S.C.A. following section 723c; and 28 U.S.C. § 45a, 28 U.S.C.A. § 45a, was later added in support of this contention. But the motion to intervene was denied by order, without opinion.

The District Court then allowed an appeal to this Court from its order denying intervention. The appellee railroads moved to dismiss the appeal on the ground that such an order was not final and hence was not appealable, the Brotherhood not being entitled to intervene as a matter of right. We postponed further consideration of the question of our jurisdiction to review the order to the hearing of the appeal upon the merits. 330 U.S. —, 67 S.Ct. 870. . . .

First. It is unquestioned that the Brotherhood is the duly designated representative of the River Road trainmen.

Second. The right of intervention granted to such a representative by § 17(11) applies to a court proceeding under § 16(12) of the Act, the plain language of § 17(11) extending its reach to "any proceeding arising under this Act."

On this point, however, the appellee railroads contend that § 17(11) must be confined to proceedings before the Interstate Commerce Commission, to the exclusion of court proceedings. In support of this contention, they point to the fact that § 17 as a whole is primarily concerned with Commission procedure and organization. That fact is emphasized by the heading of § 17 as it appears in the Statutes at Large, 54 Stat. 913, and the United States Code, 49 U.S.C. § 17, 49 U.S.C.A. § 17, a heading that reads: "Commission procedure; delegation of duties; rehearings." The inference is then made that paragraph (11), with which we are concerned, must be limited by that heading and by the general context of § 17 as a whole. The result of the contention is that the phrase "any proceeding arising under this Act," as found in paragraph (11), is rewritten by construction to refer only to "any proceeding before the Commission arising under this section."

We cannot sanction such a construction of these words. It is true, of course, that § 17 is concerned primarily with the organization of the Commission and its subdivisions and with the administrative disposition of matters coming within that agency's jurisdiction. At least ten of the twelve paragraphs of § 17 deal with those matters. And before § 17 was cast into its present form in 1940, all five of its paragraphs related exclusively to those matters. Congress rewrote the section when it enacted the Transportation Act of 1940, 54 Stat. 898, continuing and modifying previous provisions and consolidating and including matters which had formerly been scattered throughout the Act. At the same time, however, it was expressly recognized that certain paragraphs were being added which were entirely new, paragraphs which went beyond purely administrative matters. Thus the pertinent committee reports stated that "A new paragraph (9) is included providing that orders of a division, an individual Commissioner, or a board shall be subject to judicial review as in the case of full Commission orders, after an application for rehearing has been made and acted upon." And as to paragraph (11), it was said that "A new paragraph is added at the end of section 17 providing that representatives of employees of a carrier may intervene and be heard in any proceedings arising under part I affecting such employees." By such language in their reports, the framers of § 17 recognized the obvious fact that certain provisions of that section deal with something more than might be indicated by the heading.

That the heading of § 17 fails to refer to all the matters which the framers of that section wrote into the text is not an unusual fact. That heading is but a short-hand reference to the general subject matter involved. While accurately referring to the subjects of Commission procedure and organization, it neglects to reveal that § 17 also deals with judicial review of administrative orders and with intervention by employee representatives. But the headings and titles are not meant to take the place of the detailed provisions of the text. Nor are they necessarily designed to be a reference guide or a synopsis. Where the text is complicated and prolific, headings and titles can do no more than indicate the provisions in a most general manner; to attempt to refer to each specific provision would often be ungainly as well as useless. As a result, matters in the text which deviate from those falling within the general pattern are frequently unreflected in the headings and titles. Factors of this type have led to the wise rule that the title of a statute and the heading of a section cannot limit the plain meaning of the text. United States v. Fisher, 2 Cranch 358, 386, 2 L.Ed. 304; Cornell v. Coyne, 192 U.S. 418, 430, 24 S.Ct. 383, 385, 386, 48 L.Ed. 504; Strathearn S. S. Co. v. Dillon, 252 U.S. 348, 354, 40 S.Ct. 350, 351, 64 L.Ed. 607. For interpretative purposes, they are of use only when they shed light on some ambiguous word or phrase. They are but tools available for the resolution of a doubt. But they cannot undo or limit that which the text makes plain.

Here the meaning of § 17(11) is unmistakable on its face. There is a simple unambiguous reference to "any proceeding arising under this Act" or, as the House committee paraphrased it, to "any proceedings arising under part I." There is not a word which would warrant limiting this reference so as to allow intervention only in proceedings arising under § 17 or in proceedings before the Commission. The proceedings mentioned are those which arise under this Act, an Act under which both judicial and administrative proceedings may arise. The instant case is a ready illustration of a judicial proceeding arising under this Act; a suit of this nature is authorized solely by § 16(12) of the Act. Hence it is a proceeding to which the right of intervention may attach by virtue of § 17(11).

Nor do we perceive any reason of statutory policy why the framers of § 17(11) should have wished to confine the right of intervention by employee representatives to proceedings before the Commission. Occasions may arise, as in this case, where the employee representatives have no interest in intervening in the original administrative proceeding, but where they have a very definite interest in intervening in a subsequent judicial proceeding arising under the Act. When the framers have used language which covers both types of proceedings, we would be unjustified in formulating some policy which they did not see fit to express to limit that language in any way. . . .

We thus conclude that § 17(11) gives the Brotherhood an absolute right to intervene in this proceeding, making it unnecessary to discuss whether, and to what extent, the Brotherhood would have had such a right apart from § 17(11). It follows that we have jurisdiction to consider the appeal on its merits. And in the exercise of that jurisdiction, we reverse the judgment of the District Court denying leave to the Brotherhood to intervene.

Reversed.

D. Drafting Titles

MINNESOTA ATTORNEY GENERAL'S MEMORANDUM ON FORM OF BILLS, 1941

Rule 4. The title of every bill should be in general terms, stated as briefly as possible. It should be broad enough to cover the subject-matter of the bill, but unnecessary particulars, which might make the title unduly restrictive and perhaps invalidate provisions of the act not coming within the specified purposes, should be avoided.

Note: See the so-called 1925 Reorganization Act, Laws 1925, Chapter 426. In this case, the title of the preliminary draft of the bill attempted to enumerate all of the various subjects dealt with, and would have covered half a printed page. Fortunately it was boiled down to the model title finally adopted: "An Act in Relation to the Organization of the State Government." This title and many others of commendable brevity have been sustained by the Supreme Court.

Rule 5. If a bill amends or repeals existing laws, the title should state first the general subject, followed by reference to the statutes amended or repealed, also mentioning the addition of new provisions, if any.

Note (a). The phrase "and adding new provisions" is to be included in the title only if the act contains separate sections which are entirely new, in addition to sections which amend or repeal existing statutes. Technically this phrase may not be necessary, but it is advisable in order to avoid a possible court ruling that express reference to amendments or repeals in the title would restrict the application of the act thereto. See the following note.

Note (b). Reference in the title to statutes amended or repealed is not essential to the validity of an act, if the general subject be properly stated. For some reasons it might be preferable simply to state the general subject and avoid any reference in the title to statutes amended or repealed. For example, if the title expressly refers to certain statutes to be amended or repealed, but inadvertently omits to refer to other statutes amended or repealed by the body of the act, or to new provisions added by the act (as may occur through oversight either in the original drafting or where amendments are made while the bill is pending), the provisions not mentioned in the title might be held void. On the other hand, it is desirable to refer in the title to statutes amended or repealed for the information of members of the legislature and others interested. The practice is sanctioned by long usage and is required by the legislative rules. Hence it should be followed, with extreme care to see that all the original statutes affected are mentioned in the title, and that if new provisions are included in the same bill, and suggested clause as to "adding new provisions" is incorporated in the title. . . .

Note (c). The following form has been much used: "A bill for an act to amend Mason's Minnesota Statutes of 1927, Section —, relating to

_____." This form, while technically sufficient, is objectionable for the following reasons:

(1) It has been held by the Supreme Court to restrict the effect of the act to the amendment specified in the title, invalidating additional new matter, if any, in the body of the act;

(2) It does not inform the reader at first glance of the general subject of the act, as is done by a title in the form recommended under Rule 5, stating the general subject first:

(3) It is more inconvenient to amend such a title in case further provisions are added to the bill after introduction.

CARL H. MANSON, THE DRAFTING OF STATUTE TITLES

10 Ind.L.J. 155, 165-167 (1934).

Method of Statement. If general terms are chosen for the title language, they must suggest a unified, congruent core of material, either natural or developed by practice. More specific language usually has the effect of limiting the scope of the act.

It is not necessary to set forth in the title, any of the ordinary means of accomplishing the object of the act. The stating of the object and the means in the title does not make duality or plurality of objects; nor does additional descriptive matter in the title which applies to only a portion of the body. The statement of the means alone in the title may be sufficient if the object can be derived from them. When both the object and the means are stated in the title, the scope of the act should be limited to those means, unless the title clearly indicates that others are included in the body.¹ As a general rule, any title enumeration of powers, duties, penalties, rights, rules, etc., or descriptive clauses, etc., ordinary or extraordinary, will render the title restrictive in scope to such enumeration and clauses. If the scope of the act is desired to be greater, make such clear in the title.

After the object is stated, descriptive clauses must be excluded unless they can be added without making the scope of the act ambiguous. It is often difficult to determine whether a long title indicates the legislative intent that the scope of the act be restricted to those things named or that it indicates an intent to cover the entire field in a broad way; leads to uncertainty as to what will be the decision of the court.²

Number references to other statutes alone in the title should not be relied upon to state the object of an act. They lead to errors and give insufficient notice of the contents of the bill or statute.³ Such a practice also applies to the naming of the compiler's sections and is vigorously condemned by the courts. If number references and explanatory words are used together, the words are held to state the object, limit the scope, and explain the numbers, though in fact, some of the numbers may refer to other matters, beyond the scope of the words, but germane. These other matters would be sustained if sufficiently stated in the title, but fall, though numbers indicate them, since the explanatory words in the title are taken as the object and limit of the scope. The safest method is to use sufficient words in the title without reliance upon number of references. The only value of these numbers is as a ready reference to the statutes amended.

Amendatory Acts. The purposes of the title-body clause require amendatory acts to be considered as distinct from the acts which they amend. The repeated statement that an amendment can contain any provision, which might have been incorporated in the act amended under its title, is too general. If the title of the amendatory act is merely a repetition of the title of the original act, the amendment can contain any provision which may have been included in the original act except as qualified by intervening development and practices, which may make the provision no longer germane to the original act or a radical change which requires special title designation.

If the title of the amendatory act states, along with the title of the original act, the amendments to be made, other provisions, though they could have been included in the amendatory act under a title which solely restated the title of the original act, cannot be included in this amendment. This statement of the nature of the amendment restricts the scope of the act thereto.⁴

The scope of the amendatory act may be enlarged by its title so that it is greater than that of the original act, thus sustaining provisions which could not have been included under the original title; any idea to the contrary hampers legislation.

NOTE—DRAFTING AMENDATORY STATUTES

43 Harv.L.Rev. 1143 (1930).

The form of statute which in its title and purview recites no more than that it is an act to amend a certain section of the code or session laws seems wholly inadequate in failing to give notice of the subject of the enactment. A common and more satisfactory device is, therefore, to follow the citation in the title with a brief statement of the subject to which the act relates. If there has been a previous amend-ninety-three, and act number two hundred thirty-four of the public acts of Michigan for the year nineteen hundred one, being section six thousand four hundred forty-six of the Compiled Laws of eighteen hundred ninety-seven." 101 P.A. 1905.

ment, the citations of the intervening amendatory acts will also be given, both in the title and the purview. But difficulties arise in the case of session laws when the draftsman includes in the title of the amendatory act the full title of the act to be amended. And the effect of piling Pelion on Ossa is achieved if the subject to which the act relates is also added, or if the original title is repeated in the purview. This problem is somewhat simplified by the modern device of short titles, but even these add confusion when the original act has been amended and the title of the amendatory act recites the title and citation of the original act plus the citations of all intervening amendments.

A brief reference to the subject of a particular amendment is far more instructive to a hurried lawyer than the title of the whole act. And the practice revealed in each instance so far considered of inserting the citation to the act amended in both the title and purview of the amendatory act produces needless repetition. It should be sufficient to state in the title of the amendment that it is an act to amend an act relating to a particular subject, and then to reserve the citation for the purview. But in a few states the practice has gone too far in this direction, failing to disclose in the title that the act in question is an amendment. The title should reveal two things at a glance: the subject matter of the act in brief, and the fact that it is amendatory. A citation to the original act is, of course, essential, but a single reference to it in the purview should suffice.

CHAPTER 1, NEW YORK LAWS, 1929

An Act to amend chapter three hundred and forty-eight of the law of nineteen hundred and twenty-seven, entitled "An act to create a commission for the purpose of making a study and a comprehensive survey of the port of Buffalo and the Niagara frontier district to determine the feasibility of the creation and establishment of a port authority to be known as the Buffalo and Niagara frontier port authority, which port authority shall have power and authority over the development, control and operation of port facilities within the district," in relation to the report of the commission.

The People of the State of New York, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

Section 1. Section two of chapter three hundred and forty-eight of the laws of nineteen hundred and twenty-seven, entitled "An act to create a commission for the purpose of making a study and a comprehensive survey of the port of Buffalo and the Niagara frontier port authority, which port authority shall have power and authority over the development, control and operation of port facilities within the district," is hereby amended to read as follows: . . .

CHAPTER 6, LAWS OF WISCONSIN, 1929

An Act to amend section 9 of chapter 564, laws of 1907, as amended by chapter 36, laws of 1921, relating to the county court of Fond du Lac county.

The People of the State of Wisconsin, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

Section 1. Section 9 of chapter 564, laws of 1907, as amended by chapter 36, laws of 1921, is amended to read: . . .

CHAPTER 4, PUBLIC ACTS OF CONNECTICUT, 1929

An Act Amending an Act Providing for a State Athletic Commissioner

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in General Assembly convened:

Section 1. Section four of chapter 243 of the public acts of 1925 is amended to read as follows: . . .

MINNESOTA LAWS, 1933, CHAPTER 149

An act to amend Section 1, Chapter 257, Laws of 1927, as amended by Chapter 341, Laws of 1931, forbidding the pledge of assets by banks and trust companies, except in certain instances.

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota:

Section 1. Banks may not pledge assets—exceptions.—Chapter 257, Laws of 1927, as amended by Chapter 341, Laws of 1931, is hereby amended to read as follows: . . .

MINNESOTA LAWS, 1933, CHAPTER 228

An act relating to Town Roads.

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota:

Section 1. Definitions.—The words, "Town Road" and "Town Roads" shall mean those roads and cartways which have heretofore been or which hereafter may be established, constructed and improved under the authority of the several town boards, and also all roads lying wholly within one township and not within the limits of any city or village including roads therein established by use.

Section 3. Inconsistent acts repealed.—All Laws, Acts or parts thereof inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed. . . .

CHAPTER 41, PUBLIC ACTS OF CONNECTICUT, 1929

An Act Concerning Construction of Building for the State.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in General Assembly convened:

Section 1. Section 63 of the general statutes is amended to read as follows: . . .

MINNESOTA LAWS, 1933, CHAPTER 254

An act making 1931 Supplement to Mason's Minnesota Statutes of 1927, prima facie evidence of the statutes therein contained. . . .

NOTE

The device of providing a "short title" by which reference may be made to an act serves to reduce superfluous and cumbersome language in both the titles and purviews of amending statutes. See the Securities Act of 1933, supra, p. 506.

SECTION 3. THE PREAMBLE

HUNTWORTH v. TANNER.

Supreme Court of Washington, 1915.

87 Wash. 670, 152 P. 523, Ann.Cas.1917D, 676.

CHADWICK, J. Plaintiff brought this action to restrain a threatened arrest and prosecution for alleged violation of Initiative Measure No. 8, being popularly known as the Employment Agency Law. Prior to the last general election there was initiated a measure entitled:

"An act to prohibit the collection of fees for the securing of employment or furnishing information leading thereto and fixing a penalty for violation thereof."

Upon the initiation of the measure the Attorney General, as required by law, submitted to the secretary of state a ballot title in form as follows:

"An act to prohibit the collection of remuneration or fees from workers for the securing of employment or furnishing information leading thereto, and providing a penalty for violation thereof."

This was printed upon each of the ballots, and became, under the statute, a notice of the measure and its provisions to the electors of the state.

At the general election the law was adopted. It is in form as follows: "Be it enacted by the people of the state of Washington:

"Section 1. The welfare of the state of Washington depends on the welfare of its workers and demands that they be protected from conditions that result in their being liable to imposition and extortion.

"The state of Washington therefore exercising herein its police and sovereign power declares that the system of collecting fees from the workers for furnishing them with employment, or with information leading thereto, results frequently in their becoming the victims of imposition and extortion and is therefore detrimental to the welfare of the state.

"Sec 2. It shall be unlawful for any employment agent, his representative or any other person to demand or receive either directly or indirectly from any person seeking employment, or from any person on his or her behalf, any remuneration or fee whatsoever for furnishing him or her with employment or with information leading thereto.

"Sec. 3. For each and every violation of any of the provisions of this act the penalty shall be a fine of not more than one hundred dollars and imprisonment for not more than thirty days." Laws 1915, p. 1.

It is alleged by plaintiff that for many years he has conducted, by himself and his predecessors in interest, a business known under the trade-name of "Pacific Teachers' Agency"; that the business is successful and remunerative; that its activities are entirely confined to and that it enjoys the confidence, support, and patronage of school-teachers, and those either engaged or concerned in educational affairs throughout the states of Washington, Idaho, Oregon, Montana, and the territory of Alaska, and elsewhere. The character of the business and the manner in which it is conducted is alleged to be as follows:

"That said school-teachers have dealt and deal with the plaintiff for the purpose of obtaining employment as school-teachers, and use said agency as a medium through and by means of which their qualifications and ability to teach may be inquired into and ascertained by school district officers, and their previous professional records submitted or presented to such officers or to any municipality, school district, or other public body desiring to employ teachers for investigation and as a means to facilitate further investigation of their qualifications by such officers or public bodies before entering into contracts of employment.

"That in the performance of services by plaintiff for teachers so seeking employment, he investigates by written or personal communication their professional records and previous standing in the communities where lately employed, solicits on their behalf and receives reports and confidential information from educational institutions and authorities familiar with their scholarship, professional preparation and attainments, experience, character, and personal characteristics, for the purpose of determining their fitness and availability for employment as school-teachers. That such information so obtained is indexed by plaintiff and kept in a convenient form in suitable record books, and preserved permanently for the use and benefit of such persons, for the inspection of employers of teachers, in carrying on correspondence with teachers and prospective employers, and in making and furnishing copies of such records whenever called upon to do so by such teachers or employers. That for such services plaintiff charges and receives in advance a fee of $2 from each person soliciting his services. That such sum is usually insufficient to defray the actual cost to plaintiff of the services hereinbefore referred to."

The teacher agrees to pay 5 per cent. of the first year's salary if a situation is obtained.

The business of plaintiff has been conducted under, and is subject to, an ordinance of the city of Seattle entitled:

"An ordinance to license and regulate certain trades and occupations in the city of Seattle, and providing penalties for the violation thereof."

It is alleged that the defendants, acting in their respective capacities, maintain and contend that plaintiff is guilty of violating the provisions of Initiative Measure No. 8, and that they declare that they will subject him to arrest and prosecution in the courts of the state. Plaintiff contends that his business is a legitimate business; that it has been carried on and operated in an honest and fair manner, and has contributed to the welfare of the people who deal with the people who deal with and through him; that he has at no time been guilty of any impositions or frauds or extortions, but has rendered faithful and efficient service to the entire satisfaction of his patrons. These things being true, he insists that Initiative Measure No. 8 is not, either by its terms or intendments, applicable to his business, and further, if it be so held, that the act is void in contravention of the Constitution of the state of Washington and of the fifth and fourteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States, in that it deprives plaintiff of his liberty and property without due process of law; that it denies to him the equal protection of the laws, and abridges his privileges and immunities as a citizen of the United States; that it is discriminating and class legislation; and that it is an attempt to regulate interstate commerce. Plaintiff further alleges that, if arrested and prosecuted for a violation of the act, his business will be irreparably damaged; that he deals only with school-teachers, who are peculiarly punctilious in the observance of all law, and his arrest, if published in the newspapers and educational journals throughout the states in which he does business, will work a loss of confidence in him and his business, and that his present and possible future patrons will refrain from doing business with him, although his business may finally be held by the courts to be a lawful business; that unless his business is carried on without interruption its efficiency and value cannot be maintained; and that to discontinue it would result in total destruction.

These facts come to this court as admitted; the court having sustained a demurrer to the complaint and entered a judgment dismissing plaintiff's action with prejudice.

We are advised by counsel that the court below sustained the demurrer upon the theory that plaintiff's business falls within the prohibitions of Initiative Measure No. 8, and that the act is a valid exercise of the police power of the state. It is our judgment, after mature reflection, that we are not called upon to pass upon the constitutionality of the law. The case may be decided upon other grounds.

Appellant contends that the law does not include one who is conducting an agency patronized only by teachers and those who employ them; that the act by its words and intendments applies only to those who may be classed as "workers" or workmen, and not to those who are engaged in professional service. He submits several definitions of the words "worker" and "workman."

Worker:

"One who, or that which, works; a laborer; performer; doer; as a worker in brass; worker of iniquity.

"One who, or that which, works; a laborer; a toiler; a performer.

"One who, or that which, performs work; a toiler."

Workman:

"A man employed in labor whether in tillage or manufactures; a worker; especially a skilled artificer or laborer.

"A laboring man; one who earns his living by manual labor.

"One who labors; one who is employed to do business for another."

"Laborer" is defined as one who performs physical or manual labor."

This argument is met by the suggestion that, although the ballot title and section 1 of the act use the word "workers," they are to be regarded as a preamble to section 2; the rule being:

"The preamble to a statute can neither expand nor control the scope and application of the enacting clause, when the latter is clear and explicit." Black on Interpretation of Laws (2d Ed.) § 84.

Many authorities are cited to sustain this proposition.

Section 2, which, it is said, is the enacting part of the law, uses the words "any person," and under the rule quoted we are called upon to hold that the act covers any person who may receive a fee for procuring employment for another or for furnishing any information leading thereto. Appellant meets this argument, saying that the purpose of the act was to protect laborers and workers only as distinguished from professional men and others, and that the terms and history of the law concur to sustain a judicial declaration that the words "any person" qualify and have reference only to those who take fees from the class designated as "workers" in the ballot title and section 1 of the act.

We are unable to follow the Attorney General in his interpretation of the law. To do so would be to thrust aside all other and equally important rules of statutory construction. While it may be true that the ballot title and section 1 are in a sense preambulatory, they nevertheless go further than to declare merely an evil and a purpose to correct it by legislation. A "preamble" is, strictly speaking, matter that is descriptive of the purpose of the law, making general reference to its objects. It is:

"A clause at the beginning of a Constitution or statute explanatory of the reasons for its enactment and the objects sought to be accomplished." Black's Law Dict.; 6 Words and Phrases, tit. Preamble.

A preamble is not without its uses. It is not to be entirely rejected where the statute is ambiguous, although it will not be resorted to to create a doubt or misunderstanding which otherwise does not exist. Where there is a doubt, it will be given its place as a component part of the act.

"A preamble is said to be the key of a statute, to open the minds of the makers as to the mischiefs which are to be remedied and the objects which are to be accomplished by the provisions of the statute." Bouvier, Law Dictionary, tit. Preamble.

"When a statute is in itself ambiguous and difficult of interpretation, the preamble may be resorted to." Den ex dem. James v. Du Bois, 16 N.J.L. 285.

Where the intent of the law is the object of inquiry, it is said that:

A preamble "discloses the intention of the Legislature in enacting the statute." Hanly v. Sims, 175 Ind. 345, 93 N.E. 228, 94 N.E. 401.

"It is 'a good means,' says Lord Coke, to find out the meaning of the statute, and is a true key to open the understanding thereof.'" Lewis' Sutherland, Stat. Const. (2d Ed.) § 341.

Without multiplying authorities or discussing those cited, we think it may be laid down as a general rule that, if there is a broader proposition expressed in the act than is suggested in the preamble, the body or enacting part of the law will prevail over the preamble; but, if the body of the act can be given a construction that is consistent with the purpose as declared in the preamble, it will be so construed.

Under these rules section 1 is as much a part of the act as sections 2 and 3. It not only defines an evil and a purpose to correct it, but also recognizes and defines a certain class, "workers," as being the object of the law's solicitude, and, as a class, entitled to the protection of the police power. The preamble is not wholly descriptive. It is a declaration of a policy that is intended to advance the police power into a new field, and to bring within its protection a certain class of men, and to make a class amendable to it which has hitherto been unaffected by any law directed specially against it. The finding of necessity coordinates with section 2, for the reason that classes are defined. If the law were a general statute applying to all alike, the rule would be as contended. To limit the declarations of the act to sections 2 and 3 would require us to ignore section 1, and extend a law which is limited in its scope beyond its clear intent. If thus construed, it might well be questioned whether the law would be constitutional—granting for present purposes that the act in whole or in part does no violence to the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, a question upon which we make no ruling; for an act of the character of the one now before us, in so far as it affects individuals who may have conducted a legitimate business fairly and honestly, would be clearly unconstitutional unless it can be said that the abuses growing out of the conduct of a certain kind of a business are so great as to warrant a holding that the general welfare demands that the innocent must limit or give up their calling for the common good. Such laws are sustained, not because a business is in itself unlawful, but because of the abuses attending its operation. Consequently, it is in the abuses, and not the business, that the law is rooted. The police power touches those things which offend against the welfare of society. It finds no resting place in that which is inoffensive. If the act be construed as to include "any person" who may accept a fee for procuring employment for another without qualification, and without reference to the mischiefs declared in the preamble and sought to be remedied by the statute, it would be an unreasonable restraint, and probably be overturned in its entirety.

"The test of the [police] power is found in the effect the pursuit of the calling has upon the public weal, rather than in the inherent nature of the calling itself." State ex rel. Davis-Smith v. Clausen, 65 Wash. 156, 192, 117 P. 1101, 1112 (37 L.R.A. [N.S.] 466).

We have said that, to adopt the theory of the Attorney General, we would have to reject other rules of statutory construction. Having met and, as we believe, answered the contention that section 1 is not to be rejected as a preamble, but to be considered as a guide to the intent and purpose of the law, we shall endeavor to fortify our conclusion by reference to other rules.

Where a new statute is so ambiguous as to incite contrary opinion as to its meanings, the first resort is to discover the antecedent mischief. The mischief inducing the present act is not hard to find. It was to correct what society had come to regard as a wrong practiced upon those who for many reasons were unable to protect themselves against impositions and extortions. It was to protect a class that was powerless under existing conditions to protect itself.

As said by the Supreme Court of the United States in Patterson v. Bark Eudora, 190 U.S. 169, 23 S.Ct. 821, 47 L.Ed. 1002, when speaking of the federal statute prohibiting any person from demanding or receiving remuneration for providing employment for sailors:

"The story of the wrongs done to sailors in the larger ports, not merely of this nation, but of the world, is an oft-told tale."

Or, as the Court of Appeals of New York said when considering the constitutionality of a statute regulating employment agencies:

"The Legislature had the right to take notice of the fact that such agencies are places where emigrants and ignorant people frequently resort to obtain employment and to procure information. The relations of a person so consulting an agency of this character with the managers or persons conducting it are such as to afford great opportunities for fraud and oppression, and the statute in question was for the purpose of preventing such frauds and probably, for the suppression of immorality." People ex rel. Armstrong v. Warden of City Prison, 183 N.Y. 223, 76 N.E. 11, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 859, 15 Ann.Cas. 325.

The Supreme Court of Minnesota has noticed particular abuses incident to a class of business and impositions upon its patrons in the same way:

"The nature of the business and the character of those with whom the business is likely to be conducted, in point of intelligence, experience, and capacity for self-protection from fraudulent practices, are such that it might well be deemed necessary by the Legislature, as a matter of proper police regulation. . . . The propriety of police regulation seems apparent when it is considered that by means of such agencies ignorant and credulous persons might easily be defrauded of their money under a mere pretense of employment to be afforded them in a distant part of the state, so that the fraud would not be discovered until the victim should have gone so far away as to be unlikely to trouble the fraudulent agent by prosecution." Moore v. City of Minneapolis, 43 Minn. 418, 45 N.W. 719. . . .

We conclude, therefore, that the acts of appellant and the business conducted by him are not within the terms or intendments of Initiative Measure No. 8, and that the court has jurisdiction to restrain the threatened prosecution. Whether the law is a proper exercise of the public power as to those falling within its terms we pass no opinion.

Reversed and remanded, with instructions to enter a perpetual injunction.

MORRIS, C. J., and HOLCOMB, PARKER, and MOUNT, JJ., concur.

MAIN, J. I am unable to concur in the views expressed in the majority opinion. Section 2 of the act provides that it shall be unlawful for "any employment agent" to receive or demand from "any person" a fee for furnishing such person with employment. This language is so plain as not to call for construction. It is obvious that the appellant comes within the terms of the act. It is true that section 1 of the act, which is in the nature of a preamble, and declares the general policy of the state, uses the word "workers," but to limit the meaning of the word "work" to those who perform physical labor is not sustained by the lexicographers defining the term, nor is it the common understanding of its meaning. The word "workers," as used in section 1, even though given the limited meaning, should not modify the plain language used in the operative section of the statute.

FULLERTON and ELLIS, JJ., concur.

State v. Superior Court, 92 Wash. 16, 159 P. 92 (1916), held improper a preamble to a proposed initiative measure on the ground that it was no part of a law and there was "no need or place for the alleged declaration of purpose . . .". The court said: "In the entrance upon new fields of legislation, in order to justify the legislation 'to the impartial consideration of mankind,' preambles are frequently adopted. Thus, the framers of the Constitution of the United States explained their purpose to mankind by a preamble which for conciseness and brevity and general and comprehensive breadth of scope is unequalled. . . ."

"Both in England and in this country it was at one time a common practice to prefix to each law a preface or preamble stating the motives and inducement to the making of it; but it is not an essential part of the statute, and is now generally omitted. It is not only not essential and generally omitted, but it is without force in a legislative sense, being but a guide to the intentions of the framer. As such guide it is often of importance. In this sense it is said to be a key to open the understanding of a statute. The preamble is properly referred to when doubts or ambiguities arise upon the words of the enacting part. It can never enlarge. It is no part of the law. . . ."

DOWNING v. INDEPENDENT SCHOOL DIST. NO. 9

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1940. 207 Minn. 292, 291 N.W. 613.

JULIUS J. OLSON, JUSTICE. Plaintiff's suit under our declaratory judgments act to have the court determine and establish her status and rights under her teacher's contract with defendant resulted in findings sustaining her contentions. Upon these judgment was entered later, and defendant appeals.

Plaintiff, a duly qualified teacher, was employed as such by defendant, an independent school district, under a written contract entered into in accordance with the provisions of 1 Mason Minn.St.1927, § 2903, as amended by L.1937, c. 161 (3 Mason Minn.St.1938 Supp. § 2903), for the school year of 1938-1939. This enactment, generally referred to as the "teachers continuing contract law," so far as here material, provides that a teacher's contract "shall remain in full force and effect . . . until terminated by a majority vote of the full membership of the school board or by the written resignation of the teacher before April 1st. Such termination shall take effect at the close of the school year in which the contract is terminated in the manner aforesaid." On March 8, 1939, defendant's school board, by a majority vote, adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas, there are pending before the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, certain bills which, if enacted into law, would materially decrease the amount of income for said School District for the ensuing years, and

"Whereas, the School Board of Independent School District No. 9, Itasca County, Minnesota, will be unable to determine until on or about the 22nd day of April, 1939, whether such measures will become laws, and

"Whereas, under Chapter 161, Laws of Minnesota for 1937, commonly known as the Teachers Tenure Act, the School Board of said School District must make any changes in teachers' contracts which are to take effect for the next school year on or before April 1st of this year, or must discharge such teachers by terminating their contracts before April 1st, which said contracts would then remain in force to the end of the school year, 1938-1939, and

"Whereas, the said School Board wish in fairness to all of their employees who come under the provisions of said Teachers Tenure Act to make no adjustments in salaries which are unwarranted by the final circumstances which will be determined on the basis of whether or not the aforementioned bills become laws;

"Now, therefore, be it resolved, by the School Board of Independent School District No. 9, Itasca County, Minnesota, at a meeting thereof duly called and legally held in the Nashwauk High School, at 7:00 p.m., on the 8th day of March, 1939, all members being present, that the assistant superintendent and all teachers now in the employ of said Independent School District No. 9, Itasca County, Minnesota, be discharged, effective at the close of the school year of 1938-1939, it being the intent of the said School Board that all teachers and other employees coming within the provisions of Chapter 161 of the Laws of Minnesota for 1937, be discharged so that all such contracts will terminate at the close of the school year in 1939." (Italics supplied.)

On April 27, another board meeting was held at which a motion to re-elect all teachers for the ensuing year was lost "by an equally divided vote." At the next meeting, May 10, all board members being present, 70 of the teachers were unanimously re-elected for the ensuing year, but plaintiff and five others were not. At that meeting four of the remaining six teachers on motion to re-elect were unsuccessful "by an equally divided vote." Except as mentioned, no other action has been taken by the board in respect of plaintiff's employment. She is and has been at all times "ready, willing, and able to perform her said contract . . . , but has been and is refused permission to do so."

The court thought that "The natural and reasonable interpretation" of the "resolution and notice" was that the pendency of the mentioned legislative bills "would [if enacted] materially decrease" the district's tax income, hence it was "the desire of the school board to postpone" the making of future financial commitments "until after" the threatened legislation had been disposed of. That was the "interpretation and construction" given the resolution and notice by the "assistant superintendent and by this plaintiff and others of said teachers." The bills did not pass; hence the contingency, so the court held, upon which the resolution and notice depended, did not occur. For this reason it was thought that "there has been no determination" by the board "to terminate" plaintiff's employment contract.

At the outset of the trial defendant moved for judgment on the pleadings on the theory that there were no issuable facts involved. Its "contention" was that "the reasons set up in the preamble" of the resolution "are not to be taken into consideration" in its interpretation; "that the only [determinative] portion of that resolution . . . is the resolving clause which clearly states, 'it being the intent of the said school board that all teachers' " within the provisions of the act, " 'be discharged so that all such contracts will terminate at the close of the school year 1939.' " It therefore seems clear that if defendant's theory is correct it amounts to a torpedoing of the resolution amidship. Charity forbids the thought that any such purpose was intended if we read and consider the whole resolution. Equally so is any motion that by this wholesale discharge political pressure might be brought upon the members of the legislature having in hand the feared enactments. Nor may we impute bad or sinister motives on the part of counsel or the board to bring about a discharge of teachers without a clear majority of the board being in favor of so doing. With these preliminaries in mind and in view of the fact that there is no question here of the power of the board to discharge teachers nor of the teachers' right to receive notice of such discharge before the April 1st deadline is reached, we may proceed directly to the only question, which we think determinative. It is this: Do the facts disclosed by the record justify the court's finding that there was no valid determination to discharge the teachers under and pursuant to the 1937 act?

1. The purpose of that act (L.1937, c. 161) was to do away with the then existing chaotic conditions in respect to termination of teachers' contracts. Until then in many cases teachers would be left in a state of uncertainty as to whether they would be re-elected for the ensuing year. In many instances this state of uncertainty ran over a period of months. The later in the year that a school board acted, the greater the teacher's disadvantage in event of discharge to find vacancies elsewhere. That was the situation sought to be remedied. Under it a deadline of April 1 was fixed. If no termination had been made prior thereto and adequate notice given to the teacher, absent mutual consent by the teacher and the board, the contract continued in full force and effect.

The resolution itself, if viewed in its entirety, leaves ample room for the court's view that the termination of the teachers' contracts here involved depended upon the passage of the feared hostile legislation. In the light of that statute and the deliberately chosen words of the resolution, is it reasonable to suppose that all teachers were discharged thereby? Would not such wholesale discharge in and of itself be subject to explanations? Surely a school board having in hand the conduct of two large schools employing 76 teachers did not intend to go out of the business of conducting its schools. What, then, motivated this wholesale discharge if it was not fear of inadequate tax income? If the bills did not pass there was nothing on the horizon to indicate justification for any such fear.

If we approach this situation as a practical matter it seems clear, or at least entirely probable, that the pending legislation and its effect upon future tax income were the motivating causes for the resolution. Upon the happening of that event alone depended the outcome. This resolution was prepared by a lawyer, not a layman. We have here a keen, alert, and able lawyer representing the board. His language was chosen with deliberate care. If the board intended to discharge all teachers, and that is what defendant's contention is, then everything said in the inducing, and to the layman compelling, "whereas" clauses was foreign to the discharge purpose and should have been left out entirely from the resolution. Is it not obvious that these were the clauses that naturally and properly appealed to the teachers as sound and compelling reasons for the deferment of final action on the part of the board until legislative adjournment? If in this resolution the inducing "whereas" clauses were expressed in the terms of exceptions or provisos, there could be no doubt that these would amply justify the court's conclusion. 17 C.J.S., Contracts, § 343. Does the fact that the same thought, purpose, and intent appear in the form of "whereas" provisos defeat the obvious plan and purpose? We think not.

2, 3. The "cardinal rule" in the interpretation of contracts (and this applies to statutes, ordinances, and the like) "is to ascertain the intention of the parties and to give effect to that intention if it can be done consistently with legal principles." 12 Am.Jur., Contracts, § 227. The rules of interpretation "are not inflexible, their purpose being to reach the probable intent of the parties." They "are intended for persons of common understanding." Id. § 226. The nature, subject matter, and purposes thereof are to be looked for and ascertained in aid of interpretation. By what name an instrument is labeled is unimportant, for the writing "is not dependent upon any name given it by the parties or upon any one provision, but upon the entire body" of the instrument "and its legal effect as a whole." Id. § 242. Hence it is that "all contracts must be interpreted with reference to their subject matter." The court in Thomson Electric Welding Co. v. Peerless Wire Fence Co., 190 Mich. 496, 505, 157 N.W. 67, 70, correctly stated the rule here applicable: "In construing written agreements the actual undertaking of the parties is to be deduced from the entire instrument, taking into consideration, reconciling, and giving meaning to all its parts so far as possible, including recitals as well as operative clauses, and, when so considered, language which has a distinct meaning standing alone may, in the connection used, become doubtful or its meaning modified by other parts of the instrument, including particular recitals."

Here, as in that case, the recitals were (190 Mich. 502, 157 N.W. 69) "not necessary to a valid" instrument. But defendant selected them and "saw fit to adopt them in framing" its resolution. So electing in framing its resolution, it thereby employed the recitals to "serve as a preface or preliminary statement introducing the subject in relation to which" it was to function. And the court quoted with approval from Torrance v. McDougald, 12 Ga. 526, as follows (190 Mich. 504, 157 N.W. 69): "The rule of construction applicable to all writings, Constitutions, statutes, contracts, and charters, public or private, and even to ordinary conversation, is this: That general and unlimited terms are restrained and limited by particular recitals, when used in connection with them." That the recitals in this case are particular, not general, seems obvious.

Of similar import are Duquesne Light Co. v. City of Pittsburgh, 251 Pa. 557, 97 A. 85, Ann.Cas.1917E, 534; Hanly v. Sims, 175 Ind. 345, 93 N.E. 228, 94 N.E. 401. And in Blaisdell v. Home Building & Loan Ass'n, 189 Minn. 422, 249 N.W. 334, 86 A.L.R. 1507, the mortgage moratorium case, this court had for consideration nine "whereas" paragraphs. These recited the facts in respect to the existence of an economic emergency and declared that (L.1933, c. 339, § 1) "in view of the situation hereinbefore set forth" there was an "economic emergency . . . in the State of Minnesota." The court said (189 Minn. 428, 249 N.W. 336, 86 A.L.R. 1507): "The main proposition upon which this law must rest is the existence of 'a public economic emergency.' True, the legislature in section 1 of the law declares that it exists, and a preamble of nine 'whereases' seeks further to disclose the necessity for the law." The court thought that (189 Minn. 429, 430; 249 N.W. 337, 86 A.L.R. 1507) "in addition to the weight to be given the determination of the Legislature that an economic emergency exists which demands relief," and after recital of many facts of economic history the opinion added: "With this knowledge the court cannot well hold that the Legislature had no basis in fact for the conclusion" reached. The Federal Supreme Court in reviewing that case referred to the preambles by saying that: "Attention is thus directed to the preamble and first section of the statute, which described the existing emergency in terms that were deemed to justify the temporary relief which the statute affords." Home Building & Loan Ass'n v. Blaisdell, 290 U.S. 398, 420, 54 S.Ct. 231, 233, 78 L.Ed. 413, 419, 88 A.L.R. 1481. . . .

And, surely, it will not be seriously contended by anyone that the preambles of our National and State Constitutions are without significance in the interpretation of these our fundamental laws.

So it seems perfectly clear that we should not eliminate from consideration the inducing preambles here presented. They afford adequate explanations for the making of the resolving portion. With these it seems clear that the wholesale discharge of all teachers was far from any thought entertained by anyone connected with this affair. . . .

5. We conclude that the record sustains the findings made by the court, hence the judgment entered is right and is affirmed.

STONE, LORING, and PETERSON, Justices (dissenting).

The resolution here is unambiguous and, as we understand the foregoing opinion, would discharge the teachers but for the recitals. The recitals cannot make the clear and definite discharge ambiguous.

The preamble of the resolution is relevant only as a statement of the reasons for the resolution which follows. The effective declaration is "that the assistant superintendent and all teachers now in the employ of said . . . District . . . be discharged, effective at the close of the school year of 1938-1939, it being the intent [hereof] . . . that all teachers and other employees . . . be discharged so that all such contracts will terminate at the close of the school year in 1939."

So the effective declaration of the resolution, thrice repeated, is of intent to discharge the teachers and terminate their contracts as stated. That being so, the reasons stated for the action become immaterial. They are enlightening so far as they show that the purpose of the board was to terminate all pending teachers' contracts in order that they might have a free hand in respect to renewals. The action so taken was of course subject to re-employment. But so far as re-employment, or its possibility, is suggested by the resolution and by the notice thereafter given to the teachers, it was all a matter of intention for the future and not at all a matter of contract right. In short, the contract rights terminated pursuant to the resolution. Thereafter there was nothing left for the teachers except the intention to employ some or all of them as the board might in the future decide, and at rates of compensation to be later determined. . . .

The effect of the foregoing opinion is to violate the purpose of the enactment and render a definite discharge, compelled by statute under the circumstances, a nullity by considering matters and facts recited by way of explanation and not as part of the resolution itself.

This resolution has not been torpedoed. Worse, while undergoing inspection in the drydock of litigation, it has been destroyed by those whose duty it was to relaunch it in order that its plainly designated home port of purpose could be reached.

We think the judgment should be reversed.

SECTION 4. THE ENACTING CLAUSE

SJOBERG v. SECURITY SAVINGS & LOANS ASS'N

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1898.

73 Minn. 203, 75 N.W. 1116, 72 Am.St.Rep. 616.

START, C. J. . . . 1. The act of 1897 in question, authorizing the board of directors of building and loan associations, with the consent of the public examiner, to go into voluntary liquidation, contains no enacting clause whatever. The constitution (article 4, § 13) provides that the style of all laws of this state shall be, "Be it enacted by the legislature of the state of Minnesota." Is this provision mandatory or only directory? There is a conflict in the authorities upon this question. Of the cases which hold similar constitutional provisions directory, the case of McPherson v. Leonard, 29 Md. 377, may be regarded as the leading one. The constitution of Maryland provided that the style of all laws of that state shall be, "Be it enacted by the general assembly of Maryland;" and the provision was held directory only, and that a failure to comply with it did not render a statute void. There was a vigorous dissent in this case. The constitution of Missouri contains a similar provision; and in the case of City of Cape Girardeau v. Riley, 52 Mo. 424, it was held that the provision was directory only, citing McPherson v. Leonard. In the case of Swann v. Buck, 40 Miss. 268, it was held that where the enacting clause of a statute read, "Be it resolved," etc., instead of, "Be it enacted," etc., it was a substantial compliance with the provision of the constitution, which was practically like our own. This case, however, does not hold that a statute without any enacting clause is valid, for the gist of the decision was: "There are no exclusive words in the constitution negating the use of any other language, and we think the intention will be best effectuated by holding the clause to be directory only. It is necessary that every law should show on its face the authority by which it is adopted and promulgated, and that it should clearly appear that it is intended that it should take effect as a law. These conditions being fulfilled, all that is absolutely necessary is expressed. The word 'resolved' is as potent to declare the legislative will as the word 'enacted.' There are other cases in which courts have applied the doctrine of directory statutory provisions to constitutional requirements, of which Pim v. Nicholson, 6 Ohio St. 177, is an example, in which it was held, contrary to the unbroken line of decisions in this court, that the constitutional provision that "no law shall embrace more than one subject, which shall be expressed in its title," was directory. The constitution of the state of Nevada provides: "The enacting clause of every law shall be as follows: 'The people of the state of Nevada represented in senate and assembly do enact as follows.'" Article 4, § 23. There is no essential difference in its legal effect between this language and that of our constitutional provision "that the style of all laws shall be, 'Be it enacted by the legislature of the state of Minnesota.'" In the case of State v. Rogers, 10 Nev. 250, it was held that a statute in which an attempt to comply with the constitutional provisions was made, but the words "senate and" were omitted from the enacting clause, was unconstitutional. The court, in its opinion, cites, compares, and analyzes all the decisions upon the question, and reaches the conclusion that the constitutional provision was mandatory. The courts of Indiana, Illinois, and North Carolina have respectively construed a constitutional provision, like the one now under consideration, mandatory. May v. Rice, 91 Ind. 546; Burritt v. Commissioners, 120 Ill. 322, 11 N.E. 180; State v. Patterson, 98 N.C. 660, 4 S.E. 350. In the Seat of Government Case, 1 Wash.T. 115, it was held that a statute without an enacting clause was void, although there was no constitutional provision requiring it. Mr. Cushing states the rule to be this: "An enacting clause is necessary to the validity of every statute, whether required by the constitution or not; and, where the enacting words are prescribed, nothing can be a law which is not introduced by those very words, even though others which are equivalent are at the same time used. Where the enacting words are not prescribed by the constitutional provision, the enacting authority must, notwithstanding, be stated, and any words which do this to a common understanding are doubtless sufficient; or words may be prescribed by rule, and in this respect much must depend upon usage." Cush. Parl. Law, § 2102. The question whether the entire absence of an enacting clause from a statute renders it void is an open one in this state. In the case of Board of Sup'rs v. Heenan, 2 Minn. 330 (Gil. 281), it was held that the provisions of the constitution prescribing the manner of passing bills in the legislature are imperative, and must be strictly followed. It is true that in the opinion in that case it was incidentally stated that many of the provisions in constitutions and statutes, though explicit in terms, are to be construed to be directory. This remark was purely obiter, and there is nothing in the opinion to suggest that a statute without a head—that is, an enacting clause—would be valid. Upon both principle and authority, we hold that article 4, § 13, of our constitution, which provides that "the style of all laws of this state shall be, 'Be it enacted by the legislature of the state of Minnesota,' " is mandatory, and that a statute without any enacting clause is void. Strict conformity with the constitution ought to be an axiom in the science of government. We are not prepared to hold that every provision of the constitution is mandatory, but we do hold that they should all be understood and accepted as mandatory unless a different intention is unmistakably manifest on the face of the provision. Rules which distinguish mandatory and directory statutes should rarely, if ever, be applied to constitutional provisions. Courts tread upon very dangerous ground when they attempt to do so. Cooley, Const.Lim. 93.

Unless a constitutional provision shows upon its face that it was intended to be directory, it must be accepted as the imperative mandate of the sovereign people, and not as good advice which legislators and courts may accept or reject as they please. The safety of the state, and the protection of the liberties and rights of the people, demand that this rule be strictly adhered to. But it is claimed that the provision in question shows that it was intended to be directory only, because it relates to a matter of form, and not of substance, and was intended simply to secure uniformity in the style of all laws. This is one of the objects intended to be secured by the provision, but not the only one. All written laws, in all times and in all countries, whether in the form of decrees issued by absolute monarchs, or statutes enacted by king and council, or by a representative body, have, as a rule, expressed upon their face the authority by which they were promulgated or enacted. The almost unbroken custom of centuries has been to preface laws with a statement in some form declaring the enacting authority. If such an enacting clause is a mere matter of form, a relic of antiquity, serving no useful purpose, why should the constitutions of so many of our states require that all laws must have an enacting clause, and prescribe its form. If an enacting clause is useful and important, if it is desirable that laws shall bear upon their face the authority by which they are enacted, so that the people who are to obey them need not search legislative and other records to ascertain the authority, then it is not beneath the dignity of the framers of a constitution, or unworthy of such an instrument, to prescribe a uniform style for such enacting clause. But it is otherwise if an enacting clause be a mere form, devoid of essence or substance. The concession that the object of the constitution, in prescribing the style of the enacting clause of a law, was to secure uniformity, necessarily implies that the matter of an enacting clause was so essential and important as to require uniformity in the mode of expressing it. Surely, it was not the intention to secure uniformity in the style of a useless form. It is not necessary to go to the extent of holding that, in the absence of any constitutional provision on the subject, a statute without an enacting clause would be void. But we do hold that the framers of our constitution, and the people adopting it, advised by the usages of the past, and the wisdom and legal learning of the men who had framed the constitutions for so many other states, regarded an enacting clause in a law as useful, necessary, and proper, and that they therefore anchored in the constitution a requirement that every law should have an enacting clause, and prescribed the form thereof. The words of the constitution, the style (that is, the mode of expressing or declaring) of all laws of this state shall be, "Be it enacted by the legislature of the state of Minnesota," imply that all laws must be so expressed or declared to the end that they may express upon their face the authority by which they were enacted; and, if they do not so declare, they are not laws of this state.

It is, however, claimed by appellant that the law in question contained an enacting clause at the time it passed the legislature, and that the trial court erred in excluding evidence of such fact. The ruling was correct, for the fact itself was immaterial, for the reason that a bill, although it passes the legislature, never becomes a law, unless it be presented to the governor, pursuant to article 4, § 11, of the constitution. If the bill in question contained an enacting clause when it passed the legislature, it was never presented to the governor, but in place of it a bill was presented to and approved by him containing no enacting clause. It follows that chapter 250, Laws 1897, is void, and that a compliance with its provisions does not necessarily constitute a defense to the application for a receiver in this case. . . .

MITCHELL, J. While I concur in the result, I am not prepared to assent to the proposition that the provision of the constitution as to the style of laws is mandatory, and that the absence of an enacting clause renders a statute void. I assent to the proposition that courts should be very slow in holding constitutional provisions to be merely directory, and that they ought never to do so unless it conclusively appears that the provision relates exclusively to a mere matter of style or form, which neither affects any right nor tends to prevent any wrong. But, in my judgment, the provision relating to the style of laws is one of exactly that kind. As stated in the opinion of the court, it had been the custom almost from time immemorial to prefix an enacting clause to every statute; but, as I understand the law, the omission to do so (in the absence of any constitutional provision requiring it) would not invalidate the act. A reference to the early English and the colonial statutes will show that there was no uniformity in enacting clauses, a great variety of forms being used, according to the taste of the legislative body enacting the law. Prior to the American Revolution it had been customary to state in the enacting clause that the statute was enacted by or with the consent of the reigning sovereign of Great Britain. This style became inappropriate after the declaration of our independence. Hence it became necessary to adopt some new style; and to this end, and at the same time to obtain uniformity, the former colonies usually inserted a provision in their state constitutions providing what the style of statutes should be. This was not designed to protect any right or to prevent any wrong, but merely to provide a new and uniform style in place of the old ones, which were no longer appropriate to the changed political conditions. This is not necessary in order to show by whom the law was passed, for that is apparent from the official publication of the laws or the engrossed bills on file in the office of the secretary of state or other proper officer, in connection with constitutional provisions as to the legislative department of the government, of which every person is presumed to be cognizant. As the decision of the majority of the court will, so far as I am personally concerned, be accepted as the settled law of this state, I do not care to say more than to thus briefly state my reasons for thinking that this provision of the constitution should be held to be merely directory. . . .

CANTY, J. I concur with MR. JUSTICE MITCHELL.

SECTION 5. DEFINITION OR INTERPRETATION CLAUSE

MCCARTHY v. STATE

Supreme Court of Wisconsin, 1920. 170 Wis. 516, 175 N.W. 785.

McCarthy was convicted of violation of the Pure Food Law, section 4601e, Stats. Wis., and brings his writ of error to reverse the judgment. The facts were undisputed, and were in brief as follows: McCarthy offered for sale and sold for use and consumption within the state a compound known as Mrs. Price's Canning Compound, composed of 95 per cent. boric acid and 5 per cent. common salt, advertised and intended to be used as a preservative in the canning of all kinds of fruits and vegetables. At the time of the sale, June 5, 1918, section 4601e, Stats. Wis., provided that—

"No person . . . shall . . . sell . . . or offer for sale any article of food within the meaning of section 4600 of the Statutes which contains . . . boric acid . . . or any other preservatives injurious to health."

Section 4600, after prohibiting the sale of any drug or article of food which is adulterated or any candy containing intoxicating liquor, further provides that—

"The term, 'food,' as used herein shall include all articles used for food or drink or condiment by man, whether simple, mixed or compound, and all articles used or intended for use as ingredients in the composition thereof or in the preparation thereof."

Section 4601e was first enacted in 1905 (chapter 33, Session Laws 1905), and at that time section 4600, Statutes, did not contain the final clause quoted above in italics, but stopped with the word "compound." The clause in question was added to the section by chapter 202, Session Laws of 1909.

WINSLOW, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). The Legislature has determined that food used by our citizens ought not to contain boric acid, because it is believed to be harmful to the health. In the lawful exercise of its police power the Legislature has interdicted the sale of food containing boric acid by section 4601e of the Statutes, and:

has referred us to section 4600 of the Statutes for the definition of the word "food." Turning to the last-named section we find that the definition of food at the time of the sale in question included "all articles . . . intended for use as ingredients in the composition thereof or in the production thereof."

It is entirely competent for the Legislature to provide its own definition of a word used in a law which it enacts, and when it does so that definition must necessarily control, regardless of dictionary definitions. So the question is not whether the compound in question is really a food, or whether the definition provided by the statute is a logical one, but whether the compound was intended for use as an ingredient in the composition or preparation of food; if it was, then it was a "food" within the meaning of section 4601e, and as it contained 95 per cent. of boric acid its sale was prohibited by that section. We think the question must be answered in the affirmative.

Clearly the compound is intended to enter as a constituent part into the food which it preserves, otherwise it could hardly have effect as a preservative; thus it necessarily becomes an ingredient in the composition thereof; and just as clearly the canning of fruit or vegetables is a part of the preparation of such fruit or vegetables for use as food. The fact that the canning operation may be removed by a considerable period of time from the final acts of preparation for the table does not make it any the less a legitimate part of the general work of preparation of the raw material for use as food.

Judgment affirmed.

STATE v. STANDARD OIL CO.

Supreme Court of Oregon, 1912. 61 Or. 435, 123 P. 40, Ann Cas.1914B, 179.

This is an action brought by the state of Oregon to recover from defendant, a corporation doing business in Oregon, taxes upon the gross earnings of such defendant for the period from June 26, 1906, to December 31, 1906, and for the years of 1907 and 1908, pursuant to the provisions of an act proposed by the initiative and adopted by the people June 4, 1906, and proclaimed by the Governor June 25, 1906, being sections 3544 to 3550, inclusive, of Lord's Oregon Laws. . . .

Defendant has complied with the act of February 16, 1903, entitled "An act to provide for the licensing of domestic corporations and foreign corporations, joint stock companies and associations," etc. On November 9, 1906, the Secretary of State of the state of Oregon issued defendant a certificate of authority to do business in the state, and the latter designated an attorney upon whom process might be served under the act, entitling it to transact business in Oregon.

Section 1 of the act in question (section 3544, L. O. L.) provides: "That in addition to the taxes now provided for by law, every . . . oil company, doing business in this state, shall pay to the state of Oregon, a license of three (3) per centum upon the gross earnings of such company in this state, which license shall be paid annually by such company to the treasurer of this state."

Section 4 (3547, L. O. L.) is as follows: "Any nonresident person or persons and every joint stock company or corporation not having its principal place of business within this state, or not being organized or incorporated under the laws of the state of Oregon, engaged in the business of buying and selling, or buying or selling (petroleum in its various products) within the state of Oregon, and any and all persons, companies, and corporations doing business in this state as the representative of any or either of the aforesaid persons or corporations, on commission or otherwise, and any person or persons, joint stock company, or corporation, resident within this state or organized or incorporated under the laws thereof, engaged in the business of buying and selling oil (petroleum in its various products) produced, obtained, or refined by either or any of the aforesaid nonresident persons, companies, or corporations, and whose business done annually in such special line amounts in the gross to twenty-five per centum of the total annual gross receipts of such person, company, or corporation from all lines in which he or it deals, and any person or persons, joint stock company, or corporation, wherever organized or incorporated, engaged in the business of operating cars for the transportation of such oil in this state on or over any railway line or lines in whole or in part within the state of Oregon, such line or lines not being owned or leased by such person, company, or corporation, shall be deemed an oil company, within the meaning of this act."

BEAN, J. (after stating the facts as above). . . . We find, as to the rule for the construction of interpretation clauses, that any provision in a statute which declares its meaning or purpose is authoritative. Any contemporaneous construction of the same words by the lawmakers is high evidence of the sense intended. It has been said that an interpretation clause should be used for the purpose of interpreting words which are ambiguous or equivocal; not so as to disturb the meaning of such as are plain. It is often inserted for this purpose, or for abundant caution, that there may be no misapprehension, though the interpretation so directed is not different from that which the language used would otherwise receive. In such cases, this provision leads to no difficulties of construction. When, however, the clause is employed, as it often is, to make particular words mean something different or more than they would naturally and ordinarily signify, it should be construed strictly. When a concise term is used which is to include other subjects besides the actual thing designated by the words, it must also be used with due regard to the true, proper, and legitimate construction of the act. 2 Lewis, Sutherland, Statutory Construction, § 576. Such clauses often perform much the same office as a guideboard having no index to point the direction. They have been discussed with marked disfavor in England, as they embarrass, rather than assist, the courts in their decisions. "It has been very much doubted," says Lord St. Leonards, L. C., "and I concur in that doubt, whether these interpretation clauses, which are of modern origin, have not introduced more mischief than they have avoided; for they have attempted to put a general construction on words which do not admit of such a construction in the different senses in which they are introduced in the various part of an act of Parliament." 2 Lewis, Sutherland, Statutory Construction, § 577.

Where the interpretation clause is that a particular word shall include a variety of things, not within its general meaning, it is a provision by way of extension, and not a definition by which other things are excluded. When the meaning is thus extended, the natural and ordinary sense is not taken away. Id. § 578, citing Ex parte Ferguson, L.R. 6 Q.B. 279, 291, where an act provided that the word "ship" shall include every description of vessel used in navigation not propelled by oars." On the question whether a fishing boat 24 feet long, partially decked over, and fitted with two masts and a rudder, and also with four oars, which were sometimes used, was a ship, within the meaning of the act, Mr. Justice Blackburn said: "The argument against the proposition is one which I have heard very frequently, viz., where an act says certain words shall include a certain thing, that the words must apply exclusively to that which they are to include. That is not so; the definition given of a 'ship' is in order that 'ship' may have a more extensive meaning. Whether a ship is propelled by oars or not, it is still a ship, unless the words 'not propelled by oars' exclude all vessels which are ever propelled by oars." . . .

In 26 Amer. & Eng. Enc. of Law, 680, we find, in regard to a proviso as aiding construction of enacting clauses, the following: ". . . Such clauses are often introduced from excessive caution, and for the purpose of preventing a possible misinterpretation of the act by including therein that which was not intended; the rule is therefore not one of universal obligation, and must yield to the cardinal rule which requires the court to give effect to the general intent, if that can be discovered within the four corners of the act. If such general intention would be defeated by construing the act as embracing everything of the same general description as those particularly excepted therefrom, an arbitrary application of the rule is not admissible." See, also, Dollar Savings Bank v. United States, 19 Wall. 227, 22 L.Ed. 80.

In The Queen v. Kershaw, 26 Com.Law Reports (Law Jr. 1857, N. S.), at page 22, 6 E. & B. 999, 1007, it was contended for the appellants that at an election the poll was invalid, because no person ought to have been admitted to vote at the election who was not actually rated to the highway rate; and the fifth section of 5 and 6 Will. IV, c. 50, was relied upon as explaining the meaning of the sixth section that the word "inhabitant" means a person rated to the highway rate. Justice Erle said: "There is nothing in the first part of section 6 to exclude any inhabitant from voting at the election of surveyor of highways who is entitled to be present at the nomination of overseers of the poor, and no doubt every one rated to the poor would be entitled to attend and to vote, though not rated to the highway rate. Then, as to the point arising out of the interpretation clause, if section 5 had said that the word 'inhabitant' should only mean a person rated, the construction would have been different. But the words are that 'inhabitant' shall be understood 'to include any person rated,' and other parts of the section show that the word 'include' is used in the sense of extension, and not as a definition, as when it is said that the word 'church' shall be understood to include chapel."

In the construction of a statute, where the court finds, in any particular clause, an expression not so large and extensive in its import as those used in other parts of the same statute, if, upon a review of the whole act, the real intention of the Legislature can be collected from the larger and more extensive expressions used in other parts, effect will be given to the large expressions. State v. Jennings, 27 Ark. 419.

It is contended by defendant's counsel that, by construing section 4 of the act and applying the maxim, "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius," the statute does not purport to tax residents of Oregon. This maxim does not apply to a statute, the language of which may fairly comprehend many different cases, in which some only are expressly mentioned, and not as excluding others of a similar nature. If there is some special reason for mentioning one, and none for mentioning a second, which is otherwise within the statute, the absence of any mention of the latter will not exclude it. 2 Lewis, Sutherland, Statutory Construction, § 495.

Whenever an act can be so construed and applied as to avoid conflict with the Constitution and give it the force of law, this will be done. Where one construction will make a statute void on account of conflict with the Constitution and another would render it valid, the latter will be adopted. Every intendment should be made in favor of the constitutionality of a statute. The lawmakers are presumed to act in view of the Constitution, and not to intend a violation of its provisions or the enactment of an invalid law. . . .

Applying the principles enunciated by the above authorities, which we think are sound and reasonable, section 1 of the act in question purports to impose a burden alike upon a resident and a nonresident oil company or person; and the interpretation clause in section 4 does not exempt residents of the state of Oregon from the operation of the act. The latter section does not say that only nonresident corporations or persons "shall be deemed an oil company within the meaning of the act." This section appears to have been inserted by the lawmakers in order that there might be no doubt as to the nonresident companies doing business in this state in a certain manner, or residents of the state buying and selling oil for nonresidents on commission. Taking the act in question as a whole, and giving it the meaning intended by the lawmakers, as indicated by its language, we think there is no discrimination between residents and nonresidents of the state of Oregon, or any denial of the "equal protection of the laws," as guaranteed by the fourteenth amendment of our federal Constitution, and that the tax provided for by the act is uniform. . . .

The judgment of the lower court is therefore affirmed.

IVEY v. RAILWAY FUEL CO.

Supreme Court of Alabama, 1928. 218 Ala. 407, 118 So. 583.

BOULDIN, J. The controlling question in this case is: Can an action be maintained under the Homicide Act for the death of a minor under 16 years of age, employed in a mine in violation of the Child Labor Law, or is the case governed by the Workmen's Compensation Law?

Section 7539 of the Code reads:

"Minors within statute.—The provisions of this chapter shall apply to employ  s who are minors and who have been employed in accordance with or contrary to laws regulating the employment of minors."

Speaking of this statute in Chapman v. Railway Fuel Co., 212 Ala. 106, 101 So. 879, it was said:

"This we construe to mean only that a minor is entitled to the benefit of the act as an employee, even though the contract under which he works is contrary to law and therefore void."

This was said in course of a discussion of the constitutionality of the Workmen's Compensation Law, but is nevertheless an expression of the judicial mind; and we may say declares the obvious meaning of such provision.

But the difficulty now presented arises from the presence, in section 7596, subd. (h), defining employee or workman within the meaning of the law, of the following expression: "And also includes minors who are legally permitted to work under the laws of [this] State."

As this clause appears in subdivision (h), it is incomplete and out of its setting. Its proper place is in subdivision (g). This becomes apparent by inspection of the original statute (Acts 1919, pp. 237, 238), in connection with the substitute bill set out in the Senate Journal, vol. 1, pages 819 and 820, and in connection with the statute of Minnesota from which the provision was taken. 2 Honnold, page 1325,    34, subd. (g).

The above-quoted provisions of the same legislative act are in conflict. Which controls?

Section 7539 is an express special declaration dealing with minors alone, while the expression quoted from subdivision (h) appears in section 7596, and which said section is but a general provision defining words and phrases. Section 7539 is plain and unambiguous, and deals specially with the application of the law to minors, while subdivision (h) and the section in which it appears deals generally with many subjects, words, and phrases. It is well settled by the decisions of this and other courts that, where there is a conflict in sections or provisions in pari materia, one dealing specially with a subject and the other doing so generally, the special section must prevail. "Generalibus specialia derogant." . . . Moreover, the rule applicable to defining clauses is that they should be used only for the purpose of interpreting words that are ambiguous or equivocal and not so as to disturb the meaning of such that are plain. 36 Cyc. 1106.

Section 7539 appears in the original act as subsection 5a, Acts 1919, p. 207.

Section 5 (Code, § 7538) deals with death claims arising under the Homicide Act among others. It incorporates therein section 4 (Code, § 7537), which expressly denies a right of recovery thereunder in case of an employee who has elected not to accept the provisions of article 2 as against an employer who has accepted such provisions.

Thus clearly the legislative mind was directed to the application of these elective features to minors, and section 5a was incorporated accordingly.

As above mentioned, section 36 of the Alabama act (Code, § 7596) was copied from the Minnesota act. Section 34. It had been construed in Westerlund v. Kettle River Co., 137 Minn. 24, 162 N.W. 680, as excluding minors employed in violation of the Child Labor Law.

Subsection 5a, Code, § 7539, did not appear in the Minnesota act. It is new to the Alabama statute. Thus appears a clear legislative purpose to depart from the parent act, and incorporate a provision expressive of such purpose. . . . This section does not strike down, nor is it in conflict with, the Child Labor Law. That law makes its violation a misdemeanor, punished accordingly. It does not deal with the civil remedies that shall accrue to such minor in case of injury, nor to his representative in case of death.

The Workmen's Compensation Law does deal with it. It confers on the minor the benefits of the Compensation Law, notwithstanding his employment was illegal, and likewise subjects him to the burdens of that law.

The Legislature was dealing comprehensively with employer and employee in view of conditions theretofore existing.

In Humphrees v. Boxley Brothers Co., 146 Va. 91, 135 S.E. 890, 49 A.L.R. 1427, the Virginia court deals at length with the occasion for Workmen's Compensation Laws, their scope and policy. We cite it as a well-considered case.

We think quite clearly our Legislature has brought within the Alabama Compensation Law cases of minors employed in violation of the Child Labor Law. Whether this is a wise or just policy is for the Legislature.

Affirmed.

SUSPINE v. COMPANIA TRANSATLANTICA
CENTROAMERICANA

District Court of the United States, 1941. 37 F.Supp. 268.

Libel by Braolio Suspine and others against Compania Transatlantica Centroamericana, S. A., and another, to recover for breach of contract of employment and to recover wages for overtime services in accordance with the contract of employment, wherein the United States Attorney intervened on behalf of the government. [Under the terms of the shipping articles with the respondent company, owners of the S. S. Panamanian, signed at Newport News, Virginia, on or about May 5th, 1940, the libellants were to serve as seamen for a voyage from there to England.]

HULBERT, DISTRICT JUDGE. . . . The libelants are citizens of the Philippine Islands.

10. On August 28, 1940, the United States Collector of the Port at Baltimore, Maryland, issued the following certificate:

"Treasury Department
"United States Customs Service
"Baltimore, Md.
"August 28, 1940.

"To Whom It May Concern:

"This is to certify that on June 29, 1940, the Master of the Panamanian S/S Panamanian applied to this office for clearance of the vessel to Liverpool, England, and clearance was refused because of the presence on board of Philipino seamen, who were prohibited from making such a voyage by the Neutrality Act of 1939, and by the Regulations of the Department of Commerce.

"It is further certified that clearance was granted to the vessel on July 3, 1940, when this office was satisfied that there were no persons on board who were prohibited by the Neutrality Act of 1939 from making the voyage in question."

11. On or about July 5, 1940, the libelants were discharged by the respondents as members of the crew of the S/S Panamanian and evicted from said vessel. . . .

The Act of Congress passed November 4, 1939, Title 22 U.S.C.A. §§ 245j to 245j—19, is known as the Neutrality Act of 1939.

The respondents contend:

1. That the libelants are "citizens" within said act;
2. As such, are debarred from entering the combat area defined by the President of the United States pursuant thereto, and
3. Such contract for the employment of the libelants upon the S/S Panamanian violated the laws of the United States and hence is null and void and unenforceable.

On November 4, 1939, the President of the United States pursuant to Section 1(a) of the said Neutrality Act, by proclamation No. 2374, 4 Federal Register 4493 D.I.-B.V., proclaimed that a state of war existed between Germany and France; Poland; and the United Kingdom, India, Australia, Canada, New Zealand, and the Union of South Africa.

Section 3 of the Neutrality Act provides that whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation under the authority of the Neutrality Act, and he shall thereafter find that the protection of citizens of the United States so requires, he shall, by proclamation, define combat areas, and thereafter it shall be unlawful, except under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed, for any citizen of the United States or any American vessel to proceed into or through any such combat area.

That on November 4, 1939, the President of the United States, acting under the authority of the said Neutrality Act, issued a proclamation, No. 2376, 4 Federal Register 4495-B.V., defining combat areas, and included in the combat areas so defined were all the waters adjacent to the British Isles. . . .

Section 16, of the Neutrality Act, under the heading of "Definitions", provides:

"(a) The term 'United States', when used in a geographical sense, includes the several States and Territories, the insular possessions of the United States (including the Philippine Islands), the Canal Zone, and the District of Columbia. . . .

"(f) The term 'citizen' shall include any individual owing allegiance to the United States"

The Philippine Independence Act, Title 48 U.S.C.A. § 1231 et seq., approved March 24, 1934, authorized the Philippine Legislature to formulate and draft a constitution for the government of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, and Section 1232 provides that such constitution shall contain the mandatory provision, among others, that pending the final and complete withdrawal of the sovereignty of the United States over the Philippine Islands, "All citizens of the Philippine Islands shall owe allegiance to the United States." Subdivision (2) thereof reads: "Every officer of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall, before entering upon the discharge of his duties, take and subscribe an oath of office, declaring, among other things, that he recognizes and accepts the supreme authority of and will maintain true faith and allegiance to the United States."

The Constitution of the Philippine Islands, adopted February 8, 1935, and approved by the President of the United States March 23, 1935, provides in an Ordinance annexed thereto, as follows:

"Section 1. Notwithstanding the provisions of the foregoing Constitution, pending the final and complete withdrawal of the sovereignty of the United States over the Philippines—

"(1) all citizens of the Philippines shall owe allegiance to the United States." 30 Philippine Pub.Laws, p. 386.

The status of the Philippine Islands and their inhabitants was reviewed at length in a very interesting opinion by Mr. Justice Sutherland (who had had an illustrious career in the U. S. Senate before his appointment to the bench) in Cincinnati Soap Co. v. United States, 301 U.S. 308, 57 S.Ct. 764, 81 L.Ed. 1122. . . .

It cannot be gainsaid that Filipinos are within the statutory definition of "individuals owing allegiance to the United States." . . .

It is a fundamental principle that a statutory definition of a word or phrase will be followed by the courts regardless of what meanings may be attributed to it by other authorities, or even by common understanding. Fox v. Standard Oil Co., 294 U.S. 87, 55 S.Ct. 333, 79 L.Ed. 780. . . .

Moreover, the very purpose of the law in the case at bar is to preserve the neutrality of the United States and avert the risks which brought us into the World War on April 6, 1917. . . .

My conclusion of law is:

For failure to state a cause of action, the libel must be dismissed and a decree entered in favor of the respondents.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. v. LENROOT

Supreme Court of the United States, 1945.
323 U.S. 490, 65 S.Ct. 335, 89 L.Ed. 414.

MR. JUSTICE JACKSON delivered the opinion of the Court.

A decree of the District Court in substance restrains the Western Union Telegraph Company from transmitting messages in interstate commerce until for thirty days it has ceased employment of messengers under the age of sixteen years and of certain others between the ages of sixteen and eighteen. This was thought to be required by the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, 29 U.S.C.A. § 201 et seq. The Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed, and we granted certiorari. 322 U.S. 719, 64 S.Ct. 1057.

The Western Union Telegraph Company collects messages in communities of origin and dispatches them by electrical impulses to places of destination where they are distributed. Messengers are employed in both collection and distribution. A little under 12 per cent of the messenger force is under sixteen years of age, and about .0033 per cent are from sixteen to eighteen years of age, engaged in the operation of motor vehicles, scooters, and telemotors. These messengers are employed only in localities where the law of the state permits it. It is not denied that both groups are engaged in oppressive child labor as defined by the Federal Act,¹ if it applies. Whether it does so apply is the only issue here.

I. It is conceded that the Act does not directly prohibit the employment of these messengers, because it contains no prohibition against employment of child labor in conducting interstate commerce.² It is conceded, too, that language appropriate directly to forbid this employment was proposed to Congress and twice rejected.

[Part of the opinion dealing with the history of the legislation is omitted. It is printed infra at p. 1160 Ed.]

II. The Government brought this action to reach indirectly child labor in interstate commerce by bringing it under the prohibition of Section 12(a) of the Act, which so far as material reads "no producer, manufacturer, or dealer shall ship or deliver for shipment in commerce any goods produced in an establishment situated in the United States, in or about which within thirty days prior to the removal of such goods therefrom any oppressive child labor has been employed." Violation of this command is a crime (§§ 15 and 16) punishable by a fine and imprisonment, and threatened violations may be restrained by injunction. The Government in this case sought injunction. Its complaint charges the Western Union with a violation in that "defendant has been engaged in shipping telegraph messages in interstate commerce and in delivering telegraph messages for shipment in interstate commerce, the said goods having been produced in its said establishments in or about which the aforesaid minors were employed, suffered, and permitted to work within thirty (30) days prior to the removal of said goods therefrom."

Contention that this section is applicable to the Western Union is predicated on three steps, viz.: telegrams are "goods" within its meaning; the Company "produces" these goods within the Act because it "handles" them; and transmission is "shipment" within its terms. If it can maintain all three of these positions, the Government is entitled to an injunction; if it fails in any one, admittedly the effort to bring the employment under the Act must fail.

The Government says messages are "goods" because the Act defines "goods" as therein used to include among other things "articles or subjects of commerce of any character." § 3(i). Of course, statutory definitions of terms used therein prevail over colloquial meanings. Fox v. Standard Oil Co., 294 U.S. 87, 95, 55 S.Ct. 333, 336, 79 L.Ed. 780. It was long ago settled that telegraph lines when extending through different states are instruments of commerce and mes-manufacturing or mining) in any occupation, or (2) any employee between the ages of sixteen and eighteen years is employed by an employer in any occupation which the Chief of the Children's Bureau in the Department of Labor shall find and by order declare to be particularly hazardous for the employment of children between such ages or detrimental to their health or well-being" 29 U.S.C. § 203(l), 29 U.S.C.A. § 203(l), June 25, 1938, c. 276, § 3(l), 52 Stat. 1061.

² The Act provides: "After the expiration of one hundred and twenty days from the date of enactment of this Act, no producer, manufacturer, or dealer shall ship or deliver for shipment in commerce any goods produced in an establishment situated in the United States in or about which within thirty days prior to the removal of such goods therefrom any oppressive child labor has been employed" § 12(a), 29 U.S.C. § 212(a), 29 U.S.C.A. § 212(a).

sages passing over them are a part of commerce itself. Western Union Telegraph Co. v. James, 162 U.S. 650, 654, 16 S.Ct. 934, 935, 40 L.Ed. 1105. That "ideas, wishes, orders, and intelligence" are "subjects" of the interstate commerce in which telegraph companies engage has also been held. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Pendleton, 122 U.S. 347, 356, 7 S.Ct. 1126, 1127, 30 L.Ed. 1107; cf. Associated Press v. National Labor Relations Board, 301 U.S. 103, 128, 57 S.Ct. 650, 653, 81 L.Ed. 953. It is unnecessary to decide whether electric impulses into which the words of the message are transformed are "goods" within the Act (cf. Utah Power & Light Co. v. Pfof, 286 U.S. 165, 52 S.Ct. 548, 76 L.Ed. 1038; Fisher's Blend Station, Inc. v. State Tax Commission, 297 U.S. 650, 56 S.Ct. 608, 80 L.Ed. 956; Electric Bond & Share Co. v. Securities & Exchange Commission, 303 U.S. 419, 58 S.Ct. 678, 82 L.Ed. 936, 115 A.L.R. 105), since the complaint is not based on "shipment" of impulses as "goods" but only of messages. We think telegraphic messages are clearly "subjects of commerce" and hence that they are "goods" under this Act, as alleged in the complaint.

The next inquiry is whether the Western Union Telegraph Company is a producer of these goods within the Act. Congress has laid down a definition that as used in the Act "produced" means produced, manufactured, mined, handled, or in any other manner worked on" § 3(j). The Company, says the Government, not only "handles" the message but "works on" it.

The Government contends that in defining "produced" the statute intends "handled" or "worked on" to mean not only handling or working on in relation to producing or making an article ready to enter interstate transit, but also includes the handling or working on which accomplishes the interstate transit or movement in commerce itself. If this construction is adopted, every transporter, transmitter, or mover in interstate commerce is a "producer" of any goods he carries. But the statute, while defining "produced" to mean "handled" or "worked on", has not defined "handled" or "worked on." These are terms of ordinary speech and mean what they mean in ordinary intercourse in this context. They serve a useful purpose when read to relate to all steps, whether manufacture or not, which lead to readiness for putting goods into the stream of commerce. One who packages a product, or bottles a liquid, or labels, or performs any number of tasks incidental to preparing for shipment might otherwise escape the Act, for in a sense he neither manufactures, produces, or mines the goods. We are clear that "handled" or "worked on" includes every kind of incidental operation preparatory to putting goods into the stream of commerce.

If we go beyond this and assume that handling for transit purposes is handling in production, we encounter results which we think Congress could not have intended. The definitions of this Act apply to the wage and hour provisions as well as to the child labor provisions. Section 15 (a) makes it unlawful to transport or ship goods in the production of which any employee was employed in violation of the wage and hour provisions. But it makes this exception: "except that no provision of this Act shall impose any liability upon any common carrier for the transportation in commerce in the regular course of its business of any goods not produced by such common carrier." (Italics supplied.) This recognizes a distinction between handling in transportation and producing, which is entirely put to naught by the Government's contention that by definition everyone who handles goods in carriage is thereby made a producer. The exception then is as if it read "the Act shall impose no liability on a common carrier for carrying goods that it does not carry." One would not readily impute such an absurdity to Congress; nor can we assume, contrary to the statute, that "produced" means one thing in one section and something else in another. To construe those words to mean that handling in carriage or transmission in commerce makes one a producer makes one of these results inevitable. Congress, we think, did not intend to obliterate all distinction between production and transportation. Its artificial definition, if construed to mean that "handling" and "worked on" catches up into the category of production every step in putting the subject of commerce in a state to enter commerce, is a sensible and useful one, not at odds with any other section of the Act. We think the Government has not established its contention that the Western Union is a "producer" of telegraph messages.

A third inquiry remains. Has the Company engaged in "shipping telegraph messages in interstate commerce and in delivering telegraph messages for shipment" as alleged? The learned trial court said, "More troublesome is the question whether the defendant 'shipped' goods in commerce." But he concluded on the basis of our decisions that the defendant was a "carrier of messages" to be compared to a railroad as a "carrier of goods," citing Western Union Telegraph Co. v. State of Texas, 105 U.S. 460, 464, 26 L.Ed. 1067; Pensacola Telegraph Co. v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 96 U.S. 1, 24 L.Ed. 708. He thought "ship" synonymous with "transport" and "convey" and hence held that the Company was "shipping" messages.

The Circuit Court of Appeals, although it sustained the injunction, took a contrary view of the nature of the enterprise. It analyzed the technology of transmitting messages. The message, it said, never leaves the originating office. It is only a text for sending electrical impulses "which are not only not the sender's message, but would be totally incomprehensible to him or to the addressee, if either could perceive them." [141 F.2d 400, 402.] It said, "From the foregoing it is at once apparent that there is not the least similarity between what the defendant does and the transportation of goods by a common carrier." Thus it cut the ground from under the Government's only allegation of violation: i. e., that the Company is engaged in "shipping" messages. It advanced this theory, apparently, to answer the Company's contention that if it was likened to a carrier, as the District Court thought, it was entitled to the benefit of the carrier's exemption in Section 15(a) (1). We do not think it is necessary for us to resolve the interesting but baffling inquiry as to precisely what, if anything, moves across state lines in the telegraphic process. In its practical aspects, which concern the public, transmission of messages is too well known to require analysis; and in its scientific aspects, which interest the physicist, it is too little known to permit of it.

The statute applies the indirect sanctions of the Act only to those who "ship" subjects of commerce. It does not, however, define "ship." The Government says, "The verb 'ship' is an imprecise word meaning little more than to send or to transport." The term, not being artificially defined by statute, is from the ordinary speech of people. Its imprecision to linguists and scholars may be conceded. But if it is common in the courts, the marketplaces, or the schools of the country to speak of shipping a telegram or receiving a shipment of telegrams, we do not know of it, nor are examples of such usage called to our attention. Nor, if one departs from the complaint in the case and adopts the theory of the Court of Appeals, do we think either scientist or layman would ever speak of "shipping" electrical impulses. The fact is that to sustain the complaint we must supply an artificial definition of "ship," one which Congress had power to enact, but did not. We do not think "ship" in this Act applies to intangible messages, which we do not ordinarily speak of as being "shipped."

Another consideration convinces us that this Act did not contemplate its application by indirection to such a situation as we have in hand. Its indirect sanctions are well adapted to the producer, miner, manufacturer, or handler in preparation for commerce. They become clumsy and self-defeating when applied to telegraph companies, railroads, interstate news agencies, and the like, as this decree demonstrates. The Western Union is not forbidden by the decree to employ child labor, nor could it be, for it is not so forbidden by the Act. As construed by the courts below, what is prohibited is the sending of telegrams—so long as it employs child labor and for a period of thirty days after it quits. This, as the Company observes, is a sanction that the Court could not permit to become effective. A suspension of telegraphic service for any period of time would be intolerable. Of course, the Government says, the Company could escape its effect except for the thirty-day period by discharging some twelve per cent of its messengers, who are under age but whom neither the Court nor Congress has forbidden it to employ. It also suggests that the thirty-day period may be absorbed in delays. Or, it says, the District Court or Circuit Court of Appeals "may properly stay the injunction further in order to permit the transmission of messages until petitioner has a reasonable time to comply."

Of course literal compliance could be made only by ceasing to send messages, since that is all the decree does or could command. But the Company could and probably would avoid doing what the decree orders, by doing what it does not and cannot order: viz., discharging the underage part of its messenger force. This, however, would leave the thirty-day period after our mandate becomes final and goes down, during which the courts must stay the force of the injunction, either candidly or by dilatory tactics, or the Company, by continuing service to the public, would be in contempt. Even if this were done, courts cannot stay the provisions under which the sending of messages during such period is made criminal. We may suppose the Government would not actually prosecute. But that is only because the sanctions of the Act, if applied to such a situation, are so impractical that a violation adjudged by us to be proven by stipulation of the parties as to the facts would be waived. We think if Congress contemplated application of this Act to the Western Union it would have provided sanctions more suitable than to forbid telegrams to be sent by the only Company equipped on a nation-wide scale to serve the public in sending them. Nor will we believe without more express terms than we find here that Congress intended the courts to issue an injunction which as a practical matter they would have to let become a dead letter, or enforce at such cost to the public, if a defendant proved stubborn and recalcitrant. If the indirect sanctions of this Act were literally to be applied to great agencies of transportation and communication, the recoil on the public interest would be out of all proportion to the evil sought to be remedied.

However, the indirect sanction of cutting one's goods off from the interstate market is one which can be applied to producers as we have defined them herein effectively and without injury to the public interest. If such a producer using child labor is refused facilities to transport his goods, competitors usually come in, needs are still supplied, and only the offender suffers. These indirect sanctions can practically and literally be applied to the miner and the manufacturer with no substantial recoil on the public interest, and with no gestures by the courts that they cannot follow through to punish disobedience.

Ascertainment of the intention of Congress in this situation is impossible. It is to indulge in a fiction to say that it had a specific intention on a point which never occurred to it. Had the omission of a direct prohibition of this employment been called to its attention, it might well have supplied it, for any reason we can see. Congress of course has the right to be indirect where it could be direct and to be obscure and confusing where it could be clear and simple. But had it determined to reach this employment, we do not think it would have done so by artifice in preference to plain terms. It is admitted that it is beyond the judicial power of innovation to supply a direct prohibition by construction. We think we should not try to reach the same result by a series of interpretations so far-fetched and forced as to bring into question the candor of Congress as well as the integrity of the interpretative process. After all, this law was passed as the rule by which employers and workmen must order their daily lives. To translate this Act by a process of interpretation into an equivalent of the bills Congress rejected is, we think, beyond the fair range of interpretation. Declining that, we cannot sustain the Government's bill of complaint.

Reversed.

MR. JUSTICE MURPHY, dissenting. A word need be said about the Court's fear of enforcing Section 12(a) against Western Union. Pursuant to the Congressional mandate, the trial court enjoined Western Union from transmitting or delivering for transmission in commerce "telegraph or other messages or any other goods" produced by it in any establishment in or about which within 30 days prior to the transmission there shall have been employed any oppressive child labor. It is said, however, that this is a sanction that we dare not permit to become effective since the suspension of telegraphic service for 30 days would be intolerable. Such a sanction is said to be well adapted to the producer, miner, manufacturer or handler but clumsy and self-defeating when applied to telegraph companies, railroads and the like. Convinced by these considerations that the Act did not contemplate its application to this situation, the Court proceeds to carve out a judicial exception to Section 12(a) for all interstate carriers.

However much we may dislike the imposition of Congressional sanctions against a particular industry or field of endeavor, the judicial function does not allow us to disregard that which Congress has plainly and constitutionally decreed and to formulate exceptions which we think, for practical reasons, Congress might have made had it thought more about the problem. To read in exceptions based upon the nature or importance of the particular industry or corporation is dangerous precedent. If the suspension of telegraphic service for 30 days is so intolerable as to justify lifting the burden of Section 12(a) from the shoulders of Western Union, can it not be argued with equal fervor that a 30-day injunction against interstate shipments by an airplane manufacturer, a munitions plant or some other industry vital to a war or peace time economy would be likewise intolerable? What valid distinction in this respect is there between interstate carriers and manufacturers or producers? Moreover, are we to examine the competitive situation or degree of importance of a particular company to determine the amount of intolerableness which a suspension of interstate transportation might engender? These and countless other legislative problems present themselves when we embark upon a course of fashioning exceptions to a statute according to our own conceptions of appropriateness of the sanctions of an Act. Such a course is an open invitation to wholesale veto of valid and reasonable legislative provisions by means of judicial refusal to apply statutory enforcement measures. Adherence to the sound rule that inequities and hardships arising from statutory sanctions are for Congress rather than the courts to remedy by way of amendment to the statute is desirable and necessary in such a situation.

We are charged with the duty of interpreting and applying acts of Congress in accordance with the legislative intent. Courts are not so impotent that they cannot perform that duty and, at the same time, grant stays or other appropriate relief in the public interest should the occasion demand it. See Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U.S. 1, 81, 31 S.Ct. 502, 524, 55 L.Ed. 619, 34 L.R.A., N.S., 834, Ann.Cas. 1912D, 734; United States v. American Tobacco Co., 221 U.S. 106, 187, 188, 31 S.Ct. 632, 651, 55 L.Ed. 663. Thus if the injunction is granted here against Western Union, we will have vindicated to that extent the public policy against oppressive child labor. If a 30-day suspension of telegraph messages would unduly harm the public interest, a stay of the mandate or of the injunction can be granted until at least 30 days have elapsed during which no oppressive child labor has been employed by Western Union. Thus by fashioning remedies through injunctions and stays we can aid in the elimination of oppressive child labor without undue hardship on the public. This can and should be done without abdicating our judicial function and assuming the rule of the legislature.

MR. JUSTICE BLAKE, MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS and MR. JUSTICE RUTLEDGE join in this dissent.

SECTION 6. THE PURVIEW

A. Unity of Subject

JOHNSON v. HARRISON

47 Minn. 575, 50 N.W. 923, 58 Am.St.Rep. 382.

MITCHELL, J. Chapter 46, Laws 1889, entitled "An act to establish a Probate Code," is divided into 21 subchapters, containing 326 sections. The intention of the legislature obviously was to enact, in the form of one act, a complete system of statutory law relating to or connected with those matters of which, under the constitution, probate courts have jurisdiction, to-wit, "estates of deceased persons and of persons under guardianship." It is contended that the act is repugnant to section 27, art. 4, of the constitution of the state, which provides that "no law shall embrace more than one subject, which shall be expressed in the title;" that the act embraces several distinct and separate subjects, some of which, particularly subchapter 3, relating to title to real property by descent, is not expressed in the title. The purposes of such a constitutional provision, the mischiefs which it is designed to prevent, the rules to be applied to its construction, and the tests to be applied to determine whether a law is repugnant to it, are so familiar, and have been so often passed upon by this and other courts, that they need only be referred to very briefly. Its purposes are two: First, to prevent what is called "log-rolling legislation" or "omnibus bills," by which a number of different and discontinued subjects are united in one bill, and then carried through by a combination of interests; second, to prevent surprise and fraud upon the people and the legislature by including provisions in a bill whose title gives no intimation of the nature of the proposed legislation, or of the interests likely to be affected by its becoming a law; and, in deciding whether an act is obnoxious to this provision of the constitution, a very good test to apply is whether it is within the mischiefs intended to be remedied.

Again, while this provision is mandatory, yet it is to be given a liberal, and not a strict, construction. It is not intended, nor should it be so construed as, to embarrass legislation by making laws unnecessarily restrictive in their scope and operation, or by multiplying their number, or by preventing the legislature from embracing in one act all matters properly connected with one general subject. The term "subject," as used in the constitution, is to be given a broad and extended meaning, so as to allow the legislature full scope to include in one act all matters having a logical or natural connection. To constitute duplicity of subject, an act must embrace two or more dissimilar and discordant subjects that by no fair intendment can be considered as having any legitimate connection with or relation to each other. All that is necessary is that act should embrace some one general subject; and by this is meant, merely, that all matters treated of should fall under some one general idea, be so connected with or related to each other, either logically or in popular understanding, as to be parts of, or germane to, one general subject. The large number of related or cognate matters often treated of under some comprehensive title, such as "Criminal Code," "Penal Code," "Code of Civil Procedure," "Private Corporations," "Railroad Corporations," and the like, are familiar illustrations of what may be legitimately included in one act. Any construction of this provision of the constitution that would interfere with the very commendable policy of incorporating the entire body of statutory law upon one general subject in a single act, instead of dividing it into a number of separate acts, would not only be contrary to its spirit, but also seriously embarrassing to honest legislation. All that is required is that the act should not include legislation so incongruous that it could not, by any fair intendment, be considered germane to one general subject. The subject may be as comprehensive as the legislature chooses to make it, provided it constitutes, in the unconstitutional sense, a single subject, and not several. The connection or relationship of several matters, such as will render them germane to one subject and to each other, can be of various kinds, as for example, of means to ends, of different subdivisions of the same subject, or that all are designed for the same purpose, or that both are designated by the same term. Neither is it necessary that the connection or relationship should be logical; it is enough that the matters are connected with and related to a single subject, in popular signification. The generality of the title of an act is no objection, provided only it is sufficient to give notice of the general subject of the proposed legislation and of the interests likely to be affected. The title was never intended to be an index of the law. Tested by these general rules, we are of opinion that the Probate Code embraces a single general subject, and that this subject is sufficiently expressed in its title.

In our judgment, much of the argument of counsel for respondents rests upon an entirely too limited and narrow definition of the meaning of the words "probate" and "code." They seem to construe the title of the act as if it read "An act to establish a Probate Court Code of Procedure." The word "code," as now generally used, and as obviously used in this title, means "a system of law,"—"a systematic and complete body of law." And while the word "probate" originally meant merely "relating to proof," and afterwards "relating to the proof of wills," yet in the American law it is now a general name or term used to include all matters of which probate courts have jurisdiction, which in this state are "the estates of deceased persons and of persons under guardianship." Hence the term "Probate Code" may and should be construed as meaning "the body or system of law relating to the estates of deceased persons and of persons under guardianship." In common understanding, this is as distinct and clearly defined a branch of the law as is criminal law or corporation law, and in popular signification the term "probate law" includes all matters of which probate courts generally have jurisdiction, among which is "estates of deceased persons." An examination of this act will show that all its provisions are connected with this general subject. The fact that some of them relate to matters of mere procedure, while others define and fix rights of property, is no valid objection to the law. The same objection might be urged against many acts the constitutionality of which has never been questioned. Neither is the fact important that a law contains matters that might be, and usually are, contained in separate acts, or would be more logically classified as belonging to different subjects, provided only they are germane to the general subject of the act in which they are put. The legislature is not limited to the most logical or philosophical classification. The law of wills and of title to property by descent is a part of the law relating to the estates of deceased persons, and hence is, in popular understanding, if not logically, a part of the general subject of probate law. . . .

B. Terms Incorporated by Reference

HORACE E. READ, IS REFERENTIAL LEGISLATION WORTHWHILE?

18 Can.Bar Rev. 415 (1940); 25 Minn.L.Rev. 261 (1941).

. . . A referential statute, accurately so-called, operates in either of two ways: first, and most commonly, the new act adopts precepts, in whole or in part, from other law; or second, the act provides that it shall be incorporated into all acts of a certain kind that may be passed in the future.¹⁶ Common examples of the latter are the general interpretation acts.¹⁷ (Since statutes which use the former method are by far the more numerous and troublesome, all discussion hereafter will concern them unless otherwise is expressly indicated). Further, as to method, a referential act with the adoptive effect just described may either (a) apply to a new set of circumstances law originally passed for the purpose of dealing with another set of circumstances, or, less often, (b) apply to some matter a code originally passed for the purpose of being applied from time to time in a certain sphere as occasion requires.¹⁸ However, each of these modes as compared to the other has merely incidental peculiarities; and they will be adverted to later.

A person who seeks the law within the covers of the statute book must first of all discover whether the provision under his immediate perusal is self-contained, and, if it is not, in what direction and how far afield he must go to supply its deficiencies. To do this he must interpret. If, despite textual interpretation, he finds a hiatus in legislative expression, he will look for the legislative intention as to how to fill that hiatus. Before resorting to some contextual aid such as, for example, application of the in pari materia canon, he will investigate whether there is an incorporation of terms by reference. If he finds an express reference, his first step is easy; and for that reason a draftsman should be careful to make an intended express reference clear. A typical example of the result of a failure to do so was dealt with by Chief Justice Coleridge in *Mather v. Brown*¹⁹ where he held that a section of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1835,²⁰ was neither extended to nor incorporated with the Municipal Elections Act 1875, by the following reference:

"This Act shall, as far as consistent with the tenor thereof, be construed as one with the Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, ch. 76 (Municipal Corporations Act) and the acts amending the same. . . ."²¹

There may be an implied reference. Cases involving the question of (Railway Clauses Consolidation Act). Wording that is characteristic of such acts appears in The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. ch. 18) which provides by sec. 1 "that this Act shall apply to every undertaking authorized by an Act which shall hereafter be passed, and which shall authorize the purchase or taking of lands for such undertaking, and this Act shall be incorporated with such Act" For a discussion of this act see In re Wood's Estate, (1886) 31 Ch.D. 607, 55 L.J.Ch. 488.

²¹ 38-39 Vict. ch. 40, sec. 13. An example of a back-handed form of words which was construed to have effected an incorporation by reference is Kentucky, Acts 1936, ch. 105, p. 327: "Nothing contained herein or in chapter one hundred forty-two (142) of the Acts of one thousand nine hundred thirty-two (1932) of the General Assembly of Kentucky, shall be construed as affecting the duties of the county attorney, with reference to the giving of notice as provided in section four thousand one hundred fifty-three (4,153), Carroll's Kentucky Statutes, or as affecting his compensation as provided in said section." incorporation of terms by implication or necessary intendment, although not plentiful, have usually been vexatious. One of the most interesting arose recently in Wisconsin. In *Gilson Bros. Co. v. Worden-Allen Co.*²² the question was whether the plaintiff was a beneficiary of a contractor's bond and hence could claim as a party in interest under an act of 1931²³ which required such bonds to be secured in public works contracts. The act provided that the bond should cover labor and materials, but was silent concerning the extent of the class of persons protected, and contained no words of express reference whatever. It was held that as the legislature did not attempt to give anyone a mechanic's lien on a public building, but instead devised the plan of placing a bond, to be given by the principal contractor where it would serve to save from loss persons who were so related to the work that they would have been protected by the mechanic's lien act had they been dealing with a contractor who was building for an individual, the 1931 act by necessary implication incorporated therein the classification of parties in interest contained in the mechanic's lien statute ipsissimis verbis. The plaintiff did not fall within that classification.²⁴

England supplies an example of a finding that an implied incorporation by reference was effected despite what appeared to be an express negation contained in the referring statute itself. The Metropolitan Board of Works, by an act passed in 1877,²⁵ was authorized to acquire specified land for street improvement, and sec. 33 thereof provided the machinery and regulated the procedure by which such land was to be acquired and sold or let. Later, by an amending act, passed in 1892,²⁶ the board was required to erect artisans' dwellings on three of the lots. Section 3 of the amending act declared:

"From and after the passing of this Act the provisions contained in section 33 of the Act of 1877 shall cease to be in force with respect to the lands shewn on the Gray's Inn Road plan, [the land on which the dwellings were to be built] and authorized to be taken by the Act of 1877, and in relation thereto the Act of 1877 shall be read as though the said section were not contained therein."

In *Wigram v. Fryer*²⁷ Mr. Justice North held that because the amending act had failed to provide the Board with the essential machinery to enable it to erect the required dwellings, the provisions of sec. 33 of the principal act of 1877 were, despite the language of sec. 3, referentially adopted pro tanto by necessary implication. Well might the judge remark,

If the seeker of the law of the statute finds that there is a reference, either express or implied, he next must solve the problem of its extent in the sense simply of quantity, that is how many of the terms of the law to which reference is made does the referential act gain?

If the reference is express and specific, that is, one which refers to one or more named provisions of another act or to one or more named acts and applies it or them to the subject of the adopting statute, he will have little trouble.²⁹ But general references are pregnant with litigation. In them the very looseness of the referring language is a command invitation to the courts to partake in the legislative process—and they have responded with a rule of reason: "In the construction of general references in acts of Parliament, such reference must be made only as will stand with reason and right."³⁰

A typical general reference is illustrated and the judicial modus operandi in applying this standard is neatly revealed by an Alabama case.³¹ There the question was whether the clerk of the city court of Mobile had power to issue an original attachment. By statute there had been conferred upon that court "all the powers, [with one exception not here relevant], of the several circuit courts of the state."³² The clerks of those courts had been, by a previous statute, expressly empowered to issue an original attachment. The court called reason to their aid as follows:

"An original attachment is not an ordinary process, and does not issue out of a court, and does not pertain to the exercise of the ordinary powers and jurisdiction of a court. It is an extraordinary process, and can only be issued by the persons or officers upon whom the statute confers special authority to issue it. The power exercised in issuing Interpretation acts sometimes assist in making specific references additionally precise, e.g. Alberta, Rev.Stat.1922, ch. 1, secs. 33, 34; Manitoba, Rev.Stat.1913, ch. 105, sec. 26.

Dexter*, (1859) 8 Fla. 276, 285, the same doctrine is expressed in varied language: ". . . where the provisions of a statute are adopted by general reference it will receive a more liberal construction than if originally passed with reference to the particular subject." See also Panama R. R. v. Johnson, (1924) 264 U.S. 375, 391-392, 44 S.Ct. 391, 68 L.Ed. 748; Hutto v. Walker County, (1913) 185 Ala. 505, 64 So. 313.

it is *in its nature judicial*³³ . . . and is not such as pertains to the clerk of a court merely as a clerk, and such as he exercises in the issue of process which issues out of the court and pertains to the exercise of the jurisdiction of the court."³⁴

The conclusion was that the reference clause conferred upon the clerk of the city court, a ministerial officer, the general powers of the clerks of the circuit courts, but not the power to issue an original attachment, a power special and in its nature judicial.³⁵

Perhaps it is not out of place to observe just here that tasks of this kind thrust upon the courts by using general references do not appear to be materially lightened by the clause sometimes inserted to the effect that the adopted law "shall apply save so far as expressly varied or excepted" by the referring act.³⁶ Neither are they lightened by a direction that the law referred to shall be applied "only in so far as the same are applicable," since after all that is but an express mandate to employ the rule of reason.³⁷ Employment of this direction has, indeed, been held to authorize judicial legislation to the degree necessary to save a referential act from being so uncertain as to be an insufficient expression of the legislative will.³⁸

Sometimes the identity of the provisions included within a general reference is impossible to discover. Then, the extent of the reference being wholly indeterminable, the referring act is void for uncertainty; there is a casus omissus. This obviously occurs and is easily established when no law of the sort named in the reference exists.³⁹ Also it happens when a statute provides that its subject shall be governed by

It was held that since the court could take judicial notice of what that form was the reference was not void for want of certainty.

the law concerning some other subject, and that law is unidentifiable, as in the New Mexican case where the reference was to "the laws of this state as to method and manner of appropriation and use of underground waters" and different laws containing contradictory rules were applicable to underground waters according to whether or not they were artesian.⁴⁰

Extent of a reference in time, that is in respect of adoption of change in the adopted measure made subsequent to the reference, methodically should be considered here. Historically, however, the pertinent law had its beginning as a logical inference from the rule governing the primary effect of a reference upon the status of an adopted precept. It is desirable, therefore, to consider that law in its setting as a secondary result of that primary effect.

The courts are unanimous concerning the primary legal effect of a statutory reference. Whenever an act of the legislature brings into itself by reference pre-existing common law precepts or the terms of another act, the precepts and terms to which reference is made are to be considered and treated as if they were incorporated into and made a part of the referring act just as completely as though they had been explicitly written therein.⁴¹ The adopted provisions as such derive their vitality solely from the referential statute.⁴²

From this primary doctrine flow certain secondary results. The first is that a two step process is introduced to the interpretation and construction of the adopted language. It must first be read in the sense which it bore in the original act from which it was taken,⁴³ and next in the light of its new environment, textual and otherwise.⁴⁴

The second of these secondary results has concerned the effect of modifications of the adopted law, made subsequent to the adoption, upon the referential statute, that is to say, the extent of a reference in time. Here a study of the cases in which the now established rules were evolved reveals in striking fashion the genius of the courts for compromising between the dictates of logic and practical expediency. The earlier decisions in both England and the United States hold without qualification that the repeal of the incorporated law leaves the referring one in force, unless it also is repealed expressly or by necessary implication, and that the reference does not carry with it changes afterwards made in the former. Taking as premise the primary effect of a reference, the logic of such a rule is obviously unassailable.⁴⁵ Moreover, as Mr. Justice Thompson pointed out in Kendall v. United States, " . . . no other rule would furnish any certainty as to what was the law, and would be adopting prospectively all changes that might be made in the law."⁴⁶ This is apparently still the unqualified common law rule in England,⁴⁷ Ontario,⁴⁸ and Nova Scotia.⁴⁹

Lord Blackburn said: "Where a single section of an act of parliament is introduced into another act, I think it must be read in the sense which it bore in the original act from which it was taken, and that consequently it is perfectly legitimate to refer to all the rest of that act in order to ascertain what the section meant, though those other sections are not incorporated in the new Act." Soc.*, (1931) 58 I.A. 259, 267, Sir George Lowndes, speaking for the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, said, after stating the rule as to repeal of an adopted statute: "It seems to be no less logical to hold that where certain provisions from an existing act have been incorporated into a subsequent act, no addition to the former act, which is not expressly made applicable to the subsequent act, can be deemed to be incorporated in it, at all events if it is possible for the subsequent act to function effectually without the addition."

(b) The common law rule stated in the text supra was modified in England by the Interpretation Act, 1889, 52-53 Vict. ch. 63 sec. 38(1), which reads: "Where this act or any act passed after the commencement of this act repeals and re-enacts, with or without modification, any provisions of a former act, references in any other act to the provisions so repealed, shall, unless the contrary intention appears, be construed as reference to the provisions so re-enacted." See 31 Halsbury, Laws of England (2d ed. 1938) 565, n. (q), for cases applying this provision. See also interpretation acts, Canada, Rev.Stat.1927 ch. 1, sec. 20(b); Alberta, Rev.Stat.1922, ch.

But, despite their initial declaration of firm loyalty to a rule coined of logic and dedicated to certainty, it was not long before the "American" courts, while in the throes of construction, resorted to the "Intention of the Legislature," that Aladdin's lamp which has so often enabled Anglo-American courts to conjure much from little or nothing. The result was a distinction between two types of reference: Where one statute adopts the whole or a part of another *statute*⁵⁰ by a particular or descriptive⁵¹ reference to the statute or provisions adopted, such adoption takes the statute as it exists at the time of adoption and does not include subsequent additions, modifications, or repeals of the statute so taken unless it does so expressly or by necessary implication.⁵² But where the reference is, not to any particular statute or part of a statute, but to the law generally which governs a specified subject, the reference will be regarded as including, not only the law on that subject in force at the date of the referential act, but also that law as it exists from time to time thereafter.⁵³

The distinction just stated appears to have been drawn first in a Florida case, Jones v. Dexter, in 1859.⁵⁴ An act of 1828 adopted in general terms as the rule for the distribution of personalty on intestacy — "the provisions of the law regulating descents." At that time descents of realty were covered by an act of 1822, but in 1829 it was superseded. The 1829 act was substantially borrowed from Kentucky, which in turn had derived it from Virginia. Both states had enacted it after a referential act had applied the law of descents to personalty, and in both the reference had been held not to extend to it. On perusing the Virginia and Kentucky decisions,⁵⁵ the Florida court found a distinction between the wording of the reference clauses pronounced upon therein and that of the one before it. Said the court:

"In the construction of our statute of 1828, we are wholly relieved from the pressure which bore upon the Virginia and Kentucky courts, growing out of the particular phraseology of their adopting acts. Our statute makes no reference to any particular act, by its title or otherwise, but uses the broader and more comprehensive term 'law' — 'the law governing descents.' The term 'law' is more general than the term 'act', and is of much more extensive signification, and especially so in its application when the latter is limited and qualified by the designation of its title. . . . It would be monstrous indeed to hold, that because the provisions of a statute, especially enacted with reference to a particular subject, had been, by mere adoption in general terms, applied to a subject of an essentially different nature, those provisions still continued in force in relation to that other subject, notwithstanding the original act should have been expressly repealed. The bare announcement of the proposition furnishes its own condemnation. It is illogical and wholly incompatible with any idea of sound reason. We are not unaware that there are instances where a repeal of the original act operates no further than to affect the original subject . . . ; but this is not of that class of cases."⁵⁶

It followed that the act of 1829 furnished the rule of descent for personalty.

By such logic was a distinction born, a logic sound enough on its immediate premises but hardly compatible with the primary legal effect of a reference. Certainly it is well worth quoting at length, for two reasons: first, because many courts outside of Florida were quick to crystallize this distinction, (expedient though it was merely to construing a relatively obscure statute of that state), into a dogmatic rule; and second, because reasoned judicial applications of the distinction have been rarer than radium. Indeed, practically every judge who has since made use of it "seems to have shrunk from the discussion thereof, and reposed himself upon the sanctity of former decisions." ⁵⁷

In stating the rule which originated in Jones v. Dexter the present writer in the text just before stating the case has used the language and its arrangement most common to judicial opinions and text books. From that language the essential distinction involved might well appear to be between whether or not the adopted precept was statutory or common law. But the distinction plainly does not lie there; it actually operates only when the precept to which reference is made happens to be in legislative form. When the precept is a part of the unwritten law, a reference to it for adoptive purposes is always general. But when it is statutory, the reference may be either specific or general, depending upon the form of words used as construed in the light of the precept to which the reference is made.

Especially difficult to construe in this regard in advance of litigation are descriptive references. How determine in a given case between description and generality? Thus in *Chelan County v. Navarre*⁵⁸ the reference in question was contained in a general statute relating to condemnation proceedings. It provided that "In case a jury is waived, as in civil cases in courts of record, in the manner prescribed by law, the compensation to be paid for the property sought to be appropriated shall be ascertained and determined by the court or the judge thereof, and the proceedings shall be the same as in trials of an issue of fact by the court."

When this reference was made in 1891 waiver of juries in ordinary civil actions was governed by a single general statute which allowed no constructive waiver, but it was amended in 1903 to provide for that species of waiver. In holding that the 1903 act enabled a constructive waiver to be found in condemnation proceedings begun in 1904, the court said:

"Here the adopting statute does not refer to any particular act, but to the general statute on the subject of waiving a jury trial, hence the existing law governs the subject, and not the law in force at the time the condemnation statute was enacted." ⁵⁹

The character of this reference appears to be plain. But compare People v. Crossley,⁶⁰ where it was held that the following reference in an act to authorize the organization of high school districts was to a specific statute, and not to the law generally on the particular subject, schools:

"For the purpose of supporting a high school, the township or territory for the benefit of which a high school is established under the provisions of this act, shall be regarded as a school district, and the board of education thereof shall, in all respects, have the powers and discharge the duties of boards of education elected under the general school law."

Here, just as in Chelan County v. Navarre, when the reference was made the law adopted was contained in a general statute, but it happened here that the title of that general statute was "General School Law," a phrase that coincided exactly with the wording of the reference. If the draftsman of that reference thought about the matter, the odds should probably be even that he intended it to be general rather than specific, and would likely have been surprised to learn that he had opened the way for the court to decide the question to accord with a restrictive rather than an expansive mood. Somewhat difficult to reconcile with this would be a case holding that a reference to an act by its popular name is general.⁶¹

⁶¹ Brabner-Smith, Incorporation by Reference and Delegation of Power—Validity of "Reference" Legislation, (1937) 5 Geo.Wash.L.Rev. 198, 204, implies that a court might so hold.

The Interpretation Act, Manitoba, Rev.Stat.1913, ch. 105, sec. 25, which is designed to assist in making descriptive references specific, reads: "Where, in any act, reference is made to an act by any name or designation other than that of the chapter and year of enactment, it shall be understood that the reference is intended to be to the act which by its terms, or the terms of some other act, is to be or may be cited by that name or designation, or if there be none, to the act bearing such name or designation at the head or beginning thereof, and, where there is more than one such act, then to that one thereof in the Revised Statutes, 1913, unless the reference be in an act later than the Revised Statutes 1913, and there be a later act than the corresponding one in the Revised Statutes 1913, which, it is provided as aforesaid, may be cited by, or which bears a name or designation the same as, that so mentioned, in which case or in case there is no such Act in the Revised Statutes 1913, the reference shall be deemed to the latest act of the Legislature of Manitoba which it is provided, as aforesaid, may be so cited, or which bears as aforesaid such name or designation, or if there be no such act of such legislature, then to the latest act of the Parliament of Canada which it is so provided, as aforesaid, may be so cited, or which so bears, as aforesaid, such name or designation." (Obviously a good idea, this provision should have been re-drafted with clarity of expression in mind. But in 1939 the Manitoba Interpretation Act was revised, following substantially the draft bill prepared by the Canadian Conf. of Comms. on Uniformity of Leg., Manitoba, Statutes 1939, ch. 34, now Manitoba Rev.Stat.1940, ch. 108; and for the old sec. 25 was substituted sec. 21(1) of the new act: "In any act, regulation or document, an act of the province or of Canada may be cited by reference to its title or its short title, if any, either with or without reference to the chapter of the Revised Statutes or of the statutes for the year of Our Lord or of the regnal year in which the act was passed." In a recent letter to the author the legislative counsel of Manitoba says: "Section 25 has been partially reproduced in section 21. . . . In view of your comments on old section 25 I am not entirely satisfied that our present act is quite complete.")

Similarly it is somewhat difficult to find guidance by which to draw the line between a general and specific reference in the frequently cited, but apparently rarely read, Michigan case, Dramstaetter v. Moloney.⁶³ There the following reference was held to adopt "under general words of reference a specific regulation in a separate general law" and hence not to include a later amendment to the law so adopted:

"The assessor and aldermen . . . of the respective wards of the city of Detroit, shall be and are hereby vested with the powers and duties of supervisors, as provided by the laws of this state. . . ." ⁶³

How can this be justified without stressing unduly the word "laws" as compared with "law," an emphasis nowhere expressly indicated in the court's opinion? ⁶⁴

Perhaps the apparent contradictions between the cases which purport to apply the so-called rule of Jones v. Dexter are reconcilable on the basis of a silent application of an all pervading doctrine of statutory construction: that a court may transmute any so-called rule of construction into a mere canon to be discarded in the face of the court's notion of what was or should have been the instant "legislative intent." The Jones v. Dexter rule has been expressly eliminated in that fashion on several occasions.⁶⁵

Obviously the wise draftsman will avoid the rule of Jones v. Dexter by explicitly stating whether or not a reference is confined to the then existing precept or is to include any future change or substitution. Thus in a general reference an Illinois act provides that park taxes shall be collected "in such manner as is now or may hereafter be provided by law for the collection of state and county taxes." To a specific reference may be added "as the same may be amended from time to time." ⁶⁶

For an ingenious use of a descriptive reference by the court to fix the time at which a referring act became law, see Ross v. Chambers, (1938) 214 Ind. 223, 14 N.E.2d 1012.

⁶⁶ E.g., In the Matter of Estate of Frathelm, (1923) 156 Minn. 366, 369, 194 N.W. 766.

⁶⁷ The Illinois law is the act of May 2, 1873 for improvement of parks and boulevards (Illinois, Rev.Stat.1874, p. 744) sec. 2. Cf. construction in Culver v. People, (1896) 161 Ill. 89, 43 N.E. 812. See also Oklahoma, Stat. 1921 sec. 6123, as applied in Dabney v. Hooker, (1926) 121 Okla. 193, 249 Pac. 380. The care that should be taken in drafting these provisions is illustrated by a decision that references adopting expressly "existing general law" and the "general law now in force" on a subject meant the law in force when the referring act was later applied and not the law in force at the time that act was passed. As the rule that a statute is to be taken as always speaking rendered the above quoted phrases ambiguous, the court resorted to contextual interpretation. Newman v. City of North Yakima, (1893) 7 Wash. 220, 34 P. 921. See also Guenthoer's Estate, (1912) 235 Pa.St. 67, 83 A. 617.

Evils and a Virtue. Herein of State Prohibitions

The apparent simplicity and labor saving value of this method of legislating led naturally to its widespread adoption, and in the days before legislation became the growing point of the law its use gave rise to little difficulty. But as statutes became more numerous and complex and the tempo of the legislative process accelerated, evils soon developed. The description of the first of them fifty years ago by Mr. Justice Mathew in Knill v. Towse has with passage of time gained in point:

"Sometimes whole Acts of Parliament, sometimes groups of clauses of Acts of Parliament, entirely or partially, sometimes portions of clauses are incorporated into later Acts, so that the interpreter has to keep under his eye, or, if he can, bear in his mind, large masses of bygone and not always consistent legislation in order to gather the meaning of recent legislation. There is very often the further provision that these earlier statutes are incorporated only so far as they are not inconsistent with the statute into which they are incorporated; so that you have first to ascertain the meaning of a statute by reference to other statutes, and then to ascertain whether the earlier Acts qualify only or absolutely contradict the later ones, a task sometimes of great difficulty, always of great labour—a difficulty and labour generally speaking wholly unnecessary."⁶⁷

The second evil was the unfair advantage which use of the device enabled unscrupulous legislators to take of their fellows and the public.

"This practice afforded a means of imposing upon unwary members of the legislative bodies, and of procuring the passage of amendments which would never have been passed had their effect been fully understood."⁶⁸

Third, apart altogether from the opportunity for fraud, the unfortunate result was inevitably to multiply the instances in which legislation was enacted improvidently, "without that intelligent consideration and understanding of the matter involved which is so essential to the procurement of wise and wholesome legislation."⁶⁹

But cf. Schlaudecker v. Marshall, (1872) 72 Pa.St. 200, where "power . . . now has" was held to mean at the time the referring act was passed. Examples of provisions ambiguous in this respect are: (a) Minnesota, Laws 1939, ch. 99, sec. 11, "The superintendent of schools shall receive . . . such fees as are now prescribed by law;" and Minnesota, Laws 1939, ch. 114, sec. 4 ". . . shall be taxed in accordance with existing laws." In an attempt to curb these evils⁷⁰ thirty-three of the United States have adopted prohibitory constitutional provisions. They are of three types. The first type, in force in twenty-one states,⁷¹ says that "no act shall be revised, revived or amended, by reference to its title only." Probably by a very liberal construction, in the light of all three evils which they were intended to cure, these constitutional provisions could have been held to prohibit referential legislation altogether. But the courts realized that to construe them so broadly would be both impractical and unreasonable, for, they said, if you will turn through a copy of the session laws for any session, you will find much original legislation which is complete in itself but refers to other statutes to define the scope of its application; and to hold this legislation unconstitutional would result in chaos.

"To require legislation to be so complete that no reference would be necessary to any other legislation to determine the meaning of the particular legislation would . . . hamper legislation almost to the extent of prohibiting it."⁷²

As a consequence, by placing emphasis upon correction of the two evils of referential legislation referred to last above, as being the purpose of the constitutional prohibitions, and by also construing in the light of relative results, most courts have held them to forbid enacting only statutes which are either incomplete in themselves or which by reference expressly revise, amend, extend, or revive prior acts, and not to forbid incorporation in an independent new act the terms of an old one.⁷³

The position is not difficult to defend, since, although they too are susceptible to being used for evil purposes and to cloak a draftsman's laziness or ignorance or both, incorporating references have certain compensating virtues to be later mentioned which may justify their use; virtues which in case of amendments and repeals by reference have less redemptive value.

Ten states have provisions of a second type as follows: "No law shall be revised or amended, or the provisions thereof extended by reference to its title only."⁷⁴ By guessing that the language forbidding extension was inserted because the provisions of the first type " . . . as construed by the courts were not deemed sufficient to carry out the broad purpose of such restriction, and to prevent the mischief existing and anticipated . . ."⁷⁵ from referential legislation, some courts have held that they prevent altogether incorporation of substantive terms but not of provisions that set out mere methods of procedure.⁷⁶ Although prima facie the construction as regards substantive terms appears to be close to literal, when the primary effect of an incorporation by reference is remembered it is seen to be a very liberal interpretation indeed. In truth it is a distortion, when as in the actual cases the new act incorporates a former one by reference because it then does not extend the incorporated act as such. The cases that hold that the effect of the second type in the usual case, that of adoption of "terms" by reference in no way differs from that of the first seem to be logically and verbally correct; that is, that they do prohibit extending already existing statutes by reference, but do not prevent extending in that manner the referring statute itself.⁷⁷ For what is extension of already existing statutes but amendment of them?

In addition to the states which have constitutional prohibitions of the sorts just discussed, there are two in which the provisions comprise a third type by providing that in enacting a new statute, if all or any part of an existing statute is adopted, it shall be inserted in full in the new act.⁷⁸ Plainly these prohibitions are aimed at the practice

Ramey*, (1922) 195 Ky. 223, 242 S.W. 21, emphasizing that the first and second types of provisions were intended "to prevent the same type of abuse." In Quinlan v. Houston & Tex. Cent. Ry., (1896) 89 Tex. 356, 34 S.W. 738, where the referring act in terms "extended" the old act, the court treated it as being incorporated into the referring one to avoid violation of a constitutional provision of the first type.

of inserting by mere reference the provisions of other laws into even an original law as it is being enacted. But in both states the courts, on the ground of practical expediency⁷⁹ have refused to give them literal effect. Instead, while they have held that a referential incorporation of substantive provisions is forbidden, they have decided that a new act, if substantively complete in itself, may adopt rules of construction or modes of procedure for carrying out its objects or applying its standards by reference to other statutes,⁸⁰ if the reference is certain⁸¹ and the content and effect of the material adopted is within the assumable knowledge of the legislature at the time the new law is enacted.⁸²

Although salutary enough, all of this has been done in the name of the legitimated offspring of legislative intent, a judicially fabricated constitutional purpose or policy.⁸³ Perusal of the record of judicial experience in applying these constitutional prohibitions of legislation by reference leads one to concur with a judge's declaration in a New York case that

"A provision of the fundamental law which attempts to regulate the form in which the legislative will is to be expressed in the enactment of laws is difficult of a just and reasonable application in all cases, and is at best of very doubtful utility. . . ."⁸⁴

It will have been apparent that the courts have never given these state constitutional restrictions upon referential legislation rigid effect because they believe that to do so would work great if not intolerthereof extended or incorporated in any other bill by reference to its title only, but so much thereof as is revised, amended or extended or so incorporated shall be re-enacted and published at length.")

To say, as the court did in the Banks Case at p. 575, that "by such a reference the general [procedural] statute is not incorporated into or made a part of the [referring] special statute," is so much subterfuge. On p. 150 the court said: "This reference to 'all laws' . . . is entirely too vague, and to permit it to pass as proper legislation would in effect nullify the constitution. . . . For this case the petitioner seeks only reference to article 33-A of the Education Law, but the act is not so limited—all laws—what laws? Nobody knows and nobody can tell with any certainty, although we may guess that none will turn up except article 33-A as applicable to the Board of Education. 'There is the provision 'all laws applicable'—too vague to be good."

able inconvenience for the legislatures and would render the statutes unnecessarily voluminous. A single virtue of incorporation by reference, that it tends to avoid encumbering the statute book with "useless repetition and unnecessary verbiage,"⁸⁵ has to them justified its preservation as a legislative device.

Federal Constitutional Restraints

In federally united countries such as the United States, Canada and Australia, referential legislation raises additional problems. Both practical and theoretical characteristics of federalism contribute to them, comprising first the mutual tendency of the associated local governments to adopt laws from each other and that of the local and central governments to do likewise, especially in the field of economic and social legislation, and second the phenomena of separate sovereignty of the federated units and division of governmental power between them on the one hand and the central government on the other.

Where not restrained by some constitutional limitation there is nothing to prevent any legislature, federal or local, from adopting precepts from the laws of any associated legislature by reference. In the United States the difficulties arise from certain provisions in state constitutions⁸⁶ and from a generally accepted theory of the nature of

⁸⁶ They have been just discussed in the text of this article. It is obvious that the first type as generally construed cannot prevent adoption of precepts from the laws of other states or of Congress. Such provisions refer only to revision or amendment of some law already passed by the referring legislature itself: In re Burke, (1923) 190 Cal. 326, 212 P. 193 (stating that the constitutional provision "refers only to the revision or amendment of some law already enacted by our state legislature"); People v. Frankovich, (1923) 64 Cal.App. 184, 221 P. 671. Contra, Commonwealth v. Dougherty, (1909) 39 Pa.Super. 338, purportedly distinguished but in effect overruled by Commonwealth v. Alderman, (1923) 275 Pa.St. 483, 119 A. 551. As observed supra in the text, the courts are thus far divided on whether the second type has any different effect than the first concerning referential adoption of a state's own prior laws. In the case of previous acts of Congress and of other states, there is even stronger ground logically for concluding that adoption by reference is not thereby forbidden; to wit, the fact that the legislatures concerned are respectively in different sovereignties. The legislature of Minnesota cannot incorporate its statute into, so as to extend, an act of Congress or of another state. The supreme court of New Mexico has, however, by single-eyed devotion to the so-called "mischief" rule (the rule in Heydon's Case, (1584) 3 Co. 7a), absurdly concluded that an adoption into a statute of that state of certain provisions of the National Prohibition Act by a specific reference was a violation of the state's constitutional proscription against extension by reference. State v. Armstrong, (1925) 31 N.M. 220, 243 P. 333 (on re-hearing). See also Commonwealth v. Dougherty, (1909) 39 Pa.Super. 338. The third type has been held by the courts of both New York (Darweger v. Staats, (1935) 267 N.Y. 290, 196 N.E. 61) and New Jersey to forbid adoption of precepts from federal and other extra-state law by reference. "The adoption," exclaimed the vice-chancellor of New Jersey, "... of the laws of another state or of the nation as a part of our own act was improper; it cannot be introduced into our legislation by reference. We may adopt the spirit, but we can't make the law by injecting into our statutes a reference to the United States Code or Minnesota law and calling it our law." Wilentz v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., (1934) 12 N.J.Misc. 531, 533-534, 172 A. 903. In both the New York and New Jersey cases just cited the references were also held to involve wrongful delegation of legislative power, but there was no confusion of the two problems as has sometimes occurred, e.g. State v. Larson, (1932) 10 N.J.Misc. 384, 160 A. 556. This angle legislative power. The chief difficulty of a peculiarly federal nature relates to delegability of legislative power. Whatever its true doctrinal foundation, one of the most firmly established principles of United States constitutional law is that, subject to certain limited exceptions,⁸⁷ legislative power cannot be delegated.⁸⁸ Although no express constitutional provisions forbid such delegation, the courts have developed the proscription as a corollary of the doctrine of separation of powers.⁸⁹ Obviously this question can arise concerning referential legislation only when the referring legislature adopts precepts from a body of law not of its own making.

Just when does a reference confront the delegation problem and how do the courts approach a solution? Legislative power is exercised by enactment of laws, and "The enactment of a law involves both the determination of what the rule shall be and that such rule shall have the force of law."⁹⁰ When, therefore, a legislature adopts a precept merely in the existing form in which another law-making body has already passed it there is clearly no delegation at all. This was decided in Santee Mills v. Query,⁹¹ where the South Carolina legislature adoptively referred to the provisions of the United States Income Tax Act of 1921 and Acts amendatory thereto ". . . which have been passed and approved prior to the time of approval of this Act."⁹² On the other hand, if future laws, rules or regulations are included in the adoption there is with equal clarity a delegation.⁹³ An extreme example of an express reference of that kind was the Nebraska statute which provided that

"Assent is hereby given to the provisions of an Act of Congress . . . now pending . . ." and ". . . 'the good faith of Darweger v. Staats and Wilentz v. Sears, Roebuck & Co. was apparently overlooked in Brabner-Smith, Incorporation by Reference and Delegation of Power—Validity of "Reference" Legislation, (1936) 5 Geo.Wash.L.Rev. 193, 222, where it is stated that every state constitutional provision fails to "prevent reference to a law of another jurisdiction."

of the state of Nebraska is hereby pledged to provide funds sufficient to carry out the provisions of said Act of Congress as hereinafter provided.'⁹⁴

Less extreme, but equally delegations, are the references that expressly include the adopted measure and its future amendments. So also are those that simply include the adopted measure "and amendments thereto" when at the time of the reference no such amendments yet exist; but not necessarily if amendments have previously been made, since in the latter case the court is free by construction to avoid unconstitutionality by saying that only the ones previously made were intended to be included.⁹⁵

When a referring act fails to state expressly in any manner the scope of the adoption in regard to futurity, resort must be had to interpretation and thus to the so-called rule in Jones v. Dexter. It will be recalled that under that rule the particularity or generality of the reference determines whether the reference is intended to include the adopted precept only as it exists at the time of the reference or also as it may be amended from time to time thereafter.⁹⁶ Remembered also will be the fact that this rule, like any other "rule" of statutory construction, is susceptible to being dubbed a "mere canon of construction" and jettisoned in the name of legislative intent.

There have been several cases in which the references were to future legislation of Congress or another state, where the line between delegation and non-delegation was not as easily discernible as in the Nebraska statute described above. Decisions in these cases turn upon the same criteria that determine the question of delegation of legislative power generally.⁹⁷ Professor Rottschaefer states:

"The general rule . . . , is that it [a state legislature] may not confer on the authorities of another state, or of the United States, the power to determine what shall be the rule in force in the state, or condition changes in its rule on changes in rules enacted by other states or the United States."⁹⁸ But it is not a delegation when the ⁹⁴ This statute was held to be an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power in Smithberger v. Bannin, (1935) 129 Neb. 651, 660-661, 262 N.W. 92. There is, of course, no delegation when a reference is made to other laws that may be enacted by the same legislature. See Robertson v. Langford, (1928) 95 Cal.App. 414, 273 P. 150.

legislature merely conditions the operation and duration of a statute on the action of the legislature of another state or of Congress.

The line drawn in the cases, taken as a whole, making this distinction between wrongful delegation and a proper conditional enactment is up to now shadowy and non-definitive. In all of them, however, emphasis is placed on whether the reference to the external standard is or is not merely to an extrinsic fact which in no way substitutes the legislative discretion of the other legislature as to what is to be the law for that of the one making the reference. If it is there is no delegation. For example, a Minnesota act which provided that it should remain in effect only so long as a federal statute remained in effect was on this basis definitely sustainable.⁹⁹ But it is difficult to follow the court which on the same ground upheld an act of New York which measured fees payable by a foreign insurance company doing business there by corresponding fees which might be charged New York companies from time to time under the law of the state of its origin.¹⁰⁰

In recent years there has been a type of statute before Canadian provincial courts in which several of the problems already herein discussed have been intrinsic. . . .

Conclusion

In conclusion, in view of this survey how should the question "is referential legislation worth while" be answered? Some critics have vehemently replied, "never," and have described the device as the deadly sin in draftsmanship.¹⁴¹ Halsbury's advice on drafting¹⁴² takes a slightly more moderate position:

ministrative rulings. See Note (1934) 11 N. Y. U. L. Q. Rev. 601, 607. On the question of delegation of legislative power to a body of the legislature's own creation, see (1936) 15 Oregon L.Rev. 260.

⁹⁹ State v. Andrew Brothers, (1919) 144 Minn. 337, 175 N.W. 685. Plainly this sort of a reference does not incorporate the foreign statute into the state act: State ex rel. Tex. Co. v. Dickinson, (1910) 79 N.J.L. 292, 75 A. 803. On power to legislate conditionally see Cargo of Brig Aurora v. United States, (1813) 7 Cranch (U.S.) 382, 3 L.Ed. 378; Field v. Clark, (1892) 143 U.S. 649, 12 S.Ct. 495, 36 L.Ed. 294; J. W. Hampton Jr. & Co. v. United States, (1928) 276 U.S. 394, 48 S.Ct. 348, 72 L.Ed. 624; People v. The Oklahoma Unemployment Compensation Act, which provides that it shall cease to be operative in the event that title IX of the Federal Social Security Act is declared invalid, has recently been held not a delegation of legislative function to the Supreme Court of the United States, but "simply a legislative determination of future applicability of the act dependent upon a contingency." Legislators should not have to look beyond the four corners of a bill in order to comprehend its meaning."

¹⁴² 31 Halsbury, Laws of England (2d ed. 1938) sec. 787. Accord, see Thring, Practical Legislation (1902) 53-57.

"Referential legislation, while improper where those whose duty it is to approve it and those who are bound by it must look beyond the four corners of a statute in order to comprehend it¹⁴³ . . . , is proper when the object of reference is to incorporate certain general acts, or parts of general acts, made for and adapted to incorporation."¹⁴⁴

Many now approve of the references which Halsbury calls "proper."¹⁴⁵ But those which are characterized unqualifiedly "improper" would seem in the light of the various factors examined in this article, to have received rather cavalier treatment by the author of that commentary. Here as elsewhere careful examination reveals the need of discrimination, and correct statement is relative: that the admitted disadvantages of having to derive terms of a statute from outside may sometimes be outweighed by other considerations and even largely obviated when safeguards are used.

Now to summarize the factors this study has divulged to be necessarily taken into account by the framer of a statute when making up his mind whether to use a reference in his given case and to indicate desirable limits and safeguards for use.¹⁴⁶

Greatest advantage gained by incorporating terms by reference is that the new bill may be shortened with two practical benefits, reduction in volume of the statute books, and application of established precepts of proven worth to a new situation with a minimum of legislative tinkering.¹⁴⁷ Balanced against these benefits, mere incon-

¹⁴⁴ Adding in note, "Thus, when powers of acquiring land are to be taken the machinery of the Lands Clauses Acts (as defined in the Interpretation Act, 1880 (52-53 Vict. ch. 63), sec. 23) is usefully embodied with them."

Minnesota Revisor of Statutes' Manual, Report of Revisor to Senate and House of Representatives, 1941, 62, rule (3) is as follows: "Reference should not be made to wholly separate acts unless the acts referred to are general acts, made for and adapted to incorporation by reference. The incorporated general act should not be deviated from or modified. The referential legislation to be avoided consists in referring, in one act, to provisions of another act, which do not readily lend themselves to incorporation, and require to be referentially modified before they can be made to harmonize with the incorporating act." This was plainly taken from unrealistic and inadequate text book treatments of the problem.

¹⁴⁶ Recall that "referential legislation," strictly and as discussed in this article, does not include amendment and repeal of existing acts merely by reference to them in a new act. Such blind amendments and repeals breed almost nothing but evil, and, as has been seen, have been effectively prohibited in thirty-three of the United States. See unanimous condemnation of such "Chinese puzzle" method of amendment and repeal in evidence before Select Committee of the House of Commons 1875, Cmd. 208, and discussion by W. M. Graham-Harrison, (1935) J.Soc.Pub. Teach.L. 29. See safeguard in this respect in Rule 4b, Rules of Minnesota House of Representatives, 1941.

¹⁴⁷ When giving evidence before the Select Committee, 1875 Cmd. 208, Sir George Jessel said: "If you bring in a Bill with an enormous number of clauses it is difficult to get the bill through committee, and the draftsman is compelled therefore, venience of looking "beyond the four corners" of the new bill and act should mean little, and as a screen for fraud the device can as a practical matter largely be discounted. However, since any incorporation of terms by reference inevitably renders them indeterminate as to the referring act, great care should be taken to insure that they are readily and surely determinable.¹⁴⁸ Hence, very serious consideration should be given to the degree to which a proposed referential adoption will render the terms of the new measure difficult to discover, unworkable, or unintelligible.

A competent draftsman will first of all if the proposed reference is to adopt an act or portion of an act examine the whole of that act, its textual environment, construction, history and administrative application, to make sure that the adoption will neither heap up a series of statutes, be unsuitable, nor achieve unintended results. Having satisfied himself that serious dangers of that sort are avoidable, he will employ at least the following safeguards: (a) Make the reference express and clear.¹⁴⁹ (b) Use only specific reference when adopting statutory precepts with exact citation, never mere description. There is a saying that the strength of a statute lies in its general phrases. But Ernst Freund showed that to be a half truth, that in some statutes general phrases constitute weakness.¹⁵⁰ The foregoing analysis has demonstrated that in most statutes general references usually do so. (c) Be explicit concerning the extent of the reference in quantity,¹⁵¹ and never affirmatively provide that the statutory provision referred to shall apply "so far as applicable" or "so far as practicable."¹⁵² (d) When necessary to adapt the adopted precepts to the subject matter of the referential act, do so expressly in the new bill; do not leave the task to the courts and administrative officials. In case of administrative provisions special care in this respect should be taken with both rules and standards.¹⁵³ (e) As to extent of the reference in time, displace application of the English rule or of the rule in Jones v. Dexter or, if desirable, of that in a general interpretation act by expressly stating in so many words with a view to passing the Bill to make it a short Bill. Making it a short Bill involves simply as much reference as possible to former enactments. Members [take] the opportunity of endeavoring to improve the existing law. . . ." See also Chalmers, An Experiment in Codification, (1886) 2 Law Q.Rev. 125, 133; Crales, Statute Law (4th ed. 1936) 26.

¹⁴⁹ The problem of implied references can be avoided by taking care to avoid any casus omissus in the new act.

whether changes made in the incorporated law after the date of the adoption are or are not to be included in the reference.¹⁵⁴ (f) In countries with written or partly written constitutions if the reference is to precepts from a body of law not of the legislature's own making, try to avoid constitutional difficulties by expressly declaring that an adoption by reference, not a delegation, is being made and that the reference includes only the precepts "which have been passed prior to the passage of this act."¹⁵⁵

Although in any case its use means careful and time-consuming search by someone, most properly by the draftsman, whether referential legislation is worth while cannot be determined in the abstract. After all, in each particular case it is a question of good judgment and skill on the part of the draftsman.¹⁵⁶

The following reference clause appeared in a recent bill for an English Finance Act:

"Sub-sections (2) and (3) of section 20 of the Finance Act 1922 shall have effect as if references to paragraph (c) of sub-section (1) of that section included references to the foregoing provisions of this section, as if references to a disposition included references to a settlement, and as if the reference to the making of a disposition included a reference to the making of or entering into a settlement, and sub-section (4) of that section shall have effect as if the reference to that section included a reference to the said provisions of this section."

¹⁵⁴ See supra notes 66 and 47.

¹⁵⁶ When making the above suggestions the author had in mind that Chalmers, who drafted the English Bills of Exchange and Partnership Act, once remarked that lawyers usually regard projects for improving drafting of statutes "with the same pious shrinking as that with which an orthodox doctor would regard a medical prescription written in English instead of in dog Latin." Since publication of this article in the Canadian Bar Review a lawyer correspondent has commented to the author: "I have no faith that draftsmen will adopt your sensible advice. It seems to me that, short of an earthquake, nothing will induce a lawyer to use the English language in preference to 'legal English,' or to use his common sense,—otherwise we should long ago have got rid of artificial and meaningless monstrosities like the ordinary mortgage deed and the ordinary deed of trust in a bond issue, and draftsmen would come to see the necessity of making special provision in every statute for such inevitable problems as retrospective effect, contracting out, extent of protection conferred on administrative officers, etc., etc." However, the author's experience seems to justify less pessimism concerning his fellow disciples of Saint Ives. See review by Sir Cecil Carr in (1940) 22 J.Comp.Leg. (3d ser.) 191, of this article as published in the Canadian Bar Review for interesting commentary based on his experience as a parliamentary draftsman.

SECTION 7. EXCEPTIONS, PROVISOS AND SAVINGS CLAUSES

NOTE

Exceptions and provisos made their first appearance in the early real property law. The distinction between them in their use in conveyances was that an exception operated to save something out of the original conveyance so that the thing saved or excepted had to be in existence at the time of the conveyance. On the other hand, a proviso was a thing newly created or reserved out of the property conveyed, and operated by way of re-grant back to the grantor. See Coke upon Littleton, 47 (a); 1 Saunders Rep. 234 note c. This theoretical distinction was preserved when the use of exceptions and provisos became common in statutes.

ROWELL v. JANVRIN

Court of Appeals of New York, 1896. 151 N.Y. 60, 45 N.E. 308.

O'BRIEN, J. This was an action against a stockholder of a corporation organized under the manufacturing act of 1848, to enforce a debt of the corporation, upon the ground that no certificate that the capital stock had been paid in was ever made or filed as required by the tenth and eleventh sections of the act. The complaint was dismissed at the trial on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and this ruling, and the exception taken by the plaintiff, raise the only question that need now be considered. The complaint alleges that the certificate required by the sections of the act above referred to was not filed or recorded, but it was held that this allegation was not sufficient to charge the defendant. . . .

The more substantial ground upon which the defendant succeeded in the courts below was that the complaint failed to state whether the stock was issued for cash or for property. It is said that, if the stock was issued for property, there was no duty or obligation to file any certificate whatever, while, if issued for money, then the statute applied, but the plaintiff was bound to state a case in his pleading which brought the defendant within the statute. This contention calls for a construction of the statute upon which the action is based. The tenth section of the act of 1848 provides that the stockholders of such company shall be severally liable to the creditors, to an amount equal to the stock held by them, for all debts and contracts of the company, until the whole amount of capital stock fixed and limited by the company shall have been paid in, and a certificate thereof made and recorded as provided in the following section, and the capital stock shall all be paid in, one-half within one year, and the other half within two years from the incorporation, or the company shall be dissolved. The next section prescribes the form of the certificate, and the officers who are to make and file the same. The fourteenth section declares that nothing but money shall be considered as payment of any part of the capital stock. It will be seen, from these provisions of the statute as originally enacted, that the complaint in this case states sufficient facts to create the liability then imposed upon the stockholders. But by chapter 333 of the Laws of 1853 the act of 1848 was amended generally, without naming any particular section. It is upon this amendment that the learned counsel for the defendant has constructed an argument that has met with signal success in the courts below. That statute reads as follows: "Sec. 2. The trustees of such company may purchase mines, manufactories, and other property necessary for their business, and issue stock to the amount of the value thereof in payment therefor; and the stock so issued shall be declared and taken to be full stock, and not liable to any further calls; neither shall the holders thereof be liable for any further payments under the provisions of the tenth section of the said act; but in all statements and reports of the company, to be published, this stock shall not be stated or reported as being issued for cash paid into the company, but shall be reported in this respect according to the fact."

But it does not follow that because stock issued by a manufacturing corporation for property is not within the tenth section of the act of 1848, requiring the certificate to be filed, the complaint in this action is defective. The act of 1853 has modified the general provisions of the act of 1848, and has relieved stockholders, under certain circumstances, from personal liability. The question here is one of pleading, and the complaint is good unless the plaintiff was bound to negative the provisions of the amendment of 1853. In stating a cause of action arising upon a statute, it is an ancient rule that, where an exception is incorporated in the body of the clause of a statute, he who pleads the clause ought to plead the exception. But where there is a clause for the benefit of the pleader, and afterwards follows a proviso which is against him, he may plead the clause, and leave it to his adversary to show the proviso. Jones v. Axen, 1 Ld. Raym. 120. This rule of pleading has been followed and applied in a great variety of cases arising upon statutes and contracts, to this day. Harris v. White, 81 N.Y. 532; U. S. v. Cooke, 17 Wall. 168; Com. v. Hart, 11 Cush. 130; Sheldon v. Clark, 1 Johns. 513; Bennet v. Hurd, 3 Johns. 438; Teel v. Fonda, 4 Johns. 303; Hart v. Cleis, 8 Johns. 41; Fleming v. People, 27 N.Y. 329; People v. Kibler, 106 N.Y. 321, 12 N.E. 795; People v. Briggs, 114 N.Y. 56, 20 N.E. 820. The whole controversy presented by the appeal really turns, therefore, upon the question whether the amendment of 1853 is to be treated as an exception or a proviso. If the latter, the plaintiff was not bound to anticipate it by negative allegations in his complaint, but might leave it to his adversary, as matter of defense. The reason upon which this rule of pleading rests seems to be that when a party counts upon the enacting clause of a statute containing an exception, as the foundation of his action, he cannot logically state his case unless he negative the exception. But if the modifying words are no part of the enacting clause, but are to be found in some other part of the statute, or in some subsequent statute, it is otherwise; and he may then state his case in the words of the enacting clause, and it will be prima facie sufficient. When we bear in mind the reason of the rule, and the necessity for pleading the negative, it is not very important to deal with the somewhat vague and shadowy distinctions which are to be found in the books between an exception and a proviso. But the distinction, however difficult to state, has always been recognized. An exception exempts something absolutely from the operation of a statute, by express words in the enacting clause. A proviso defeats its operation conditionally. An exception takes out of the statute something that otherwise would be part of the subject-matter of it. A proviso avoids them by way of defeasance or excuse. Black, Law Dict. 960; 2 Bouv. Law Dict. 483, "Proviso"; Minis v. U. S., 15 Pet. 421. The plaintiff has stated a case under the tenth section of the original act. When that was passed, it contained no exception, and remained in that condition for five years, till the passage of the amendment of 1853. An exception is generally part of the enactment itself, absolutely excluding from its operation some subject or thing that otherwise would fall within its scope. But when the enactment is modified by ingrafting upon it a new provision, by way of amendment, providing conditionally for a new case, it is in the nature of a proviso. The statute of 1853 has all these characteristics. It was passed five years after the enactment which it modified. It was not an absolute permission to issue the stock for property generally, but only such property as was necessary in the corporate business; and the amount of stock to be thus issued could not lawfully exceed the fair value at which it should, honestly and in good faith, be estimated by the directors. The amendment took out of the original act a special case, and provided specially for such a case. It ingrafted a limitation upon the broad and general language which the legislature had originally employed in constructing the tenth section, and that, as we understand, is the main office of a proviso. In re Webb, 24 How. Prac. 247; Potter, Dwar. 118. It had the same effect as if it was attached to the original section, and was preceded by the usual words, "Provided, however," etc. If this view is correct, it follows that the plaintiff was not bound, by the strict rules of pleading, to negative the proviso. He could state a case within the terms of the original enactment, and leave the defendant to take the case out of it by pleading the facts constituting the special case provided for by the amendment.

We have seen that an exception in a statute is something embodied in, and forming a part of, the enacting clause itself; and nothing of that kind is found in the tenth section, upon which the complaint was framed. If words follow the enacting clause, or are subsequently attached to it or ingrafted upon it by way of amendment, which modify or change its scope and application, or take a particular case out of it, then such new matter or modifying words constitute what is technically known in the construction of statutes as a "proviso," which the plaintiff was not bound to negative by pleading. Spieres v. Parker, 1 Term R. 141; Rex v. Bryan, 2 Strange, 1101; Steel v. Smith, 1 Barn. & Ald. 94. And it was therefore for the defendant to aver and prove that the case was one falling within the terms of the amendment of 1853. It appears from the record that this was the view which the defendant's counsel took of the case, since he has pleaded in his answer that the stock was issued for property; thus availing himself of the terms of the amendment or proviso, and in that way avoiding the statutory liability for failing to file the certificate which the original law required, but which the amendment did not, according to the construction which the courts have given to it. But, before the complaint was dismissed, some proof should have been given of the facts so pleaded. When the allegations of the answer were sustained by proof of the fact that the stock was issued, not for cash, but for property, then the defense would be complete, unless the plaintiff gave proof tending to show either that the property was not such as pertained to the business, or that it was deliberately overvalued for the fraudulent purpose of evading the statute. It would not be enough to show that there was an honest error of judgment on the part of the trustees in fixing the value, but it must be shown that they acted in bad faith. We conclude, therefore, that in this respect the complaint was sufficient.

. . . For these reasons, the judgment dismissing the complaint without requiring the defendant to give any proof should be reversed, and a new trial granted; costs to abide the event. All concur. Judgment reversed.

"Provisos" and "exceptions" are striking examples of art having degenerated through misuse into legal jargon. Retention meanwhile of the historical technical distinction between them has created many needless problems for the courts. One of the most perplexing of these has to do with the pleading of such statutes. The question there is whether the one relying on a statute must negative in the complaint or indictment the exceptions and provisos, or whether he may leave them to be introduced, if at all, by the other party. Further importance is attached to this problem by the fact that the rules as to burden of proof and the burden of going forward with the evidence usually follow the rules of pleading. "He who pleads must prove." Legislative practice being as it is, many statutes fairly abound in exceptions and provisos. (See, for example, the statutes construed in the following cases: Orinoco Supply Co. v. Masonic & Eastern Star Home, 163 N.C. 513, 79 S.E. 964 (1913); People v. Martin, 314 Ill. 110, 145 N.E. 395 (1924); Richman v. Commonwealth, 195 Ky. 715, 243 S.W. 929 (1922); Campbell v. Jackman Bros., 140 Iowa 475, 118 N.W. 755 (1908).) A pleader may find that he has a vast amount of proof to set up if he wishes to rely on a certain statute, unless he is prepared to show that it was the duty of the other party to plead the exceptions and provisos.

While the distinction drawn in the principal case is retained in civil pleading, in criminal cases, where the problem most frequently arises, this distinction has been largely abandoned. The main theme as to pleading of exceptions and provisos is whether or not they are considered elements of the offense. The judicial application of this criterion is, however, so uncertain that it is imperative when drafting criminal statutes to state specifically what are to be considered essential elements of the offense and what are to be matters merely of defense. Thus, for example: "The following are matters of defence, to be pleaded, if at all, by the defendant", or "The following are the essential elements of this offense".

The case of People v. Bowes, 314 Ill. 140, 145 N.E. 391 (1924), furnishes a word of warning. The statute there involved provided: "It shall not be necessary in any affidavit, information or indictment, to include any defensive negative averments, but it shall be sufficient to state that the act complained of was then and there prohibited and unlawful." In spite of this provision, the majority of the court held that the exceptions in the state liquor act had to be negatived, and said: ". . . where the statute creating a new offense does not describe the act or acts which compose it, the pleader is required to state them specifically." The minority opinion went on the ground that the intent of the legislature as to what should constitute this crime had been clearly set out.

PIERSON v. CADY

SWAYZE, J. The relators claim title to the office of chosen freeholders of Union county, under the act of 1902 (P.L. p. 65), amended in 1908 (P.L. p. 269; C.S. p. 509, pl. 131), and revised in 1912 (P.L. p. 619). The defendants claim title to the same office under the legislation existing prior to the act of 1902. The act of 1902 was to take effect only when adopted by vote of the legal voters of the county. An attempt to adopt it had been made in Union county in 1911.

The county of Union is a county of the second class, that is, a county with a population of not less than 50,000 nor more than 300,000 inhabitants. P.L. 1911, p. 19. By the amendment of 1908, a proviso was inserted in section 1 of the act of 1902, in the following language, "Provided, however, this act shall not apply to counties of the second class." Obviously, if this proviso is to control and the statute with the proviso was within the power of the Legislature to enact, the adoption of the act of 1902 in 1911 was without warrant of law. The relators advanced two claims by way of attack upon the proviso. They say: First, that the proviso is repugnant to the rest of the section and must be rejected; and, second, that if the proviso is sustained the act then becomes unconstitutional.

We think the first contention is untenable. The proviso is indeed repugnant to the rest of the section, but the question is whether the proviso or the other language is to prevail. A distinction is made in the cases between a saving clause repugnant to the purview of the act, and a repugnant proviso. Townsend v. Brown, 24 N.J.L. 80; Clark Thread Co. v. Kearny Township, 55 N.J.L. 50, 25 A. 327. In the first-cited case Chief Justice Green said: "The rule has long been established that if a proviso in a statute be directly contrary to the purview of the statute the proviso is good, and not the purview, because it speaks the later intention of the Legislature." The rule was recognized by Mr. Justice Van Syckel, in the last-cited case, although he quoted from Sedgwick and Chancellor Kent as to its arbitrary character. If we take only the words of the act, the clause forbidding its application to second-class counties is undoubtedly a proviso; it is so denominated by the Legislature itself, and upon the rule of law above stated this clause would nullify the preceding portion of the section. It would, however, be too narrow a view to make the case turn on the mere fact that the Legislature had used the word "provided," instead of the words "saving and excepting." As Justice Van Syckel said in Clark Thread Co. v. Kearny Township, we ought to ascertain, if possible, which part of the section expresses the latest intent of the Legislature. Ordinarily the clause coming last in the act represents the last intention of the lawmaker. In the present case we have a section which, as amended in 1908, carefully provides for the selection of freeholders in all counties whatever their population. In counties having between 100,000 and 200,000, seven were to be elected. In counties having between 50,000 and 100,000, five were to be elected. These counties included all counties of the second class, as the classification then was. It would be attributing absurd conduct to the draftsman of this act to suppose that the original intent was to exclude second-class counties from the operation of the law, and that this intent was altered by afterwards providing especially for counties of the requisite population. It is much more probable that the act as originally drafted and introduced contained distinct provisions for counties having from 50,000 to 100,000 population, and counties having from 100,000 to 200,000, and that it was amended in its passage through the Legislature by adding the proviso excluding second-class counties from its operation. This is all the more probable for the reason that Monmouth, a county of the second class, had in 1905 adopted the act of 1902. Patterson v. Close, 82 N.J.L. 160, 83 A. 233. But for the proviso in the act of 1908, the county of Monmouth would have been subject thereto, and it seems probable that the representatives of that county induced the Legislature to refuse to change its government within three years after it had begun the trial of the act of 1902, and while litigation growing out of the change was still pending. Tacking the proviso to the act as originally drawn was a ready way of accomplishing this end, and it was not unnatural in the haste of legislation to overlook the repugnancy thus created. We cannot resort in aid of this construction to the history of the legislation in the process of passage through the Senate and House of Assembly. Standard Underground Cable Co. v. Attorney General, 46 N.J.Eq. 270, 19 A. 733, 19 Am.St.Rep. 394. It is, however, reassuring to know that in fact the proviso was adopted as a Senate amendment to a bill originating in the House of Assembly. . . . The act of 1902 was not law in 1911; it had been essentially modified in 1908, was no longer applicable to second-class counties, and the amendments of that year were never voted on. Even if the referendum of 1911 were validated, however, it would be of no avail, since it could do no more than make effective the act as it then was, and that act was repealed in 1912. When the relators were elected, the only act under which they could be elected was chapter 355 of the Laws of 1912, and that act at best was ineffective without a referendum thereon, which has not been had in Union county.

As to those of the defendants whose terms would otherwise have expired, they hold over because no successors have been chosen and qualified. C.S. 3489, pl. 130; Wright v. Campbell, 74 N.J.L. 609, 67 A. 186. The other defendants hold to the ends of their terms. The defendants are entitled to judgment.

COMMONWEALTH v. DESMOND

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1877. 123 Mass. 407.

GRAY, C. J. By the St. of 1869, c. 410, entitled "an act to establish certain rules for the construction of repealing statutes," it is enacted that "in the construction of all statutes hereafter enacted the following rules shall be observed, unless such construction would be repugnant to the express terms of the same statute." The general rules so established are to be deemed part of every repealing statute since passed, as much as if expressly inserted therein, unless the later statute clearly manifests a different intention. One of these rules is that the repeal of an act shall not affect any prosecution pending at the time of the repeal for an offence committed under the act repealed. The St. of 1876, c. 172, § 4, which simply enacts that the St. of 1874, c. 356, "is hereby repealed," does not therefore affect this prosecution, which was pending under the St. of 1874 when the St. of 1876 was passed.

Exceptions overruled.

1. Communication of the Law Revision Commission to the Legislature Relating to Section 93 of the General Construction Law, N.Y.Leg.Doc. (1939) No. 65 (M), 3-4. (1939) Rep.Rec.& St.Law Rev.Comm. 741-742. "By each act of repeal the Legislature expresses or implies prospective intention, as to what the law is to be, and a retrospective intention, as to what effect the repeal is to have on the application of the repealed law to past acts. To aid in the determination of such intention certain presumptions were developed, such as the one that the repeal of a statute not only prevents the accrual under it in the future of rights and liabilities, but that it also prevents the enforcement under it of accrued rights and liabilities. To prevent the application of this presumption it became common to introduce into repealing statutes clauses saving for certain purposes the effectiveness of the laws repealed.

"In order to deal more effectively with repeals, most states, including New York, have passed statutes of general construction relating to legislative intent. These have radically changed certain of the presumptions developed by the common law. The New York statute contained in the General Construction Law provides in section 90 that the repeal of a statute which repealed a prior statute does not revive the prior statute; in section 93 that the repeal of a statute shall not affect or impair any act done, right acquired, or liability incurred prior to the time when the repeal takes effect; and in section 94 that all actions or proceedings, civil or criminal, commenced under or by virtue of a provision which is repealed may be prosecuted and defended in the same manner as if such provisions had not been repealed. These sections state rules of construction to be applied in reading each enactment of the Legislature, unless it is made clear that a contrary rule of construction is intended.

"In spite of the existence of the provisions in section 93, doubt has been expressed as to the propriety of repealing statutes without attaching to the repealer a specific saving clause. Objection has been made to several bills recommended by the Commission, on the ground that they did not contain specific saving clauses, apprehension being expressed that such repealers might be construed to impair existing rights.

"If section 93 of the General Construction Law is sufficient in its language to accomplish its purpose, and is valid as applicable to acts of future legislature, such objections are groundless. The Commission has made a study of these questions. As a result of its study, the Commission is convinced of the validity of section 93 of the General Construction Law, and its adequacy.

"It has been repeatedly declared by the Court of Appeals that section 93 of the General Construction Law is not an invalid attempt by one Legislature to bind later Legislatures, but is a valid rule of interpretation to be applied to subsequent legislation, in the absence of evidence of a contrary legislative intent. In substantive matters, the adequacy of section 93 of the General Construction Law has been tested and upheld not only in actions involving the rights, both vested and inchoate, of individuals, but also in proceedings relating to the rights of the state, in tax matters and criminal prosecutions, and proceedings involving the rights and liabilities of municipal corporations. Section 93 does not apply to enactments which regulate merely the details and incidents of judicial procedure, but it does apply to save every substantive right and liability from automatic extinction by a statute, procedural or otherwise.

"The Commission concludes that section 93 of the General Construction Law is valid and adequate to take the place of specific clauses in repealing statutes intended to save substantive rights and obligations. It desires to call this conclusion to the attention of the Legislature. It supports those bills previously recommended by the Commission which did not contain specific saving clauses."

2. The Minnesota Interpretation Act, 1945 Minn.Stat. § 045.35 reads: "The repeal of any law shall not affect any right accrued, any duty imposed, any penalty incurred, or any proceeding commenced, under or by virtue of the law repealed. Any civil suit, action, or proceeding pending to enforce any right under the authority of the law repealed shall and may be proceeded with and concluded under the laws in existence when the suit, action, or proceeding was instituted, notwithstanding the repeal of such laws; or the same may be proceeded with and concluded under the provisions of the new law, if any, enacted."

This savings clause is silently incorporated by reference into all acts unless expressly rejected.

3. "The saving clause simply limits the scope of the repeal. A title for an unqualified repeal comprehends a qualified one as the greater includes the less. . . . A title which recites that the act contains a repeal need not refer to a germane saving clause. Likewise, provisos and exceptions appearing in the body without previous mention in the title have been sustained." O. Thomas Stores Sales System v. Spaeth, 209 Minn. 504, 297 N.W. 9 (1941). See commentary in 26 Minn.L. Rev. 135 (1941).

4. A typical saving clause in an original as distinguished from an amending or repealing act is Section 76a of the Uniform Sales Act: "None of the provisions of this act shall apply to any sale, or to any contract to sell, made prior to the taking effect of this act." Mason's Minn.Stat., 1927, § 8451. This clause was expressly applied in Wylie China Co. v. Vinton, 97 Or. 350, 192 P. 400 (1920). See also Section 76b. Cf. Walsh v. Alaska Steamship Co., 101 Wash. 295, 172 P. 269 (1918), concerning effect of a saving clause not in a repealing act.

SECTION 8. SEVERABILITY CLAUSE

WILLIAMS v. STANDARD OIL CO.

MR. JUSTICE SUTHERLAND delivered the opinion of the Court.

These cases were considered together by the court below and are submitted together here. In both the validity of a statute of Tennessee is assailed as contravening the federal Constitution. Appellee in No. 64 is a corporation organized under the laws of Louisiana, and appellee in No. 65 is a corporation organized under the laws of Delaware. From a time long prior to the passage of the statute, both have been engaged and are now engaged in the business of selling gasoline in the state of Tennessee.

The statute was adopted in 1927. Its purpose and effect are to fix prices at which gasoline may be sold within the state. A division of motors and motor fuels is created in the department of finance and taxation and authorized to collect and record data concerning the manufacture and sale of gasoline, freight rates, differentials in price to wholesalers and retailers, the cost and expense of production and sale, etc. The information thus collected is made available for use by the commissioner of finance and taxation in the regulation of prices at which gasoline may be sold in the state. Permits for such sale are to be issued subject to the approval of the commissioner but only at the prices fixed and determined. Prices of gasoline are to be fixed with a proper differential between the wholesale and retail price. Rebates, price concessions, and price discrimination between persons or localities are forbidden. The prices first are to be stated by the applicant for a permit, and, if not approved by the superintendent of the division, are to be determined by that official, with a right of review by the commissioner and finally by the courts. Chapter 22, p. 53, Public Acts Tennessee 1927. By a general statute (Shannon's Tennessee Code, § 6437) a violation of the act is a misdemeanor and is punishable by fine and imprisonment. Pressly v. State, 114 Tenn. 534, 538, 86 S.W. 378, 69 L.R.A. 291, 108 Am.St.Rep. 921.

Appellees brought separate suits in the court below to enjoin the state officers named as appellants from carrying out their intention to enforce the act and institute criminal proceedings for violations of it against appellees, respectively, and to have the act declared unconstitutional and void. Under the facts alleged, the suits were properly brought. Terrace v. Thompson, 263 U.S. 197, 214, 44 S.Ct. 15, 68 L. Ed. 255; Tyson & Brother v. Banton, 273 U.S. 418, 428, 47 S.Ct. 426, 71 L.Ed. 718.

The principal ground of attack, and the only one we need to consider here, is that the Legislature is without power to authorize agencies of the state to fix prices at which gasoline may be sold in the state, because the effect will be to deprive the vendors of such gasoline of their property without due process of law in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. Appellees applied for a temporary injunction against appellants, upon which there was a hearing, and the court below, consisting of three judges (section 266, Judicial Code; 28 U.S.C.A. § 380), granted the injunction as prayed. . . .

In support of the act under review it is urged that gasoline is of widespread use; that enormous quantities of it are sold in the state of Tennessee; and that it has become necessary and indispensable in carrying on commercial and other activities within the state. But we are here concerned with the character of the business, not with its size or the extent to which the commodity is used. Gasoline is one of the ordinary commodities of trade, differing, so far as the question here is affected, in no essential respect from a great variety of other articles commonly bought and sold by merchants and private dealers in the country. The decisions referred to above make it perfectly clear that the business of dealing in such articles, irrespective of its extent, does not come within the phrase "affected with a public interest." Those decisions control the present case. . . .

Finally, it is said that even if the price-fixing provisions be held invalid other provisions of the act should be upheld as separate and distinct. This contention is emphasized by a reference to section 12 of the act, which declares: "That if any section or provision of this act shall be held to be invalid this shall not affect the validity of other sections or provisions hereof."

In Hill v. Wallace, 259 U.S. 44, 71, 42 S.Ct. 453, 459 (66 L.Ed. 822), it is said that such a legislative declaration serves to assure the courts that separate sections or provisions of a partly invalid act may be properly sustained "without hesitation or doubt as to whether they would have been adopted, even if the Legislature had been advised of the invalidity of part." But the general rule is that the unobjectionable part of a statute cannot be held separable unless it appears that, "standing alone, legal effect can be given to it and that the Legislature intended the provision to stand, in case others included in the act and held bad should fall." The question is one of interpretation and of legislative intent, and the legislative declaration "provides a rule of construction which may sometimes aid in determining that intent. But it is an aid merely; not an inexorable command." Dorchy v. Kansas, 264 U.S. 286, 290, 44 S.Ct. 323, 325 (68 L.Ed. 686).

In the absence of such a legislative declaration, the presumption is that the Legislature intends an act to be effective as an entirety. This is well stated in Riccio v. Hoboken, 69 N.J.L. 649, 662, 55 A. 1109, 1113 (63 L.R.A. 485) where the New Jersey Court of Errors and Appeals, in an opinion delivered by Judge Pitney (afterward a Justice of this Court), after setting forth the rule as above, said:

"In seeking the legislative intent, the presumption is against any mutilation of a statute, and the courts will resort to elimination only where an unconstitutional provision is interjected into a statute otherwise valid, and is so independent and separable that its removal will leave the constitutional features and purposes of the act substantially unaffected by the process." . . .

The effect of the statutory declaration is to create in the place of the presumption just stated the opposite one of separability; that is to say, we begin, in the light of the declaration, with the presumption that the Legislature intended the act to be divisible, and this presumption must be overcome by considerations which make evident the inseparability of its provisions or the clear probability that the invalid part being eliminated the Legislature would not have been satisfied with what remains.

In the present case, it requires no extended argument to overcome the presumption and to demonstrate the indivisible character of the act under consideration. The particular parts of the act sought to be saved are found in sections 1, 2, 3, 4 and 10. Section 1, after a preamble in respect of the importance of controlling the sale of gasoline and a declaration that such sale is impressed with a public use, creates the division of motors and motor fuels as already stated. Section 2 requires the superintendent of the division and other employees to make investigations, collect and record data concerning the manufacture and sale of gasoline, the cost of refining, freight rates, differentials in wholesale and retail prices, costs and expenses incident to the sale, methods employed in the distribution of gasoline, and other data and information as may be material in ascertaining and determining fair and reasonable prices to be paid for gasoline. This information is declared to be available for use in the regulation of prices and for the inspection and information of the public. The superintendent is directed to issue permits for the sale of gasoline at prices fixed and determined as provided in other parts of the statute. Section 3 makes it unlawful for anyone to engage in the sale of gasoline without first having obtained a permit signed by the superintendent and approved by the commissioner of finance and taxation, for which permit application must be made in accordance with and in compliance with all the requirements of the act. Section 4 requires that the application shall set forth whether the applicant proposes to do a wholesale or retail business, or both, the number and location of the different places where he is to operate and other like information. He must also set forth the price or prices at which he is at the time selling gasoline, the cost price thereof, including various items which enter into the price, and the price at which he proposes to sell. Section 10 imposes a special permit tax of $10 per annum for each place of sale at wholesale, and $1 per annum for each retail service station or curb pump. The tax thus imposed is constituted a special maintenance fund to aid in defraying the expenses of the division of motors and motor fuels.

The bare recital of these details shows conclusively that they are mere adjuncts of the price-fixing provisions of the law or mere aids to their effective execution. The function of the division created by section 1 is to carry these provisions into effect, and if they be stricken down as invalid the existence of the division becomes without object. The purpose of collecting the data set forth in section 2 is to furnish information to aid in the fixing of proper prices. The requirements in section 3 that a permit must be obtained before any person can engage in the business of selling gasoline and those in section 4 that the application therefor must state the character of the business, the number and location of the places where business is to be carried on, the price or prices at which the applicant is then selling gasoline, the cost price thereof, and the price at which he proposes to sell, obviously constitute data for intelligently putting into effect the price-fixing provisions of the law or means to that end. The taxes imposed by section 10 are solely for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the division of motors and motor fuels, and since the functions of that division practically come to an end with the failure of the price-fixing features of the law, it is unreasonable to suppose that the Legislature would be willing to authorize the collection of a fund for a use which no longer exists.

Appellants also insist that certain provisions in respect of rebating and discrimination contained in section 8 of the act are separable. Those provisions are that it shall be unlawful to grant any rebate, concession, or gratuity to any purchaser for the purpose of inducing the purchaser to purchase, use, or handle the gasoline of the particular dealer, and that it shall likewise be unlawful to discriminate for or against any purchaser by selling at different prices to purchasers in the same locality or in different localities. It seems clear that these provisions are mere appendants in aid of the main purpose; but, if treated as separable, they are unconstitutional restrictions upon the right of the private dealer to fix his own prices and fall within the principle of the decisions already cited. See especially Fairmont Creamery Co. v. Minnesota, supra.

This interpretation of the various provisions of the act is fortified by a requirement of the Tennessee Constitution (article 2, § 17) that "no bill shall become a law which embraces more than one subject, that subject to be expressed in the title." It is fair to conclude, and there is nothing to suggest the contrary, that in the passage of the present act the Legislature intended to observe this requirement and confine the provisions of the act to the one subject of price-fixing.

Accordingly, we must hold that the object of the statute under review was to accomplish the single general purpose which we have stated, and that purpose failing for want of constitutional power to effect it, the remaining portions of the act, serving merely to facilitate or contribute to the consummation of the purpose, must likewise fall.

Decrees affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE HOLMES dissents.

MR. JUSTICE BRANDEIS and MR. JUSTICE STONE concur in the result.

1. In State v. Montgomery (1912) 177 Ala. 212, at pp. 241-2, 59 So. 294, 303, McClellan, J., said: "It is of course not within legislative competency to bind the courts by any declaration or pronouncement in their unfettered functions of determining the constitutional validity of enactments. Yet we do not doubt that it is within legislative competency to remove, by express assertion in the act, any uncertainty, in the judicial mind, as to what the Legislature would have done in respect to the adoption of the act, with the invalid parts thereof stricken, before passage, therefrom. Whether, after accepting such legislative assertion that it would have passed the act with the invalid stricken, that remaining is valid, surviving the operation of the cutting off of the invalid, we think would still be a question of separability, of vigor, and effectiveness to stand without the aid of that so stricken, etc., within the rule and limitations before stated in those particulars. In short, such an expression in an enactment serves only to render certain the legislative intent with respect to passage of the valid parts, notwithstanding the invalid, and does not avail to clothe the valid with immunity from the invalidating effect the law gives the inseparable blending of the bad with the good. If the expression were given other or greater effect, the result would be to sanction legislative restraint of the judicial power in the performance of the unimpaired duty of interpreting and of enforcing, when properly invoked to do so, the mandates and requirements of the Constitution."

2. Handbook of the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws, 1928, pp. 59-61. "Mr. Freund, (Chairman of Committee on Legislative Drafting): I think it is quite clear that when the legislature makes a statement or purports to pass a statement in the act that it would have passed any section irrespective of the validity or invalidity of any other section, the legislature says something that it does not really mean. I think that is very clear. We had an example of that last year in the Uniform Business Corporation Act.

"There was a clause specifically repealing all other acts, and then it said that the legislature would have passed any section irrespective of the fact of any other section. Now if the whole act had been declared unconstitutional, I mean all the provisions, the repealing clause would have stood and repealed all other acts, and you would have no corporation law at all. No one meant that. That is quite clear, but you stated it. It seems to me very undesirable and a futile kind of decision, which no court would pay any attention to.

"There is a separability clause which is found in the more recent acts of Congress, which covers a point that is not covered by any of the acts that have been before this Conference, and that is the application provision—that is to say, that the act shall be applied so far as it is valid where a part of the application is declared unconstitutional. I think that originated with the Employers' Liability Act. The first Employers' Liability Act spoke of any carrier engaged in interstate commerce, and the Supreme Court held that meant not only the carrier while engaged in interstate commerce but any carrier engaged in interstate commerce whether the employe was injured in intrastate or interstate. And then they declared the act unconstitutional, whereupon the act was amended and so altered to read 'while engaged in interstate commerce.' That of course was a very narrow and perhaps unfortunate construction of the first act, and against the dissent, and I think it was owing to this construction that in Congress this clause is now usually inserted.

"That is not a usual construction, however. It is a construction that occurs in acts of Congress, and even so I believe it is a rather dangerous clause to put in, because it is quite obvious that the Congress would not intend in every case to give an act which is unconstitutional, say for instance as to all persons and matters, application to only a few.

"For instance, you can do a great many things with reference to corporations, relating to the future, but if you have a general regulation act which is unconstitutional, to say that that shall then apply to all corporations to be created in the future might create a diversity between future and present corporations, which it was never the intention of Congress to enact.

"All these separability clauses have a certain danger and, on the whole, it seems to me the matter might just as well be left to the courts. They are reasonably liberal in making a separation, and where the thing hangs together in such a way that they do not feel the act should be sustained, so far as I can gather from the decisions, the court will not be bound by any legislative declaration, which is apparently disregarded as an encroachment upon the judicial prerogative of construction, particularly with reference to constitutional matters."

3. The point raised by Mr. Freund in the second paragraph of his remarks supra was dealt with in Mazurek v. Farmers Fire Ins. Co., 320 Pa. 33, 181 A. 570 (1935), as follows:

"Where a subsequent statute which would, if valid, act as a repeal of a prior statute only by implication, i. e., because its terms are contradictory of the provisions of the earlier enactment, is itself unconstitutional, it must be obvious that the earlier act remains in full force and effect. This follows inevitably from the fact that in the eyes of the law it never came into existence. Never having come into existence, it could have no effect.

"Nor is this conclusion forestalled by a section on 'constitutional construction' . . . wherein it is declared that the 'provisions of (the) act shall be severable, and, if any of its provisions shall be held to be unconstitutional, the decision of the court shall not affect the validity of the remaining provisions of (the) act.' Such a clause is to be given a reasonable interpretation, and since the repealing clauses are inseparably connected with (the invalid) section 344 they must stand or fall with it. The severability clause cannot save the appropriate repealing sections if it is clearly apparent that they would not have been inserted had the Legislature known that section 344 was invalid, even though there is an apparent legislative expression to the contrary."

4. See for a case in which the "presumption" raised by a severability clause was expressly given full effect, N. R. Bagley Co. v. Cameron, 282 Pa. 48, 127 A. 311 (1925), (citing similar cases from several states).

STATE v. NEVEAU

Supreme Court of Wisconsin, 1940. 237 Wis. 85, 294 N.W. 796.

This action was begun on March 26, 1940, by the state of Wisconsin, plaintiff, against Edgar Neveau, defendant, to enjoin the defendant from continuing to operate his barber shop until the license fees were paid. The case was tried to the court. The court made and filed findings of fact and conclusions of law, holding the act under which the application was made unconstitutional and void. From the judgment dismissing the plaintiff's complaint, the plaintiff appeals.

The complaint alleges that the trade practice standards for the barber trade have been issued under sec. 100.205 of the statutes and are in effect; that the defendant is operating a barber shop within the city of Milwaukee without a license; that the trade practice standards for the barber trade provide that barbering shall not be done for less than the following reasonable costs: hair cut, 50 cents, plain shampoo, 40 cents, hair tonic application, 25 cents; that the trade practice standards for the barber trade provide: "Also each of the following is an unfair trade practice and an unfair method of competition, and is forbidden: (1) To offer, contract, undertake, or advertise to do or sell, or to do or sell, barbering for less than the foregoing schedule of reasonable cost, directly or indirectly, by: . . . (g) any method or device."

Upon information and belief it is alleged that the defendant is selling and threatens to sell hair cuts for 35 cents, and is advertising to sell and selling, and threatens to advertise and sell, shampoos for 25 cents and hair tonic applications for 15 cents. The plaintiff asks that the defendant be enjoined pending the action from operating his barber shop without the license required by sec. 100.205 of the statutes and from violating the trade practice standards.

The defendant appeared and answered. The answer is long and argumentative but admits the issuance of the trade practice standards; alleges that sec. 100.205 of the statutes of 1939 and the trade practice standards promulgated pursuant thereto are void and unconstitutional on nearly all the grounds on which any regulatory law has been declared to be unconstitutional, and by way of counterclaim asks judgment declaring sec. 100.205 unconstitutional and that the plaintiff be restrained from enforcing its provisions. Upon motion the counterclaim was stricken.

The parts of sec. 100.205 material on this appeal are set out in the margin.¹

1 "100.205(1) (a) The department shall appoint a trade practice examiner not subject to chapter 16, who shall, after investigation and public hearing, issue by order such standards, with written reasons therefor, as are necessary or convenient to eliminate unfair methods of competition or unfair trade practices in the cleaning and dyeing, barber, cosmetician and shoe rebuilding trades and amend or revoke by order any standards previously issued by him.

"(b) [Department is authorized to modify or set aside any action of the examiner, review the examiner's action and to adopt, modify or change the examiner's written reasons etc.]

"(c) [Relates to judicial review of orders, not involved in this case.]

"(2) (a) [Provides for the appointment of an advisory committee etc.]

"(b) [Relates to the power of the department to appoint a deputy and his duties.]

"(3) (a) Unreasonably low wages, unreasonably long or inappropriate work or shop hours, other unreasonably burdensome or hazardous labor conditions, and selling below reasonable cost, are severally expressly declared to be, among others, unfair methods and practices.

"(b) [Provides for cooperation with the industrial commission.]

"(c) For pertinent reasons, and within the limitation of this section, standards may classify persons, places and other things, and delimit areas of natural competition in the trade, and the examiner, by like procedure and subject to like review, may make specific exemptions.

"(d) No standards shall be issued or continued in any area where it is impracticable of enforcement.

"(e) No standard tending to promote monopoly, oppress or discriminate against small enterprises, or unreasonably burden consumers, shall be issued or continued.

"(f) [Not involved in this action.]

"(4) (a) [Relates to date when standards become effective.]

"(b) Any court having any equity jurisdiction may enjoin violation of the provisions of this section or the violation of any standard issued thereunder.

"(c) [Right of jury trial.]

"(d) Violation of any provision of this section or any standard promulgated or issued thereunder, shall be punishable by a fine of not less than five nor more than one hundred dollars, or by imprisonment in the county jail for not less than five nor more than ninety days, or both.

"(5) (a) [Duty of examiner.]

"(b) [Not involved.]

"(c) [Relates to assessments and fees, not involved here.]

ROSENBERY, CHIEF JUSTICE. A perfect swarm of constitutional questions is raised by a consideration of the facts and conclusions in this case. To deal exhaustively with all of the questions raised and suggested would require us to write a treatise on constitutional law. In the first place, it is to be observed that sec. 100.205 presents a peculiar method of law making. There are included in the statute many provisions as to the constitutionality of which the legislature must have had substantial doubts. This is indicated by the fact that the legislature went to extreme lengths in the insertion of severability clauses in the act. Subsec. (7) is general and by its terms the provisions and limitations of sec. 100.205 wherever contained in the act, and whether express or implied, are all severable from each other and as to different persons, things and circumstances. This of course applies to subsec. (6) (a) but in order to make assurance doubly sure subsec. (6) (a) provides: "Each provision of this paragraph is expressly declared to be severable".

It was apparently the legislative purpose to enact a law as to the constitutionality of which there was substantial doubt and then by the insertion of an all inclusive severability clause, authorize the court to whittle down the law so as to bring it within the constitutional field. This is a method of law making not contemplated by the constitution. The constitutional mandates apply to the legislature as well as the courts. It is as much the responsibility of the legislature to enact valid laws as it is the duty of the courts to pass upon their validity after they are enacted. . . .

Judgment affirmed.

"(d) [Not involved.]

"(8) (a) The provisions of this section shall not apply to any county having a population of thirty thousand or less by the last federal census, or to any town, city or village having a population of five thousand two hundred or less by such census. Such territory shall be known as noncode area. Provided that if the provisions of this paragraph as to counties is invalid, the provision shall be that standards are prima facie not necessary or convenient in any county of not more than thirty thousand population by the last federal census unless by reason of proximity to a county of greater population unfair competition would result, and that if the provision of this paragraph as to towns, cities and villages is invalid the provision shall be that standards are prima facie not necessary in any town, city or village of not more than five thousand two hundred population by such census unless by reason of proximity to a municipality of greater population unfair competition would result; provided that in any event no standards shall be effective in any such county or in any such town, city or village other than those in a county having a population of five hundred thousand or more unless such standards are approved by a majority of the electors voting thereon in such county or town, city or village. Provided further that in judicial review of orders or denials of orders under this paragraph, the court shall have the same powers as the department under paragraph (b) of subsection (1). Each provision of this paragraph is expressly declared to be severable.

"(b) [Not involved here.]

"(7) Provisions and limitations of this section, whether or not in the same subsection or sentence, or express or implied, all are severable from each other and as to different persons, things and circumstances."

NOTES

1. See Stern, "Separability and Separability Clauses and the Supreme Court", 51 Harv.L.Rev. 76, esp. 114 et seq. (1937), where the author concludes that up to the time of writing ". . . In important cases judicial decisions on separability often reflect the attitude of the judges towards the merits of the particular statute—their general constitutional philosophy—rather than an objective effort to apply the principles which are always said to determine separability." After ten years that conclusion remains without need for qualification.

2. 1945 Minn.Stat., § 645.20, provides: "Unless there is a provision in the law that the provisions shall not be severable, the provisions of all laws shall be severable. If any provision of a law is found to be unconstitutional and void, the remaining provisions of the law shall remain valid, unless the court finds the valid provisions of the law are so essentially and inseparably connected with, and so dependent upon, the void provisions that the court cannot presume the legislature would have enacted the remaining valid provisions without the void one; or unless the court finds the remaining valid provisions, standing alone, are incomplete and are incapable of being executed in accordance with the legislative intent."

Inclusion of a specific severability clause in bills drawn for introduction in the Minnesota Legislature, in addition to its doubtful utility, is thus pointless.

3. Mich.Pub.Acts 1945, No. 119, § 5, reads: "In the construction of statutes of this state the following rules shall be observed, unless such construction would be inconsistent with the manifest intent of the legislature, that is to say:

"If any portion of an act or application thereof to any person or circumstances shall be found to be invalid by a court, such invalidity shall not affect the remaining portions or applications of the act which can be given effect without the invalid portion or application, provided such remaining portions are not determined by the court to be inoperable, and to this end acts are declared to be severable."

See discussion of this statute in 46 Colum.L.Rev. 623 (1946).

SECTION 9. CLAUSE AS TO TAKING EFFECT

TURNIPSEED v. JONES

Supreme Court of Alabama, 1893. 101 Ala. 593, 14 So. 377.

STONE, C. J. This was and is a contest by Turnipseed, the appellant, of the election of Jones, appellee, to the office of treasurer of Montgomery county. The proceeding was instituted before the judge of probate under the statutory provisions found in the Code of 1886, commencing with section 396 of that Code. It is not shown in the record before us what disposition the judge of probate made of the case, nor in what manner it found its way into the circuit court. It comes to us by appeal from the judgment of the circuit court, pronounced on demurrer to contestant's amended complaint, which sets forth his grounds of contest. The ruling by the judge of probate becomes wholly immaterial, for, under the statute as it existed when this proceeding was commenced, (Code 1886, § 432,) "in contested election cases tried by the judge of probate, an appeal lies to the circuit court, to be tried de novo." So, no erroneous rulings made by the judge of probate, if such were made, not carried into the rulings of the circuit court, can be inquired into in this court. The circuit court sustained the demurrer to the amended complaint or information, and the present appeal questions the correctness of that ruling.

The judgment of the circuit court sustaining the demurrer was pronounced February 10, 1893. On that identical day the governor approved the act "to provide for and regulate contests of elections to offices, state and county, herein named." Sess.Acts 468. That statute embraces the office of county treasurer, and provides for its contest. It also expressly repeals by numbers all the sections of the Code under which the present contest was instituted. The questions arise: Does that statute exert any influence in the decision of this case? If so, what influence does it exert? It will not be denied that the right to contest an election is purely statutory, and, when that mode of redress is invoked, statutory requirements must be substantially conformed to. At what time must the statute of February 10, 1893, be understood as going into operation? The authorities bearing on this question are far from uniform. It was long the rule in England—the source of our common law—that sessions of parliament were treated as one continuous day, and every statute enacted during any given session was binding and given effect to as if enacted on the first day of the session. Under that absurd interpretation, fines and mulcts were assessed for acts which, when done, violated no law then in existence. This was subsequently changed by statute. But still the rule on this question in the several states is far from uniform. "In this country an act takes effect generally, and where no other time is fixed by constitution, general law, or the particular statute itself, from the time of its passage." End.Interp.St. § 498, note 119. Neither does the law, in the absence of express provision, regard a fraction of a day. "In the legal computation of time there are no fractions of a day, and a day on which an act is done must be entirely excluded or included." 5 Amer. & Eng.Enc.Law, 89. "The legislature has full power to take away, by statute, rights not vested, which have been conferred by statutes. If the repealing statute is general and unconditional, without a saving of pending proceedings and prosecutions, these fall with the statute which may have authorized them." Luke v. Calhoun Co., 56 Ala. 415. The question we are considering has been settled in this state. Wood v. Fort, 42 Ala. 641. In that case it was said: "The right of the appellee to an affirmance depends upon the question whether the act is to be deemed to have been of force during the entire day of its approval. Upon authority and principles of policy and convenience, carefully limiting ourselves by the necessities of this case, we decide that a public statute, remedial in its character, and not prescribing punishments or penalties, is of force during the entire day of its approval, and that the law in reference thereto does not recognize any fraction of a day; yet we concede that the decisions are not entirely harmonious." That doctrine was reaffirmed in Young v. Pollak, 85 Ala. 439, 5 So. 279. So, we must treat this case as falling within the influence of the act approved February 10, 1893.

. . . We hold that, before this case was brought to a conclusion in the circuit court, the statute under which it was instituted was repealed, and that that repeal put an end to the suit. The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

PARKINSON v. BRANDENBURGH

MITCHELL, J. The question here is whether the levy made on February 27th, under writs of attachment issued out of justice's court, was dissolved by the assignment under the insolvent law, executed March 2d, by the defendants in the writs, Johnson & Dahl. This involves the question whether chapter 70, Gen.Laws 1885, took effect on the twenty-seventh or on the twenty-eighth of February. The act was passed February 27th, and was, by its terms, "to take effect, and be in force, from and after its passage." In Duncan v. Cobb, 32 Minn. 460, S.C. 21 N.W. 714, this court, in considering a statute which was to take effect "one year from and after its passage," held that in computing this period of one year the day of the passage of the act should be excluded. This would seem to be decisive of the present case. But as the point was decided without much consideration, and was not necessarily involved in the determination of the case, we would not feel compelled to adhere to the rule, if, on fuller consideration, we were convinced that it was wrong.

Undoubtedly the great weight of authority is to the effect that a statute which is to take effect "from and after its passage" takes effect upon the day of its passage. Arnold v. U. S., 9 Cranch, 104; Matthews v. Zane, 7 Wheat. 211; Mallory v. Hiles, 4 Metc. (Ky.) 53; People v. Clark, 1 Cal. 406. The reason usually assigned for this is that it is in accordance with the general rule that when a computation of time is to be made from an act done, the day on which the act is done is to be included. Arnold v. U. S., supra; Mallory v. Hiles, supra. And yet the general and now prevailing rule is that where the computation of time, as prescribed in statutes, is to be made from an act done, the first day—that on which the act is done—is to be excluded. Sedg. Const. St. 356; Smith, Comm. § 616; Bigelow v. Willson, 1 Pick. 485.

How this rule is to be reconciled with that suggested in Arnold v. U. S. and Mallory v. Hiles, supra, we have never been able clearly to understand. It may well be doubted whether any inflexible rule can be laid down as of universal application to all classes of causes. The word "from" may, in vulgar use, and even in strict propriety of language, mean either "inclusive" or "exclusive." It must always depend upon the context and subject-matter whether it shall be inclusive or exclusive of the terminus a quo. Pugh v. Duke of Leeds, 2 Cowp. 719. It seems to us that the words "from and after," as used by the legislature in this connection, are words of exclusion. And if a day is to be deemed an indivisible point of time, and, in accordance with the general rule, fractions of day disregarded, it logically follows that the day of the passage of the act should be excluded. The expressions "from its passage" and "from the day of its passage," like the expressions "from the date" and "from the day of the date," are synonymous, (Bigelow v. Willson, supra; Pugh v. Duke of Leeds, supra;) and if a day is an individual point of time, there can be no distinction between a computation from an act done and a computation from the day on which the act was done.

It therefore seems to us that when a legislature declare that an act shall take effect "from and after its passage," or "from and after the day of its passage," it may be fairly presumed that they use these terms as exclusive of the day of the passage of the act. This furnishes a certain and convenient rule, which avoids serious practical difficulties resulting from holding that the day of the passage of the act is to be included. Some of the authorities which hold that such a statute takes effect on the day of its passage take the position that it is to be deemed in force from the earliest moment of that day, and that any inquiry as to the exact hour of its passage is inadmissible. In re Welman, 20 Vt. 64; Mallory v. Hiles, supra. But it would seem wrong in principle that laws designed as rules of conduct should be, by a mere legal fiction, made retroactive, even for a fraction of a day. To avoid this result, the tendency now is to hold that the statute takes effect only from the exact moment of its approval, and that, when necessary to determine conflicting rights, courts of justice will inquire as to the exact hour of its passage. In re Richardson, 2 Story, 571; People v. Clark, supra; Louisville v. Savings Bank, 104 U.S. 469.

The objection to this is that, while all right in theory, it is difficult of application in practice. There is usually no satisfactory means of ascertaining the exact hour at which the executive approved any given statute. The question must generally be decided on mere conjecture, or by indulging in presumptions, as in Kennedy v. Palmer, 6 Gray, 316. It certainly does not seem fit or proper that the time of the commencement of a law, whenever the question arises, should be left to depend upon the uncertainty of parol proof, or upon anything extrinsic to the law itself and the authenticated recorded proceedings in passing it. By excluding the day of the passage of the act, and holding that it takes effect at the beginning of the following day, all these practical difficulties are avoided, and a rule established which is not only certain and convenient, but, as we think, entirely in accord with recognized canons of construction. It is also in harmony with the usual method of computing time in other cases. We therefore see no good reason for receding from the rule laid down in Duncan v. Cobb, supra.

It is not necessary to consider whether the legislature could, by making this statute retroactive, have affected attachment liens acquired prior to its passage. It is sufficient here to say that statutes are not to be construed as retroactive unless by their language it clearly appears that they were so intended to be. No such intent appears from the language of this act. Order reversed.

1. In Mushel v. Board of County Commissioners for Benton County, 152 Minn. 266 at p. 269, 188 N.W. 555 at page 556, (1922), Hallam, J., said:

"If the question were an open one, we should have serious doubts as to the correctness of the rule adopted in the Parkinson case. It is contrary to the weight of authority and to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States as the decision itself plainly shows. The rule that in such cases the law will not take into account fractions of a day was repudiated in Syndicate Printing Co. v. Cashman, 115 Minn. 446, 132 N.W. 915, where it was held that where two inconsistent statutes are approved on the same day the court will ascertain which was passed last and will hold that the one passed last repeals the other, and in arriving at its conclusion will presume that they were passed in their numerical order. On the other hand, since this decision was rendered, the legislature has met more than 20 times. At any session the legislature might have changed the rule, but it has not done so. On the contrary, when it adopted the code of 1905 it provided that every act of the legislature which does not expressly declare when it shall take effect shall be in force 'from and after' its approval by the Governor. R.L.1905, sec. 5510; G.S.1913, sec. 9408. The words 'from and after' were doubtless used with knowledge of the judicial construction that had been placed upon them in the cases cited and the same construction was doubtless contemplated in the new use. A majority of the court are of the opinion that the Parkinson case should not be overruled."

1945 Minn.Stat. § 645.02, reads: "Each act, except one making appropriations, enacted finally at any session of the legislature takes effect at the beginning of the day next following its final enactment, unless a different date is specified in the act."

"An appropriation act or an act having appropriation items enacted finally at any session of the legislature takes effect at the beginning of the first day of July next following its final enactment, unless a different date is specified in the act."

"Each act takes effect at 12:01 a.m. on the day it becomes effective, unless a different time is specified in the act."

ROBERTSON v. BRADBURY

132 U.S. 491, 10 S.Ct. 158, 33 L.Ed. 405.

BRADLEY, J. This is a suit to recover alleged excess of duties exacted on certain cargoes of asphaltum in cakes, imported by Bradbury, the plaintiff below, from Antwerp, in May, 1883. Two questions are presented in the case for our determination: First, whether the seventh section of the act of March 3, 1883, entitled "An act to reduce internal revenue taxation, and for other purposes," went into effect at the time of the passage of the act, or not until the 4th of July following; secondly, if it did go into effect at the time of the passage of the act, whether, under the circumstances of this case, the plaintiff below was entitled to the benefit of that section. Prior to the passage of the act referred to, under the 2907th and the 2908th sections of the Revised Statutes (which were taken from the ninth section of the act of July 28, 1866, 14 St. 330) the collector, in determining the "dutiable value" of merchandise, was required to add to the cost, or actual wholesale price or general market value, at the time of exportation, in the principal markets of the country whence the goods were imported, the cost of transportation, shipment, and transshipment, with all the expenses included, from the place of growth, production, or manufacture, to the vessel in which shipment was made to the United States; also the value of the sack, box, or covering, and commissions and brokerage; which additions were to be regarded as part of the actual value, and a penalty was imposed for not including them. These sections were repealed by the seventh section of the act of March 3, 1883. They are repealed by words in the present tense, thus: "That sections 2907 and 2908 . . . be, and the same are hereby, repealed, and hereafter none of the charges imposed by said sections, or any other provisions of existing law, shall be estimated in ascertaining the value of goods to be imported." We do not see how there can be any doubt that this repealing section went into immediate effect. The law itself went into immediate effect, although, it is true, various provisions of it, contained in other sections, were postponed to take effect, some on the 1st of July, and some on the 1st of May. But where such postponement was intended it was expressed, and only referred to the parts that were so postponed. It did not affect the section in question; and such was the understanding of the treasury department itself at the time. In a treasury circular of March 12, 1883, addressed to the collectors of customs, the secretary, referring to the act in question, then just passed, said: "Various sections recite the date when each shall go into effect, and, so far as concerns these sections, those dates control. Section 7, however, names specifically no date when it is to go into operation, and the department holds that it takes effect from and after the date of the passage of the act." This contemporaneous construction is entitled to some weight in favor of importers. U. S. v. Johnston, 124 U.S. 236, 253, 8 S.Ct. 446. At all events, it was undoubtedly the correct construction. . . .

PAYNE v. GRAHAM

Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, 1919.
118 Me. 251, 107 A. 709, 7 A.L.R. 516.

DEASY, J. In May, 1919, Vera Payne was indicted and convicted in the superior court, Cumberland county, for violation of chapter 112 of the Public Laws of 1919, which act, approved March 7, 1919, makes more stringent the provisions of statute for the prevention and punishment of sexual crimes.

She presents her petition for writ of habeas corpus, upon the ground that at the time of her indictment and conviction chapter 112 had not become effective as law.

Section 7 of the act is as follows:

"In view of the emergency cited in the preamble this act shall take effect when approved."

But the petitioner says that chapter 112, notwithstanding this legislative pronouncement, is not an emergency act, and that it did not take effect until 90 days after the recess of the Legislature, which period expired after her conviction.

The amended Constitution of Maine, article 4, part third, section 16, is as follows:

"No act or joint resolution of the Legislature, except such orders or resolutions as pertain solely to facilitating the performance of the business of the Legislature, of either branch, or of any committee or officer thereof, or appropriate money therefor or for the payment of salaries fixed by law, shall take effect until ninety days after the recess of the Legislature passing it, unless in case of emergency (which with the facts constituting the emergency shall be expressed in the preamble of the act), the Legislature shall, by a vote of two-thirds of all the members elected to each house, otherwise direct. An emergency bill shall include only such measures as are immediately necessary for the preservation of the public peace, health or safety; and shall not include (1) an infringement of the right of home rule for municipalities, (2) a franchise or a license to a corporation or an individual to extend longer than one year, or (3) provision for the sale or purchase or renting for more than five years of real estate."

The petitioner contends that the act in question is not immediately necessary for the preservation of the public peace, health, or safety, and that the court should so declare.

But the state maintains that the question presented is one for final legislative determination.

The leading case touching this matter is Kadderly v. City of Portland, 44 Or. 120, 74 P. 721, 75 P. 222. The opinion in this case sustains the state's contention. See, also, to same effect Hanson v. Hodges, 109 Ark. 479, 160 S.W. 392; Oklahoma City v. Shields, 22 Okl. 265, 100 P. 559; In re Menefee, 22 Okl. 365, 97 P. 1014; In re Senate Resolutions, 54 Colo. 269, 130 P. 336; Bennett Trust Co. v. Sengstacken, 58 Or. 333, 113 P. 863.

But in the case of State v. Meath, 84 Wash. 302, 147 P. 11, the doctrine of the Oregon court is by a majority opinion denied, and its conclusions rejected. Other cases also hold that the question is one for court review. State v. Whisman, 36 S.D. 260, 154 N.W. 711, L.R.A. 1917B, 1; Miami County v. City of Dayton, 92 Ohio St. 215, 110 N.E. 728; Attorney General v. Lindsay, 178 Mich. 542, 145 N.W. 98.

Obviously the test is the extent to which legislative power is limited by the Constitution. Constitutional limitations are subjects of judicial interpretation and effectuation. Questions of public policy, such as the justice, expediency, necessity, or urgency (immediate necessity) of laws are for final legislative determination. But the control by the Legislature of even these questions may be qualified by express constitutional limitation.

The only Maine case touching the subject is Lemaire v. Crockett, 116 Me. 267, 101 A. 302. This case is not directly in point, because it involves one of the express limitations of the Constitution. Though it may deem an act which is an "infringement of the right of home rule for municipalities" to be immediately necessary, the Legislature is forbidden by the positive mandate of the Constitution to give it immediate effect. Whether a given act is such an infringement is a judicial question. The case of Lemaire v. Crockett does not reach the question concerning which courts differ so radically; i. e., whether the words, "An emergency bill shall include only such measures as are immediately necessary for the preservation of the public peace, health or safety," or other similar language, creates a limitation upon legislative power which the courts have jurisdiction to interpret and give effect to.

We are mindful of the long-established rule that questions of constitutional law should not be passed upon, unless strictly necessary to a decision of the cause under consideration. We therefore defer expressing a final opinion upon the question concerning which, as appears above, courts are at variance, because, for another reason not touched upon in any of the above-cited cases, we hold that chapter 112 did not take immediate effect as an emergency act.

Of the states that have provided for giving emergency acts immediate effect, generally in connection with the initiative and referendum, the Constitutions of nearly all provide in effect that emergency legislation shall include only such measures as are immediately necessary for the preservation of the public health, peace, or safety. But our Constitution goes further and requires that the emergency "with the facts constituting the emergency shall be expressed in the preamble of the act." The only state Constitutions containing similar language are those of California, article 4, § 1; Ohio, article 2, § 1d; North Dakota, article 2, § 67; Mississippi, amendment of 1914 (see Laws 1941, c. 520); Massachusetts, amendment of 1918. In neither of these is the language precisely like that of the Maine Constitution, but all require that the facts constituting, or reasons for, an emergency be expressed or set forth in the preamble or some part of the act. Our investigation does not disclose that in either of these states such constitutional provisions have been judicially interpreted. The case of City of Roanoke v. Elliott (Va.) 96 S.E. 821, construes that clause of the Virginia Constitution reading: "The emergency shall be expressed in the body of the bill" (Const. § 53). The Virginia Constitution does not require the facts or reasons to be expressed, and it is held that in the absence of an explicit constitutional mandate the facts need not be set forth.

We think it clear that the above-quoted language of the Maine Constitution creates a limitation upon legislative power, and that without conforming to it no act be made an emergency act, and as such be given immediate effect.

The preamble of chapter 112, under consideration, is as follows:
"Whereas, owing to the necessity of preserving the public health in general, the enactment of more stringent laws prohibiting prostitution, lewdness and assignation and providing punishment therefor, is an emergency measure immediately necessary for the preservation of the public peace, health or safety."

This preamble contains an assumption that there is "a necessity of preserving the public health in general," and a conclusion that "the enactment of more stringent laws . . . is an emergency measure." It contains no statement of facts, as required by the Constitution, and no facts that are even suggestive of an emergency.

In argument, indeed, facts are presented which give the act an emergent character. In argument it is said that a great World War had been raging; that, while an armistice had been declared, large bodies of troops were still assembled; that for preventing the spread among these troops of sexual disorders, destructive of military efficiency, existing laws were inadequate; and that the federal authorities had requested the co-operation of the state in meeting these conditions.

But these facts are not, as the Constitution requires, expressed in the preamble. The facts constituting the emergency are expressed in the briefs of counsel, instead of in the preamble of the act. Chapter 112 is therefore not an emergency act as defined by the Constitution. It did not take effect until after the petitioner's indictment and conviction. Her detention is therefore not warranted, and the entry must be:

Exceptions sustained.

Writ of habeas corpus to issue.

LEGISLATIVE LANGUAGE, ITS ARRANGEMENT, AND THE MECHANICS OF DRAFTING

SECTION 1. INTRODUCTORY

CARMAN F. RANDOLPH, DELIBERATE LEGISLATION

25 Rep.N.Y.S.B. 168, 172 (1902).

The poison of bad law circulates through every vein of the body politic, and often they who suffer most are least cognizant of the cause. Naturally the most intelligent resentment comes from lawyers, for they best appreciate the connection between the cause and the effect; and our profession should prescribe the cure. Here is not merely the opportunity of the American Bar. Here is a duty imposed by the reproach cast upon us by the existing conditions. Few laws are drafted by laymen. Our ignorance, our carelessness, our obeisance to noxious influences are immediately responsible for most of the statutory texts condemned by our wisdom, our skill and our public spirit.

NOTE

See also "Report of Special Committee on Drafting of Statutes", 39 Rep.A.B.A. 637-641, 648-649 (1914).

JAMES BRYCE, THE CONDITIONS AND METHODS OF LEGISLATION

31 Rep.N.Y.S.B.A. 153, 162-163 (1908).

. . . . The quality of statute law may be considered in respect: First, of its Form; secondly, of its Substance.

As respects Form, you, as lawyers, know that a statute ought to be clear, concise, consistent. Its meaning should be evident, should be expressed in the fewest possible words, should contain nothing in which one clause contradicts another or which is repugnant to any other provision of the statute law, except such provisions as it is expressly intended to repeal.

To secure these merits two things are needed, viz.: That a bill as introduced should be skillfully drafted, and that pains should be taken to see that all amendments made are also properly drafted, and that the wording is carefully revised at the last stage and before the bill is enacted. Of these objects the former is in England pretty well secured by the modern practice of having all government bills—these being the most important and the large majority of those that pass—prepared by the official draftsman, called the Parliamentary Counsel to the Treasury. Nearly all our important bills, nearly all the controverted bills that pass are bills brought in by the government of the day. A private member has now hardly any chance of passing legislation. Therefore, you may take it that all important legislation is prepared, pushed through and passed by the government. The government has an official permanent drafting staff, consisting of two or three able and highly trained lawyers, whose business it is to put its bills in the best shape. If they are not always in the best shape, that is not the fault of the draftsman, because the best scientific shape is not necessarily the shape in which it is most easy to pass a bill through Parliament. A bill may be so prepared in point of form as to excite more or less opposition and sometimes it is just as well to take a little pains so to arrange the clauses as to give the least open front to hostile criticism, and also, to afford the fewest opportunities for taking divisions in committees. It is one of our rules of Parliament that every clause has to be separately put to vote in committee, therefore, the more clauses, the more divisions. Hence if you put a great deal into one clause subdividing it into subsections, and parts of subsections by numbers and letters, instead of letting each matter enacted have a clause to itself, you have fewer debates on each clause and fewer divisions. That explains what you might otherwise think scientifically objectionable in the structure of recent acts. It is not possible in legislation, passed by a popular assembly, to attain that high standard of scientific perfection which could be obtained by an absolute potentate like a Roman Emperor.

This question of Parliamentary drafting is really an important one. . . .

THOMAS I. PARKINSON, LEGISLATIVE CONTRIBUTION TO PROGRESS

12 A.B.A.Jour. 95 (1926).

. . . The translation of a legislative idea into an effective statute is not, to use the words of a Bar Association President, "a pastime for a summer afternoon." John Stuart Mill, a legislator as well as an economist, says "there is hardly any kind of intellectual work which so much needs to be done . . . by minds trained to the task through long and laborious study as the business of making laws," and yet we, in this country, acting upon the premise that the legislator's duty includes not only determination of questions of general policy but also the phraseology of the statute necessary to give effect to an approved policy, have been leaving the preparation of our statutes to men who, though representative of their communities, know nothing of the science of legislation. The resulting difficulty with much of our legislation is expressed by an English Court's criticism of the British workmen's compensation act "that the draftsman has apparently not worked out on paper in legislative language the scheme which he had in his head."

American legislators have been slow to recognize their need of competent draftsmen. When Senator Root proposed a legislative draftsman for Congress he was told by leading Senators on the floor of the Senate that they did not propose to turn over to a "schoolmaster" the responsibility for law-making which their constituents had vested in them. It is to the credit of Claude Kitchin, Democratic leader of the House during the Wilson Administration, that he recognized the need and persuaded Congress to provide official draftsmen who are contributing so much of improvement in the form and phraseology of the Federal statutes. The leaders in Congress of both parties now recognize the distinction between the policy-determining function of the representative and the legislative drafting function in the exercise of which the representative is entitled to have competent technical assistance. What Mr. Kitchin then established exists today in the hands of men who, in my opinion, are the most competent draftsmen employed by any parliamentary body in an English-speaking country. I think it is little known, even among the lawyers of the country, that the draftsmen now serving the House and the Senate in Washington are doing as splendid, as accurate and as fine drafting service as anywhere in the world is being given to a legislative body.

The legislative draftsman constantly finds his path beset with tantalizing difficulties some of which are inherent in the English language. One legislature, determining to deal vigorously with accidents at railroad grade crossings, provided that when two trains approach a grade crossing from different directions they should both come to a full stop and that neither should start up again until the other had fully crossed. That makes up in effectiveness what it lacks in practicability.

Governor Hodges cites a Kansas hotel act which requires that "all carpets and equipment used in offices and sleep-rooms including walls and ceilings must be well plastered."

There is still on the Federal statute books a provision "that no sponges . . . shall be landed at any port in the United States of a smaller size than four inches in diameter." How many of our ports could qualify for the reception of imported sponges?

"A legislative commission engaged in drafting a workmen's compensation act after providing compensation for the widow of a killed workman defined the term widow as "only those who are living with the decedent at the time of his death." In order to avoid the possibility of a plurality of claims the commission in a later draft presented the following definition: "The term 'widow' shall include only a widow living with the decedent at the time of his death." What the commission was evidently trying to say was "the decedent's wife living with him at the time of his death."

In emphasizing the defects of our legislative enactments we must not be unmindful of the fact that similar and equally serious flaws are frequently present in other legal documents which are not prepared by our legislatures. The best of our lawyers have not been able to overcome the difficulties of form and phraseology which account for so many of the failures of our legislators. The Marine insurance contract was not drawn by legislators and while it has the merit of brevity it would hardly be selected as a model of concise and definite legal phraseology. The standard fire insurance contract can boast of no superiority in form and phraseology when compared with the average workmen's compensation act. . . .

The defects of our statutes merit the criticism and derision which are daily heaped upon them. I am not attempting to divert this criticism to contracts and other legal documents formulated by counsel for private interests, but I am endeavoring to emphasize the importance of detail and precision in all legal documents including statutes. Wise and effective legislation is dependent upon attention to detail. It requires power in the legislator to analyze the problems which confront him; wisdom in selecting from available alternatives, and skill in the use of language. . . .

FELIX FRANKFURTER, SOME REFLECTIONS ON THE READING OF STATUTES

47 Colum.L.Rev. 527, 545-546 (1947).

The quality of legislative organization and procedure is inevitably reflected in the quality of legislative draftsmanship. Representative Monroney told the House last July that "ninety-five percent of all the legislation that becomes law passes the Congress in the shape that it came from our committees. Therefore if our committee work is sloppy, if it is bad, if it is inadequate, our legislation in ninety-five percent of the cases will be bad and inadequate as well."⁴⁴ And Representative Lane added that ". . . in the second session of the 78th Congress 953 bills and resolutions were passed, of which only 86 were subject to any real discussion."⁴⁵ But what courts do with legislation may in turn deeply affect what Congress will do in the future. Emerson says somewhere that mankind is as lazy as it dares to be. Loose judicial reading makes for loose legislative writing. It encourages the practise illustrated in a recent cartoon in which a senator tells his colleagues "I admit this new bill is too complicated to understand. We'll just have to pass it to find out what it means." A modern Pascal might be tempted at times to say of legislation what Pascal said of students of theology when he charged them with "a looseness of thought and language that would pass nowhere else in making what are professedly very fine distinctions." And it is conceivable that he might go on and speak, as did Pascal, of the "insincerity with which terms are carefully chosen to cover opposite meanings."⁴⁶

But there are more fundamental objections to loose judicial reading. In a democracy the legislative impulse and its expression should come from those popularly chosen to legislate, and equipped to devise policy, as courts are not. The pressure on legislatures to discharge their responsibility with care, understanding and imagination should be stiffened, not relaxed. Above all, they must not be encouraged in irresponsible or undisciplined use of language. In the keeping of legislatures perhaps more than any other group is the well-being of their fellow-men. Their responsibility is discharged ultimately by words. They are under a special duty therefore to observe that "Exactness in the use of words is the basis of all serious thinking. You will get nowhere without it. Words are clumsy tools, and it is very easy to cut one's fingers with them, and they need the closest attention in handling; but they are the only tools we have, and imagination itself cannot work without them. You must master the use of them, or you will wander forever guessing at the mercy of mere impulse and unrecognized assumptions and arbitrary associations, carried away with every wind of doctrine."⁴⁷

Perfection of draftsmanship is as unattainable as demonstrable correctness of judicial reading of legislation. Fit legislation and fair adjudication are attainable. . . .

SIR W. D. EVANS, INTRODUCTION TO COLLECTION OF STATUTES

3rd ed., London: 1829, p. xxx.

Another evil may be noticed, that is rather formidable in the distance, than influencing, at present, to any great extent; namely, the notion of introducing a technical Nomenclature throughout the whole extent of our Judicial system. Not to mention, that in spite of the multiplicity of set forms of expression, applying to particular cases, that might be promulgated, yet upon account of the still greater variety of possible circumstances, it would constantly occur, among all those forms there would not be found one exactly parallel to the case under consideration, and that, therefore, it is a vain attempt to introduce accuracy into a subject that does not admit of it: The only cases in which a Nomenclature can, with any safety, be fixed, are those proceedings, (pleadings for example) in which lawyers are unavoidably employed, and where time is not essentially an object. Here without any impropriety, and frequently with great advantage, there are a number of phrases, to which the Courts annex an artificial meaning, and which they will interpret in that sense only. No inconvenience arises from this, since these matters are conducted by men trained up in the science of which these forms are a part. But to introduce a technical Nomenclature throughout the whole extent of the Judicial system, would not merely throw the most ordinary affairs of life into the hands of lawyers; it would introduce endless misery, by taking from those who either had not the means, or the opportunity of employing professional men, the power of acting. The notion, indeed, has been partially carried into effect. In some instances, set forms of expression have certain ideas, in exclusion of all others, annexed to them, as in the Law of Devises; a practice that has been deplored by Judges as enlightened as those who introduced it. In its origin, perhaps, it sprung from that rage for simplicity, which, by making every thing bend to a single principle, and that alone govern a system, has introduced so much confusion into science.

FRANCIS M. BURDICK, CAN A STATUTE BE WELL WRITTEN IN ENGLISH

6 Rep.N.Y.S.B.A. 130, 133-134 (1882).

Is not the true reason why our statutes are so badly written found in the defective education of our Bar, in legal and legislative expression? There can be no doubt that our statutes are, in the main, "framed by lawyers, are, in the long run, the fruit of whatever capacity for orderly disposition and whatever power of comprehensive expression are to be found among the Bar." Until recently, the genius of English and American lawyers has been almost wholly directed to the development of case law. In this field they are unrivaled. But they have done little in the cultivation of an accurate and comprehensive terminology for legal and legislative use. Indeed, in some instances, those who have attempted to codify our laws have increased their uncertainty by insisting upon using words in their popular sense. If law is a science, however, it must have its scientific phraseology. Words must be used by the lawyer and legislator with scientific precision and definiteness, if the prolixity and liability to misapprehension which now characterize our statutes and forensic discussions are to be avoided.

Such has not been the habit of the English-speaking lawyer or lawgiver; hence the poverty of our legal vocabulary. To demand of legislators well-written statutes, while the proper materials for their construction are wanting, is to impose a more difficult task than was put on ancient Israel—of making bricks without straw.

If the cause of the defectiveness of our statutes has been correctly pointed out, it follows that the only efficient remedy is found in making legal terminology a distinct department of legal education. In support of this position, we have the high authority of Sir Henry Maine. He says: "The difficulty of drafting statutes, and the confusion caused by amending them, are infinitely greater than they need be, and infinitely greater than they would be, if English practitioners were subjected to any system of legal education, in which proper attention was paid to the dialect of legislation and law. This branch of study may be described, though the comparison cannot, from the nature of the case, be taken strictly, as having for its object to bring all language, for legal purposes, to the condition of algebraic symbols, and therefore to produce uniformity of method in its employment and identity of inference in its interpretation. In practice, of course, nothing more than an approximation to these results could be obtained; but it is likely that a general educational machinery would add materially to the extent and importance of that portion of legislative phraseology which is common stock."

OGDEN AND RICHARDS, THE MEANING OF MEANING

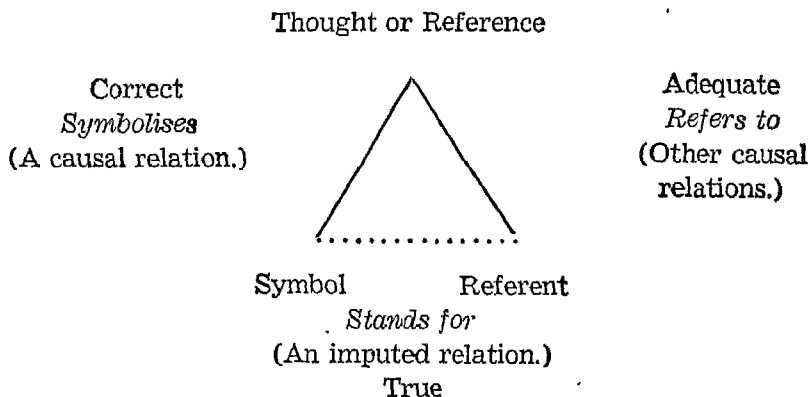

(1936) Harcourt, Brace & Co., 11.

b. Symbols

There is no doubt an Art in saying something when there is nothing to be said, but it is equally certain that there is an Art no less important of saying clearly what one wishes to say when there is an abundance of material; and conversation will seldom attain even the level of an intellectual pastime if adequate methods of Interpretation are not also available. Some knowledge of symbols, of words and their ways, is therefore a direct advantage both in general discussion and in scientific enquiry.

Symbolism is the study of the part played in human affairs by language and symbols of all kinds, and especially of their influence on Thought. It singles out for special inquiry the ways in which symbols help us and hinder us in reflecting on things. Symbols direct and organise, record and communicate. In stating what they direct and organise, record and communicate we have to distinguish as always between Thoughts and Things. . . .

This may be simply illustrated by a diagram, in which the three factors involved whenever any statement is made, or understood, are placed at the corners of the triangle, the relations which hold between them being represented by the sides.

The point just made can be restated by saying that in this respect the base of the triangle is quite different in composition from either of the other sides. Between a thought and a symbol causal relations hold.

When we speak, the symbolism we employ is caused partly by the reference we are making and partly by social and psychological factors—the purpose for which we are making the reference, the proposed effect of our symbols on other persons, and our own attitude. When we hear what is said, the symbols both cause us to perform an act of reference and to assume an attitude which will, according to circumstances, be more or less similar to the act and the attitude of the speaker. . . . Between the symbol and the referent there is no relation other than the indirect one, which consists in its being used by someone to stand for a referent. Symbol and Referent, that is to say, are not connected directly (and when, for grammatical reasons, we imply such a relation, it will merely be an imputed, as opposed to a real, relation) but only indirectly round the two sides of the triangle.

ZECHARIAH CHAFEE, JR., THE DISORDERLY CONDUCT OF WORDS

Words are the principal tools of lawyers and judges, whether we like it or not. They are to us what the scalpel and insulin are to the doctor, or a theodolite and sliderule to the civil engineer. So we need to know more about their imperfections. Several books have appeared recently about a new science of language called Semantics. Best known in the United States are The Meaning of Meaning (fourth edition, 1936), a technical and difficult work by C. K. Ogden and I. A. Richards, and The Tyranny of Words (1938), a popular discussion by Stuart Chase. I have gone to these for help, to see whether they supplement the efforts of judges and lawbooks to solve problems of legal interpretation.

I

The first lesson I have learned is, that language is not used solely for the communication of thought. That purpose is uppermost in our minds when we write opinions or briefs or law review articles, and hence we lawyers easily forget that words are frequently employed with quite a different object—to make somebody do something. Ogden and Richards stress this emotive function of language as distinguished from its communicative function; and illustrate this by printing Malinowski's observations on the speech of children and savages. They do not employ language, he says, as a condensed piece of reflection and a record of fact or thought, as does the author of a book or inscription. With them, language functions as a link in concerted human activity, as a piece of human behavior. It is a mode of action and not an instrument of reflection. For example, among primitive people:

"A word, signifying an important utensil, is used in action, not to comment on its nature or reflect on its properties, but to make (the utensil) appear, be handed over to the speaker, or to direct another man to its proper use."

It takes only a little thought for us to realize that among civilized adults language is largely employed for the same emotive purpose. One instance will suffice—the young wife who complained, "When I ask Charles if he loves me, he acts as if I were asking for information."

However, our major concern as lawyers is with the communicative function of language, to which my remaining observations will be devoted. My next main point is that The Meaning of Meaning gives us much help in understanding the true relation between a word and the object for which the word stands. (I use "object" loosely to embrace persons and abstract ideas as well as tangible things; the semanticists use instead the technical word "referent").

To start with, the word is not the same as what it points to. Obvious as this statement may seem, the contrary belief is constantly cropping up; that words have existence and power, that they are equivalent to the things and persons they denote, or nearly so. It is something like the relation assumed by primitive or superstitious minds between the god and the image. A Harvard professor fell into conversation with a peasant in the Campagna, who asserted defiantly that there was no God. "I suppose you don't believe in the Devil either." Quick as a flash the peasant crossed himself and looked behind him with terror.

Although this identification of the word with the object is avoided by more sophisticated minds, they often slip just one peg down into the deeply-rooted notion that the word inevitably and unalterably belongs to a particular thing or person. A name is like a label chained around the object by God's order, which nobody must presume to detach. "And whatsoever Adam called every living creature, that was the name thereof." . . .

Lawyers and judges are highly susceptible to this notion of an indissoluble link between the word and the thing. A sense of the inherent potency of words is natural with us. Words are the effective force in the legal world. In statutes, they result in heavy fines, long imprisonment or even death. In contracts, deeds, or wills, they transfer large amounts of property. Hence the persistent feeling in our profession that the right words must be used. You must in the old days say "A and his heirs" to give a fee, not "A and his descendants" or "A and his successors." . . .

The need for analysis of this word "meaning" is obvious. Ogden and Richards constantly insist that words are only symbols of objects. These symbols do not arise from the nature of the objects, but are created by human beings for purposes of convenience, just like buoys and traffic-signals. So far there is nothing new. Wigmore, for example, has an admirable presentation of the symbolic quality of words. But now comes a big contribution from Ogden and Richards. The relation of the word to the object is only indirect. Between these two factors, a third factor always intervenes, the thought of some person. Thus the object causes a thought in the mind of a speaker or writer, and he uses a word to express his thought. In listening or reading, the process is reversed. The word brings about a thought which refers to the object. The authors diagram their theory by a triangle. The word and the object are at the two base angles; the thought is at the apex. We never go directly across the base of the triangle, from word to object or vice versa, but always travel the long way around through somebody's thought at the top of the triangle. Of course, we telescope this process in popular parlance by saying that the word stands for the object, but in careful analysis we must always remember the whole series: object to thought to word, or word to thought to object.

The value of this analysis to law can be realized only after a full consideration of Ogden and Richard's book. I shall speak of only one application, to the problems of Mistake. Since the relation between the word and the object involves two steps, two different kinds of mistakes may occur. First, the thought may not adequately represent the object, as when parties buy and sell a racehorse which is in fact dead. This type of mistake I call Error. Second, the word may not correctly express the thought. For example, a deed describes the "east" half of Blackacre when the parties intended the west half to be conveyed. This I call a Mistake of Expression. This distinction is important, because the usual remedy for Error is to call the bargain off (rescission), and for Mistake of Expression is to remould the writing to the actual intention (reformation).

Another big contribution of Ogden and Richards is their demonstration that this word "meaning," which we lawyers and judges use so blithely as if it were a clear path out of our tangles, is really a network of paths in which we are likely to get worse lost than ever. The authors list sixteen different main definitions of "meaning" and nine sub-variations, all derived from reputable sources. I mention only a few of these, as apt to occur in law: the other words annexed to a word in the dictionary; what the user of the word intends to be understood from it by the listener or reader (intention of the testator, etc.); that to which the user of the word actually refers; that to which the user of the word ought to be referring (this is common usage, the view held by Mr. Justice Holmes, who insists on "the ordinary meaning of the language in the mouth of a normal speaker situated as the party using the language was situated"); that to which the interpreter of a word refers; that to which the interpreter believes himself to be referring; that to which the interpreter of a word believes the user to be referring.

When a lawyer or judge speaks of "the meaning of the word used," he needs to know clearly which of these numerous definitions is applicable. Sometimes a case on the interpretation of a will or contract or statute shows the judge employing "meaning" in three or four different senses and sliding unconsciously from one sense to another in a single sentence of his opinion.

I have spoken of two lessons for law to be gained from the writers on Semantics—first, the varied functions of language; second, the analysis of the relation between the word and the object. We now come to a third lesson, that words are very imperfect means of communication. A word doesn't stay put. It wabbles and slides around. This is illustrated by the migrations of "meaning," just discussed. Hundreds of examples arise in daily life. We pay dues to a golf-club and use a golf-club to hit a ball. Then we invite our fair partner to a ball at the clubhouse.

When the objects for which a single word stands are thus widely separated, no harm results except an occasional excruciating pun, from which even the law is not free. A Massachusetts doctor charged with procuring an abortion argued to the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts that he was protected by the Statute of Frauds—no one should be held for the debt, default or "miscarriage of another" unless evidenced by some memorandum in writing.

However, when the same word signifies two ideas which are close to each other or overlap, confusion and obscurity are probable. The writer may fall into the terrible crime called the utraquistic subterfuge, of using the word in both its senses during the same discussion. This is said to be a frequent crime among philosophers. For example, "knowledge" may be used for both the content of what is known and the process of knowing. Such an error occasionally creeps into judicial opinions. For example, a case involves a serious misstatement of fact, but it is not clear that the speaker knew of the falsehood or intended to deceive. The judge begins by calling innocent misrepresentation "constructive fraud." After a while "constructive" drops out. Later on he cites a number of cases of intentional misrepresentations which stress the wickedness of "fraud." "Fraud" is an emotive as well as a communicative word, and the judge begins to warm up. Before long the speaker's knowledge of the falsehood is treated as irrelevant, and the judge concludes that an innocent misstatement should be heavily penalized because "fraud" is a vicious quality.

If words were perfect instruments of communication, such difficulties could be avoided. Ogden and Richards lay down as the first requirement of a satisfactory system of symbols, "One symbol stands for one and only one referent." ("Referent," as already stated, is their word for my "object,"—what one's thought refers to.) Unfortunately, this requirement can only rarely be fulfilled. In mathematics, we have a specially devised system of symbols of such a character; pi always means the same thing. The natural sciences approximate this ideal. Our colonial ancestors used "robin" for an English relative of the sparrow and an American relative of the thrush, but an ornithologist calls each bird by a different Latin name. But it would be impossible to impose such precision on ordinary language, for it would go to pieces in the wear and tear of everyday intercourse. "Thus it constantly happens that one word has to serve functions for which a hundred would not be too many." Some attempts to introduce a specially devised symbolism into law have not been successful, as we shall see later. For the most part we must be content to let the words remain imperfect symbols.

It is some consolation to realize that other kinds of symbols often possess the same difficulty. Stuart Chase would have us go back to gestures as far more accurate than words, but has he never been perplexed by the ambiguity of the arm motions of a traffic policeman? A red light symbolizes the rear of an automobile, a pile of dirt, a railway crossing, a fire alarm box, the port side of a steamer, and (on a lighthouse) the presence of rocks and shoals. Probably nobody has ever confused the port light of a boat with a moving automobile, but a lowered railway gate has been mistaken for such an automobile with disastrous consequences. Ordinarily we are able to attach the proper significance to the red light because of the environment, just as a word which is in itself ambiguous can often be understood in the light of the context and surrounding circumstances. But this is not always possible.

We find abundant examples in law of the trouble caused by a word which is capable of standing for two or more different objects, like "remarries" in the divorce settlement. Are canary birds subject to a tariff on "live animals"? A life insurance policy makes the company not liable for death while "participating in aeronautics"; does the phrase apply when the insured is killed while a passenger in a commercial plane which crashes? This quality of words was described by Mr. Justice Holmes in the first Stock Dividend case, where he made it plain that "income" in a revenue act did not necessarily mean exactly the same as "income" in the Sixteenth Amendment:

"A word is not a crystal, transparent and unchanged, it is the skin of a living thought and may vary greatly in color and content according to the circumstances and the time in which it is used. . . ."

A fourth and final lesson is taken from a Polish exile, Korzybski. This I call the hierarchical nature of words. All words are symbols, but some of them are much nearer than others to the five senses. Thus, at the bottom level we have "John Marshall," "Ford sedan No. 1,207,643" and "26 Broadway." On a higher level come generalized words for persons and things, like "judge," "automobile," "office-building." Above these are "men," "chattels," "real estate." Still higher come abstractions like "mankind" and "property." Some writers, especially Stuart Chase, stress the dangers that we run as we get up on the heights. The more abstract the word, the greater the risk that any proposition in which it is used will not be true of all the persons and things within the class denoted by the word, and the more liable we are to forget that at bottom we are talking about persons and things. An ardent advocate of female rights will assert that "Women are oppressed by men" regardless of several hen-pecked husbands she knows. With this inexactness of abstractions goes another danger, their emotional quality. Men are stirred to frenzy by words like "democracy," "un-American," "New Deal" without taking the trouble to specify to themselves the individual persons and practices which they purport to admire or hate.

Similar dangers exist in the legal use of abstractions. "Property" is a striking example. It includes a great range of things from my home to my interest in a free access to prospective customers and employees. Suppose that an official, acting under a statute, is compelling me to bargain with a union or alter my management of a holding company in which I have majority control. Because he is restricting my "property," I begin to feel and talk as indignantly as if I were turned out of my home or forbidden to cruise in my own sloop. Mr. Justice Holmes, who has given as much thought to the meaning of words as any American judge, recognized this danger in Truax v. Corrigan.

"Delusive exactness is a source of fallacy throughout the law. By calling a business 'property' you make it seem like land, and lead up to the conclusion that a statute cannot substantially cut down the advantages of ownership existing before the statute was passed." . . .

However, it is one thing to say that abstractions must be used cautiously, and quite another to urge, that, unless they can be verified by the methods of the natural sciences, they must not be used at all. The higher ranges of the hierarchy of words are indeed dangerous, but so are high buildings and high voltages. Modern life would be hampered without these; and every department of intellectual activity including law would be slowed down almost to a standstill if we did not employ shorthand expressions to denote great masses of related facts.

SECTION 2. SOME PROBLEMS OF LANGUAGE AS JUDICIALLY DETERMINED

INTRODUCTORY NOTE

Professor Conard is undoubtedly correct in what he says about the undesirability of writing laws primarily for the eye of the literal-minded judge (infra, p. 914). Anyone who relies confidently upon so-called judicial canons of interpretation as a guide to effective draftsmanship deludes himself. However there are valuable lessons about the expression and arrangement of language and the necessity for careful legal research to be learned from the methods of literal contextual interpretation, and further, since canons are always available as "aids in discovering the intention of the legislature", the draftsman should know and take account of those most commonly invoked. The material in this section should be examined with this in mind. In Chapter 7, Section 2, infra, it will be reviewed in its setting within the interpretive processes (infra, pp. 1072-1078).

A state supreme court has recently reaffirmed that "All relevant rules for the interpretation of statutes are brought to bear in resolving doubtful meaning. We indulge the presumption that the Legislature acted with the knowledge that these traditional methods would be used to determine its will and intention."¹

ERNST FREUND, THE USE OF INDEFINITE TERMS IN STATUTES

30 Yale L.J. 437 (1921).

It is possible to distinguish roughly three grades of certainty in the language of statutes of general operation: precisely measured terms, abstractions of common certainty, and terms involving an appeal to judgment or a question of degree. The great majority of statutes operate with the middle grade of certainty. The language of the law always aims at precision, while the language of politics favors vagueness and ambiguity, for the former is chosen with a view to the ultimate arbitrament of a court of justice, the latter with a view to immediate effect upon sentiment or opinion. Some of the most general clauses of American constitutions are phrased politically rather than legally, but they are more legal in form than the Declaration of Independence; and the more recent American constitutions are written almost like statutes.

Abstractions of common certainty may be furnished by words of popular usage, by technical terms, or by circumscribing definitions. No general rule can be laid down as to which of these serves statutory purposes best, although a good deal might be said about the illusory certainty of some technical terms, and of cumulations and qualifications sanctioned by traditional practice. Every common abstraction has its "marginal" ambiguity, which mere elaboration of definition cannot altogether remove.

The closest approach to certainty is found in precise measurement, where that form of expression is available. Matters of quantity and quality can often be dealt with in this manner. The law may speak of intoxicating liquors, or it may fix upon a percentage of alcohol. In the history of liquor legislation the more generic term has not been found altogether inadequate, while the superiority of the precise definition has to be paid for by the inconvenience of a more elaborate technical apparatus of administration and proof.

From the past and present practice of legislation we can learn a great deal as to the relative advantage of precisely measured terms and common abstractions, and the ways of handling either; but the considerations applicable vary too much from case to case to be summarized in comprehensive fashion.

It is otherwise with regard to the third class of terms, those representing the lowest grade of certainty, which may be characterized, if we think of them favorably, as flexible, if we think of them unfavorably, as indefinite. They involve either an appeal to judgment, or a question of degree. The former category is represented by such terms as reasonable, proper, sufficient, suitable, necessary; where they are used, flexibility is a deliberate object of legislative policy. The latter category is represented by such terms as nuisance, coercion, undue influence, immorality, depravity, reputability, sedition, unprofessional conduct, unfairness, unsightliness, restraint of trade; their choice is not so much matter of policy, as of inability to deal with a problem. Some of these latter terms have the sanction of common-law recognition, while others represent new standards of which the common law did not take cognizance. They fail to differentiate adequately either the province of morals or of social restraint from the province of law, or the province of the unlawful from that of the legitimate and even valuable. Both categories, considered from the point of view of justice, fail to give certain and equal operation, but on the other hand are more adaptable to varying circumstances than fixed terms. From the legislative point of view, facility of formulation counts in their favor. From the point of view of official administration and individual application, flexibility or indefiniteness has the double aspect of liberty and peril. Liberty means not only a desirable latitude of action, but also the temptation to take the benefit of the doubt; the peril lies in the risk of error and misjudgment and its attendant consequences.

It follows that in deciding upon the admissibility of flexible or indefinite terms, regard must be had to the circumstances under which, the persons by whom, and the sense of responsibility with which, the law will be applied, and to the consequences which an error will entail. Is there any risk of loss and on whom will it fall? Will it be the risk of a penalty? of unsettling title, securities, status rights, or public revenues? a risk of damages? a liability to equitable or administrative order or injunction? the risk that favorable official action will be denied? the risk that a regulation or order will turn out to be invalid? or will the risk be merely the disappointment of an expectation? . . .

A. The Meaning of Words

(i) DETERMINED BY SUBJECT MATTER

NIX v. HEDDEN

Supreme Court of the United States, 1893.
149 U.S. 304, 13 S.Ct. 881, 37 L.Ed. 745.

MR. JUSTICE GRAY delivered the opinion of the court.

The single question in this case is whether tomatoes, considered as provisions, are to be classed as "vegetables" or as "fruit," within the meaning of the tariff act of 1883.

There being no evidence that the words "fruit" and "vegetables" have acquired any special meaning in trade or commerce, they must receive their ordinary meaning. Of that meaning the court is bound to take judicial notice, as it does in regard to all words in our own tongue; and upon such a question dictionaries are admitted, not as evidence, but only as aids to the memory and understanding of the court. Brown v. Piper, 91 U.S. 37, 42; Jones v. U. S., 137 U.S. 202, 216, 11 S.Ct. 80; Nelson v. Cushing, 2 Cush. 519, 532, 533; Page v. Fawcett, 1 Leon. 242; Tayl.Ev. (8th Ed.) §§ 16, 21.

Botanically speaking, tomatoes are the fruit of a vine, just as are cucumbers, squashes, beans, and peas. But in the common language of the people, whether sellers or consumers of provisions, all these are vegetables which are grown in kitchen gardens, and which, whether eaten cooked or raw, are, like potatoes, carrots, parsnips, turnips, beets, cauliflower, cabbage, celery, and lettuce, usually served at dinner in, with, or after the soup, fish, or meats which constitute the principal part of the repast, and not, like fruits generally, as dessert.

The attempt to class tomatoes as fruit is not unlike a recent attempt to class beans as seeds, of which Mr. Justice Bradley, speaking for this court, said: "We do not see why they should be classified as seeds, any more than walnuts should be so classified. Both are seeds in the language of botany or natural history, but not in commerce nor in common parlance. On the other hand in speaking generally of provisions, beans may well be included under the term 'vegetables.' As an article of food on our tables, whether baked or boiled, or forming the basis of soup, they are used as a vegetable, as well when ripe as when green. This is the principal use to which they are put. Beyond the common knowledge which we have on this subject, very little evidence is necessary, or can be produced." Robertson v. Salomon, 130 U.S. 412, 414, 9 S.Ct. 559.

Judgment affirmed.

KATZMAN v. COMMONWEALTH

Court of Appeals of Kentucky, 1910.

140 Ky. 124, 180 S.W. 990, 30 L.R.A.,N.S., 519, 140 Am.St.Rep. 359.

CARROLL, J. The information filed by the commonwealth against the appellant, who is a druggist, charged that he unlawfully sold at retail, not on a physician's prescription, to Will Frazier a certain quantity of poison, to wit, opium, without satisfying himself that such poison was to be used for legitimate purposes, and with the knowledge that it was intended for smoking purposes or for habitual use. It was returned under section 2630 of the Kentucky Statutes (Russell's St. § 5057), reading in part: "No person shall sell at retail any poisons except as herein provided, without affixing to the bottle, box, vessel or package containing same, a label printed or plainly written, containing the name of the article, the word 'poison' and the name and place of business of the seller, with the common name of two or more readily accessible antidotes; nor shall he deliver poison to any person without satisfying himself that such poison is to be used for legitimate purposes. A poison, in the meaning of this act, shall be any drug, chemical, or preparation which, according to standard works of medicine or materia medica, is liable to be destructive to adult human life, in quantities of sixty grains or less. It shall be the further duty of any one selling or dispensing poisons, which are known to be destructive to adult human life in quantities of five grains or less, before delivering them, to enter in a book kept for that purpose the name of the seller, the name and residence of the buyer, the name of the article, the quantity sold or disposed of, and the purpose for which it is said to be intended. . . . The provisions of this section shall not apply to the dispensing of poisons in not unusual quantities, or doses, on physicians' prescriptions, nor to the sale to agriculturists or horticulturists of such articles as are commonly used by them as insecticides. . . ."

It is agreed that the appellant is a retail druggist; that he sold the opium charged in the information to the purchaser for the purpose of allowing the purchaser to smoke the same; that he knew before making the sale that the purchaser was addicted to the use of opium; that it was not sold on a physician's prescription; that it is a poison, destructive to adult human life in quantities of five grains or less. It is further agreed that there was affixed to the bottle or package containing the opium a printed label, giving the name of the article, the word "poison," and the name and place of the seller, with the common name of two readily accessible antidotes, and that, before delivering the poison, appellant entered in a book kept for that purpose as required by the statute the name of the seller, the name and residence of the buyer, the name of the article, the quantity sold, and the purpose for which it was said to be intended. It will thus be observed that the offending charge against the appellant consisted in selling the drug by retail without a prescription to a person addicted to the use of it; and, this being so, the sale was not made for a legitimate purpose. The law and facts were submitted to the court without the intervention of a jury, and the appellant was found guilty of violating the statute.

A reversal is asked upon the ground that the statute is invalid upon the ground of uncertainty because it does not define with sufficient precision the words "retail" and "legitimate purposes," . . .

On the trial of this case a number of physicians were introduced for the commonwealth for the purpose of showing that the sale of opium for smoking purposes or to an habitual user of the drug was not a sale for legitimate purposes. These physicians graphically described the ruinous effects of opium, physically, mentally, and morally, when used habitually in any manner, and declared in emphatic terms the habit to be the most degrading and destructive that any person can acquire. Their testimony was objected to, but we think that in a prosecution under the statute, if the accused should make the defense that the sale of opium to a person for smoking purposes or who was an habitual user of the drug was legitimate, it would be competent to introduce as witnesses upon this point physicians or druggists to give an opinion whether or not the sale under the described circumstances and conditions was for a legitimate purpose. The statute was intended to regulate sales by druggists, and, when it is sought to apply the words "legitimate purposes" to a sale of drugs or poisons by druggists, they have a technical meaning that may not be clearly known or underslood by courts or jurors, and so it is permissible to allow experts to give evidence as to what is regarded by qualified druggists and physicians legitimate purposes for which sales may be made so that the trial court and jury may be informed as to what is recognized as a legitimate purpose for which these drugs may be sold by those intrusted with their sale, and to whom, in a measure, is confined the knowledge as to what constitutes a sale for legitimate purposes. When words are used in a penal statute that have both a popular and a trade or technical meaning, and as used in the statute they have reference to a trade or profession, these words in construing the statute should be given their meaning as understood by the trade or profession to which they apply. . . .

The question is further suggested that the construction of words and phrases in a statute is usually for the court. Generally this is true. But, if it is shown by evidence that words and phrases are susceptible of two meanings, depending on the state of facts it is attempted to apply them to, the court may instruct the jury in the words of the statute and leave them to find from the evidence whether it has been violated. To illustrate, if there should be difference of opinion on the part of witnesses as to whether or not the sale being inquired into was made for a legitimate purpose, the court should leave it to the jury to find the fact and make their verdict accordingly.

. . . The judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

TOWN OF PLYMOUTH v. HEY

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1934. 285 Mass. 357, 189 N.E. 100.

CROSBY, JUSTICE. This suit is brought under the provisions of G.L. (Ter.Ed.) c. 117, §§ 6-11, to compel the defendant to reimburse the plaintiff for the expense incurred for the support of Gladys M. Hey, an illegitimate daughter of Gladys L. Hey, deceased daughter of the defendant, and to require the defendant to provide for the future support of the child. The case was heard by a judge of the Superior Court who found and ruled that the bill should be dismissed with costs. He found that at the time of her death Gladys L. Hey retained a settlement in Plymouth; that she left no property and her illegitimate child, Gladys M. Hey, is without any means of support; that the defendant has sufficient ability to support the child; and that $5 a week is a reasonable sum for her support.

G.L. c. 117, § 6, as amended by St.1928, c. 155, § 15, provides: "The kindred of such poor persons, in the line or degree of father or grandfather, mother or grandmother, children or grandchildren, by consanguinity, living in the commonwealth, and of sufficient ability, shall be bound to support such poor persons in proportion to their respective ability." This statute is substantially the same as the original statute dealing with this subject, enacted in 1692 and re-enacted in 1788 and 1793, and found in each subsequent revision of the laws, and since at common law an illegitimate child was regarded as the child of no one, the defendant cannot be charged with liability.

It is the contention of the plaintiff that the terms "kindred" and "consanguinity" mean relationship by ties of blood in the direct line from a common ancestor, and that the words according to their natural import and accepted meaning refer to the children, grandchildren, parents and grandparents of paupers irrespective of any question of the legitimacy of the relationship. . . . It was said in Wright v. Wright, 2 Mass. 109, 110: "In legal contemplation, a bastard is generally considered as the relative of no one." In construing Pub.St. c. 125, § 4, as amended by St.1882, c. 132, it was said by Knowlton, J., in Sanford v. Marsh, 180 Mass. 210, 211, 62 N.E. 268: "By the common law a bastard is nullius filius. He can be the heir of no one, nor have heirs, except of his own body. He has no ancestors from whom any inheritable blood can be derived. The common law on this subject is in force in Massachusetts, except as it has been changed by the statutes. The statutes which have been adopted here have all been construed strictly." In Cooley v. Dewey, 4 Pick. 93, 94, 16 Am.Dec. 326, it was said that "there seems to be no maxim of [the common] law less questionable, than that a bastard is filius nullius," it being there held that the mother of an illegitimate child does not inherit his estate. . . .

Although most of the decided cases in this Commonwealth respecting an illegitimate child deal with questions of inheritance, they plainly show that "child" and "children" at common law have been interpreted to mean only a legitimate child or children. It follows by the same reasoning that the term grandchild must be interpreted as meaning legitimate grandchild. . . .

Neither in the original statute enacted in 1692 nor in any subsequent revisions or codifications of it does it appear that illegitimate children are included. Whenever somewhat analogous statutes have been considered by this court, it has without exception been held that the words "child" and "children" refer only to legitimate children. The word "kindred" as used in G.L.(Ter.Ed.) c. 117, § 6, has no application to the present case. The statute which imposes a financial burden upon the persons therein named is to be construed strictly. It appears, as pointed out by the trial judge, that the statutes from 1692 down to the present applicable to the support of bastard children have been grouped under the title "Of the Maintenance of Bastard Children." Rev.St. c. 49, Gen.St. c. 72. In none of these codifications of the law applicable to such persons is there a provision imposing responsibility for their support upon the maternal next of kin. It cannot be thought that the Legislature in re-enacting the statute in substantially the same terms intended any change of meaning. In re Opinion of the Justices, 237 Mass. 591, 594, 130 N.E. 685. The words "by consanguinity" in the statute cannot be construed to include illegitimate children. The words "by consanguinity" are apt to distinguish them from the persons named by affinity.

It results that as no liability for the support of this child is imposed upon the defendant, either by the common law or by statute, G.L. (Ter.Ed.) c. 117, § 6, the bill cannot be maintained. In accordance with the terms of the reservation a decree is to be entered dismissing the bill.

Ordered accordingly.

NOTES

1. Using the same technique as in the principal case, the Superior Court of Pennsylvania in In re Shriver's Estate, 159 Pa.Super. 314, 48 A.2d 52 (1946), held that an illegitimate son of an illegitimate son of the deceased was not "issue" within the meaning of that term in a statute giving the surviving spouse of an intestate dying without issue an allowance.

2. In Henry v. United States, 251 U.S. 393, 40 S.Ct. 185, 64 L.Ed. 322, Holmes, J., interpreted "vested interest" as used in the Spanish War Revenue Act 1898, to include legacies paid by the executor of an estate before the time at which the legatees could have demanded payment as of right and subject to being repaid if the remainder of the estate proved insufficient to pay its debts. He said: "The law uses familiar legal expressions in their familiar legal sense, and the distinction between a contingent interest and a vested interest subject to be divested is familiar to the law."

3. In Bell v. Bell, 1940 Session Cases 229, the decision turned on the meaning of "desertion" in the Divorce (Scotland) Act 1938. Lord Carmont said at p. 264: ". . . The word 'desertion' does not appear in either of the statutory (divorce) enactments before 1938. . . . The word 'desertion' lay at hand encrusted with the case law of the ages. . . . It is to have this wealth of meaning that the new Act has had recourse to the words 'desertion' and 'deserted', and it has adopted, not casually, words which are charged with legal meaning. It is difficult, I think, to imagine that this was not done with a view to attaching the decisions of the past to new legislation."

CITY AFFAIRS COMMITTEE v. BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS

Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey, 1946.
134 N.J.L. 180, 46 A.2d 425.

HEHER, JUSTICE. We hold the view that a municipality may lawfully publicize, at public expense, what its governing body conceives to be sound reasons, relating to the essential local welfare, for the rejection by the people of the State of proposed amendments to the Constitution. . . .

We are . . . brought to a consideration of the question of whether the expenditures so made are fairly comprehended in the appropriation of the then current year for "Railroad Tax Litigation."

We are of opinion that the appropriation here fairly comprehends the expenditures made. Generally, municipal ordinances are construed by the same rules which apply in the interpretation of statutes. Ordinances are to receive a reasonable construction and application. The aim of judicial construction is to discover the sense in which the terms were employed by the legislative body. The words "Railroad Tax Litigation" are to be given their ordinary acceptance and significance. The natural import of the words employed in the enactment, according to their common use, when applied to the subject matter of the act, is ordinarily considered as expressing the intention of the lawmaking body. Bayonne Textile Corp. v. American, etc., Silk Workers, 116 N.J.Eq. 146, 160, 172 A. 551, 92 A.L.R. 1450. We are convinced that, by this construction, the words "Railroad Tax Litigation" are given the sense and meaning intended by the local legislative body. The term "litigation" has a broad significance in common usage. It is defined thus: "Act or process of litigating; a suit at law; a judicial contest; also, figuratively, dispute; discussion." Webster's New International Dictionary, 2d Ed.

At the time of the enactment of the appropriation measure, the controversy respecting railroad taxes, accrued and to accrue, had taken a wide range, which included also the question of the tax formula that would approximate justice between the state and the railroads. There was then pending litigation involving the validity of Chap. 291 of the Laws of 1941, Pamph.L. 788, as amended by Chap. 169 of the Laws of 1942, Pamph.L. 513, N.J.S.A. 54:29A-1 et seq.; and it was the position of the city that the rate of $3. for each $100. of valuation therein fixed contravened the state constitutional mandate, Art. IV, sec. VII, par. 12, N.J.S.A., that property shall be assessed for taxes "under general laws, and by uniform rules, according to its true value," and that the adoption of the tax formula embodied in the suggested revision of that constitutional precept would "destroy the legal basis for the attack then pending" upon these statutes. This issue has since been determined by the Supreme Court. City of Jersey City v. State Board of Tax Appeals, 133 N.J.L. 202, 43 A.2d 799. An appeal from the judgment therein is now pending in this court. We consider that these questions are all so interrelated in subject matter as to be embraced within the general head of "Railroad Tax Litigation." In popular acceptance and meaning, this legend was designed to cover expenditures deemed essential to the proper presentation of the issues and the city's cause, not only in judicial tribunals but in the forum of public opinion. That such was the conception of the purpose of the appropriation in the popular mind is reasonably clear; and thus the policy of the statutory provision for appropriation of funds for public purposes was satisfied. R.S. 40:2-12, 40:2-29, 40:50-6, N.J.S.A. And we are not required to give the term "litigation" its strict literal meaning. It has a figurative, analogical sense in common usage which covers the expenditures under consideration; and we are aware of no reason why it should not have that significance here. We do not think that the local legislative body had in mind the restricted meaning of that term, nor that it was so understood by the public. Such nicety of distinction is not ordinarily to be found either in the expression or the understanding of local legislative enactments.

THE CHANCELLOR, THE CHIEF JUSTICE, JUSTICES DONGES, and PER-SKIE, and JUDGES RAFFERTY, DILL, and MCGEEHAN concurred.

COLIE, JUSTICE (dissenting). . . . The majority opinion holds that the words "railroad tax litigation" are to be given the sense and meaning intended by the local legislative body. With that statement I cannot agree. Our Legislature has provided that "the budget . . . shall be itemized according to the respective objects and purposes for which appropriations are made" One of the purposes sought to be achieved by the budget act was to give publicity to the items of the budget and to afford the public a better understanding of the financial condition and affairs of municipalities in which they are interested. Chamber of Commerce v. Essex County, 96 N.J.L. 238, 114 A. 426; Mackey v. Mayor, etc., of Belvidere, 101 N.J.L. 250, 128 A. 859. It is utterly immaterial what sense and meaning the local body may have had in mind when it used the words "railroad tax litigation". What is of importance is the actual meaning. The majority opinion says, I quote: "The term 'litigation' has a broad significance in common usage. It is defined thus: 'Act or process of litigating; a suit at law; a judicial contest; also, figuratively, dispute; discussion.' Webster's New International Dictionary (2d Ed.)." If this definition is meant to show that the word "litigation" encompasses "dispute" or "discussion", I think that it falls far short of the purpose, since the word is defined only in a figurative sense as including "dispute" or "discussion", and there is no authority that I know of which justifies using words in a municipal budget in a figurative sense. An exhaustive research has failed to disclose a single definition of the word "litigation" so broad so to cover what was done in this case.

The following are typical definitions of "litigation":

"The act or process of litigating, or carrying on a lawsuit in any forum, whether a court of law or otherwise." 13 Am. & Eng. Encyc. of Law, 1st Ed., p. 925.

"A contest in a court of justice, for the purpose of enforcing a right; a judicial contest, a judicial controversy; a suit at law." 38 C.J. 68 quoted in Re Loudenslager's Estate, 113 N.J.Eq. 418, 167 A. 194.

"A contest, authorized by law, in a court of justice, for the purpose of enforcing a right." 2 Bouv. Law Dict., Rawle's 3d Rev., p. 2036, also Shumaker & Longsdorf, Cyclopedic Law Dictionary.

"Services and activities of attorneys at law and others in appearing before the Legislature and the committees thereof, and in otherwise combating a movement to create by constitutional amendment a new county, however commendable it may be in the county authorities to resist the subtraction from their county of territory necessary in the creation of the proposed new county, does not come within the definition of 'litigation,' when that term is given its broadest possible legitimate signification. DeVaughn v. Booten, 146 Ga. 836, 92 S.E. 629:"

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, Volume 25, Litigation, pages 402 to 405.

For the reasons stated above, I vote to reverse the judgment under appeal.

JUSTICES PARKER and OLIPHANT and JUDGE FREUND desire to be recorded as concurring herein.

(ii) DETERMINED BY CONTEXT. HEREIN OF CERTAIN SO-CALLED CANONS

SUWANNEE FRUIT & STEAMSHIP CO. v. FLEMING

United States Emergency Court of Appeals, 1947. 160 F.2d 897.

MARIS, CHIEF JUDGE. Maximum Price Regulation No. 285, imported Fresh Bananas, Sales Except at Retail ¹ established maximum prices of $4.50 per cwt. for bananas from Costa Rica, Panama, Guatemala, Honduras and from the southern Mexican states of Chiapas and Tabasco; $3.25 per cwt. for bananas from other parts of Mexico; and $4.00 per cwt. for bananas from all other countries, which included those from the Dominican Republic. The maximum prices for bananas from the four Central American countries and from Chiapas and Tabasco was increased to $5.50 per cwt. by Amendment No. 2,² decreased to $5.00 per cwt. by Amendment No. 4³ and further decreased to the original figure of $4.50 by Amendment No. 9.⁴ Neither MPR 285 nor Amendments 2, 4 and 9 thereto were approved by the Secretary of Agriculture. . . .

The complainant contends that the regulation and its amendments are invalid because they were promulgated and issued by the Price Administrator without the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture or of the War Food Administrator⁵ as required by Section 3(e) of the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix, § 903(e). Subsection (e) of Section 3 of the Act, commonly referred to as the Bankhead Amendment, as originally enacted and in force during the period here relevant read:

"(e) Notwithstanding any other provision of this or any other law, no action shall be taken under this Act by the Administrator or any

³ 8 F.R. 16626, issued December 8, 1943.

⁴ 9 F.R. 14106, issued November 28, 1944.

other person with respect to any agricultural commodity without the prior approval of the Secretary of Agriculture; except that the Administrator may take such action as may be necessary under section 202 and section 205 [(a) and (b)] to enforce compliance with any regulation, order, price schedule or other requirement with respect to an agricultural commodity which has been previously approved by the Secretary of Agriculture."

The language just quoted would seem to be so clear as to leave no room for construction. If each word in the section is given its ordinary meaning it would follow, as contended by the complainant, that the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture was a condition precedent to the validity of the regulation by which the Price Administrator established maximum prices for bananas since they are unquestionably an agricultural commodity in the normal meaning of those words. The Administrator urges, however, that the words "any agricultural commodity" as used in the Bankhead Amendment should not be given their usual meaning but rather should be read as words of art so limited in scope as to exclude agricultural commodities imported into the United States. If the phrase "any agricultural commodity" does not apply to imports then a regulation which establishes maximum prices for imported bananas would not require the prior approval of the Secretary of Agriculture. It would follow, the Administrator argues, that MPR 285 and its amendments were not invalid by reason of the fact that they were issued by the Price Administrator without the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture. The issue between the complainant and the Administrator on this point is, therefore, reduced to the narrow question as to the meaning which is to be given the phrase "any agricultural commodity" as that phrase is used in Section 3(e) of the Act. We shall accordingly examine the reasons which the Administrator advances for his assertion that the phrase in question is not to be given its plain and ordinary meaning.

The Administrator asserts that when Congress used the phrase "any agricultural commodity" in Section 3 of the Act it meant only those commodities for which the Secretary of Agriculture had power to fix parity or comparable prices. He argues that the Secretary of Agriculture had neither the duty nor the authority to fix parity or comparable prices for any agricultural commodity not grown in the United States and he asserts that it necessarily follows that an imported commodity could never be an "agricultural commodity" within the meaning of the Bankhead Amendment. In support of his suggested construction of the Bankhead Amendment the Administrator primarily relies upon the proposition that the phrase "any agricultural commodity" is used as a term of art in that restricted sense throughout the whole of Section 3 of the Emergency Price Control Act, including subsection (e) thereof. He also claims to find support for his view in the reports of the debates in Congress on the Bankhead Amendment, in his own administrative practice, in an opinion of a federal district court, and in an advisory opinion of the solicitor for the Department of Agriculture.

In advancing his primary contention the Administrator points out that the phrase "any agricultural commodity" is used in four of the subsections of Section 3 and asserts, as we have said, that the phrase is used as a term of art in all of them. He argues that in subsections (a), (b) and (c) the phrase is used in the restricted sense for which he contends and he urges that it is necessary to the proper and unified construction of the section that the phrase be given that restricted meaning in subsection (e) also. Basic to this contention is the Administrator's assertion that Congress intended to give the phrase exactly the same meaning when using it in each of the subsections preceding subsection (e). For, as he thus recognizes, by a term of art is meant one which is used in a particular field with a precise technical meaning. In testing the soundness of the premise upon which the Administrator's contention is based, therefore, it is necessary only to examine the preceding subsections to which he points in order to determine whether the phrase "any agricultural commodity" is used in each of them in exactly the same sense.

Subsections (a), (b) and (c) of Section 3 are as follows:

"(a) No maximum price shall be established or maintained for any agricultural commodity below the highest of any of the following prices, as determined and published by the Secretary of Agriculture: (1) 110 per centum of the parity price for such commodity, adjusted by the Secretary of Agriculture for grade, location, and seasonal differentials, or, in case a comparable price has been determined for such commodity under subsection (b), 110 per centum of such comparable price, adjusted in the same manner, in lieu of 110 per centum of the parity price so adjusted; (2) the market price prevailing for such commodity on October 1, 1941; (3) the market price prevailing for such commodity on December 15, 1941; or (4) the average price for such commodity during the period July 1, 1919, to June 30, 1929.

"(b) For the purposes of this Act, parity prices shall be determined and published by the Secretary of Agriculture as authorized by law. In the case of any agricultural commodity other than the basic crops corn, wheat, rice, tobacco, and peanuts, the Secretary shall determine and publish a comparable price whenever he finds, after investigation and public hearing, that the production and consumption of such commodity has so changed in extent or character since the base period as to result in a price out of line with parity prices for basic commodities.

"(c) No maximum price shall be established or maintained for any commodity processed or manufactured in whole or substantial part from any agricultural commodity below a price which will reflect to producers of such agricultural commodity a price for such agricultural commodity equal to the highest price therefor specified in subsection (a)."

It will be observed that subsections (a) and (c) are similar in that each imposes a specific limitation upon the power of the Administrator to establish maximum prices for "any agricultural commodity", or commodity processed therefrom, as the case may be. Subsection (b) on the other hand is directed to a different object. Its purpose is to impose upon the Secretary of Agriculture the duty to determine and publish parity or comparable prices.

It will be seen that subsections (a) and (c), impose a limitation upon the maximum prices which may be fixed for the agricultural commodities to which the subsections refer. It read literally as applying to all agricultural commodities the subsections would operate to prevent the Administrator from fixing any maximum prices for agricultural commodities (or commodities processed therefrom) for which parity or comparable prices have not previously been determined by the Secretary of Agriculture. For it is obvious that the limiting figure which the subsections impose upon the Administrator's action with respect to an agricultural commodity could not be ascertained and applied in the absence of its principal element, the parity or comparable price of the commodity. It seems clear, therefore, that the phrase "any agricultural commodity" as used in these two subsections must be limited by the context to refer to those agricultural commodities only for which parity or comparable prices have actually been determined and published and that the restriction which these subsections impose upon the Administrator's power to control the prices of agricultural commodities must be construed as limited to those particular agricultural commodities. We took this view in California Lima Bean Growers Ass'n v. Bowles, 1945, Em.App., 150 F.2d 964, and we still adhere to it.

We think that Congress recognized this limitation upon the meaning of the phrase "any agricultural commodity" in subsections (a) and (c) when in the First Supplemental National Defense Appropriation Act approved July 25, 1942, it attached to the appropriation made to the Office of Price Administration the proviso

"That no part of this appropriation shall be used to enforce any maximum price or prices on any agricultural commodity or any commodity processed or manufactured in whole or substantial part from any agricultural commodity unless and until (1) the Secretary of Agriculture has determined and published for such agricultural commodity the prices specified in section 3(a) of the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942; (2) in case of a comparable price for such agricultural commodity, the Secretary of Agriculture has held public hearings and determined and published such comparable price in the manner prescribed by section 3(b) of said Act; and (3) the Secretary of Agriculture has determined after investigation and proclaimed that the maximum price or prices so established on any such agricultural commodity will reflect to the producer of such agricultural commodity a price in conformity with section 3(c) of said Act: Provided further, That in the case of a maximum price or maximum prices heretofore established the provisions of the foregoing proviso shall not apply until the expiration of sixty days after the date of enactment of this Act." ⁶

This whole proviso is evidently based upon the premise that the Administrator could lawfully fix maximum prices for agricultural commodities (or commodities processed therefrom) without regard to the limitations of subsections (a) and (c), in the case of those agricultural commodities for which parity or comparable prices had not actually been determined.

When we turn to subsection (b) of Section 3, however, it is obvious that the phrase "any agricultural commodity" is used with a quite different and much broader meaning. In this subsection it clearly comprehends agricultural commodities for which parity or comparable prices have not been determined or published by the Secretary of Agriculture, since its principal purpose is to direct him to make such determinations and publications in appropriate cases.

It will thus be seen that the phrase "any agricultural commodity" is used in one very restricted sense in subsections (a) and (c) and in another and much broader sense in subsection (b). In each case the normal and inclusive meaning of the phrase is limited by the particular context in which it is used. We are thus compelled to the conclusion that Congress did not use the phrase "any agricultural commodity" as a phrase of art with a uniform meaning in all the various subsections of Section 3, but that on the contrary it was used in each subsection in its ordinary meaning limited only by the particular context. In subsection (e), however, the context imposes no limitation upon the normal meaning of the phrase. On the contrary, as we shall later see, there are valid reasons for thinking that Congress may well have intended the phrase as used in subsection (e) to have its broadest possible meaning. We, therefore, reject the Administrator's contention that the phrase "any agricultural commodity" was used in Section 3 as a phrase of art and that it must for that reason be given a limited meaning in subsection (e). . . .

Judgments will be entered declaring Maximum Price Regulation No. 285 and Amendments 2, 4 and 9 thereto invalid ab initio.

LENROOT v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, 1944. 141 F.2d 400.

L. HAND, CIRCUIT JUDGE. The defendant appeals from an injunction, forbidding it to violate § 212(a) of Title 29 U.S.C.A., by using messengers under sixteen, or motorcar drivers between sixteen and eighteen in transmitting telegrams. Both parties agree that the employment in question is within the meaning of "oppressive child labor" in § 203(l) of Title 29 U.S.C.A., and as defined by § 422.2 of Chapter 4, Title 29 of the Code of Federal Regulations; but the defendant maintains that the act does not apply to its business. The case was tried upon stipulated facts, most of which it is not necessary to state, as the general nature of the defendant's business is so well understood. All that we need say is that over eleven per cent of the telegraph messengers employed by the defendant are under sixteen years of age, and that a small percentage of its motorcar drivers are between sixteen and eighteen. Both sides moved for summary judgment, since the outcome depended altogether upon the meaning of the statute; and the judge, believing defendant to be within it, granted judgment for the plaintiff. We do not understand that the defendant disputes that it is engaged in interstate commerce; at any rate there can be no doubt that it is. . . .

Thus, Congress could unquestionably have forbidden the employment of the messengers and drivers here in question, if it had wished. That does not, however, answer the question whether § 212(a) covers the business; and it does not do so, unless the defendant is a "producer" of "goods" which it "ships" in interstate commerce. While it is of course true that, taken in their colloquial sense, these words do not apply to its activities, they should not be so taken, for the statute has made its own definitions in § 203. Subdivision (i) of that section reads as follows: "'Goods' means goods . . . wares, products, commodities, merchandise, or articles or subjects of commerce of any character." (Originally the words, "or subjects," were absent; they were added in the Senate Committee on Education and Labor.) Subdivision (j) reads: "'Produced' means produced, manufactured, mined, handled, or in any other manner worked on."

In order to learn whether the defendant's business falls within the section so defined, we must consider exactly what steps sending a telegram comprises. Ordinarily, it is true, the sender thinks of the telegram as the actual transmission of his words to the addressee; and so he speaks of "sending" it and of its being "delivered," as though the same thing had left him, passed to the addressee's home or office and was there handed to him. Indeed, the defendant itself uses that very argument in order to bring itself within the exception in § 215(a) (1) which exempts common carriers from the act as to any goods not produced by them. It does no more, it says, than transport to the addressee intangible objects—the sender's words transformed into electric impulses; it "produces" no "goods," even though we read those words with their definitions. We might indeed agree, if the defendant did no more than carry written messages between the parties; conceivably the same might even be true, if it only provided means—like a telephone—by which the parties could communicate, though these consisted of pulsations of an electric current. But neither of these is what the defendant does. The sender either writes out his message on paper and delivers it to one of the defendant's messengers, or delivers it himself at one of the defendant's offices; or he dictates or telephones it to an employee at an office, who takes it down on paper in shorthand, or types it. The message so received never leaves that office; the addressee never sees it. Another employee—or perhaps the same one—either uses it as a text for pressing a key in suitable dots and dashes, having a conventional significance to him and to another employee at the opposite end of a wire; or as a text for manipulating some other suitable device—like a "teletype"—by which equivalent movements will appear upon a similar device at the end of a wire.

In either case nothing can be said to be "sent" between the office except pulsations of electrical current, which are not only not the sender's message, but would be totally incomprehensible to him or to the addressee, if either could perceive them. When these have been transmitted, they are either translated, if they are in code, or transcribed, if they are not; and the message so resulting is delivered either by messenger or by telephone to the addressee. From the foregoing it is at once apparent that there is not the least similarity between what the defendant does and the transportation of goods by a common carrier. It is also apparent that the defendant's activities are within the definition of "produced" in subdivision (j) of § 203; for, not only does it "handle" the sender's message, but it "works on" it, first, by changing it into something wholly different, and then by changing it back to a form like the original.

The only remaining question is whether the defendant "ships" any "goods." First, are there any "goods" concerned? To prove that there are the plaintiff relies upon the phrase, "subjects of commerce of any character" in subdivision (i); to which the defendant answers that we must judge that phrase by its context, which necessarily limits its meaning to "tangible" objects. It is here that the Senate amendment becomes important. Until that was made the subdivision had read: "wares, products, commodities, merchandise or articles of commerce of any character." So far as we can see, no more complete enumeration could have been made of every kind of "tangible"; so that, when the Senate expanded the phrase to include, not only "articles" of commerce, but "subjects" of commerce, the opposition would have meant nothing, if it had not included "intangibles." Moreover, not only had all kinds of "tangibles" been already included, but "subjects of commerce" was not a good description of "tangibles." Its introduction into a phrase which had been sufficient to include all kinds of "tangibles," cannot be set down to tautology, or slovenly draughting; it demands that some additional significance be added. We need not with the plaintiff resort to opinions such as those of Johnson, J., in Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 229, 230, 6 L.Ed. 23, in which the transmission of "intelligence" is spoken of as a "subject" of commerce. It is enough that we have unmistakable evidence of a purpose to extend the definition of subdivision (i) to everything which had been considered a "subject [s] of commerce": that is, to whatever Congress could regulate as such a subject. Last, we have to say whether, assuming that a message received for transmission is "goods," and that the defendant "produces" it, it also "ships" the message, when it sends the pulsations over the telegraph wires. Although that is indeed an inappropriate word to apply to "intangibles," its unfitness for the most part disappears, once we treat messages as "goods." Certainly we should stultify ourselves, having gone so far, if we were to refuse to understand it as covering what is here involved.

So much for textual analysis. The defendant also argues that, aside from any verbal correspondence which can be spelled out between the section and its business, § 212(a) as a whole and particularly the contrast between it and §§ 206 and 207, show that Congress did not mean to forbid the use of child labor when an employer was merely engaged in interstate commerce, but only in case he was engaged in shipping goods in commerce; in other words, that § 212(a) covers only those who are not engaged in interstate commerce. No reason is suggested for such a capricious limitation upon a purpose which was apparently pervasive; and the curious result would be that Congress singled out the more vulnerable of its powers for exercise, for in 1938, Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U.S. 251, 38 S.Ct. 529, 62 L.Ed. 1101, 3 A.L.R. 649, Ann.Cas.1918E, 724, had not yet been overruled. If it is right we must suppose that Congress meant to control the passage across state lines of goods made in a state under conditions which it disapproved—a power which at that time was still in doubt—but did not mean to regulate the conduct of interstate commerce in goods—a power which it had always incontestibly had. Moreover, there is no basis for the argument in the statute itself, for the contrast between the language of § 212(a) and of §§ 206 and 207 does not justify the inference made from it. The act was a compromise of two quite separate designs: that of the House, which was to regulate child labor by national standards; that of the Senate, which was to prevent one state from breaking down the standards of another by unregulated competition. The House won, and it would leave its plan in large part unrealized to omit child labor in interstate commerce—to say nothing of the fact that such commerce, and the shipment in commerce of goods made by child labor, are not inevitably mutually exclusive. Fleming v. A. B. Kirschbaum Co., 3 Cir., 124 F.2d 567, 571, 572, note 5, affirmed 316 U.S. 517, 62 S.Ct. 1116, 86 L.Ed. 1195.

The difference in language can be otherwise accounted for. The original scheme of the House was to give to the Secretary of Labor power to declare what industries "affected" interstate commerce. That was to be a condition upon both the child labor provisions, and wages and hours regulation. It had nothing to do with interstate commerce which was to be regulated anyway, without any action by the Secretary. The House plan was amended, however, changing the definition in §§ 206 and 207 to the phrase, "production of goods for commerce," which the courts were to construe without any aid from the Secretary. Section 212—then § 10—as originally proposed, contained two subdivisions: subdivision (a) being the same as it now is, and subdivision (b) containing the phrase, "engaged in commerce in any industry affecting commerce." That was the form also of §§ 206 and 207 during the period while the Secretary was to declare what industries did "affect commerce." Subdivision (b) was deleted, because, as the Conference Report declared, the power given to the Secretary in section 6 of the House amendment had been taken away in Conference. That was perhaps a good reason for not retaining the phrase, "in any industry affecting commerce"; but it must be admitted that it is not clear why subdivision (a) was not amended to conform to §§ 206 and 207. Nevertheless, that gives us no ground for inferring that subdivision (a) was supposed to be more limited than §§ 206 and 207 in their amended form; verbally, as we have seen, it covers the situation at bar, and the reason given for deleting subdivision (b) suffices to show that Congress had no such purpose as the defendant imputes to it.

The defendant's arguments based upon the well-known canons of statutory interpretations we have not disregarded; but it is not necessary to say more than that, whatever their weight, they do not in our judgment overbear the construction we have adopted.

Judgment affirmed.

VLASAK v. VLASAK

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1939. 204 Minn. 331, 283 N.W. 489.

STONE, JUSTICE. In this action by daughter against father, the former had judgment for damages resulting from personal injuries, sustained, so the jury found, because of defendant's negligence. For defendant it is urged that plaintiff, at the time of the accident, was an unemancipated minor, and in consequence without right to sue her father for his personal tort. So far as the question of emancipation depends upon facts, we have no present concern with it.

At the time of the accident, December 31, 1936, plaintiff was 20 years and 4 days of age. Under the then law, she was not a minor.

At common law, children of both sexes under 21 years were infants or minors. Anderson v. Peterson, 36 Minn. 547, 32 N.W. 861, 1 Am. St.Rep. 698. That was changed for Minnesota by G.S.1866, c. 59, § 2, declaring that: "Males of the age of twenty-one years and females of the age of eighteen years shall be considered of full age for all purposes; before those ages they shall be considered minors."

So our law remained until the revision of 1905. In the probate code, as thereby revised, Rev.Laws, 1905, § 3636, we find this: "Definitions—The word 'representative,' when used in these laws with reference to probate courts and proceedings therein, shall be construed as including executors, administrators, special administrators, administrators with the will annexed, administrators de bonis non, and guardians. The word 'minor' means a male under the age of twenty-one years, or a female under the age of eighteen years."

Whatever it meant, that was the law at the time of plaintiff's injury, Mason's Minn.St.1927, § 8706, and so determinative of her then status. By Laws 1937, c. 435, § 24, Mason's Minn.St.1938 Supp. § 8892-185, the word "minor" is declared to mean "a person under the age of twenty-one years." Thereby was removed the former discrimination against masculine youth. Both sexes now attain majority at 21 years.

The argument for defendant is untenable that the definition of "minor" above quoted from Rev.Laws 1905, was restricted by the contextual "reference to probate courts and proceedings therein." It had long been our law that females attain majority at 18. There is nothing in the revision of 1905 to indicate intention to modify the law in that respect.

The conclusion just stated is the only one permissible from the phrasing of the 1905 revision, considered against its background of the long existing statutory rule. It is enforced by another consideration. If there is need for construction, which we doubt, it should not result in absurdity. For plaintiff it is well argued, that if defendant's argument were to prevail, women between the ages of 18 and 21, from the effective date of the 1905 revision to that of Laws of 1937, c. 435, April 26, 1937, would have been in this dilemma; if 21 were the age of majority for both sexes, except for probate purposes, young women at that stage of life could not have given valid deeds of real estate. Nor could they have conducted other business affairs, even if their estates so required. But, on the other hand, they could not have had guardians appointed by the probate court, because, for probate purposes only, being over 18, they were not minors. Counsel for plaintiff are right in concluding that neither the revision commission of 1905 nor any legislature could have intended to mar our law with such a blemish of unworkable anomaly.

In consequence, our holding is that before April 26, 1937, the effective date of Laws 1937, c. 435, women attained their majority for all purposes at the age of 18. That requires that the judgment be, and it is affirmed.

(1) NOSCITUR A SOCIIS

CARSON & CO. v. SHELTON.

Court of Appeals of Kentucky, 1908.

128 Ky. 248, 107 S.W. 793, 15 L.R.A.,N.S., 509.

HOBSON, J. Walton, Wilson, Rhodes & Co. were the general contractors for the building of the Madisonville, Hartford & Eastern Railroad. G. A. Shelton was a subcontractor under them. Shelton boarded his hands, and bought from Carson & Co. the supplies necessary for this purpose and for the feeding of his teams, as well as for his household. He failed to pay Carson & Co. the grocery bill, and they filed a claim in the county clerk's office, asserting a lien upon the railroad for the balance due them. They brought this suit to enforce their lien. The circuit court sustained a demurrer to their petition, and they declining to plead further, dismissed it. From this judgment, they appeal.

The rights of the parties are governed by section 2492, Ky.St. 1903, which is as follows: "All persons who perform or furnish labor, material, supplies or teams, for the construction or improvement of any canal, railroad, turnpike or other public improvement in this commonwealth, by contract expressed or implied, with the owner or owners thereof, or by subcontract thereunder, shall have a lien thereon, and upon all the property and franchise of the owner or the owners thereof, for the full contract price of such labor, material, supplies and teams so furnished or performed, which said lien shall be prior and superior to all other liens thereafter created thereon." It will be observed that the statute gives a lien to all persons who furnish labor, material, supplies, or teams for the construction of any railroad by contract, expressed or implied, with the owner, or by subcontract thereunder. The things for which the statute gives a lien are labor, material, supplies, or teams for the construction of the railroad. The material referred to is that which enters into the construction of the railroad. The labor and teams are those used in the construction of the railroad. The word "supplies" must receive a similar construction and must include such things as are used in the construction of the railroad. To construe it to refer to all supplies furnished to any subcontractor for his personal use, or for the personal use of his hands, would be to entirely disregard the rule that, in construing statutes, a word is always construed in connection with the words with which it is associated, and, where several things are referred to, they are presumed to be of the same class, when connected by a copulative conjunction, unless a contrary intent appears. The word "supplies" would include powder or dynamite used in the construction of the railroad, or fuses to set off the powder, shovels and carts with which the work was done, and like. But the food that was furnished Shelton was not used in the construction of the railroad. The fact that Shelton, who was a sub-contractor, also boarded his hands, is not material. If another person had run the boarding house, there would be as much ground for adjudging the supplies furnished for the hands a lien on the railroads as there is now. The plaintiff sold his groceries to Shelton. Shelton used the groceries in running his boarding house and in feeding his household, and, if there was a lien on the road for such things as these, there would be no limit to the things that would be included by the statute, and a railroad company would never be safe in settling with the contractor. In Flightower v. Bailey, 108 Ky. 208, 56 S.W. 149, 49 L.R.A. 255, 94 Am.St.Rep. 350, when we had before us a similar statute, we said: "We cannot extend the statute beyond its plain language and evident meaning. The hardships to owners are apt to be considerable, even under the terms of the statute. If the right to the lien be extended beyond its terms, then it can be extended indefinitely, and there would be no safety in contracting for the erection of a building."

Judgment affirmed.

RUSSELL MOTOR CAR CO. v. UNITED STATES.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1923.
261 U.S. 514, 43 S.Ct. 428, 67 L.Ed. 778.

MR. JUSTICE SUTHERLAND delivered the opinion of the Court.

These cases, here on appeal from the Court of Claims, differ in details of fact, but are controlled by the same principles of law, and depend alike upon the construction and application of the same statutory provisions.

The salient facts in the case of the Motor Car Company are as follows: That company, on May 14, 1918, entered into a contract, numbered 1498, with the United States, acting through the Secretary of the Navy, to make 250 anti-air craft gun mounts, at an agreed price of $7,860 each to be delivered at stipulated periods; the last being the 60 days ending April 30, 1919.

Prior to the making of the foregoing contract, viz. in November, 1917, a similar contract, numbered 949, had been entered into by the same parties; the last period for delivery being the 60 days ending January 15, 1919. The actual work under contract 949 was begun about March, 1918, and some time later, and after the making of contract 1498, at the request of the company, the Secretary consented to allow all shipments of mounts to be applied upon contract 949 until its completion. Deliveries under that contract were finished in June, 1919.

On November 18, 1918, the Navy Department expressed a desire that the manufacture of gun mounts under both contracts be greatly decreased and that the company resume production of peace-time products as soon as possible, "so that the minimum of economic disturbance will be felt during the transition." In its communication the Navy Department requested that immediate arrangements be made for the reduction and eventual stoppage of production of materials under these contracts and the substitution therefor of commercial products, and that the company "initiate preparations for the cancellation along the lines indicated." On November 23, 1918, the company was notified that the Secretary had authorized the cancellation of contract 1498, directed to cease work in connection therewith not later than December 2, 1918, and informed that a just and fair settlement would be made as provided by contract and in accordance with the statute covering such cases. Extended negotiations followed, in an effort to bring about a settlement, and the Secretary finally fixed the sum of $444,847.68 as just compensation for the cancellation of the contract. Seventy-five per cent. of this amount was paid and accepted by the company, expressly without prejudice to its rights.

The Court of Claims, after hearing the case, found that just compensation for the cancellation of the contract was the sum of $495,-250.34, which amount included a number of elements and items not necessary to be set forth. The court further found that, if the company had been permitted to complete the contract according to its terms, it could and would have earned a profit, in round figures, of $960,000, but held that the action of the Secretary of the Navy in canceling the contract was within the authority conferred by the statute, presently to be mentioned, and that the company consequently was not entitled to an award including anticipated profits.

The statute upon which this determination rested was the Act of June 15, 1917 (40 Stat. p. 182, c. 29), making deficiency appropriations for the military and naval establishment on account of war expenses, and for other purposes. This act contained a provision authorizing and empowering the President, within the limits of the amounts appropriated:

" . . . (b) To modify, suspend, cancel, or requisition any existing or future contract for the building, production, or purchase of ships or material." Comp.St.1918, Comp.St.Ann.Supp.1919, § 3115½d.

The President was authorized to exercise the authority conferred upon him by the act and expend the money therein and thereafter appropriated "through such agency or agencies as he shall determine from time to time." The authority so far as it concerned the Navy, was by him delegated to the Secretary of the Navy in an order dated August 21, 1917,

"in so far as applicable to and in furtherance of the construction of vessels for the use of the Navy and of contracts for the construction of such vessels, and the completion thereof, and all powers and authority applicable to and in furtherance of the production, purchase and requisitioning of materials for construction of vessels for the Navy and for war materials, equipment, and munitions required for the use of the Navy, and the more economical and expeditious delivery thereof."

The word "material," the act provided, should include stores, supplies and equipment for ships and everything required for or in connection with the production thereof, and in our opinion included the articles contracted for in this as well as in the other two cases. The act provided that whenever the United States should cancel, modify, suspend, or requisition any contract just compensation should be made therefor to be determined by the President. If the amount so determined should be unsatisfactory, the person entitled to receive it could accept 75 per cent. thereof and bring suit to recover such further sum as added to the 75 per cent. would make just compensation. By the terms of the act the authority granted to the President or delegated by him was to "cease six months after the final treaty of peace is proclaimed between this government and the German Empire."

The Motor Car Company contends that subdivision (b) of the statute above quoted applies to private contracts alone and affords no authority for the cancellation by the government of its own contracts. The Court of Claims held otherwise and whether its holding or the company's contention is correct presents the principal question for our consideration.

It must be apparent, we think, that the words of the provision, "any existing or future contract," read with literal exactness, include all contracts, whether private or governmental. But it is pointed out that the power to "requisition" cannot apply to a governmental contract; and this may be conceded, since the government cannot requisition what it already has. Then it is said that inasmuch as the application of the word "requisition" must be confined to private contracts, the other words associated with it must be likewise restricted by virtue of the maxim "noscitur a sociis." That a word may be known by the company it keeps is, however, not an invariable rule, for the word may have a character of its own not to be submerged by its association. Rules of statutory construction are to be invoked as aids to the ascertainment of the meaning or application of words otherwise obscure or doubtful. They have no place, as this court has many times held, except in the domain of ambiguity. Hamilton v. Rathbone, 175 U.S. 414, 421, 20 S.Ct. 155, 44 L.Ed. 219; United States v. Barnes, 222 U.S. 513, 518-519, 32 S.Ct. 117, 56 L.Ed. 291. They may not be used to create but only to remove doubt. Id. Moreover, in cases of ambiguity the rule here relied upon is not exclusive. The problem may be submitted to all appropriate and reasonable tests, of which "noscitur a sociis" is one. Here we have one word which it may be conceded applies only to private contracts, but the other three words, standing alone, it likewise must be conceded, naturally apply to governmental contracts as well. Indeed they more naturally apply to such contracts. The power to modify the obligations of a private contract is, to say the least, a most unusual one for governmental exercise. To modify a contract is in effect to make a new one, and it puts something of a strain on our conception of the functions of government to concede its power to make contracts between private parties, to which neither may assent, and which consequently, neither will be bound to perform.

We do not mean to deny the power of Congress, in time of war, to authorize the President to modify private contracts (leaving the parties free, as between themselves, to accept or not), nor do we suggest that Congress has not done so by the present statute; but the contention here is, not that the power in question extends to private contracts, but that it is limited to them. This cannot be conceded. The meaning of four predicate words is not doubtful; in that respect, as well as in their operative scope, they obviously differ from one another. The question we are called upon to answer is whether, because the words "any . . . contract" must be given a narrower meaning when qualified by the predicate "requisition," their meaning must be limited in like manner when qualified by one of the other three predicates. "Noscitur a sociis" is a well-established and useful rule of construction, where words are of obscure or doubtful meaning, and then, but only then, its aid may be sought to remove the obscurity or doubt by reference to the associated words. Virginia v. Tennessee, 148 U.S. 503, 519, 13 S.Ct. 728, 37 L.Ed. 537; Benson v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 75 Minn. 163, 77 N.W. 798, 74 Am.St.Rep. 444. But here the meaning of the words considered severally is not in doubt, and the rule is invoked not to remove an obscurity, but to import one. There is nothing in the rule or in the statute which requires us to assimilate the words "modify" "cancel" to the scope of the word "requisition," simply because the latter has a necessarily narrower application. The meaning of the several words, standing apart, being perfectly plain, what should be done is to apply them distributively, diverso intuitu, giving to each its natural value and appropriate scope when read in connection with the object (any contract) which they are severally meant to control. Thus, the predicate "requisition" will be limited to private contracts, while the other words may be appropriately extended to include governmental contracts as well. An illustration is afforded by the commerce clause of the Constitution. The power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce is found in the same clause and conferred by the same words, but the scope of the power when applied to the former may be narrower than when applied to the latter. Groves v. Slaughter, 15 Pet. 449, 505, 10 L.Ed. 800.

This disposition of the question also accords with the broad purposes of the legislation. When the act was passed we were in the midst of a great war, which called for the utilization of all our resources. The necessities were great, beyond the power of statement. The government was confronted with the vital necessity, not only of producing ships and supplies in unprecedented quantities, but of producing them with the utmost haste. Hence it was necessary that everything which stood in the way of or hindered such production should be put aside. But this was a necessity which Congress, of course, realized must sooner or later come to an end, suddenly and completely. With the termination of the war the continued production of war supplies would become, not only unnecessary, but wasteful. Not to provide, therefore, for the cessation of this production, when the need for it had passed, would have been a distinct neglect of the public interest. The situation, it is plain, required that production should proceed while the war lasted to the utmost limit of the nation's power, but that it should come to an end as soon as possible upon the passing of the emergency. In the light of these circumstances, it is not unreasonable to regard the statute now under consideration as intended to accomplish both results, that is: (1) To enable the President, during the emergency, to utilize his powers over contracts to stimulate production to the utmost; and then, (2) upon the passing of the emergency, to enable him to utilize these same powers to stop that production as quickly as possible. To the latter accomplishment authority to modify and cancel government war contracts would contribute most effectively. These considerations lend support to the judgment of the court below construing the statute as having this effect.

In this connection it is not without significance that the authority granted to the President was to cease six months after the final treaty of peace. Obviously, the powers granted to him—among them to modify and cancel contracts—were to continue during the six months' period, not for the purpose of forwarding war production, but, on the contrary, for the purpose of stopping it. To that end, we conclude, he was authorized to cancel the government's own contracts, such as the one here involved, upon making just compensation to the parties concerned.

The judgments of the Court of Claims are severally
Affirmed.

(2) EJUSDEM GENERIS

CLEVELAND v. UNITED STATES

Supreme Court of the United States, 1946.

329 U.S. 14, 67 S.Ct. 13, 91 L.Ed. 1.

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS delivered the opinion of the Court.

Petitioners are members of a Mormon sect, known as Fundamentalists. They not only believe in polygamy; unlike other Mormons,¹ they practice it. Each of petitioners, except Stubbs, has, in addition to his lawful wife, one or more plural wives. Each transported at least one plural wife across state lines² either for the purpose of cohabiting with her, or for the purpose of aiding another member of the cult in such a project. They were convicted of violating the Mann Act, 36 Stat. 825, 18 U.S.C. § 398, 18 U.S.C.A. § 398, on a trial to the court, a jury having been waived. D.C. 56 F.Supp. 890. The judgments of conviction were affirmed on appeal. 10 Cir., 146 F.2d 730. The cases are here on petitions for certiorari which we granted in view of the asserted conflict between the decision below and Mortensen v. United States, 322 U.S. 369, 64 S.Ct. 1037, 88 L.Ed. 1331.

The Act makes an offense the transportation in interstate commerce of "any woman or girl for the purpose of prostitution or debauchery, or for any other immoral purpose". The decision turns on the meaning of the latter phrase, "for any other immoral purpose".

¹The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints has forbidden plural marriages since 1890. See Toncray v. Budge, 14 Idaho 621, 654, 655, 95 P. 26.

²Petitioners' activities extended into Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, Utah and Wyoming.

United States v. Bitty, 208 U.S. 393, 28 S.Ct. 396, 52 L.Ed. 543, involved a prosecution under a federal statute making it a crime to import an alien woman "for the purpose of prostitution, or for any other immoral purpose." 34 Stat. 898, 899, § 3. The act was construed to cover a case where a man imported an alien woman so that she should live with him as his concubine. Two years later the Mann Act was passed. Because of the similarity of the language used in the two acts the Bitty case became a forceful precedent for the construction of the Mann Act. Thus one who transported a woman in interstate commerce so that she should become his mistress or concubine was held to have transported her for an "immoral purpose" within the meaning of the Mann Act. Caminetti v. United States, 242 U.S. 470, 37 S.Ct. 192, 61 L.Ed. 442, L.R.A.1917F, 502, Ann.Cas.1917B, 1168.

It is argued that the Caminetti decision gave too wide a sweep to the Act; that the Act was designed to cover only the white slave business and related vices; that it was not designed to cover voluntary actions bereft of sex commercialism; and that in any event it should not be construed to embrace polygamy which is a form of marriage and, unlike prostitution or debauchery or the concubinage involved in the Caminetti case, has as its object parenthood and the creation and maintenance of family life. In support of that interpretation an exhaustive legislative history is submitted which, it is said, gives no indication that the Act was aimed at polygamous practices.

While Mortensen v. United States, supra, 322 U.S. at page 377, 64 S.Ct. at page 1041, 88 L.Ed. 1331, rightly indicated that the Act was aimed "primarily" at the use of interstate commerce for the conduct of the white slave business we find no indication that a profit motive is a sine qua non to its application. Prostitution, to be sure, normally suggests sexual relations for hire.³ But debauchery has no such implied limitation. In common understanding the indulgence which the term suggests may be motivated solely by lust.⁴ And so we start with words which by their natural import embrace more than commercialized sex. What follows is "any other immoral purpose". Under the eiusdem generis rule of construction the general words are confined to the class and may not be used to enlarge it. But we could not give the words a faithful interpretation if we confined them more narrowly than the class of which they are a part.

That was the view taken by the Court in the Bitty and Caminetti cases. We do not stop to re-examine the Caminetti case to determine whether the Act was properly applied to the facts there presented.

⁴ "Vicious indulgence in sensual pleasures." 3 Oxford English Dictionary 79; "Excessive indulgence in sensual pleasures of any kind; gluttony; intemperance; sexual immorality; unlawful indulgence of lust." 3 Century Dict.Rev.Ed. 1477.

But we adhere to its holding which has been in force for almost 30 years, that the Act, while primarily aimed at the use of interstate commerce for the purposes of commercialized sex, is not restricted to that end.

We conclude, moreover, that polygamous practices are not excluded from the Act. They have long been outlawed in our society. As stated in Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145, 164, 25 L.Ed. 244: "Polygamy has always been odious among the northern and western nations of Europe, and, until the establishment of the Mormon Church, was almost exclusively a feature of the life of Asiatic and of African people. At common law, the second marriage was always void (2 Kent, Com. 79), and from the earliest history of England polygamy has been treated as an offense against society."

As subsequently stated in Mormon Church v. United States, 136 U.S. 1, 49, 10 S.Ct. 792, 805, 34 L.Ed. 481, "The organization of a community for the spread and practice of polygamy is, in a measure, a return to barbarism. It is contrary to the spirit of Christianity and of the civilization which Christianity has produced in the western world." And see Davis v. Beason, 133 U.S. 333, 10 S.Ct. 299, 33 L.Ed. 637. Polygamy is a practice with far more pervasive influences in society than the casual, isolated transgressions involved in the Caminetti case. The establishment or maintenance of polygamous households is a notorious example of promiscuity. The permanent advertisement of their existence is an example of the sharp repercussions which they have in the community. We could conclude that Congress excluded these practices from the Act only if it were clear that the Act is confined to commercialized sexual vice. Since we cannot say it is, we see no way by which the present transgressions can be excluded. These polygamous practices have long been branded as immoral in the law. Though they have different ramifications, they are in the same genus as the other immoral practices covered by the Act. . . .

Affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE MURPHY, dissenting.

Mr. Justice Black and Mr. Justice Jackson think the cases should be reversed. . . .

[Mr. Justice Rutledge concurred with the majority.]

Today another unfortunate chapter is added to the troubled history of the White Slave Traffic Act. It is a chapter written in terms that misapply the statutory language and that disregard the intention of the legislative framers. It results in the imprisonment of individuals whose actions have none of the earmarks of white slavery, whatever else may be said of their conduct. I am accordingly forced to dissent.

The statute in so many words refers to transportation of women and girls across state lines "for the purpose of prostitution or debauchery, or for any other immoral purpose." The issue here is whether the act of taking polygamous or plural wives across state lines or taking girls across state borders for the purpose of entering into plural marriage, constitutes transportation "for any other immoral purpose" so as to come within the interdict of the statute.

The Court holds, and I agree that under the ejusdem generis rule of statutory construction the phrase "any other immoral purpose" must be confined to the same class of unlawful sexual immoralities as that to which prostitution and debauchery belong. But I disagree with the conclusion that polygamy is "in the same genus" as prostitution and debauchery and hence within the phrase "any other immoral purpose" simply because it has sexual connotations and has "long been branded as immoral in the law" of this nation. Such reasoning ignores reality and results in an unfair application of the statutory words.

It is not my purpose to defend the practice of polygamy or to claim that it is morally the equivalent of monogamy. But it is essential to understand what it is as well as what it is not. Only in that way can we intelligently decide whether it falls within the same genus as prostitution or debauchery.

There are four fundamental forms of marriage: (1) monogamy; (2) polygamy, or one man with several wives; (3) polyandry, or one woman with several husbands; and (4) group marriage. The term "polygamy" covers both polygyny and polyandry. Thus we are dealing here with polygyny, one of the basic forms of marriage. Historically, its use has far exceeded that of any other form. It was quite common among ancient civilizations and was referred to many times by the writers of the Old Testament; even today it is to be found frequently among certain pagan and non-Christian peoples of the world. We must recognize, then, that polygyny, like other forms of marriage, is basically a cultural institution rooted deeply in the religious beliefs and social mores of those societies in which it appears. It is equally true that the beliefs and mores of the dominant culture of the contemporary world condemn the practice as immoral and substitute monogamy in its place. To those beliefs and mores I subscribe, but that does not alter the fact that polygyny is a form of marriage built upon a set of social and moral principles. It must be recognized and treated as such.

The Court states that polygamy is "a notorious example of promiscuity." The important fact, however, is that, despite the differences that may exist between polygamy and monogamy, such differences do not place polygamy in the same category as prostitution or debauchery. When we use those terms we are speaking of acts of an entirely different nature, having no relation whatever to the various forms of marriage. It takes no elaboration here to point out that marriage, even when it occurs in a form of which we disapprove, is not to be compared with prostitution or debauchery or other immoralities of that character.

The Court's failure to recognize this vital distinction and its insistence that polygyny is "in the same genus" as prostitution and debauchery do violence to the anthropological factors involved. Even etymologically, the words "polygyny" and "polygamy" are quite distinct from "prostitution," "debauchery" and words of that ilk. There is thus no basis in fact for including polygyny within the phrase "any other immoral purpose" as used in this statute. . . .

Hence I would reverse the judgments of conviction in these cases.

NOTES

1. In Rhone v. Loomis, 74 Minn. 200, 77 N.W. 31 (1898), the conclusions of both the majority and dissenting opinions were reached by applying the ejusdem generis canon, the disagreement being as to what was the factor common to the enumerated things. Mitchell J. said: ". . . The doctrine of ejusdem generis, or what is commonly called 'Lord Tenterden's rule' . . . generally stated, is that where a statute or document specifically enumerates several classes of persons or things, and immediately following, and classed with such enumeration, the clause embraces 'other' persons or things, the word 'other' will generally be read as 'other such like,' so that person or things therein comprised may be read as ejusdem generis 'with,' and not of a quality superior to or different from, those specifically enumerated. See Sandiman v. Breach, 7 Barn. & C. 99; also, 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 278, tit. 'Other.' The reason of this rule is that 'if the legislature had meant the general words to apply, without restriction, it would have used only one compendious word.' Rex v. Wallis, 5 Term.R. 379."

2. In United States v. One Zumstein Briefmarken Katalog, 24 F.Supp. 516 (D.C.Pa.1938), the court said that since ejusdem generis is a "rule of strict construction" it is peculiarly applicable to penal statutes. (See Chapter 8, Section 2c infra, p. 1219 et seq.). See commentary in 23 Minn.L.Rev. 545 (1939).

3. In Benson v. Chicago, St. P., M. & O. Ry., 75 Minn. 163, 77 N.W. 798 (1899), Mitchell, J., referring to both the noscitur a sociis and ejusdem generis canons, said: "These rules are not the masters of the courts, but merely their servants, to aid them in ascertaining the legislative intent. They afford a mere suggestion to the judicial mind that, where it clearly appears that the lawmakers were thinking of a particular class of persons or objects, their words of more general description may not have been intended to embrace any other than those within the class".

PEOPLE v. KAYE

Court of Appeals of New York, 1914. 212 N.Y. 407, 106 N.E. 122.

CUDDEBACK, J. The defendant has been convicted of a misdemeanor for violating an order made by the fire commissioner of the city of New York, which required the defendant to install "a separate and distinct system of automatic sprinklers" upon his premises, used for manufacturing purposes, at Nos. 30-34 West Twenty-Sixth street, borough of Manhattan. The order was made under section 775, tit. 3, c. 15, of the city charter (L.1901, c. 466). Section 775 was added to the charter by an amendment contained in chapter 899, Laws of 1911. The amendment, among other things, empowered the fire commissioner to—

"(3) require, in writing, the installation, as prescribed by any law or ordinance, in any building, structure or inclosure of automatic or other fire alarm system or fire extinguishing equipment and the maintenance and repair thereof, or the construction, as prescribed by any law or ordinance, of adequate and safe means of exit."

First. The defendant's main defense is that there is no law or ordinance requiring the installation in any building of automatic sprinklers as called for by the order.

Section 762, tit. 3, c. 15, of the charter, as it was in force in 1897 (L.1897, c. 378), and as it was continued in force, in the way that will be explained, by the present charter (L.1901, c. 466), provided that the owners and proprietors of all manufactories, hotels, tenement houses, and other buildings particularly mentioned "shall provide such means of communicating alarms of fire, accident or danger, to the police and fire departments, respectively, as the fire commissioner or police board may direct, and shall also provide such fire hose, fire extinguishers, buckets, axes, fire hooks, fire doors and other means of preventing and extinguishing fires as said fire commissioner may direct." Section 773 of the same title makes it a misdemeanor not to obey any such direction.

The defendant, applying to these provisions the doctrine of ejusdem generis, argues that the words italicized, namely, "other means of preventing and extinguishing fires," include only things of the same kind as fire hose, fire extinguishers, buckets, axes, fire hooks, and fire doors. That seems a narrow interpretation of the statute.

It is said in Halsbury's Laws of England, (vol. 27, p. 145):

"As a rule, general words following specific words are limited to things ejusdem generis with those before enumerated, although this, as a rule of construction, must be controlled by another equally general rule, that statutes ought, like wills or other documents, to be construed so as to carry out the objects sought to be accomplished by them."

In Schouler on Wills (3d Ed.) § 514, it is said that the rule of ejusdem generis "is after all but a rule of presumption as we should bear carefully in mind. . . . In fine, courts at the present day decline to be hampered by any rule which would sacrifice the testator's true meaning out of undue regard for association of words of limited scope with broad generic terms."

The court said in Given v. Hilton, 95 U.S. 591, 598 (24 L.Ed. 458), speaking of the rule of ejusdem generis:

"This rule of construction rests on a mere presumption, easily rebutted by anything that shows the larger subject was in fact in the testator's view."

In Matter of Robinson, 203 N.Y. 380, 386, 96 N.E. 925, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1023, the testator gave to his executors and trustees a fund "to provide shelter, necessities of life, education, general or specific, and such other financial aid as may seem to them fitting and proper to such persons as they shall select as being in need of the same." The court said:

"In construing the will now under consideration, the words 'such other financial aid' must be read with the words that precede them,

. . . and as so read, the preceding words not being exhaustive, such comprehensive words should be held to refer to financial aid of the same general character and . . . purpose as that included in such preceding words."

The cases on which the defendant relies are mostly those which involved bequests of property or penal laws enumerating crimes, or were cases where the particular things mentioned were the essential features of the subject-matter before the court. In a bequest, it is his property, and the objects of his bounty, which the donor has in mind, and in penal laws, the principal thing is the definition of crime. But in section 762 of the New York charter, the Legislature was not dealing with special reference to the particular articles therein enumerated, viz., fire hose, fire extinguishers, buckets, axes, fire hooks, and fire doors. The main object in view was the prevention and extinguishment of fires. That is, perhaps, sufficient to distinguish this case from those cited by the defendant, and to rebut the presumption that the general words of the statute are limited by the particular words preceding them.

But the case is rather within the doctrine of Matter of Robinson, supra. The words of section 762, which speak of certain kinds of fire extinguishing apparatus, are not exhaustive, and the comprehensive words "other means of preventing and extinguishing fires," which follow, should be held to include other means of the same general character and purpose as those particularly enumerated. Id. Now, automatic sprinklers, though they may cost a little more than the articles specifically mentioned in the section, are of the same general character, and are intended for the same purpose, as those articles. This liberal construction has been placed on section 762 in every case where it has come before the courts. It was held by the Appellate Term of the Supreme Court in New York (Lantry v. Hoffman, 55 Misc. 261, 105 N.Y.S. 353 [1907]) that the section authorized the fire commissioner to require the installation of perforated pipes on and along the ceiling, and connected with a valve outside the building, located above the curb level in a position accessible for the use of the fire department. This decision was affirmed by the Appellate Division (124 App. Div. 937, 109 N.Y.S. 1135). In Waldo v. Christman, 72 Misc. 349, 130 N.Y.S. 260 (1911), it was held that section 762 empowered the fire commissioner to require the installation of a separate and distinct system of automatic sprinklers of practically the same character as that required in this case.

The question is asked: Why, if section 762 in the charter already included automatic sprinklers, was it deemed necessary to mention them particularly in section 775 of chapter 899, Laws of 1911? A consideration of the act will show that the Legislature intended to confirm the construction which the court in the cases cited had theretofore put on section 762, and authorized the city to extend the requirements of the section to all buildings.

The act of 1911 added 11 sections (774-778c) to title 3, c. 15, of the charter. In these sections the Legislature brought together in one act many provisions of the charter relating to the prevention of fire, couching them in general language, and, at times, extending their application. For example, section 762 of the charter (L.1897, c. 378) required the owners and proprietors of some 15 different kinds of buildings mentioned to "provide such means of communicating alarms of fire, accident or danger, to the police and fire departments, respectively, as the fire commissioner or police board may direct." Subdivision 3, § 775, added by the act of 1911, empowered the fire commissioner to require "the installation, as prescribed by any law or ordinance, in any building, structure or inclosure of automatic or other fire alarm system." The only effect of this provision in subdivision 3 was to empower the city to require that all buildings, structures, and inclosures, not merely those mentioned in section 762, be provided with fire alarm systems. Space will not admit of further comparisons, but it will be found that other subdivisions of section 775 empower the city to extend pre-existing requirements of the charter, which were limited, the same as those relating to fire alarm systems, to all buildings, structures, and inclosures. I believe it was the intention of the Legislature, in like manner, to authorize the extension of the provisions of section 762, relating to the installation of fire extinguishing apparatus, as those provisions had been interpreted by the court, to all buildings, structures, and inclosures. This construction of chapter 899, Laws of 1911, is supported by other provisions found therein. The act amended the heading of title 3 of chapter 15 (in a manner not now important), and for some reason expressly repeated the headings without including the text of the sections (760-773) in title 3, which preceded the 11 sections added. This shows that the Legislature had those preceding sections in mind, and it must be held that it was aware of and approved the construction which the court had placed upon section 762. And when, in section 775, the Legislature empowered the fire commissioner to require the installation of automatic sprinklers, "as prescribed by any law or ordinance," it knew that a law to that effect, according to the construction placed thereon by the courts, was already in force.

I recommend that the judgment of conviction appealed from be affirmed.

HOGAN, J. (dissenting). A rule common to the construction of statutes that, where two or more words of analogous meaning are coupled together, they are presumed to be used in their cognate sense, express the same relations, and give color and expression to each other, must be applied to the statute and ordinance under consideration; therefore the language quoted, which is general in its terms, must be limited by the more specific language preceding the same and with which it is associated, and held only to comprehend "means" of a character such as the words preceding specified. To give to the section and ordinances the construction claimed for would authorize the fire commissioner to require the installation of any "means" specified by him for extinguishing fires in the buildings specified in the section, including churches, stores, offices, boarding houses, lodging houses, and all other buildings referred to in the section, and would confer upon the fire commissioner unlimited power as to the character of the means for preventing or extinguishing fires. He might, in his discretion, require an automatic sprinkling system in every church, boarding house, and building described in the section. He might require that certain of the churches and buildings specified should maintain a fire steamer for the purpose of extinguishing fires, if the language used is to be given the broad construction claimed for it. He might to-day require the installation of an automatic sprinkler system at large expense and one year later condemn it and order an improved system installed. The words "and other means of preventing and extinguishing fires as said fire commissioner may direct" must be read in connection with the words preceding, "fire hose, fire extinguishers, buckets, axes, fire nooks," etc., and held to be limited to such means as the specified means preceding the language used in the section imply.

(3) EXPRESSIO UNIUS

STATE ex rel. CURTIS v. DE CORPS

Supreme Court of Ohio, 1938. 134 Ohio St. 295, 16 N.E.2d 459.

The City Council of Canton passed an ordinance in August, 1932 [sic; agreed statement of facts], creating nine pumpmen positions in the waterworks department of that city. On June 27, 1932, appellant and another who had passed a competitive civil service examination were appointed to two of these positions. More than a half year later, namely, on February 3, 1933, seven others were appointed from an eligible list furnished by the civil service commission to fill the remaining positions.

On February 26, 1934, the City Council of Canton passed an ordinance, effective March 1, 1934, reducing the number of these positions from nine to seven. On February 27, 1934, appellant was notified, in writing, by Service Director Frank L. DeCorps, appellee herein, that he was being laid off for the purpose of economy. There was then in force and effect the following worded resolution, adopted by the Canton Civil Service Commission in 1921:

"Whenever from lack of work or funds, or other cause, it becomes necessary in any department or subdivision thereof to temporarily reduce the working force in any position, such reduction shall be made in the inverse order of the appointment of the employees in such position, and the employees last appointed being first laid off; and in determining the order in which such employees shall be laid off, the order in which such employees were certified by the commission shall control."

Since the lay-off of appellant, the number of pumpmen has continued at seven, during which time but one vacancy was filled, and that by the other pumpman who was examined with appellant.

Appellant instituted this action in mandamus in the Court of Common Pleas to compel his reinstatement, and to recover the emoluments of that position for the period during which he has been deprived thereof. The writ prayed for was denied and the judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeals. The cause is here on the allowance of a motion to certify.

BY THE COURT. The question submitted is whether the civil service commission of a municipality has the power to make a regulation which would require the appointing authority to lay off employees in the inverse order of appointment.

That portion of Section 486-19, General Code, which is here pertinent, reads:

"Such municipal commission shall prescribe, amend and enforce rules not inconsistent with the provisions of this act for the classification of positions in the civil service of such city and city school district; for examinations and registrations therefor; and for appointments, promotions, removals, transfers, layoffs, suspensions, reductions and reinstatements therein; and for standardizing positions and maintaining efficiency therein. Said municipal commission shall have and exercise all other powers and perform all other duties with respect to the civil service of such city and city school district, as herein prescribed and conferred upon the state civil service commission with respect to the civil service of the state; and all authority granted to the state commission with respect to the service under its jurisdiction shall, except as otherwise provided in this act, be held to grant the same authority to the municipal commission with respect to the service under its jurisdiction."

Appellees argue that the Legislature, by enacting Section 486-17b, General Code, "having made lay-off in the police and fire departments in the inverse order, has indicated that it did not intend that same should apply to the other classifications. The application of the principle 'expressio unius est exclusio alterius' should of itself be decisive of the question."

The maxim is of utility only as an aid in ascertaining legislative intent, but when its employment operates to defeat such intent it will be held to be inapplicable.

"The rule should not be carried beyond the reason for its existence. It is to be applied only as an aid in arriving at the legislative intention, and not to defeat the apparent intention." 37 Ohio Jurisprudence, 557, Section 296. See also 25 Ruling Case Law, 981, 982, Section 229.

In Springer v. Government of Philippine Islands, 277 U.S. 189, 48 S.Ct. 480, 72 L.Ed. 845, the court said (page 484): "The general rule that the expression of one thing is the exclusion of others is subject to exceptions. Like other canons of statutory construction it is only an aid in the ascertainment of the meaning of the law, and must yield whenever a contrary intention on the part of the lawmaker is apparent. Where a statute contains a grant of power enumerating certain things which may be done and also a general grant of power which, standing alone, would include those things and more, the general grant may be given full effect if the context shows that the enumeration was not intended to be exclusive.

In Ford v. United States, 273 U.S. 593, 611, 47 S.Ct. 531, 537, 71 L.Ed. 793, 801, the court said: "This maxim properly applies only when in the natural association of ideas in the mind of the reader that which is expressed is so set over by way of strong contrast to that which is omitted that the contrast enforces the affirmative inference that that which is omitted must be intended to have opposite and contrary treatment." Again, "The maxim of interpretation relied on is often helpful, but its wise application varies with the circumstances."

The fact that Section 486-17b, General Code, grants seniority rights to members of the police and fire departments is not indicative of an intention on the part of the Legislature to withdraw from the jurisdiction of municipal civil service commissions the element of seniority in service as a subject of regulation. The provisions of Section 486-17b, General Code, do not in any way amend, modify or restrict those of Section 486-19, General Code. The broad and comprehensive powers with which municipal civil service commissions are vested include the authority to prescribe the requirement that seniority in service shall be considered in laying off employees in classified civil service.

We find the resolution here challenged to be consistent with the provisions of the Civil Service Act and therefore valid and enforceable, and hold that appellant is entitled to a writ compelling his reinstatement as prayed for.

(1) STATUTES IN PARI MATERIA

(Since a bill obviously cannot be drafted with reference to statutes subsequently to be enacted, that aspect of the use of the in pari materia device is postponed for discussion in Chapter 7, The Methods of Interpretation and Construction.)

REX v. DOJACEK.

PERDUE, C.J.M. The accused was convicted under s. 49 of the Manitoba Temperance Act, 6 Geo.V. 1916, c. 112, by R. M. Noble, Police Magistrate, for that the accused "did unlawfully keep liquor in a place other than in a private dwelling-house in which he resides." The accused is the manager of the Ruthenian Booksellers & Publishers, Ltd. This company is the distributing agent in western Canada for the manufacturers of a patent medicine known as "Triner's American Elixir of Bitter Wine." The offence proved was that the accused had in the bookstore, which was not his place of residence, a quantity of this medicine in bottles. It is admitted that the liquid in question contains 16 to 18% of alcohol in volume. It was shewn that it also contained 18 grains per fluid ounce of cascara sagrada, said to be a strong laxative, besides some 8 other drugs in lesser proportions. It was admitted by the prosecutor that this medicine is registered under the Patent Medicine Act, 7-8 Ed. VII. 1908, c. 56.

The magistrate has found on the evidence that the patent medicine in question "contains sufficient medication to prevent its use as an alcoholic beverage, and no more alcohol than is necessary to keep its component parts in solution." But he also finds that it "is a liquor as defined in the Manitoba Temperance Act, as it contains over 2½% proof spirits, also that it is a drinkable liquid which is intoxicating."

Sub-s. (e) of s. 2 of the Manitoba Temperance Act is as follows:

The expression "liquor" or "liquors" shall include all fermented, spirituous and malt liquors, and all combinations of liquors, and all drinks and drinkable liquids which are intoxicating; and any liquor which contains more than 2½% of proof spirits shall be conclusively deemed to be intoxicating.

The definition is in effect the same as that contained in the old Liquor License Act, which was repealed by the Temperance Act; see R.S.M., 1913, c. 117, c. 2, sub-s. (g); except that the last clause of sub-s. (e) of s. 2 of the Manitoba Temperance Act commencing "and any liquor etc.," is not found in the corresponding subsection of the Liquor License Act.

Taking the definition in the Manitoba Temperance Act, the medicine in question does not come within any of the terms "fermented," "spirituous," "malt liquors" or "combinations of liquors." It must therefore come under the expression "all drinks and drinkable liquids which are intoxicating," if the conviction is to be sustained. The evidence shews and the magistrate has found that the liquid in question is prevented from being used as a beverage by reason of its medication. It could not therefore be classed as a "drink." There remains the question, is it a "drinkable liquid" within the meaning of the Act? It appears to me that this case rests wholly upon the interpretation to be placed on this expression.

The word "drinkable" may mean capable of being drunk. In that case "drinkable liquids" would include all liquids, because a liquid, no matter how nauseous or deadly it may be, is capable of being drunk. The word "drinkable" would, if taken in that sense, be unnecessary, as "liquid" standing alone would be sufficient. But "drinkable" may also mean suitable for drinking and be synonymous with potable, using the word in the sense in which we speak of water as being drinkable or undrinkable, that is, fit or unfit for drinking. I have already referred to the meaning placed upon the words "liquor" or "liquors" in the Liquor License Act. They are there defined as meaning and comprehending "all spirituous and malt liquors, and all combinations of liquors and drinks and drinkable liquids, which are intoxicating." The Liquor License Act authorized the issue of licenses to sell the liquors defined in the Act. These liquors were drinkable liquids which were intoxicating and were sold as beverages.

They were drinkable in the sense of being potable. Where, under the provisions of the Liquor License Act, local option was in force, no licenses for the sale of liquors were issued and a local prohibition prevailed within the local option district. No sale of liquors, and therefore no drinks or drinkable liquids which were intoxicating could lawfully be sold within such a district.

The clauses in the Liquor License Act relating to the prohibition of sales of liquor in local option districts very closely resemble, and in some respects are practically identical with, corresponding clauses in the Manitoba Temperance Act, 1916. The object of the local option clauses in the former Act was similar to that of the present Act. The former provided means for introducing local prohibition, the latter makes prohibition general throughout the Province. . . .

There is an intimate connection between the present law and the previous one. In ascertaining the meaning of an ambiguous expression in a statute an earlier Act dealing with the same subject should be referred to. Lord Mansfield thus stated the rule in Rex v. Loxdale (1758), 1 Burr. 445 at 447:

Where there are different statutes in pari materia, though made at different times, or even expired and not referring to each other, they shall be taken and construed together, as one system, and as explanatory of each other. . . .

It is clear that the expression "drinks and drinkable liquids which are intoxicating," found in the definition of "liquor" or "liquors" in the Liquor License Act, meant intoxicating liquids suitable for drinking, having specially in view such alcoholic beverages as would be supplied to customers in a licensed hotel, or sold in a shop licensed to sell liquors. That being the meaning of the expression in question where it appeared in the Liquor License Act, the same meaning should be given to it in the present Act, which takes the place of the other in dealing with the subject of prohibition.

Going further back into the history of temperance legislation, we find that the Temperance Act, 27-28 Vict. 1864, c. 18, where in force prohibited the sale of any spirituous or other intoxicating liquor, or any mixed liquor capable of being used as a beverage part of which is spirituous or otherwise intoxicating.

In the Canada Temperance Act, 41 Vict. 1878, c. 16(D), the prohibition is against the sale of any spirituous or other intoxicating liquor, or any mixed liquor capable of being used as a beverage and part of which is spirituous or otherwise intoxicating.

In the Canada Temperance Act, 41 Vict. 1878, c. 16 (D.), the prohibition is against the sale of any spirituous or other intoxicating liquor, or any mixed liquor capable of being used as a beverage and part of which is spirituous or otherwise intoxicating.

The Act of 1864 was intended to provide for the repression of abuses resulting from the sale of intoxicating liquors; see preamble.

The Act of 1878 aimed at promoting temperance and providing uniform legislation in all Provinces respecting the traffic in intoxicating liquors.

The intention of the Manitoba Temperance Act is to suppress the liquor traffic in that province by prohibiting provincial transactions in liquor; see preamble. It seems clear that all this legislation was aimed at preventing the excessive use of alcoholic liquors as beverages.

In the Alberta Liquor Act, Alta. stats., 1916, c. 4, the interpretation clause defining the meaning of the expression "liquor" or "liquors" was originally exactly the same as sub-s. (e) of s. 2 of the Manitoba Temperance Act. It was held by the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court (Harvey, C. J., dissenting), that the word "liquor" where used in the Act as it stood originally, meant a liquid commonly known as or adapted for reasonable use as a beverage for human consumption. See Rex v. MacLean (1918), 40 D.L.R. 443, 29 Can. Cr. Cas. 270.

In Gleeson v. Hobson (1907) V.L.R. 148, where the statute defined liquor as "any wine, spirits, ale, beer, porter, cider, perry or other spirituous or fermented liquor of an intoxicating nature," it was held that liquor meant a liquid commonly known and adapted as a drink or beverage for human consumption.

If this Court were to decide that "liquors" as defined in the Act includes all liquids capable of being drunk which contain over 2½% of alcohol, it would make illegal the sale, not only of patent medicines, but of well known specifics, liniments, tinctures, essences, extracts, perfumes, condiments, etc. If that interpretation were applied no licensed druggist could sell, except under a doctor's certificate, any patent medicine containing more than 2½% of alcohol, which would comprise virtually all patent medicines. No licensed retail druggist could sell to his ordinary customers any perfume in liquid form or any flavouring extract without danger of incurring the heavy penalties imposed by the Act.

In other Provinces power has been given to pass orders-in-council regulating and permitting the sale of liquids containing alcohol. I have not been able to find any such power in the Manitoba Temperance Act, 1916.

In Saskatchewan, flavouring extracts were thoughtfully excepted from the operation of the Act. In that Province a licensed retail druggist, or, perhaps even a grocer, may sell a phial of vanilla or peppermint without rendering himself liable to a fine of $200 or imprisonment in default of immediate payment.

In the Encyc. Brittanica, 11th ed., under the heading "Alcohol" (S.S. Industrial Alcohol), I find the following passages:

The great importance of alcohol in the arts has necessitated the introduction of a duty-free product which is suitable for most industrial purposes, and at the same time is perfectly unfit for beverages or internal application.

(S. S. methylated spirit.) For retail purposes the "ordinary" methylated spirit is mixed with .357% of mineral naphtha, which has the effect of rendering it quite undrinkable.

I cannot believe that the Legislature intended to propound the paradox that a liquid which has been made quite undrinkable becomes a drinkable liquid for the purposes of temperance legislation.

I think the prosecution has failed to prove that the patent medicine in question was a "liquor" within the meaning of the Manitoba Temperance Act. I think the conviction should be quashed and that the fine and costs, if already paid, should be returned to the accused.

(2) THE COMMON LAW

PERRY v. STRAWBRIDGE

Supreme Court of Missouri, 1908.
209 Mo. 621, 108 S.W. 641, 16 L.R.A., N.S., 244, 123 Am.St.Rep. 510, 14 Ann.Cas. 92.

GRAVES, J. (after stating the facts as above). This is an exceedingly interesting case. The question for determination, bluntly stated, is, can a husband who murders his wife inherit the one-half part of her estate under section 2938, Rev.St.1899 [Ann.St.1906, p. 1694]? To this state it is a new question, and, with few exceptions, a new one in all the states. But few courts of last resort have been called upon to pass upon the question as to what effect the criminal act of a prospective legal heir will have upon his or her rights under positive statutes governing descents and distributions. Of those which have passed upon it, we frankly confess that the holdings of a majority thereof are against the views which we entertain and will hereafter express. We are not satisfied with the reasoning of those cases, and have been unable to reach the conclusion that a mere prospective legal heir, or devisee in a will, can make certain that which was uncertain, by his own felonious act, in the coldblooded murder of the party from whom he or she expects to inherit. We do not believe that these courts have fully applied and used the canons of statutory construction, which we have the right to use and ought to use to avoid a result so repugnant to common right and common decency. . . .

The statute we are called upon to construe reads: "When a wife shall die without any child or other descendants in being capable of inheriting, her widower shall be entitled to one-half of the real and personal estate belonging to the wife at the time of her death, absolutely, subject to the payment of the wife's debts." . . .

The section of our statute, Rev.St.1899, § 4151 [Ann.St.1906, p. 2250], which adopted the common law in Missouri, was first enacted January 18, 1816. . . .

When we took unto ourselves the common law, as we did in 1816, and in later reiterations of that statute, we took the body of all the common law, which could be made applicable under our Constitutions, state and federal, and such is the law of the state except where repealed, changed, or modified by statute.

In the case of Box v. Lanier, 112 Tenn., loc. cit. 409, 79 S.W. 1045, 64 L.R.A. 458, the Supreme Court of Tennessee said: "It has been well said that there are certain general and fundamental maxims of the common law which control laws as well as contracts. Among these are: 'No one shall be permitted to profit by his own fraud, or to take advantage of his own wrong, or to found any claim upon his own iniquity, or to acquire property by his own crime. These maxims are adopted by public policy, and have their foundation in universal law administered in all civilized countries.' These maxims embodied in the common law, and constituting an essential part of its warp and woof, are found announced both in text-books and in reported cases. Without their recognition and enforcement by the courts, their judgments would excite the indignation of all right-thinking people. The first of these maxims is applied in order to prevent one from taking the benefit of his own fraud. Why should not the last be enforced so as to forbid a party receiving the fruits of his own crime?"

And Earl, J., for the New York court of last resort (Riggs et al. v. Palmer et al., 115 N.Y., loc. cit. 511, 22 N.E. 190, 5 L.R.A. 340, 12 Am.St.Rep. 819), said: "Besides, all laws as well as all contracts may be controlled in their operation and effect by general, fundamental maxims of the common law. No one shall be permitted to profit by his own fraud, or to take advantage of his own wrong, or to found any claim upon his own iniquity, or to acquire property by his own crime. These maxims are dictated by public policy, have their foundation in universal law administered in all civilized countries, and have nowhere been superseded by statutes."

Farther on in the same opinion, he says: "These maxims, without any statute giving them force or operation, frequently control the effect and nullify the language of wills. A will procured by fraud and deception, like any other instrument, may be decreed void and set aside, and so a particular portion of a will may be excluded from probate or held inoperative if induced by the fraud or undue influence of the person in whose favor it is. (Allen v. M'Pherson, 1 H.L. Cas. 191; Harrison's Appeal, 48 Conn. 202.) So a will may contain provisions which are immoral, irreligious, or against public policy, and they will be held void. Here there was no certainty that this murderer would survive the testator, or that the testator would not change his will, and there was no certainty that he would not get this property if nature was allowed to take its course. He, therefore, murdered the testator expressly to vest himself with an estate. Under such circumstances, what law, human or divine, will allow him to take the estate and enjoy the fruits of his crime? The will spoke and became operative at the death of the testator. He caused that death, and thus by his crime made it speak and have operation. Shall it speak and operate in his favor? If he had met the testator and taken his property by force, he would have had no title to it. Shall he acquire title by murdering him? If he had gone to the testator's house and by force compelled him, or by fraud or undue influence had induced him, to will him his property, the law would not allow him to hold it. But can he give effect and operation to a will by murder, and yet take the property? To answer these questions in the affirmative, it seems to me, would be a reproach to the jurisprudence of our state, and an offense against public policy. Under the civil law evolved from the general principles of natural law and justice by many generations of jurisconsults, philosophers, and statesmen, one cannot take property by inheritance or will from an ancestor or benefactor whom he has murdered. (Domat. part 2, book 1, tit. 1, par. 3; Code Napoleon, par. 727; Mackeldy's Roman Law, 530, 550.) In the Civil Code of Lower Canada the provisions on the subject in the Code Napoleon have been substantially copied. But so far as I can find, in no country where the common law prevails had it been deemed important to enact a law to provide for such a case. Our revisers and lawmakers were familiar with the civil law, and they did not deem it important to incorporate into our statutes its provisions upon this subject. This is not a casus omisus. It was evidently supposed that the maxims of the common law were sufficient to regulate such a case, and that a specific enactment for that purpose was not needed."

These maxims of the common law are expressly made a part of our laws by the statute of this state, first adopted in 1816, as we have hereinabove indicated. They are a part of the law of the state by force of section 4151, Rev.St.1899, unless they have been repealed, changed, modified, or wiped out by statute law. Have we by statute either expressly or impliedly changed or modified the maxims discussed in the Tennessee and New York cases, supra? Has the common law in this respect been repealed, changed, or modified? We think not. If not, they are a part of our law. If not, then this statute must be read in connection therewith, and when so read the father of appellees acquired no interest in the estate in controversy, and appellees have none. "Statutes in derogation of the common law are to be strictly construed, unless as in some states there is a statutory provision to the contrary." 8 Cyc. 376, and cases cited.

The common-law rule is tersely stated in section 665 of Wharton on Homicide (3d Ed.) thus: "To permit a person who commits a murder, or any person claiming under him, to benefit by his criminal act, would be contrary to public policy. And no devisee can take under the will of a testator whose death has been caused by the criminal and felonious act of the devisee himself. And, in applying this rule, no distinction can be made between a death caused by murder and one caused by manslaughter. Nor does the common-law right of succession by descent operate in favor of one who willfully takes the life of his ancestor for the purpose of succeeding to his property rights. And the common-law right of a man to succeed to the property of his wife upon her death does not operate in favor of one who murders his wife. And the rule that the common-law doctrine of succession to property does not operate in favor of one who willfully takes the life of his ancestor should apply against any person claiming through or under the slayer. Nor does a rule of law that common-law right of succession to property does not operate in favor of one who willfully takes the life of his ancestor contravene a constitutional provision that a conviction of crime shall not work a forfeiture of the estate."

To our mind our statutes of descents and distributions are so largely expressive of the common law that we must consider these maxims and the whole body of the applicable common-law doctrines; that we must read them together as parts and parcels of the same system, and when so read there can be but one answer to the query suggested by the facts of this case.

For these considerations alone, we think this case should be reversed, . . . i. e., that our statutes of descents and distributions and the live parts of the common law constitute one system of laws in this state upon that subject, and the statutory law must be construed with reference to that live portion of the common law . . .

B. Incomplete Expression: the Casus Omissus

STATE v. PARTLOW

Supreme Court of North Carolina, 1884. 91 N.C. 550.

MERRIMON, J. The act of 1881, ch. 234, prohibits the sale of spirituous liquors within designated distances from many churches and other places named therein. So much of it as is material to this case provides, "that the sale of spirituous liquors shall be prohibited within three miles of . . . Mount Zion church in Gaston county."

It appeared on the trial that there were two churches bearing the name "Mt. Zion" in Gaston county, and there is nothing in the statute indicating to which of them it applies.

It is plainly the duty of the court to so construe a statute, ambiguous in its meaning, as to give effect to the legislative intent, if this be practicable. Its meaning in respect to what it has reference and the objects it embraces, as well as in other respects, is to be ascertained by appropriate means and indicia, such as the purposes appearing from the statute taken as a whole, the phraseology, the words ordinary or technical, the law as it prevailed before the statute, the mischief to be remedied, the remedy, the end to be accomplished, statutes in pari materia, the preamble, the title, and other like means. But the meaning must be ascertained from the statute itself, and the means and signs to which, as appears upon its face, it has reference. It cannot be proved by a member of the legislature or other person, whether interested in its enactment or not. A statute is an act of the legislature as an organized body. It expresses the collective will of that body, and no single member of it, or all the members as individuals, can be heard to say what the meaning of the statute is. It must speak for and be construed by itself, by the means and signs indicated above. Otherwise, each individual might attribute to it a different meaning, and thus the legislative will and meaning be lost sight of. Whatever may be the views and purposes of those who procure the enactment of a statute, the legislature contemplates that its intention shall be ascertained from its words as embodied in it. And courts are not at liberty to accept the understanding of any individual as to the legislative intent. State v. Boon, 1 (N.C.) Taylor's Rep., 103; Drake v. Drake, 4 Dev., 110; Adams v. Turrentine, 8 Ired., 147; State v. Melton, 44 (N.C.) Busb., 49; Blue v. McDuffie, 1b., 131; Potter's Dwarries on Statutes, 179, et seq.

But a statute must be capable of construction and interpretation; otherwise it will be inoperative and void. The court must use every authorized means to ascertain and give it an intelligible meaning; but if after such effort it is found to be impossible to solve the doubt and dispel the obscurity, if no judicial certainty can be settled upon as to the meaning, the court is not at liberty to supply, to make one. The court may not allow "conjectural interpretation to usurp the place of judicial exposition." There must be a competent and efficient expression of the legislative will. In Drake v. Drake, supra, Chief Justice Ruffin said: "Whether a statute be a public or private one, if the terms in which it is couched be so vague as to convey no definite meaning to those whose duty it is to execute it, either ministerially or judicially, it is necessarily inoperative. The law must remain as it was, unless that which professes to change it be itself intelligible."

When the statute intends to refer to and embrace within its provisions one or more of a multitude of things of the same kind, or one or more persons of many of the same name, it must do so in some way or manner, in terms, or by reasonable implication, or appropriate descriptive words, to designate what things or persons are intended by it. Else, how can the court or a ministerial officer decide what things or persons are meant? A member of the legislature might say one thing or person was meant; another might say another thing or person was meant; a third might say yet another thing or person was meant; and thus the legislative will might entirely fail. The statute must speak. The legislative expression of its purpose . . .

prevail; and if this does not appear with such a degree of certainty as that the court can learn what it is, the statute cannot operate.

Now the clause of the statute before us simply refers to "Mount Zion church in Gaston county," and there are two churches of that name in that county. There is nothing in the statute that in the remotest degree indicates to which of the two it refers. There are no means or signs of any kind appearing in it, in terms, by implication, by reference, or by any possible construction, that go to point to one of the two churches any more than to the other. It must, therefore, be as inoperative as if there was no church, or fifty churches of the same name in that county.

The testimony of the witness, who was a senator at the time the statute was enacted, was wholly incompetent for the reasons already stated.

We are constrained to declare that the clause of the statute under consideration is, because of its ambiguity, inoperative and void.

There is error, for which the judgment of the superior court must be reversed, and further proceedings had according to law. Let this be certified.

Error.

STATE ex rel. HUGHES v. REUSSWIG

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1910. 110 Minn. 473, 126 N.W. 279.

JAGGARD, J. This is an appeal from an order sustaining a demurrer to the answer of respondent and appellant, who will hereafter be referred to as defendant, in quo warranto proceedings initiated by relator and appellee, who will hereafter be referred to as plaintiff. The plaintiff alleged that he had been elected as chairman of common school district No. 1 in Itasca county at an adjourned annual meeting held on or about August 5, 1908, that he thereafter qualified for said office, and that respondent refused to recognize the rights of relator and unlawfully withholds said office from him. In his answer defendant alleged that said common school district contains more than ten townships, and that he was elected as said chairman at a "general biennial state election" held on November 6, 1906, that he thereafter qualified as such officer, that he now claims said office by virtue thereof, and that certain minor irregularities in the election of relator by the annual school meeting also occurred. It is not alleged that there was any fraud or misconduct in the election of relator at the annual school meeting.

The merits of the controversy go to section 1311, Rev.Laws 1905, under which respondent claims, and which attempts to provide for an election in school districts containing ten or more townships at the general state election. Relator attacked this section on the ground, among others, that it was so inadequate and incomplete that it could not be enforced. Section 1311 reads as follows: "In all common school districts embracing ten or more townships, the trustees shall be elected biennially at the general state election, two trustees at every such election; the term of office of one to commence August 1 in the year following his election, and that of the other August 1 in the second year following his election; the time of the commencement of the term of each to be indicated on the ballot. The vote shall be returned and canvassed, and the persons elected notified, in the same manner as in the election of county officers. But a separate ballot box shall be used, and the voters need not register." If that section is enforceable, then the defendant elected under it is entitled to the office; if it is not, then the plaintiff elected at the adjourned annual meeting (see section 1305), which had the power to "elect by ballot" officers of the district (subdivision 3, § 1308), is entitled to the office.

1. The relevant general principles of construction are clear. On the one hand, the court will not allow judicial interpretation to usurp the place of legislative enactment. A statute is not valid unless there be a competent and official expression of legislative will. [Citing cases.]

On the other hand, as Ryan, C. J., said in Atty. Gen. v. Eau Claire, 37 Wis. 438: "We owe great deference to the legislative authority. It is our duty to give effect to all its enactments, according to its intention, as far as we have constitutional right and power; and to that end it behooves us, as far as we are able, to place such a construction on statutes as will reconcile them to the Constitution, and to give them effective operation, under the Constitution, according to the intention with which they are passed. It would be palpable violation of judicial duty and propriety to seek in a statute a construction in conflict with the Constitution or with the object of its enactment, or to admit such a construction when the statute is fairly susceptible of another in accord with the Constitution and the legislative intention." . . .

This court has repeatedly announced this doctrine. It has held statutes void only when clearly necessary, and then generally because of their violation of some substantial constitutional requirement. Every reasonable effort has been made to so interpret an enactment as to hold it enforceable and to effectuate the legislative intent. The resulting rule is clearly formulated by Mr. Sutherland: "It is the bounden duty of courts to endeavor by every rule of construction to ascertain the meaning of, and to give full force and effect to, every enactment of the General Assembly not obnoxious to constitutional provisions. But if, after exhausting every rule of construction, no sensible meaning can be given to the statute, or if it is so incomplete that it cannot be carried into effect, it must be inoperative and void." Stat.Cons. pp. 140, 141.

2. It remains to apply this principle to the facts in this case. It is evident that the statute in itself is incomplete and inartistic. It is a good illustration of legislative crudity and imperfection. It does not at all follow, however, that it is absolutely void. Plaintiff has urged before this court five respects in which "it gives no sufficient means whereby this act may be enforced." We will consider them successively, but with some change in their order.

(a) "Section 1311 makes no provision for nominating candidates." It is evident that the act must be construed in connection with the election law. This is in logical pursuance of the general requirement that statutes must be interpreted as a whole. Portions of the election law which can reasonably be incorporated into section 1311 are a necessary part of it. The only question is whether that law, construed with section 1311, is enforceable. So far as the provisions for nominating candidates is concerned, we think the result of the statute read as a whole is adequate. A number of provisions of that law may supply the deficiencies in section 1311. For example, section 213 provides for nomination by voters by means of certificates of nomination. We are at a loss to see why this section should not be adequate for nominating candidates for the office of trustee of the school district.

(b) "Section 1311 provides that the term of one trustee shall commence August 1st following the election, and the term of the other a year later. It makes no provision for designating which two trustees shall be so voted for. It does not designate which shall be chairman, treasurer, or clerk, or what terms shall be assigned to those officers. . . ." It is an obviously reasonable construction that, when candidates are nominated, the terms and office should be designated. If there is a failure in this respect, then the officers holding over would occupy the term until other provision be made for filling it.

(c) "How are the names of candidates placed on the ballot? Who provides the ballot boxes and other election supplies? Who names the judges of election and clerks? Who establishes precincts and polling places? These and many other vital questions at once suggest themselves." The general election fully supplies these deficiencies. See section 1311.

(d) "Section 1311 makes no provisions for the officers of newly organized districts containing ten or more townships. Nor is it aided by section 1313. This, however, need not be urged, in view of the otherwise unmistakably defective character of the act." It is plain that this criticism would merely limit the operation of section 1311, and leave the trustees of such newly organized districts to be elected otherwise than under section 1311.

(e) "Section 1311 provides for the election of two trustees biennially at the general state election. It makes no provision for the third trustee in the event of a first election in a common school district at the general state election under section 1311." We are at a loss to see why a law requiring two trustees for a certain time should not be as valid as a law requiring three trustees. It might be that the court would hold that the elected trustee had a right to fill the vacancy. Without doubt courts would prove adequate to determine this question, if the proper occasion should arise. The controversy is, however, academical in view of the change in the law introduced by chapters 187 and 238, Laws 1909.

It follows that section 1311 was valid, and the demurrer improperly sustained.

PEOPLE v. PATTEN

Supreme Court of Illinois, 1930. 338 Ill. 385, 170 N.E. 280.

HEARD, J. Plaintiffs in error, James Patten, Bob Kurfirst, Paul A. Fischer, Frank Spinuzza, and Lloyd Fravel, were each separately charged in the municipal court of Chicago, by information, with operating a motor vehicle on the public highway in the city of Chicago without first procuring a license for the same, in violation of section 9 of the Motor Vehicle Act (Smith's Stat. 1927, p. 2388, c. 121, § 209). Each pleaded not guilty and waived trial by jury, and the cases were consolidated for trial. On a hearing before the court each defendant was found guilty and sentenced to pay a fine of $10 and also the costs, and, in default of payment, stand committed to the house of correction until the fine and costs shall be worked out at the rate of $1.50 a day or until paid. Upon writs of error from the Appellate Court for the First District, the judgments of the municipal court were severally affirmed. Writs of error were severally sued out of this court by plaintiffs in error, and the causes are here consolidated for hearing.

The question involved here is whether, upon a proper construction of section 9 of the act as it existed at the commencement of these prosecutions, a license fee is required for the use of a semitrailer on public highways.

By section 1 of the Act (section 201), the term "motor vehicle" includes "trailers, or semi-trailers pulled or towed by a motor vehicle." Section 2 (section 202) divides motor vehicles into two divisions, the second of which is "those vehicles which are designed and used for pulling or carrying freight." Section 3 (section 203) fixes the maximum gross weight to be permitted on the road surface through the axle of any vehicle and the number of pounds per inch of width of tire under one wheel, and paragraph 5 of said section provides that, "where trailers are used the length of any vehicle, or vehicles, combined with their trailers, shall not exceed 65 feet." Section 5 (section 205) provides that "all motor vehicles and all trailers or other vehicles in tow thereof, or thereunto attached, operating upon the improved public highways, shall have tires of rubber or some material of equal resiliency," and that defective tires shall not be permitted to be used if so worn or otherwise damaged as to cause undue vibration or undue concentration of the wheel load on the surface of the road.

It is the contention of plaintiffs in error that a license for semi-trailers is not provided for, required, or authorized under section 9 of the Motor Vehicle Act (Smith-Hurd Rev.St.1927, c. 121, § 209), for no license fee is fixed as to semitrailers. Section 9 in full is as follows:

"§ 9. All vehicles of the second division as described in section 2 of this Act, which are designed or equipped or used for carrying freight, goods, wares or merchandise, and all vehicles of said first division which have been remodeled and are being used for such purposes, and all vehicles of said second division which are used for carrying more than seven persons shall pay to the Secretary of State for each calendar year from and after January 1, 1924, license fees for the use of the public highways of this State at the following rates, to wit:

"(a) Vehicles having a gross weight of five thousand (5,000) pounds and less, including the weight of the vehicle and maximum load, $12.00.

"(b) Vehicles having a gross weight of more than five thousand (5,000) pounds and not more than twelve thousand (12,000) pounds, including the weight of the vehicle and maximum load, $22.50.

"(c) Vehicles having a gross weight of more than twelve thousand (12,000) pounds and not more than sixteen thousand (16,000) pounds, including the weight of the vehicle and maximum load, $75.00.

"(d) Vehicles having a gross weight of more than sixteen thousand (16,000) pounds, and not more than twenty thousand (20,000) pounds, including the weight of the vehicle and maximum load, $100.00.

"(e) Vehicles having a gross weight of over twenty thousand (20,000) pounds, including weight of vehicle and maximum load, $150.00.

"(f) Tractors, traction engines or other similar vehicles used for hauling purposes, except as hereinafter provided, shall pay the same fees according to their weight as hereinbefore required in this section of other vehicles. All trailers and semi-trailers used with a motor vehicle shall pay to the Secretary of State for each calendar year from and after January 1st, 1924, license fees for the use of the public highways of this State at the following rates, to wit:

"(a) Trailers having a gross weight of 2,000 pounds, and less, including the weight of the trailer and maximum load, $6.00.

"(b) Trailers having a gross weight of more than 2,000 pounds, and not more than 10,000 pounds, $25.00.

"(c) Trailers having a gross weight of more than 10,000 pounds, including the weight of the trailer and maximum load, $50.00."

The facts are not in controversy. All were practically stipulated. Each plaintiff in error operated a motor vehicle called a "semi-trailer" on the public highways, as charged, without being licensed so to do under the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act, and without having applied for and obtained license to operate and without paying a license fee.

The undisputed evidence shows that there is a material difference between a trailer and a semitrailer. While both are classed as motor vehicles by the Motor Vehicle Act, this difference is recognized by the Legislature in the portions of the act above quoted. A trailer, as shown by the evidence, is a unit in itself, has four wheels, and can be propelled by any power, while a semitrailer is two-wheeled and is absolutely useless unless it is attached to a tractor truck. The frame of the semitrailer overlaps the frame of the truck, on the top of which frame is a horizontal turntable or fifth wheel, to which the front end of the semitrailer attaches, forming a six-wheeled unit. A semitrailer carries a much less load than a trailer, and its price is much less.

Defendant in error contends that all general provisions, terms, phrases, and expressions in a statute must be liberally construed in order that the true intent and meaning of the Legislature may be fully carried out, and cites many cases in support of this rule of construction, among them People v. Fox, 269 Ill. 300, 110 N.E. 26, 29, where this court said: "The rule is elementary that the primary object of construing a statute is to ascertain and give effect to the true intent and meaning of the Legislature in enacting it; that it is 'the intention of the lawmakers that makes the law.' Hoyne v. Danisch, 264 Ill. 467, 106 N.E. 341. For the purpose of ascertaining and giving effect to this intention of the lawmakers, it is proper to consider the occasion and necessity for the law. . . . Where the spirit and intention of the Legislature in adopting the act are clearly expressed, and its object and purposes are clearly set forth, the courts are not confined to the literal meaning of the words used, when to do so will defeat the obvious legislative intention and result in absurd consequences not contemplated or intended by it. In such cases the literal language of the statute may be departed from, and words may be changed, altered, modified, and supplied, or omitted entirely, if necessary to obviate any repugnancy or inconsistency between the language used and the intention of the Legislature as gathered from a consideration of the whole act and the previous condition of legislation upon that subject." This is undoubtedly the correct rule of construction, subject to the proviso of section 1 of chapter 131 of our statutes, "unless such construction would be inconsistent with the manifest intent of the Legislature or repugnant to the context of the same statute." The intention of the Legislature is manifested by, and must be ascertained from, what it has said in the act construed, and not from something the court might surmise the Legislature might have intended to say but which it for some reason failed to say.

From a perusal of the Motor Vehicle Act as it then existed, it is evident that the Legislature by that act intended to classify trailers and semitrailers as different motor vehicles, that by section 9 its intention is manifest that semitrailers should pay a license fee, and that by that section it intended to fix a license fee for semitrailers. It is, however, just as manifest that by that section the Legislature by some mistake or oversight failed to fix the amount of such fee, and that it used therein no language which enables us to determine what amount it intended to fix as such license fee. This section was amended by the Legislature in 1929 (Laws 1929, p. 655, § 1), so as to fix license fees for semitrailers.

A law must be complete in all its terms and conditions when it leaves the Legislature, so that every one may know, by reading the law, what his rights are and how it will operate when put into execution. People v. Board of Election Com'rs, 221 Ill. 9, 77 N.E. 321, 5 Ann.Cas. 562. If the Legislature has accidentally or inadvertently failed to express its intention to declare that certain conduct shall constitute a crime or misdemeanor, the court is powerless to correct the error or supply the omission, no matter how plainly the conduct in question is within the mischief intended to be remedied by the statute. State v. Trapp, 140 La. 425, 73 So. 255; State v. Palanque, 133 La. 36, 62 So. 224. An act cannot be executed where the language appears on its face to have a meaning but it is impossible to give it any precise or intelligible application in the circumstances under which it was intended to operate. While it is the duty of the courts to ascertain the meaning of and give effect to every constitutional enactment of the General Assembly, they cannot supply omissions or remedy defects in matters committed to the Legislature. People v. Sweitzer, 266 Ill. 459, 107 N.E. 902, Ann.Cas.1916B, 586. The Legislature having in the act in question failed to fix a license fee for the operation of semitrailers, plaintiffs in error cannot rightfully be convicted of a misdemeanor in failing to pay a license fee therefor.

HAWORTH v. CHAPMAN

Supreme Court of Florida, 1934. 113 Fla. 501, 152 So. 663.

LOVE, CIRCUIT JUDGE. In response to a writ of habeas corpus issued by this court, the return shows the petitioner is held in custody under a conviction, for violating sections 1-3, chapter 8466, Acts of 1921, sections 7308-7310, Comp.Gen.Laws, and a judgment and sentence to "pay costs of prosecution and be imprisoned for seven years in the state penitentiary from the date of your delivery to the officers thereof, upon failure to pay costs an additional 6 months' sentence is imposed."

The statute under which the petitioner was convicted and sentenced is as follows:

"Chapter 8466—(No. 71).

"An Act Relating to Fraud or the Attempt to Defraud by Assuming to Have or be Able to Obtain Certain Information Whether the Same Exists or Not; To Prescribe Certain Evidence, and to Provide Penalties for the Violation of This Act.

"Be It Enacted by the Legislature of the State of Florida:

"Section 1. That on and after the passage and approval of this Act it shall be unlawful for any person or persons to defraud or attempt to defraud any individual or individuals out of any thing of value, by assuming to have or be able to obtain any secret, advance or inside information regarding, any person, transaction, act or thing, whether such person, transaction, act or thing exists or not.

"Sec. 2. Any person or persons guilty of violating the provisions of Section 1 of this Act shall be deemed guilty of a felony and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not more than Ten Thousand ($10,000.00) Dollars and ten years in the State penitentiary.

"Sec. 3. All paraphernalia of whatsoever kind in possession of and used in defrauding or attempting to defraud as specified in Section 1 of this Act shall be held and accepted by any Court of Jurisdiction in this State as prima facie evidence of guilt.

"Sec. 4. This Act shall take effect upon its becoming a law. Approved June 14, 1921."

It is contended on behalf of the petitioner that the penalty provided in section 2 of the act for its violation, viz. that the offender "shall be fined not more than Ten Thousand ($10,000.00) Dollars and ten years in the State penitentiary," is so indefinite and uncertain as to render the act void, in that, considered with its context, such quoted part of the act does not authorize the imposition of a fine as the sole penalty for its violation, and further, in that it does not authorize by express words, imprisonment in the state penitentiary, it fails to constitute its violation a felony; and further that said quoted part of section 2 is such an inseparable integral part of the interdependent provisions of the act that the quoted provision, being uncertain and indefinite, is in whole or in part unoperative, if it does not render the entire act ineffectual to authorize the imposition of any sentence either of fine or imprisonment.

. . . the fundamental principle in the judicial interpretation of a statute is that the object is to determine what intention is conveyed by the language used therein. The rule is well and aptly stated in Orvil Tp. v. Borough of Woodcliff, 64 N.J.Law, 286, 45 A. 686, 687, as follows: "When the intention is expressed, the question is one of verbal construction only; but, if the language be not express, and some intention must necessarily be imputed, then it must be determined by inference grounded on legal principles, one of which is that the legislature must have entertained some intention, and the interpreter must determine what it was, unless it be that the statute lacks the formal requisite needed in order to give it the effect of a law."

the true sense of the form of words which is used which is to be discovered by the interpretation or construction of the statute, taking all its parts into consideration, and, if fairly possible, giving them all effect. Speaking more concretely, when the intention can be ascertained with reasonable certainty, words may be altered or supplied in the statute so as to give it effect, and to avoid any repugnancy to or inconsistency with such intention."

Section 7105 (5006) provides that: "Any crime punishable by death, or imprisonment in the State Prison, is a felony, and no other crime shall be so considered. Every other offense is a misdemeanor."

In the Constitution, section 25, art. 16, appears the following provision: "The term felony, whenever it may occur in this Constitution or in the laws of the State, shall be construed to mean any criminal offense punishable with death or imprisonment in the State penitentiary."

If, therefore, the absence of the words "imprisonment for" from the above-quoted provision of the act restricts the penalty for its violation to a fine, the offense denounced is a misdemeanor, though in the every words of the penalty clause it is termed a felony, thus producing an obvious contradiction if not an absurd conclusion. There is a strong presumption against absurdity in a statutory provision; it being unreasonable to suppose that the Legislature intended their own stultification, so, when the language used is susceptible of two senses, the sense will be adopted which will not lead to absurd consequences. Considering then the act as a whole and all of its language, it cannot be successfully contended that the intent and purpose of the Legislature was to punish the violation of its provisions by a fine only, thus making the offense a misdemeanor, contrary to the expressed intent of the act.

The only remaining alternatives are either to hold the entire statute invalid for the indefiniteness of its penal provision or to give it life and effect by ascertaining and enforcing the intent and purpose of the legislature in enacting it, if this can be done with reasonable certainty from a consideration of its language and the purpose to be accomplished within constitutional limitations.

To hold that the statute is invalid requires us to decide that its penal clause is so uncertain that the court is unable to determine what the Legislature intended or is so incomplete that it can not be executed.

It is a familiar rule of statutory construction that in the interpretation of a statute that construction of the language employed is to be adopted, if possible, which will sustain the validity of a statute, in accordance with the maxim "ut res magis valeat quam pereat." Under this rule, the courts will correct evident mistakes and supply evident omissions, to prevent a law from becoming a nullity.

If the constitutional definition of a felony, section 25, art. 16, be substituted in section 2 of the act instead of the word "felony" appearing therein, the section would read as follows: Any person or persons guilty of violating the provisions of section 1 of this act shall be deemed guilty of a "criminal offence punishable with death or imprisonment in the State penitentiary," and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not more than $10,000 and ten years in the state penitentiary.

The express language used in this section, if sufficient to constitute the offense a felony, limits the punishment of its violation to imprisonment in the state penitentiary as distinguished from the punishment of death. Therefore, from the very words used, it seems obvious that the intent of the Legislature, in denominating the offense as a felony, was to prescribe the punishment for its violation by imprisonment in the state penitentiary in addition to a fine.

To supply the words "imprisonment for" before the words "ten years in the State penitentiary" is merely to supply words obviously intended to be used but inadvertently or accidentally omitted in transcribing the bill in the Legislature, and for this there is ample precedent.

The intention of the Legislature being apparent and easily gathered from the context of the act, the question then arises, What is the duty of the court in the premises?

It has been stated by an eminent law writer that "legislative enactments are not more than any other writings to be defeated on account of mistakes, errors or omissions, provided the intention of the Legislature can be gathered from the whole Statute. When one word has been erroneously used for another, or a word omitted, and the context affords the means of correction, the proper word will be deemed substituted or supplied. This is but making the strict letter of the statute yield to the obvious intent." 2 Sutherland Stat.Const. § 410.

In 59 C. J. 992, in the discussion of the construction and operation of statutes, citing a large number of cases, it is stated: "Where it appears from the context that certain words have been inadvertently omitted from a statute, the Court may supply such words as are necessary to complete the sense and to express the legislative intent, but it cannot supply words purposely omitted and should supply an omission only when the omission is palpable and the omitted word plainly indicated by the context; and words will not be added except when necessary to make the statute conform to the obvious intent of the legislature, or to prevent the Act from being absurd; and where the legislative intent cannot be accurately determined because of the omission, the Court cannot add words to express what might or might not be intended."

See, also, Kennedy v. Gibson, 8 Wall. 498, 19 L.Ed. 476, where the word "by" was supplied in an act providing that "all suits against" certain corporations may be brought in proper courts, thus enabling suits to be brought by such corporations, the court, in supplying the word "by," saying: "The omission was doubtless accidental."

From an inspection of section 2 of the act under consideration, the omission of the words "imprisonment for" was doubtless accidental, and supplying them merely gives effect to that intent which is as-certainable with reasonable certainty from the express words of the act, and thereby obviates repugnancy and inconsistency.

To go further and add the words "not more than" before the words "ten years in the State penitentiary" enters the realm of probability, and not that of reasonable certainty based upon the express language of the act itself; but, as stated in U. S. v. Wiltberger, 5 Wheat. 76, 105, 5 L.Ed. 37, "Probability is not a guide which a court, in construing a penal statute, can safely take," for, in construing a statute, the intention of the Legislature is to be ascertained from the words employed to express such intent, and in the stated act there are no words which authorize the addition of the words "not more than."

The rule that penal laws are to be construed strictly is as old perhaps as the construction of laws itself, yet it is to be applied in connection with the modification of this ancient maxim that penal laws are to be construed strictly, they are not to be construed so strictly as to defeat the obvious intention of the Legislature. U. S. v. Wiltberger, supra.

C. Constitutional Limitations on Indefinite Expression

(i) IN SELF-EXECUTING STATUTES

WILLIAM H. TAFT, THE LEGISLATURE AND THE EXECUTION OF THE LAWS

12 Rep Pa.Bar Assn. 239, 246-247 (1906).

There is probably no branch of legislation in which the practical question of the enforcement of it should be so fully considered as in the framing of much needed criminal laws denouncing new abuses and evil results in the business of the country, induced by the intense spirit of competition and desire to monopolize and made possible by highly developed organization. In no class of cases should offenses attempted to be denounced be described with more clearness and exactness because the line between what is to remain lawful, and what is intended to be declared unlawful, must be narrow and must depend largely on motive and result, rather than on the intrinsic nature of the act itself. But it is just exactly these cases in which the Legislature thunders in the index, denounces in general terms not so much the means taken or the acts done as the undoubtedly evil result, and leaves it to the executive and the judiciary to work out the meaning of the Legislature, and by judicial legislation to piece out the indefinite, uncertain and unsatisfactory declaration of the law. The reason for this often is that the Legislature itself has a most indefinite idea of the proper method of describing and reaching the unquestioned evil which it wishes to prevent, so that it is unable to use the legal exactness of description proper in a criminal or repressive statute. The Sherman Anti-Trust Act is one which might have been made much more definite, in justice to the business community, in justice to the executive and to the courts required to enforce it, and a large part of the difficulty which has been experienced in attempted execution of that act is due, not at all to the lack of energy and courage on the part of the executive or courts in enforcing it, but to the indefiniteness of the act and the necessity for mending it or rendering it specific by judicial decision in such a way that it may become of practical use. The first section, against conspiracies in restraint of trade, is perhaps not so difficult to construe, but when it comes to the definition of what an unlawful monopoly is in interstate trade, it is no wonder that even at this late date, there has been no satisfactory judicial decision which can be used as a guide by those charged with the immediate execution of the law.

YU CONG ENG v. TRINIDAD

Supreme Court of the United States, 1926.
271 U.S. 500, 46 S.Ct. 619, 70 L.Ed. 1059.

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE TAFT delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case comes here on a writ of certiorari to review a decision of the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands denying an original petition for prohibition against the enforcement by criminal prosecution of Act No. 1972 of the Philippine Legislature, known as the Chinese Bookkeeping Act, on the ground of its invalidity. The petitioner, Yu Cong Eng, was charged by information in the court of first instance of Manila, with its violation. He was arrested, his books were seized, and the trial was about to proceed, when he and the other petitioner, Co Liam, on their own behalf, and on behalf of all the other Chinese merchants in the Philippines, filed the petition against the fiscal, or prosecuting attorney of Manila, and the collector of internal revenue engaged in the prosecution, and against the judge presiding. . . .

Act No. 2972, the validity of which is attacked, was passed by the Philippine Legislature, and approved February 21, 1921. It reads as follows:

"No. 2972. An act to provide in what languages account books shall be kept, and to establish penalties for its violation.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Philippines in Legislature assembled and by the authority of the same:

"Section 1. It shall be unlawful for any person, company, or partnership or corporation engaged in commerce, industry or any other activity for the purpose of profit in the Philippine Islands, in accordance with existing law, to keep its account books in any language other than English, Spanish or any local dialect.

"Sec. 2. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction, be punished by a fine of not more than ten thousand pesos, or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

"Sec. 3. This act shall take effect on November 1st, nineteen hundred and twenty-one."

This was amended as to its date by a subsequent act and it did not take effect until January 1, 1923. Various efforts were made to repeal the act or amend it, but they were defeated.

The petition, after setting out the prosecution in the court of first instance, and the text of the act, avers that the petitioner Yu Cong Eng is a Chinese merchant engaged in the wholesale lumber business in Manila; that he neither reads, writes nor understands the English or Spanish language or any local dialect; that he keeps the books of account of his business in Chinese characters; that by reason of his ignorance of the English and Spanish languages and of all local dialects he is unable to keep his books in any other language than his own; that, even if he should employ a bookkeeper capable of keeping his books in the English or Spanish language, he would have no means of personally revising or ascertaining the contents or correctness of the books thus kept; that the employment of such a bookkeeper, unless he should be a linguist, would entail as a necessary consequence the employment of a translator or interpreter familiar with the Chinese language and the language or dialect in which such books might be kept, in order to enable the petitioner to ascertain by hearsay the contents thereof; that he would be completely at the mercy of such employees, who, if dishonest, might cheat and defraud him of the proceeds of his business, and involve him in criminal or civil liability in its conduct; that under the provisions of the act he is prohibited from even keeping a duplicate set of accounts in his own language, and would, in the event of the enforcement of the law, be compelled to remain in total ignorance of the status of his business; and that the enforcement of the act would drive the petitioner and many other Chinese merchants in the Philippines who do 60 per cent. of the business of the Islands and who are in like circumstance, out of business.

The petition avers that the other petitioner in this case, Co Liam, is a Chinese person and conducts a small general merchandise business in Manila, commonly known in the Philippines as a Chinese tienda; that he carries a stock of goods of about 10,000 pesos, or $5,000; that his sales taxes amount to from 40 to 60 pesos per quarter; that he neither reads, writes, nor understands the English or Spanish language or any local dialect; that he keeps books of account of his small business in Chinese, the only language known to him, without the assistance of a bookkeeper; that he has been losing money for some time in the operation of his business, but that even in prosperous times his profits could never be sufficient to justify the employment of a Filipino bookkeeper, and that without the opportunity to keep Chinese books, he would be kept completely ignorant of the changing condition of his business, were he compelled to keep his books in English, Spanish, or a local dialect; and that the enforcement of the act would drive him and all the small merchants or tienda keepers in the Islands who are Chinese out of business.

The petitioners aver that the act, if enforced, will deprive the petitioners, and the 12,000 Chinese merchants whom they represent, of their liberty and property without due process of law, and deny them the equal protection of the laws, in violation of the Philippine Autonomy Act of Congress of August 29, 1916, c. 416, § 3, 39 Stat. 546 (Comp.St. § 3810).

An answer was filed by the fiscal, which is a general denial of the averments of the petition as to the effect of the law. He avers that the law is valid and necessary, and is only the exercise of proper legislative power, because the government of the Philippine Islands depends upon the taxes and imposts which it may collect in order to carry out its functions, and the determination of whether the mercantile operations of the merchants are or are not subject to taxation, as well as the fixing of its amount, cannot and ought not to be left to the mercy of those who are to bear it; that due to the inability of the officials of the internal revenue to revise and check up properly the correctness of the books of account which the Chinese merchants keep in their own language, the public treasury loses every year very large sums.

Evidence was taken on the issues made. A majority of the Supreme Court held that, if the act were construed and enforced literally, it would probably be invalid, but by giving it an interpretation different from the usual meaning of the words employed it could stand. Two of the justices dissented, on the ground that the court had exceeded its powers and by legislation made it a different act.

The majority of the Philippine court in its opinion, after quoting a number of authorities showing the duty of a court in determining whether a law is unconstitutional or not, first to give every intendment possible to its validity, and second to reach a reasonable construction by which it may be preserved, said:

"We come to the last question suggested, a construction of Act No. 2972 which allows the court legally to approve it.

"A literal application of the law would make it unlawful for any Chinese merchant to keep his account books in any language other than English, Spanish, or a local dialect. The petitioners say the law is susceptible of that interpretation. But such interpretation might, and probably would, cause us to hold the law unconstitutional.

"A second interpretation is that the Chinese merchant, while permitted to keep his books of account in Chinese, must also keep another set of books in either English, Spanish, or a native dialect. The respondents claim the law is susceptible of such construction. It occurs to us, however, that this construction might prove as unsatisfactory as the first. Fraud is possible in any language. As approximation to governmental convenience and an approximation to equality in taxation is the most which may be expected.

"A third construction, which is permissible in view of the history of the legislation and the wording of the statute, is that the law only intended to require the keeping of such books as were necessary in order to facilitate governmental inspection for tax purposes. It has not escaped our notice that the law does not specify what books shall be kept. It is stated by competent witnesses that a cash book, a journal, and a ledger are indispensable books of account for an efficient system of accounting, and that, in the smaller shops, even simpler entries showing merely the daily records of sales and record of purchases of merchandise would be sufficient. The keeping of records of sales, and possibly further records of purchases, in English, Spanish, or a native dialect, and the filling out of the necessary forms would serve the purpose of the government while not being oppressive. Actually, notations in English, Spanish, or a dialect of all sales in sales books, and of data in other specified forms are insisted upon by the Bureau of Internal Revenue, although as appears from Exhibit 2, it is doubtful if all Chinese merchants have complied with these regulations. The faithful observance of such rules by the Chinese is not far removed from the offer of co-operation oft made for them by the petitioners of the 'translation of the account books' oft mentioned and explained by the respondents.

"The law, in speaking of any person, company, partnership or corporation, makes use of the expression 'its account books.' Does the phrase 'its account books' mean that all the account books of the person, company, partnership or corporation must be kept exclusively in English, Spanish, or any local dialect? The petitioners argue that the law has this meaning. Or does the phrase 'its account books' mean that the persons, company, partnership, or corporation shall keep duplicate sets of account books, one set in Chinese and the other a translation into English, Spanish or any local dialect? Counsel for the respondents urge this construction of the law upon the court. Or does the phrase 'its account books' mean that the person, company, partnership, or corporation must keep such account books as are necessary for taxation purposes? This latter interpretation occurs to us as a reasonable one, and as best safeguarding the rights of the accused."

The court in effect concludes that what the Legislature meant to do was to require the keeping of such account books in English, Spanish, or the Filipino dialects as would be reasonably adapted to the needs of the taxing officers in preventing and detecting evasion of taxes, and that this might be determined from the statutes and regulations then in force. What the court really does is to change the law from one which by its plain terms forbids the Chinese merchants to keep their account books in any language except English, Spanish, or the Filipino dialects, and thus forbids them to keep account books in the Chinese, into a law requiring them to keep certain undefined books in the permitted languages. This is to change a penal prohibitive law to a mandatory law of great indefiniteness, to conform to what the court assumes was, or ought to have been, the purpose of the Legislature, and which in the change would avoid a conflict with constitutional restriction.

It would seem to us, from the history of the legislation and the efforts for its repeal or amendment, that the Philippine Legislature knew the meaning of the words it used, and intended that the act as passed should be prohibitory, and should forbid the Chinese merchants from keeping the account books of their business in Chinese. Had the Legislature intended only what the Supreme Court has construed it to mean, why should it not have amended it accordingly? Apparently the Legislature thought the danger to the revenue was in the secrecy of the Chinese books, and additional books in the permitted languages would not solve the difficulty.

We fully concede that it is the duty of a court in considering the validity of an act to give it such reasonable construction as can be reached to bring it within the fundamental law. But it is very clear that amendment may not be substituted for construction, and that a court may not exercise legislative functions to save the law from conflict with constitutional limitation.

One of the strongest reasons for not making this law a nose of wax, to be changed from that which the plain language imports, is the fact that it is a highly penal statute authorizing sentence of one convicted under it to a fine of not more than 10,000 pesos, or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both. If we change it to meet the needs suggested by other laws and fiscal regulations and by the supposed general purpose of the legislation, we are creating by construction a vague requirement, and one objectionable in a criminal statute. We are likely thus to trespass on the provision of the Bill of Rights that the accused is entitled to demand the nature and cause of the accusation against him, and to violate the principle that a statute which requires the doing of an act so indefinitely described that men must guess at its meaning, violates due process of law. Connally v. Construction Co., (decided January 4, 1926) 269 U.S. 385, 46 S.Ct. 126, 70 L.Ed. 322; United States v. Cohen Grocery Co., 255 U.S. 81, 41 S.Ct. 298, 65 L.Ed. 516, 14 A.L.R. 1045; International Harvester Co. v. Kentucky, 234 U.S. 216, 34 S.Ct. 853, 58 L.Ed. 1284; United States v. Reese, 92 U.S. 214, 219, 23 L.Ed. 563.

The main objection to the construction given to the act by the court below is that in making the act indefinitely mandatory instead of broadly prohibitory it creates a restriction upon its operation to make it valid that is not in any way suggested by its language. In several cases this court has pointed out that such strained construction, in order to make a law conform to a constitutional limitation, cannot be sustained. In United States v. Reese, 92 U.S. 214, 23 L.Ed. 563, the question for decision arose on a demurrer to an indictment against inspectors of municipal election for refusing to receive and count the vote of a colored man. The power of Congress to forbid such an act was confined under the Fifteenth Amendment to a refusal to receive such a vote from a colored man on account of his race, color, or previous condition of servitude, but the section under which the indictment was brought did not specifically confine the offense to a refusal for such a reason or to such discrimination, although in previous sections of the act there was a general purpose disclosed in the act to enforce the Fifteenth Amendment. The demurrer was sustained on the ground that the section was invalid.

"We are therefore directly called upon to decide whether a penal statute enacted by Congress, with its limited powers, which is in general language broad enough to cover wrongful acts without as well as within the constitutional jurisdiction, can be limited by judicial construction so as to make it operate only on that which Congress may rightfully prohibit and punish. For this purpose, we must take these sections of the statute as they are. We are not able to reject a part which is unconstitutional, and retain the remainder, because it is not possible to separate that which is unconstitutional, if there be any such, from that which is not. The proposed effect is not to be attained by striking out or disregarding words that are in the section, but by inserting those that are not now there. Each of the sections must stand as a whole, or fall altogether. The language is plain. There is no room for construction, unless it be as to the effect of the Constitution. The question then to be determined is whether we can introduce words of limitation into a penal statute, so as to make it specific, when, as expressed, it is general only. It would certainly be dangerous if the Legislature could set a net large enough to catch all possible offenders, and leave it to the courts to step inside and say who could be rightfully detained, and who should be set at large. This would, to some extent, substitute the judicial for the legislative department of the government."

And again the Chief Justice said:

"To limit this statute in the manner now asked for would be to make a new law, not to enforce an old one. This is no part of our duty."

The same principle was laid down, and this language approved by this court in the Trade-Mark Cases, 100 U.S. 82, 25 L.Ed. 550, in which, to save the validity of a general statute providing for trade-marks, the court was asked to construe the statute to apply only to trade-marks in interstate commerce. . . .

We hold the law in question to be invalid.

Judgment reversed.

BOSHUIZEN v. THOMPSON & TAYLOR CO. .

Supreme Court of Illinois, 1935. 360 Ill. 160, 195 N.E. 625.

HERRICK, JUSTICE. Gertrude Boshuizen (hereinafter called the plaintiff) brought suit in the superior court of Cook county against the Thompson & Taylor Company (hereinafter called the defendant) to recover damages under the provisions of paragraph (a) of section 15 of the Occupational Diseases Act (Smith-Hurd Ann.St. c. 48, § 87(a) for violation of section 1 of that act (section 73).

The amended complaint in part charged that the defendant is a corporation engaged in Chicago in the business of jobber of teas, coffees, and spices and is a roaster and importer of teas, coffees, and spices, and as an incident to said business the defendant engaged in the business of canning and packing pepper and other spices and preparing the same for market; that for a period of eleven months immediately prior to May 23, 1934, the plaintiff was in the employ of the defendant for hire, working in the defendant's plant in the canning and packing of pepper and other spices; that she was required in her employment to fill orders by pouring ground pepper and other spices into cans and other containers, to work in dust created by agencies used in the manufacturing process, to come into direct contact with dust created by such agencies, and to be exposed to irritating and injurious dusts; that the work and process carried on by the defendant was likely and liable to produce illness and disease peculiar to the process and work so carried on, and subjected the employees of the defendant, including the plaintiff, to the danger of illness and disease incident to such work and processes to which employees are ordinarily not exposed in other lines of employment, to wit, illness and disease caused by irritating and injurious dusts. The defendant filed a motion to dismiss the plaintiff's amended complaint, alleging, among other grounds, that section 1 of the Occupational Diseases Act violates, with other constitutional provisions, article 3 and section 2 of article 2 of the State Constitution and the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution. The trial court found section 1 of the act unconstitutional and entered judgment in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff for costs. From that judgment the plaintiff has taken an appeal direct to this court.

Section 1 of the Occupational Diseases Act is as follows: "That every employer of labor in this State, engaged in carrying on any work or process which may produce any illness or disease peculiar to the work or process carried on, or which subjects the employees to the danger of illness or disease incident to such work or process, to which employees are not ordinarily exposed in other lines of employment, shall, for the protection of all employees engaged in such work or process, adopt and provide reasonable and approved devices, means or methods for the prevention of such industrial or occupational diseases as are incident to such work or process." Smith-Hurd Ann. St. c. 48, § 73, Cahill's Rev.St. 1933, c. 48, par. 185, p. 1375.

For the purpose of passing upon the construction, validity, or constitutionality of a statute the court may resort to public official documents, public records, both state and national, and may take judicial notice of and consider the history of the legislation and the surrounding facts and circumstances in connection therewith. Davis v. Farmers' Co-operative Equity Co., 262 U.S. 312, 43 S.Ct. 556, 67 L.Ed. 996; 23 Corpus Juris, §§ 2001, 2005. Applying this rule, we find that the Occupational Diseases Act is a specific statute passed in 1911 as a result of the report and recommendation of the Occupational Diseases Commission appointed by the Governor pursuant to a joint resolution adopted by both branches of the General Assembly in 1907 (Laws 1907, p. 586), and continued by a like resolution in 1909 (Laws 1909, p. 488). This type of legislation was a complete stranger to the common law, and section 1 under consideration here has no common-law origin or history. First Nat. Bank v. Wedron Silica Co., 351 Ill. 560, 184 N.E. 897; Arquin v. Industrial Comm., 349 Ill. 220, 181 N.E. 613; Keeran v. Peoria, Bloomington & Champaign Traction Co., 277 Ill. 413, 115 N.E. 636; Adams v. Acme White Lead & Colors Works, 182 Mich. 157, 148 N.W. 485; Pennsylvania Pulverizing Co. v. Butler (C.C.A.) 61 F.(2d) 311. The section has no generally accepted body of precedents, no established standards of conduct, and no common knowledge or understanding on which it is bottomed. It therefore follows that the constitutionality of section 1 must be decided from an examination of the terms of that section alone. In determining the validity of section 1 we give due weight to the rule that where two divergent, reasonable meanings may be given a statute, the interpretation which supports the validity, rather than the one which strikes it down, is to be approved (Hunt v. Rosenbaum Grain Corp., 355 Ill. 504, 189 N.E. 907; People v. Anderson, 355 Ill. 289, 189 N.E. 338; People v. Dopp, 343 Ill. 521, 175 N.E. 812), and that the burden of showing the unconstitutionality of the statute rests upon the party assailing its validity.

Section 1 does not include employees engaged in extrahazardous occupations especially dangerous to the health of the employee, but only those employees engaged in nonhazardous industries. . . .

It is contended by the plaintiff that section 1 has been the law for many years and its provisions enforced by judgments of this court; that thereby the court has recognized its validity; that the rule is, where a statute has been recognized as valid, indirectly or directly, in numerous decisions, then the maxim of stare decisis should be applied and the statute be declared constitutional. There is merit in this position, but the rule cited is not inflexible. While section 1 has been in force over twenty years, yet it is only within recent years that cases based upon its provisions have reached this court, and there is not a long line of decisions of this court upon the subject. In People v. Bruner, 343 Ill. 146, 175 N.E. 400, decided in 1931, there was presented to this court for decision the issue whether the statute originally enacted in 1827, providing that juries in criminal cases should be the judges of the law as well as of the facts, offended the provisions of article 3 and section 5 of article 2 of the State Constitution. That statute had theretofore been before this court in different and varying forms in a very large number of cases, yet the decision in the Bruner Case held the act unconstitutional. It was said in the Bruner Case that though a statute had been interpreted and in force over a considerable period, yet where its constitutionality on the grounds charged has never been determined the statute is subject to attack on constitutional grounds. The statute granting to a master in chancery the power to grant writs of injunction when no judge authorized to grant such writs was present in the county was in 1923 declared unconstitutional in Bottom v. City of Edwardsville, 308 Ill. 68, 139 N.E. 5. That statute had been in force since 1845 and the power purported to be conferred by it had been frequently and commonly exercised. The rule deducible from the authorities is that even though a statute may be venerable, its old age does not render it immune against constitutional attacks.

Numerous cases are cited by the plaintiff wherein statutes speaking in general terms have been upheld. An examination of those cases will disclose that the employed words in those acts had acquired an intelligible and generally understood meaning at common law or had a definite, special, trade, or technical significance. The distinction between the two classes of statutes is aptly drawn in People v. Mancuso, 255 N.Y. 463, 175 N.E. 177, 76 A.L.R. 514. It is there pointed out that there are two types of legislative acts: (1) Those which prescribe a duty in terms sufficiently definite to guide those upon whom the duty is imposed, but such certainty must arise from words used having either a technical or special meaning sufficiently known and understandable to enable compliance therewith or which have acquired an established meaning through common law or established precedents. This class of statutes is valid. (2) Those wherein the statutory duty sought to be imposed is attempted to be defined in novel and unfamiliar terms which have not yet acquired any definiteness or certainty. This type of statutes is unconstitutional. The application of this rule of differentiation will readily harmonize what appears at first glance to be an irreconcilable conflict between the cases cited by the defendant and the plaintiff.

It is well to observe that section 1 does not attempt to state what "devices" the legislative mind contemplated—whether respirators, masks, a certain system of ventilation, or other mechanical devices. Did the Legislature by the words "means and methods" intend to prescribe stated medical examinations, limited hours of labor, construction of a type of building or structure to permit the maximum amount of sunshine and ventilation in the rooms or places where the labor was performed, or other different means or methods? The answer to this interrogatory, if the act is valid, must be found in section 1. To be valid the statute must prescribe a standard so definite, fixed, and understandable as to permit a compliance therewith by one who desires to meet its requirements. The statute need not specify and particularize the exact norm, but it must lay down a guide that has either a definite, fixed meaning at common law or by established and recognized precedents, or a trade, technical, or definite, specific meaning. A. B. Small Co. v. American Sugar Refining Co., 267 U.S. 233, 45 S.Ct. 295, 69 L.Ed. 589; Connally v. General Construction Co., 269 U.S. 385, 46 S.Ct. 126, 70 L.Ed. 322; Champlin Refining Co. v. Corporation Commission, 286 U.S. 210, 52 S.Ct. 559, 76 L.Ed. 1063, 86 A.L.R. 403. While the word "reasonable" has a fixed, definite meaning at common law as applied to a standard of degree and diligence, yet the word as used in section 1 cannot be given that sense, as it is employed as descriptive of the "devices, means or methods" commanded to be furnished and adopted by the employer. "Approved," as used in section 1, is not more intelligible than "reasonable" as employed in that same section. "Approved" has no definite, special, technical, trade, or common-law meaning or meaning by established precedents. By whom the approval mentioned is to be made is left open to conjecture. Is the approval contemplated that of the employer using the particular device, or some other employer or employers engaged in the same industry, or the public generally, or a court or jury trying a cause arising out of an alleged violation of section 1? Even though an act on its face appears to have a meaning, yet if it is not possible to give it a precise and intelligible application under the conditions intended for it to operate it is void. Mayhew v. Nelson, 346 Ill. 381, 178 N.E. 921; People v. Sholem, 294 Ill. 204, 128 N.E. 377; In re Di Torio (D.C.) 8 F.(2d) 279.

In the present age, conditions and methods in the industrial world change rapidly and often somewhat radically. What is modern to-day may be obsolete to-morrow. Section 1, so far as employers and employees fall within the purview of that act, purports to be complete in itself. From the reading of that section the employer must decide whether his industry is included in the class thereby created and whether he must provide the "reasonable and approved devices, means or methods," and what they are, for the prevention of occupational diseases incident to the work of his undertaking and for the violation of the terms of which he must answer in damages and also be liable to prosecution for a penalty. The employer must on his own initiative determine for himself whether any disease suffered by his employee is one "to which employees are not ordinarily exposed in other lines of employment," and in that connection must determine the sense in which the word "ordinarily" is used in the section. The section furnishes him no guide for the solution of either problem.

Under section 1 the employer must be able to forecast accurately the devices, means, and methods required of him to avoid liability under the statute. In a legal proceeding under section 1, by reason of its vagueness and indefiniteness, the rights of the parties are left to a court or jury for determination without a definite, certain, settled, and intelligible rule of conduct determined by the law for their guidance. It necessarily follows that juries in that situation would be the judges of the law as well as the evidence, and in case of trial without a jury the presiding judge would have no stable, definite, and certain rule of law for his guidance in administering justice between the parties. It would be unjust to hold the employer liable in the exercise of his business knowledge for his failure to guess correctly as to his duty under section 1 where the statute itself creates no criterion for his safe and sure guidance. Its provisions are so vague, indefinite, uncertain, and incomplete that no sufficiently clear and intelligible standard of duty is defined thereby. A statute which requires the performance of an act in terms so indefinite, uncertain, and puzzling that men of ordinary intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application transcends due process of law. Section 1 does not afford due process of law. . . . [Citing cases.]

Neither is the constitutionality of section 1, as urged by the plaintiff, saved by sections 11 and 12 of the act (Smith-Hurd Ann.St. c. 48, §§ 83, 84). Section 11, after stating it is the duty of the State Department of Factory Inspection to enforce the act and to prosecute violators thereof, proceeds as follows: "The Department of Factory Inspection shall give proper notice in regard to any violation of this act to any employer of labor in violating it, and directing the installment of any approved device, means or methods reasonably necessary, in his judgment, to protect the health of the employees therein, and such notice shall be written or printed," etc.

Section 12 is as follows: "If any occupation or industrial disease or illness or any disease or illness peculiar to the work or process carried on shall be found in any place of employment in this State by the inspectors of the State Department of Factory Inspection, or called to their attention by the State Board of Health, which disease or illness shall be caused in whole or in part, in the opinion of the inspector, by a disregard by the employer of the provisions of this act, or a failure on the part of the employer to adopt reasonable appliances, devices, means or methods which are known to be reasonably adequate and sufficient to prevent the contraction or continuation of any such disease or illness, it shall be the duty of the Department of Factory Inspection to immediately notify the employer in such place of employment, * * * to install adequate and approved appliances, devices, means or methods to prevent the contracting and continuance of any such disease or illness and to comply with all the provisions of this act." Smith-Hurd Ann.St. c. 48, § 84, Cahill's Rev.St.1933, c. 48, par. 196, p. 1376.

The term "any approved device, means or methods reasonably necessary," found in section 11, manifestly is no more definite than the words "reasonable and approved devices, means or methods" employed in section 1. It is urged by the plaintiff that the clause "reasonable appliances, devices, means or methods which are known to be reasonably adequate and sufficient to prevent the contraction or continuation of any such disease or illness" used in section 12 of the act, qualifies the word "reasonable" contained in section 1, and expresses the meaning of the word "reasonable" as used in section 1. Waiving for the moment the issue as to the constitutionality of sections 11 and 12 in conjunction with section 1, the latter section is not made sufficiently certain and specific by section 12 for the further reason it does not determine whose "knowledge" is a standard by which the determination of what devices, means, or methods are "known to be reasonably adequate and sufficient" is to be made. Whether the "knowledge" is that of the Department of Factory Inspection or its officers, a particular employer, employers generally, or the people generally, is left by the section to the conjecture and speculation of him who reads section 12. The question of whether a particular device, means, or method is "reasonably adequate and sufficient" is answered not by section 12 but is left to the opinion of experts whose judgments may materially differ one from the other, or as has often happened, the opinion of the same expert may change from time to time. It is apparent that the phrase "known to be reasonably adequate and sufficient" refers to the opinion of the factory inspector and no one else, for section 11 provides that the employer is required to install the devices, means or methods which are reasonably necessary, in the judgment of the State Department of Factory Inspection, to protect the health of the employees. If we grant for the purpose of this aspect of the case that sections 11 and 12 apply to section 1 and not to section 2 alone and the three sections 1, 11, and 12 are to be read together, we then immediately meet the important issue raised that if so construed there is then an unlawful delegation of legislative power to an administrative body, in violation of article 3 of the State Constitution. Sections 11 and 12 purport to grant to the State Department of Factory Inspection the power to determine what, in its judgment, are devices, means, or methods which employers should adopt, authorize such department to direct employers to install such devices, means, or methods, and the employer is commanded to obey the order of the department in that respect under pain of a penalty for refusal. If sections 11 and 12 each fail to promulgate any standard by which the judgment of the administrative department is to be measured, controlled, or limited, the department may arbitrarily decide "what appliances, devices, means or methods," in its judgment, are "approved," "reasonably necessary," "reasonable" or "known to be reasonably adequate and sufficient," or "adequate and approved." Neither section contains within its provisions any definite, permanent, certain test or objective standard. It has often been held by this court that the legislative department cannot constitutionally vest in the discretion of an administrative body the power to determine standards of duty not definitely found within the legislative act itself. . . .

The plaintiff with great earnestness urges that the case of Boll v. Condie-Bray Glass & Paint Co., 321 Mo. 92, 11 S.W.(2d) 48, 51, decides in accordance with her contention the very issues here involved. We have carefully examined that case but cannot accede to the plaintiff's claim that the case is determinative of the issues here presented. A distinction of material moment to be noted in the comparison of the Illinois and Missouri acts is that the Missouri act requires the furnishing of "adequate and approved means, methods or devices." The word "adequate" was apparently assumed as making the standard definite and certain. Moreover, the Missouri court in its opinion calls attention to the fact that the plaintiff there came within the provisions of a section of the act which required the employer to furnish "adequate and approved respirators." A respirator is a particular and specific device exacted by the Missouri act. Any employer knows what a respirator is. By eliminating the word "approved," as the court there did, the act required an "adequate . . . respirator." Again, the court there held that the defendant was in no position to urge the unconstitutionality of the statute requiring the employer to furnish "adequate means, methods, and devices," as he had never furnished any "means, methods, and devices" of any kind or character.

This court cannot cure the constitutional defects in a statute either by judicial amendment or construction, however beneficent the statute may be.

We are of the opinion that section 1 of the Occupational Diseases Act violates article 3 and section 2 of article 2 of the Constitution of this state and the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE

Did the court in the principal case require the same degree of definiteness to the language both as a "guide to the employer" and as a standard for the State Department of Factory Inspection? Cf. People v. Wilson Oil Co., infra.

STATE v. LANGLEY

Supreme Court of Wyoming, 1938. 53 Wyo. 332, 84 P.2d 767.

BLUME, CHIEF JUSTICE. An information was filed against the defendant in this case for unlawfully selling some merchandise at less than cost in violation of Section 2 of Chapter 73, Session Laws of Wyoming of 1937, which reads as follows:—

"It shall be unlawful for any person, partnership, firm, corporation, joint stock company, or other association engaged in business within this State, to sell, offer for sale or advertise for sale any article or product, at less than the cost thereof to such vendor, or give, offer to give or advertise the intent to give away any article or product for the purpose of injuring competitors and destroying competition.

"The term cost as applied to production is hereby defined as including the cost of raw materials, labor and all overhead expenses of the producer; and as applied to distribution cost shall mean the invoice or replacement cost, whichever is lower, of the article or product to the distributor and vendor plus the cost of doing business by said distributor and vendor.

"The cost of doing business or overhead expense is defined as all costs of doing business incurred in the conduct of such business and must include without limitation the following items of expense: labor, including salaries of executives and officers, rent, legal rate of interest on capital, depreciation, selling cost, maintenance of equipment, delivery costs, credit losses, all types of licenses, taxes, insurance and advertising."

Section 5 of the Act excepts from its provisions (a) merchandise sold in liquidation, (b) sales of perishable merchandise and seasonal goods, (c) damaged merchandise or merchandise deteriorated in quality sold as such, (d) merchandise sold under order of court, (e) merchandise sold in meeting the legal prices of a competitor. Section 12 of the Act provides as follows:

"The Legislature declares that the purpose of this Act is to safeguard the public against the creation or perpetuation of monopolies and to foster and encourage competition, by prohibiting unfair and discriminatory practices by which fair and honest competition is destroyed or prevented. This Act shall be literally construed that its beneficial purposes may be subserved."

The defendant entered a plea of guilty and thereafter filed a motion in arrest of judgment, claiming that the statute is unconstitutional as hereinafter mentioned. Thereupon, the court certified to us certain difficult constitutional questions, namely, whether Section 2, supra, is in violation of the 14th amendment of the Constitution of the United States, U.S.C.A.Const.Amend. 14, which provides: "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law," or in violation of Section 6 of Article 1 of the Constitution of Wyoming, which provides: "No person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law," or in violation of Section 7 of Article 1 of the Constitution of Wyoming, which provides that "absolute, arbitrary power over the lives, liberty and property of free men exists nowhere in a republic, not even in the largest majority." . . .

It is claimed that the statute is void for uncertainty, because it is impossible under it to determine the cost of merchandise. It is a general and universally accepted rule that in creating an offense which was not a crime at common law, a statute must be sufficiently certain to show what the legislature intended to prohibit and punish, otherwise it will be void for uncertainty. 16 C.J. 67. However, reasonable certainty is all that is required and liberal effect is always to be given to the legislative intent when possible. 16 C.J. 68. And if a statute is susceptible of two constructions, one of which will render it constitutional and the other unconstitutional, it is the duty of the court to adopt that construction which, without doing violence to the fair meaning of the language, will render it valid. 12 C.J. 788. Let us examine the section of the statute under consideration in the light of these rules.

The first paragraph of Section 2 of the act does not attempt to define the cost of each article, but merely forbids, under the conditions named, the sale or giving away of merchandise below cost. The second paragraph attempts to define the cost of a stock of merchandise, fixing it at invoice price or replacement cost, plus cost of labor and overhead expenses. That is a general definition, and it would seem that no exceptions to such definition could be taken, unless it is too indefinite. The third paragraph attempts to define somewhat more accurately the cost of doing business, or overhead expenses, and requires to be included therein labor, salaries, rent, interest on capital, depreciation, selling cost, maintenance of equipment, delivery cost, etc. The court in Balzer v. Caler, supra, thought that these various items were, by this section, to be added to each item of merchandise—instead of the proper proportion thereof. There seems to be no justification for such construction. These items must be included in the cost of doing business—nothing more. The proportion to be added to each item of merchandise is not attempted to be stated, but that this must be done is implied in the language of the statute. People v. Kahn, supra. It can scarcely be doubted that each of these items are proper items to be taken into consideration. The extent thereof is not stated, and the court in Balzer v. Caler, supra, thought that this should have been done. The court said on that point:

"Moreover, the statute fails to state what period of time is to be included in estimating overhead expenses which are to be added to the invoice price of the article to be sold so as to determine its cost for resale thereof. A merchant's stock of trade varies from time to time. Meats, bakery products and certain classes of groceries deteriorate rapidly. Is the merchant to take stock and hold an accounting every time he wishes to display for sale a few leader articles below normal price for the purpose of advertisement? For the purpose of such sales is he to estimate his average overhead expenses for the period of a year, or for a month, or is he to ascertain that sum on the very day on which he proposes to sell the forbidden article? By what standard is a merchant to determine such elements as depreciation of goods, selling cost, or credit losses? What is to be the measure of the value of his equipment? Is there to be no limit of expenditures for interest, insurance or advertising? The statute throws no light upon these perplexing problems. Every merchant is left to guess at the rules and standards to be applied and to determine for himself the period for which the overhead expenses are to be calculated. The section is therefore uncertain and void in that regard." 74 P.2d 845.

The argument at first blush seems formidable. But it would seem that, upon analysis, it will be found that if the legislature should attempt to do what that court intimates it should do, a greater interference with freedom of action would result than by the legislative act in question. Would it be feasible or advisable or consistent with inherent rights for the legislature to prescribe that a merchant shall not be permitted to spend more than a certain, limited amount for advertisement? Should it prescribe the amount for depreciation? If so, it would be required, in order to obviate constitutional objections, to make a multitude of classes, and be exceedingly careful in its classification, for the proper amount varies, as is pointed out in the above case, in the various classes of business. The proper period of time to be included in estimating overhead expenses may not be the same in the case of one merchant as in the case of another. Time may make little difference for a candy kitchen; three months time may be proper for a butcher; six months time for the clothier, for, by way of example, replacement cost may vary in the various classes of business. These illustrations suffice to show the obstacles in the way of the legislature to do what the California court above mentioned intimates should be done, and that these matters had better be left to general business methods. The legislature, doubtless, had such general business methods—reasonable standards of cost-accounting for the various classes of business—in mind and believed them to exist. If they do not exist—if cost cannot be ascertained—then the act in question should be held to be unconstitutional. If, on the other hand, the cost is ascertainable, under reasonable methods, then such cost is purely a question of fact, definite and certain, and the standard of conduct set by the legislature, too, is definite and certain. The non-existence of such reasonable methods cannot be presumed by the court, and if that is so, then the burden of showing it, in order that we might act upon it, was on the defendant, for upon him lies the duty to show the statute to be unconstitutional (12 C.J. 791-794), but no evidence was introduced in this case. Cost-accounting has been in vogue for centuries, as shown in the article on that subject in Vol. 6 of the 14th Edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica, and, as there shown, many books on that subject have been published from time to time. It is stated in Rieder v. Rogan, D.C., 12 F.Supp. 307, 318, that courts take judicial notice of the fact that modern systems of accounting have become very accurate. However that may be, it was, in any event, not alone the right, but the duty of the legislature in framing the statute in question to take into consideration the manner in which business is being done in the state. Nicol v. Ames, 173 U.S. 509, 19 S.Ct. 522, 43 L.Ed. 786. We may presume that it did so. Hence, we should hardly be justified, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, in holding that it did not have in mind such reasonable accounting methods in the belief that they in fact exist. Of course, no two merchants adopt exactly the same method. One man may be more cautious than another. One may allow more for depreciation, advertisement, etc., than another. One man may think that the percentage to be added to his invoice price should be that based on the overhead expenses of the past year; another may think that the past six months, or three months, should be the criterion. If a man just starts up in business, he necessarily, in order not to face bankruptcy, must act upon the experience of others, and obtain his information the best way he can. The invoice price of goods which come into the store is known. All else is more or less proximate, for the expenses may increase or decrease; the rapidity of the turn-over may fluctuate. All of these facts are well known. We cannot hold that the legislature did not know them. Knowing them, and composed of rational beings, we should assume that it took them into consideration and acted upon them, when it passed the law. Courts presume that it meant the law to be reasonable and just. 12 C.J. 790. Hence, in the absence of provisions to the contrary, we must presume that the legislature did not intend to prescribe that the cost must be absolutely exact, and that it must be based upon the precise method of accounting which any one merchant might adopt, but meant, by "cost," what business men generally mean, namely, the approximate cost arrived at by a reasonable rule. Hence, if a particular method adopted by a merchant cannot, under the facts disclosed, be said to be unreasonable, and does not disclose an intentional evasion of the law, the method so adopted should be accepted as correct. In other words, all that a man is required to do under the statute is to act in good faith. Hygrade Provision Co. v. Sherman, 266 U.S. 497, 45 S.Ct. 141, 69 L.Ed. 402. In that view of the case, the standard set by the legislature is virtually reduced to one of "reasonableness." And it is held that "reasonableness" as "the standard of an act, which can be determined objectively from circumstances, is a common, widely-used, and constitutionally valid standard in law." People v. Curtiss, 116 Cal.App.Supp. 771, 300 P. 801, 805, and cases cited. Construed as here mentioned, the statute may, in so far as here discussed, be upheld. There is ample authority for this conclusion. Some of them have gone much farther than it is necessary to go herein—perhaps too far. It appears in State v. Atlantic Ice & Coal Co., 210 N.C. 742, 188 S.E. 412, 413, that the legislature made it unlawful to sell any article by lowering the price so as to leave an unreasonable or inadequate profit for a time, with the purpose of increasing the profit later. The court held the act sufficiently definite. In Nash v. United States, 229 U.S. 373, 33 S.Ct. 780, 57 L.Ed. 1232, the defendant was indicted for conspiracy in restraint of trade, by selling, among other acts, far below cost in order to compel competitors to meet prices ruinous to everybody, and by fixing the price of turpentine below the cost of production, for the purpose of driving competitors out of business. The charge was held sufficiently definite. The Federal Trade Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 45, provides that "unfair methods of competition in commerce are declared unlawful." That, it may be noted, is a sweeping provision, fixing no standard at all. The provision was attacked in the case of Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 7 Cir., 258 F. 307, 6 A.L.R. 358. The court, in holding it not void, stated [page 310]:

"Petitioner urges that the declaration of Sec. 5 must be held void for indefiniteness unless the words 'unfair methods of competition' be construed to embrace no more than acts which on September 26, 1914, when Congress spoke, were identifiable as acts of unfair trade then condemned by the common law as expressed in prior cases. But the phrase is no more indefinite than 'due process of law.' The general idea of that phrase as it appears in Constitutions and statutes is quite well known; but we have never encountered what purported to be an all-embracing schedule or found a specific definition that would bar the continuing processes of judicial inclusion and exclusion based upon accumulating experience. If the expression 'unfair methods of competition' is too uncertain for use, then under the same condemnation would fall the innumerable statutes which predicate rights and prohibitions upon 'unsound mind,' 'undue influence,' 'unfaithfulness,' 'unfair use,' 'unfit for cultivation,' 'unreasonable rate,' 'unjust discrimination,' and the like. This statute is remedial, and orders to desist are civil; but even in criminal law convictions are upheld on statutory prohibitions of 'rebates or concessions' or of 'schemes to defraud,' without any schedule of facts or specific definition of forbidden conduct, thus leaving the courts free to condemn new and ingenious ways that were unknown when the statutes were enacted." . . .

In Omaechevarria v. Idaho, 246 U.S. 343, 38 S.Ct. 323, 62 L.Ed. 763, it appears that the legislature made it unlawful to herd sheep on a range previously occupied by cattle. It was claimed that the statute was too indefinite because it failed to provide for the ascertainment of the boundaries of a range and for determining what length of time was necessary to constitute a prior occupation a usual one within the meaning of the act. The court held it sufficiently definite, and stated that [page 325] "furthermore, any danger to sheep men which might otherwise arise from indefiniteness is removed" by reason of the fact that a criminal intent was necessary to constitute a crime under the act. The same point was mentioned in People v. Kahn, supra, and Hygrade Provision Co. v. Sherman, supra, and is applicable here, although it need not be determined how much importance should be attached to it. It may often be difficult to prove the intent required by the statute, particularly in criminal cases. . . . We are not concerned with that point in the case at bar in view of the plea of guilty herein. We should add, that the statute has a number of exceptions and provides that the law shall not be applicable under circumstances—or at least many or most circumstances—which make it impossible or improper for a merchant to sell goods at or above cost. The statute, then, should not prove to be a burden to anyone who acts in good faith.

The question of definiteness of the law has herein been fully considered by the writer hereof. It is his opinion that while the defendant by his plea of guilty admitted that he sold below cost with the intent mentioned in the statute, the question is whether these acts constitute a crime; that if they do not, because of the indefiniteness of the law, punishment for his acts in such case would not be due process of law . . . ; that the point should, accordingly be decided in this case. My learned associates, however, constituting the majority of the court, think that the point is not involved in this case. Their reasons, briefly stated, are these: The constitutional objection on the ground of indefiniteness is because the statute provides that the "cost of doing business," as therein defined, may be added to the invoice or replacement cost as a part of the "cost" of the article sold. The asserted defect is that the "cost of doing business" may not be known to the seller. The defendant, however, by his plea of guilty, admits making the sale below cost for the purposes denounced by the statute. It must be assumed that he knew the cost of the article, and it may be that the sale alleged in the information was for a price less than the invoice or replacement cost. Defendant's cost of doing business was not determined by the trial court, and may not have been estimated or considered by defendant in making his plea of guilty. In these circumstances a majority of the court are of opinion that it is unnecessary in this case to discuss those parts of the statute which undertake to define the cost of doing business; . . . that the contention that the statute is invalid for indefiniteness might not have been made if defendant had anticipated our holding that a sale for less than cost was criminal only when made "for the purpose of injuring competitors and destroying competition." See Hygrade Provision Co. v. Sherman, 266 U.S. 497, 501, 45 S.Ct. 141, 69 L.Ed. 402; Omaechevarria v. Idaho, supra.

With the reservation made by the majority of the court as above mentioned, the constitutional questions submitted to us are answered in the negative. We might add that no other sections of the statute except those herein mentioned have been considered.

RINER and KIMBALL, JJ., concur, with the reservations above mentioned.

GORIN v. UNITED STATES.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1941.
312 U.S. 19, 61 S.Ct. 429, 85 L.Ed. 488.

MR. JUSTICE REED delivered the opinion of the Court.

This certiorari brings here a judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals affirming the sentences of the two petitioners who were convicted of violation of the Espionage Act of June 15, 1917, 50 U.S.C.A. § 31 et seq., 9 Cir., 111 F.2d 712. As the affirmance turned upon a determination of the scope of the Act and its constitutionality as construed, the petition was allowed because of the questions, important in enforcing this criminal statute.

The joint indictment in three counts charged in the first count violation of section 1(b) by allegations in the words of the statute of obtaining documents "connected with the national defense"; in the second count violation of section 2(a) in delivering and inducing the delivery of these documents to the petitioner, Gorin, the agent of a foreign nation; and in the third count of section 4 by conspiracy to deliver them to a foreign government and its agent, just named. The pertinent statutory provisions appear below.¹ A third party, the wife of

"Title 1. Espionage. Section 1. That (a) whoever, for the purpose of obtaining information respecting the national defense with intent or reason to believe that the information to be obtained is to be used to the injury of the United States, or to the advantage of any foreign nation, goes upon, enters, flies over, or otherwise obtains information concerning any vessel, aircraft, work of defense, navy yard, naval station, submarine base, coaling station, fort, battery, torpedo station, dockyard, canal, railroad, arsenal, camp, factory, mine, telegraph, telephone, wireless, or signal station, building, office, or other place connected with the national defense, . . . or any place in which any vessel, aircraft, arms, munitions, or other materials or instruments for use in time of war are being made, prepared, repaired, or stored . . . ; or (b) whoever for the purpose aforesaid, and with like intent or reason to believe, copies, takes, makes, or obtains, or attempts, or induces or aids another to copy, take, make, or obtain, any sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blue print, plan, map, model, instrument, appliance, document, writing, or note of anything connected with the national defense; . . . shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000, or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

"Sec. 2. (a) Whoever, with intent or reason to believe that it is to be used to the injury of the United States or to the advantage of a foreign nation, communicates, delivers, or transmits, or attempts to, or aids or induces another to, communicate, Gorin, was joined in and acquitted on all three counts. The petitioners were found guilty on each count and sentenced to various terms of imprisonment to run concurrently and fines of $10,000 each. The longest term of Gorin is six years and of Salich four years.

The proof indicated that Gorin, a citizen of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, acted as its agent in gathering information. He sought and obtained from Salich for substantial pay the contents of over fifty reports relating chiefly to Japanese activities in the United States. These reports were in the files of the Naval Intelligence branch office at San Pedro, California. Salich, a naturalized, Russian-born citizen, had free access to the records as he was a civilian investigator for that office. Speaking broadly the reports detailed the coming and going on the west coast of Japanese military and civil officials as well as private citizens whose actions were deemed of possible interest to the Intelligence Office. Some statements appear as to the movements of fishing boats, suspected of espionage and as to the taking of photographs of American war vessels.

Petitioners object to the convictions principally on the grounds (1) that the prohibitions of the act are limited to obtaining and delivering information concerning the specifically described places and things set out in the act, such as a vessel, aircraft, fort, signal station, code or signal book; and (2) that an interpretation which put within the statute the furnishing of any other information connected with or relating to the national defense than that concerning these specifically described places and things would make the act unconstitutional as violative of due process because of indefiniteness.

The philosophy behind the insistence that the prohibitions of sections 1(b) and 2(a), upon which the indictment is based, are limited deliver, or transmit, to any foreign government, or to any faction or party or military or naval force within a foreign country, whether recognized or unrecognized by the United States, or to any representative, officer, agent, employee, subject, or citizen thereof, either directly or indirectly, any document, writing, code book, signal book, sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blue print, plan, map, model, note, instrument, appliance, or information relating to the national defense, shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than twenty years: Provided, That whoever shall violate the provisions of subsection (a) of this section in time of war shall be punished by death or by imprisonment for not more than thirty years; and (b) whoever, in time of war, with intent that the same shall be communicated to the enemy, shall collect, record, publish, or communicate, or attempt to elicit any information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the armed forces, ships, aircraft, or war materials of the United States, or with respect to the plans or conduct, or supposed plans or conduct of any naval or military operations, or with respect to any works or measures undertaken for or connected with, or intended for the fortification or defense of any place, or any other information relating to the public defense, which might be useful to the enemy, shall be punished by death or by imprisonment for not more than thirty years.

"Sec. 4. If two or more persons conspire to violate the provisions of sections two or three of this title, and one or more of such persons does any act to effect the object of the conspiracy, each of the parties to such conspiracy shall be punished as in said sections provided in the case of the doing of the act the accomplishment of which is the object of such conspiracy. . . ."

to the places and things which are specifically set out in section 1(a) relies upon the traditional freedom of discussion of matters connected with national defense which is permitted in this country. It would require, urge petitioners, the clearest sort of declaration by the Congress to bring under the statute the obtaining and delivering to a foreign government for its advantage of reports generally published and available which deal with food production, the advances of civil aeronautics, reserves of raw materials or other similar matters not directly connected with and yet of the greatest importance to national defense. The possibility of such an interpretation of the terms "connected with" or "relating to" national defense is to be avoided by construing the act so as "to make it a crime only to obtain information as to places and things specifically listed in section 1 as connected with or related to the national defense." Petitioners argue that the statute should not be construed so as to leave to a jury to determine whether an innocuous report on a crop yield is "connected" with the national defense. . . .

An examination of the words of the statute satisfies us that the meaning of national defense in sections 1(b) and 2(a) cannot be limited to the places and things specified in section 1(a). Certainly there is no such express limitation in the later sections. Section 1(a) lays down the test of purpose and intent and then defines the crime as going upon or otherwise obtaining information as to named things and places connected with the national defense. Section 1(b) adopts the same purpose and intent of 1(a) and then defines the crime as copying, taking or picturing certain articles such as models, appliances, documents, and so forth of anything connected with the national defense. None of the articles specified in 1(b) are the same as the things specified in 1(a). Apparently the draftsmen of the act first set out the places to be protected, and included in that connotation ships and planes and then in 1(b) covered much of the contents of such places in the nature of plans and documents. Section 2(a), it will be observed, covers in much the same way the delivery of these movable articles or information to a foreign nation or its agent. If a government model of a new weapon were obtained or delivered there seems to be little logic in making its transfer a crime only when it is connected in some undefined way with the places catalogued under 1(a). It is our view that it is a crime to obtain or deliver, in violation of the intent and purposes specified, the things described in sections 1(b) and 2(a) without regard to their connection with the places and things of 1(a).

In each of these sections the document or other thing protected is required also to be "connected with" or "relating to" the national defense. The sections are not simple prohibitions against obtaining or delivering to foreign powers information which a jury may consider relating to national defense. If this were the language, it would need to be tested by the inquiry as to whether it had double meaning or forced anyone, at his peril, to speculate as to whether certain actions violated the statute. This Court has frequently held criminal laws deemed to violate these tests invalid. United States v. Cohen Grocery

Company⁹, urged as a precedent by petitioners, points out that the statute there under consideration forbade no specific act,¹⁰ that it really punished acts "detrimental to the public interest when unjust and unreasonable" in a jury's view. In *Lanzetta v. New Jersey*¹¹ the statute was equally vague. "Any person not engaged in any lawful occupation, known to be a member of any gang . . . , who has been convicted at least three times of being a disorderly person or who has been convicted of any crime in this or in any other state, is declared to be a gangster" We there said that the statute "condemns no act or omission"; that the vagueness is such as to violate due process.¹²

But we find no uncertainty in this statute which deprives a person of the ability to predetermine whether a contemplated action is criminal under the provisions of this law.¹³ The obvious delimiting words in the statute are those requiring "intent or reason to believe that the information to be obtained is to be used to the injury of the United States, or to the advantage of any foreign nation." This requires those prosecuted to have acted in bad faith. The sanctions apply only when scienter is established.¹⁴ Where there is no occasion for secrecy, as with reports relating to national defense, published by authority of Congress or the military departments there can, of course, in all likelihood be no reasonable intent to give an advantage to a foreign government. Finally, we are of the view that the use of the words "national defense" has given them as here employed, a well understood connotation. They were used in the Defense Secrets Act of 1911.¹⁵ The traditional concept of war as a struggle between nations is not changed by the intensity of support given to the armed forces by civilians or the extension of the combat area. National defense, the Government maintains, "is a generic concept of broad connotations, referring to the military and naval establishments and the related activities of national preparedness." We agree that the words "national defense" in the Espionage Act carry that meaning. Whether a document or report is covered by sections 1(b) or 2(a) depends upon their relation to the national defense, as so defined, not upon their connection with places specified in section 1(a). The language employed appears sufficiently definite to apprise the public of prohibited activities and is consonant with due process.

At the conclusion of all the evidence petitioners sought a directed verdict of acquittal because (1) the innocuous character of the evidence forbade a conclusion that petitioners had intent or reason to believe that the information was to be used to the injury of the United States or the advantage of a foreign nation and (2) the evidence failed to disclose that any of the reports related to or was connected with the national defense. As a corollary to this second contention, reversal is sought on the ground that the trial court overruled the petitioners' objection that as a matter of law none of the reports dealt with national defense. That is, as the trial court stated the objection, that "the jury has no privilege in determining whether or no any of these reports have to do with the national defense, that that is a matter for the Court and not for the jury, as a matter of law."

An examination of the instructions convinces us that no injustice was done petitioners by their content. Weighed by the test previously outlined of relation to the military establishments, they are favorable to petitioners' contentions. A few excerpts will make this clear:

"You are instructed that the term 'national defense' includes all matters directly and reasonably connected with the defense of our nation against its enemies. . . . As you will note, the statute specifically mentions the places and things connected with or comprising the first line of defense when it mentions vessels, aircraft, works of defense, fort or battery and torpedo stations. You will note, also, that the statute specifically mentions by name certain other places or things relating to what we may call the secondary line of national defense.

Thus some at least of the storage of reserves of men and materials is ordinarily done at naval stations, submarine bases, coaling stations, dock yards, arsenals and camps; all of which are specifically designated in the statute. . . . You are instructed in the first place that for purposes of prosecution under these statutes, the information, documents, plans, maps, etc., connected with these places or things must directly relate to the efficiency and effectiveness of the operation of said places or things as instruments for defending our nation. . . . You are instructed that in the second place the information, documents or notes must relate to those angles or phases of the instrumentality, place or thing which relates to the defense of our nation; thus if a place or thing has one use in peace time and another use in wartime, you are to distinguish between information relating to the one or the other use. . . .

"The information, document or note might also relate to the possession of such information by another nation and as such might also come within the possible scope of this statute. . . . For from the standpoint of military or naval strategy it might not only be dangerous to us for a foreign power to know our weaknesses and our limitations, but it might also be dangerous to us when such a foreign power knows that we know that they know of our limitations.

"You are, then, to remember that the information, documents or notes, which are alleged to have been connected with the national defense, may relate or pertain to the usefulness, efficiency or availability of any of the above places, instrumentalities or things for the defense of the United States of America. The connection must not be a strained one nor an arbitrary one. The relationship must be reasonable and direct."

Petitioners' objection, however, is that after having given these instructions, the court instead of determining whether the reports were or were not connected with national defense, left this question to the jury in these words:

"Whether or not the information, obtained by any defendant in this case, concerned, regarded or was connected with the national defense is a question of fact solely for the determination of this jury, under these instructions."

These quotations show that the trial court undertook to give to the jury the tests by which they were to determine whether the acts of the petitioners were connected with or related to the national defense. We are of the opinion this was properly left to the jury. If we assume, as we must here after our earlier discussion as to the definiteness of the statute, that the words of the statute are sufficiently specific to advise the ordinary man of its scope, we think it follows that the words of the instructions give adequate definition to "connected with" or "relating to" national defense. The inquiry directed at the instructions is whether the jury is given sufficient guidance to enable it to determine whether the acts of the petitioners were within the prohibitions. These instructions set out the definition of national defense in a manner favorable and unobjectionable to petitioners. When they refer to facts connected with or related to defense, however, petitioners urge that the connection should be determined by the court. Instructions can, of course, go no farther than to say the connection must be reasonable, direct and natural. Further elaboration would not clarify. The function of the court is to instruct as to the kind of information which is violative of the statute and of the jury to decide whether the information secured is of the defined kind. It is not the function of the court, where reasonable men may differ to determine whether the acts do or do not come within the ambit of the statute. The question of the connection of the information with national defense is a question of fact to be determined by the jury as negligence upon undisputed facts is determined.

In a trial under an indictment for violation of section 3¹⁷ of this same Espionage Act, this Court had occasion to consider a similar question as to the function of the jury. A pamphlet was introduced as evidence of making false statements with the intent to cause insubordination. To the objection that the pamphlet could not legitimately be construed as tending to produce the prohibited consequences this Court said: "What interpretation ought to be placed upon the pamphlet, what would be the probable effect of distributing it in the mode adopted, and what were defendants' motives in doing this, were questions for the jury, not the court, to decide. . . . Whether the printed words would in fact produce as a proximate result a material interference with the recruiting or enlistment service, or the operation or success of the forces of the United States, was a question for the jury to decide in view of all the circumstances of the time and considering the place and manner of distribution."¹⁸

Viewing the instructions as a whole, we find no objection sufficient to justify reversal.

The Circuit Court of Appeals properly refused to consider the errors alleged with respect to the conspiracy count.¹⁹

NOTE

Commenting on Gorin v. United States in 29 Calif.L.Rev. 548, 551, the author says: "The facts of the case are significant in suggesting a phase of the void-for-vagueness doctrine which does not appear to have been raised as yet either in the cases or discussions of the doctrine. Does a defendant (or party, in a civil suit) always have standing to question the statute as vague? Suppose, for example, a statute makes it a crime to operate an automobile at a 'highly excessive rate of speed.' A defendant who drove 35 miles per hour in a suburban zone might well argue that the statute was too vague for him to know whether his conduct was a crime. But could one who drove 80 miles per hour in the same place seriously make this plea? There is abundant authority in other situations where due process is used to challenge a statute that the challenger must in fact be one against whom the statute operates without due process. It is not sufficient to show that the statute violates due process as to some other person included within its terms. So also, in cases involving the equal protection clause, he who attacks the statute must show himself to be a member of the class against whom the statute is arbitrarily discriminatory. Why, then, is this doctrine not equally applicable to the void-for-vagueness rule? Clearly, testing the vagueness of the statute with relation to the conduct of the defendant or litigant challenging it in the particular case would be in accord with fundamental procedure in constitutional law.

"In the Gorin case, though it was not mentioned in the opinion, probably the most impelling reason why the Court held the term definite was that any other result would have cast serious doubt on much of the recent legislation arising out of the present war. The decision could more safely have been rested on the constitutional ground suggested above, for however vague the penumbra of information 'concerned with' or 'relating to' national defense may be as an abstract question, certainly confidential reports in the Naval Intelligence office are well within the terms. Application of this approach to the void-for-vagueness cases seems eminently desirable. This would preclude the use of the doctrine as a shield for the obviously guilty, and yet would prevent application of a vague statute where injustice would result. E. S. W."

UNITED STATES v. PETRILLO

Supreme Court of the United States, 1947.

332 U.S. 1, 67 S.Ct. 1538, — L.Ed. —.

MR. JUSTICE BLACK delivered the opinion of the Court.

The District Court dismissed a criminal information filed against the respondent, James C. Petrillo, on the ground that the statute on which the information was founded was unconstitutional. 68 F.Supp. 845. The case is here on direct appeal by the Government as authorized by the Criminal Appeals Act. 18 U.S.C., Supp. V, § 682, 18 U.S.C.A. § 682. The information charged a violation of the Communications Act of 1934, 48 Stat. 1064, 1102, as amended by an Act of April 16, 1946. 60 Stat. 89. 47 U.S.C.A. § 506. The specific provisions of the Amendment charged to have been violated read:

"Sec. 506. (a) It shall be unlawful, by the use or express or implied threat of the use of force, violence, intimidation, or duress, or by the use or express or implied threat of the use of other means, to coerce, compel or constrain or attempt to coerce, compel, or constrain a licensee—

"(1) to employ or agree to employ, in connection with the conduct of the broadcasting business of such licensee, any person or persons in excess of the number of employees needed by such licensee to perform actual services; or

"(d) Whoever willfully violates any provision of subsection (a) or (b) of this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year or by a fine of not more than $1,000, or both." Pub.L.No.344, 79th Cong., 2d Sess.

The information alleged that a radio broadcasting company, holding a federal license, had, for several years immediately preceding, employed "certain persons who were sufficient and adequate in number to perform all of the actual services needed . . . in connection with the conduct of its broadcasting business." The information further charged that the respondent, Petrillo, "wilfully, by the use of force, intimidation, duress and by the use of other means, did attempt to coerce, compel and constrain said licensee to employ and agree to employ, in connection with the conduct of its radio broadcasting business, three additional persons not needed by said licensee to perform actual services"

The coercion was allegedly accomplished in the following manner:

"(1) By directing and causing three musicians, members of the Chicago Federation of Musicians, theretofore employed by the said licensee in connection with the conduct of its broadcasting business, to discontinue their employment with said licensee;

"(2) By directing and causing said three employees and other persons, members of the Chicago Federation of Musicians, not to accept employment by said licensee; and

"(3) By placing and causing to be placed a person as a picket in front of the place of business of said licensee."

The only challenge to the information was a motion to dismiss on the ground that the Act on which the information was based (a) abridges freedom of speech in contravention of the First Amendment; (b) is repugnant to the Fifth Amendment because it defines a crime in terms that are excessively vague, and denies equal protection of the law and liberty of contract; (c) imposes involuntary servitude in violation of the Thirteenth Amendment. The District Court dismissed the information, holding that the 1946 Amendment on which it was based violates the First, Fifth, and Thirteenth Amendments.

Two general principles which concern our disposition of appeals involving constitutional questions have special application to this case: We have consistently refrained from passing on the constitutionality of a statute until a case involving it has reached a stage where the decision of a precise constitutional issue is a necessity. The reasons underlying this principle and illustrations of the strictness with which it has been applied appear in the opinion of the Court in the Rescue Army v. Municipal Court, 331 U.S. —, 67 S.Ct. 130, and cases there collected. And in reviewing a direct appeal from a District Court under the Criminal Appeals Act, supra, our review is limited to the validity or construction of the contested statute. For "The Government's appeal does not open the whole case." United States v. Borden Co., 308 U.S. 188, 193, 60 S.Ct. 182, 186, 84 L.Ed. 181.

First. One holding of the District Court was that, as contended here, the statute is repugnant to the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment because its words, "number of employees needed by such licensee," are so vague, indefinite and uncertain that "persons of ordinary intelligence cannot in advance tell whether a certain action or course of action would be within its prohibition . . ." The information here, up to the place where it specifically charges the particular means used to coerce the licensee, substantially employs this statutory language. And the motion to dismiss on the ground of vagueness and indefiniteness squarely raises the question of whether the section invoked in the indictment is void in toto, barring all further actions under it, in this, and every other case. Cf. United States v. Thompson, 251 U.S. 407, 412, 40 S.Ct. 289, 291, 64 L.Ed. 333. Many questions of a statute's constitutionality as applied can best await the refinement of the issues by pleading, construction of the challenged statute and pleadings, and, sometimes, proof. Rescue Army v. Municipal Court, supra; Watson v. Buck, 313 U.S. 387, 402, 61 S.Ct. 962, 967, 85 L.Ed. 1416. Borden's Farm Products Company v. Baldwin, 293 U.S. 194, 204, 210, and concurring opinion at page 213, 55 S.Ct. 187, 189, 192, at page 193, 79 L.Ed. 281. But no refinement or clarification of issues which we can reasonably anticipate would bring into better focus the question of whether the contested section is written so vaguely and indefinitely that one whose conduct it affected could only guess what it meant. Consequently, since this phase of the appeal raises a question of validity of a statute within our jurisdiction under the Criminal Appeals Act, supra, and is ripe for our decision, we turn to the merits of the contention.

We could not sustain this provision of the Act if we agreed with the contention that persons of ordinary intelligence would be unable to know when their compulsive actions would force a person against his will to hire employees he did not need. Connally v. General Construction Co., 269 U.S. 385, 391, 46 S.Ct. 126, 127, 70 L.Ed. 322; Lanzetta v. State of New Jersey, 306 U.S. 451, 59 S.Ct. 618, 83 L.Ed. 888. But we do not agree. Of course, as respondent points out, there are many factors that might be considered in determining how many employees are needed on a job. But the same thing may be said about most questions which must be submitted to a fact-finding tribunal in order to enforce statutes. Certainly, an employer's statements as to the number of employees "needed" is not conclusive as to that question. It, like the alleged wilfulness of a defendant, must be decided in the light of all the evidence.

Clearer and more precise language might have been framed by Congress to express what it meant by "number of employees needed." But none occurs to us, nor has any better language been suggested, effectively to carry out what appears to have been the Congressional purpose. The argument really seems to be that it is impossible for a jury or court ever to determine how many employees a business needs, and that, therefore, no statutory language could meet the problem Congress had in mind. If this argument should be accepted, the result would be that no legislature could make it an offense for a person to compel another to hire employees, no matter how unnecessary they were, and however desirable a legislature might consider suppression of the practice to be.

The Constitution presents no such insuperable obstacle to legislation. We think that the language Congress used provides an adequate warning as to what conduct falls under its ban, and marks boundaries sufficiently distinct for judges and juries fairly to administer the law in accordance with the will of Congress. That there may be marginal cases in which it is difficult to determine the side of the line on which a particular fact situation falls is no sufficient reason to hold the language too ambiguous to define a criminal offense. Robinson v. United States, 324 U.S. 282, 285, 286, 65 S.Ct. 666, 668, 669, 89 L.Ed. 944. It would strain the requirement for certainty in criminal law standards too near the breaking point to say that it was impossible judicially to determine whether a person knew when he was wilfully attempting to compel another to hire unneeded employees. See Screws v. United States, 325 U.S. 91, 65 S.Ct. 1031, 89 L.Ed. 1495, 162 A.L.R. 1330; United States v. Ragen, 314 U.S. 513, 522, 524, 525, 62 S.Ct. 374, 377, 378, 379, 86 L.Ed. 383. The Constitution has erected procedural safeguards to protect against conviction for crime except for violation of laws which have clearly defined conduct thereafter to be punished; but the Constitution does not require impossible standards. The language here challenged conveys sufficiently definite warning as to the proscribed conduct when measured by common understanding and practices. The Constitution requires no more. . . .

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER, wrote a concurring opinion.

MR. JUSTICE REED, dissenting.

I dissent from the opinion and judgment of the Court. My reason for disagreement is that § 506(a) (1) of the Communications Act is too indefinite in its description of the prohibited acts to support an information or indictment for violation of its provisions. My objection is not the words in the first paragraph of § 506 that make unlawful in labor matters the use of threats, force, violence, intimidation or duress against an employer. There is a background of experience and common understanding that ordinarily gives such words, when used in criminal statutes, sufficient definiteness to acquaint the public with the limits of the proscribed acts. When such words are used, they place upon those affected the risk of estimating incorrectly the sort of action that may ultimately be held to violate the statutes. Nash v. United States, 229 U.S. 373, 33 S.Ct. 780, 57 L.Ed. 1232.

My objection is to the indefiniteness of the statutory description of the thing for which force must not be used—this is, “to compel” a licensee under the Communications Act “to employ . . . any person or persons in excess of the number of employees needed by such licensee to perform actual services.”

This criminal statute is the product of legislation directed at the control of acts deemed evil by Congress. It is one of the many regulatory acts that legislative bodies have passed in recent years to make unlawful certain practices in the field of economics that seemed contrary to the public interest.¹ These statutes made new crimes. Deeds theretofore not subject to punishment fall within the general scope of their prohibition. Common experience has not created a general understanding of their criminality. Consequently, in order to adequately inform the public of the limitations on conduct, a more precise definition of the crime is necessary to meet constitutional requirements.²

Anglo-American law does not punish citizens for violations of vague and uncertain statutes. There is no place in our criminal law for acts defined as detrimental to the interests of the state. A statute is invalid when “so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning.” 269 U.S. 385, at page 391, 46 S.Ct. 126, at page 127, 70 L.Ed. 322. It seems to me that this vice exists in this section of the challenged act. How can a man or a jury possibly know how many men are “needed” “to perform actual services” in broadcasting? What must the quality of the program be? How skillful are the employees in the performance of their task? Does one weigh the capacity of the employee or the managerial ability of the employer? Is the desirability of short hours to spread the work to be evaluated? Or is the standard the advantage in take-home pay for overtime work?

The Government seeks to avoid the difficulty by interpreting the section. Their brief says, after considering the legislative history, “the bill was not intended to apply to mere differences of opinion as to whether men were overworked; it only fits deliberate demands for payment to additional employees made in complete disregard for the employer’s need and without any justification from the viewpoint of actually getting the employer’s business done. . . . If Paragraph (1) is read in its context, along with the succeeding paragraphs, it is clear what Congress was driving at when it characterized the Act as one to prevent extortion, as distinct from bona fide demands relating to conditions of employment." This interpretation seems to me to fly in the face of § 506(1). There is another subsection to which the language might apply.³ This clearly defines the prohibited acts. If the Congress wishes to fix the maximum number of employees that a licensee may employ in stations of various sizes, it may, of course, be done. Or, if it is impractical for Congress to act because of the varying situations, the number may be left to regulations of the Federal Communications Commission or other regulatory body.

This is a criminal statute. The principle that such statutes must be so written that intelligent men may know what acts of theirs will jeopardize their life, liberty or property is of importance to all. That principle requires, I think, a determination that this section of the Communications Act is invalid.

STATE v. CHICAGO & N. W. RY. CO.

Supreme Court of Nebraska, 1947. 147 Neb. 970, 25 N.W.2d 824.

CARTER, JUSTICE. This is a suit brought by the Attorney General in the name of the state to obtain an order enjoining the defendant railroad company from continuing to operate certain main-line switch stands by the use of reflectorized equipment alleged to be in violation of section 74-581, R.S.1943. The trial court entered an order enjoining the use of reflectorized discs on switch stands leading from all main line tracks for the reason that they are in violation of the aforesaid statute. The railroad company appeals.

The record shows that the defendant operates a main-line railroad which passes through Whitney, Crawford, Fort Robinson, Glen, Andrews, Harrison, and Coffee Siding, all in Nebraska, at each of which points switch stands leading from the main track exist. In 1942, the railroad company replaced the then existing oil-burning switch lights with reflectorized lamps whose source of light was obtained from light beams thrown upon it, such as those thrown by the headlights on the railroad's locomotives. It is the position of the state that the new reflectorized lamps are unlawful equipment under the provisions of section 74-581, R.S.1943. This section is as follows: "Every person, firm, corporation, lessee or receiver of any railroad, engaged in the business of transportation in this state, shall equip with proper lights all switch stands to each and every switch leading from all main tracks of any such road, on which trains are generally operated at night, except lines fully equipped with automatic block signals. The lights upon such switch stands shall be in good condition constantly, and shall be lighted and kept burning between the time of sundown and sunrise, and at such other times when, by reason of excessively foggy weather, the condition of such lights or signals would render it unsafe both for the employees of such railroad and for the general public."

³ Pub. No. 344, 79th Cong., 2d Sess., 47 U.S.C. § 506(a) (4), 47 U.S.C.A. § 506(a) (4): "to pay or give or agree to pay or give any money or other thing of value for services, in connection with the conduct of the broadcasting business of such licensee, which are not to be performed;"

Section 74-582, R.S.1943, provides for a penalty of $5 against any railroad company permitting any violation of the foregoing section on the part of any employee.

It is first contended by the railroad company that section 74-581, R.S.1943, is so indefinite and uncertain of meaning as to be void as a penal statute under the due process clauses of the state and federal Constitutions. Art. 1, § 3; U.S.Const. Amend. 14. This contention is based upon the assertion that the statute provides for no fixed standard of guilt upon which the penalty can be assessed. It is a fundamental rule, and one upon which the railroad company relies, that no one may be required at peril of life, liberty, or property to speculate as to the meaning of penal statutes. All are entitled to be informed by reasonably explicit language what conduct on their part will render them liable to its penalties, and a statute which either forbids or requires the doing of an act in terms so vague that men of common intelligence must guess at its meaning and differ on its application, violates the essentials of constitutional provisions guaranteeing due process of law. It is urged by the railroad company that the requirement of the statute being considered that all switch stands leading from main tracks be equipped with "proper lights" does not fix an ascertainable standard of guilt and is inadequate to inform persons accused of a violation thereof of the nature of the accusation against them. . . . We think other portions of the statute sufficiently define the term "proper lights" so as to eliminate the contention that what is lawful or unlawful under it must be left to individual judgment or conjecture.

Construing section 74-581, R.S.1943, as a whole, it will be observed that the latter portion of the section limits and explains the words "proper lights" used in the fore part of the section. The requirement that the "proper lights" shall be lighted and kept burning between the times of sundown and sunrise, and at such other times when by reason of excessively foggy weather the condition of such lights or signals would render it unsafe both for the employees of such railroad and for the general public, clearly indicates that "proper lights" were intended to be any electric or combustion light. A reflectorized lamp certainly was not contemplated when it was stated in the act that they should be "lighted" and "kept burning" between sundown and sunrise. We think the act does define the type of light that is to constitute a "proper light" and clearly a reflectorized lamp does not come within the statute. The act is not void for indefiniteness and uncertainty.

It is worthy of note that in the latter part of the section it is provided that switch-stand lights shall be lighted and kept burning between sundown and sunrise, and at such other times when by reason of foggy weather the condition of such lights or signals would render it unsafe for employees and the public. It is intimated that the use of the words "such lights or signals" supports the view advanced by the defendant. We think not. The words clearly refer to times other than between sundown and sunrise, and can only refer to daytime lights and signals not the subject of legislation in the act. It cannot be properly construed, therefore, as definitive of proper lights required between sundown and sunrise.

The defendant cites various definitions from a recognized dictionary of the words "burn" and "burning" to show that they are sometimes used to mean "aglow," "glow like fire," and "shining." But it is a fundamental rule of statutory construction that the usual and ordinary meaning of words will be used in construing the meaning of a statute. The words "and shall be lighted and kept burning between the time of sundown and sunrise" do not indicate any intent to adopt any meaning other than the usual and ordinary meaning of the terms used. Special or technical definitions of common words will not be applied as a basis for declaring legislative acts void for indefiniteness and uncertainty. . . .

Affirmed.

MARTIN v. UNITED STATES

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, 1939. 100 F.2d 490.

(Appeal from conviction of conspiring to violate the Motor Carrier Act of 1935, 49 U.S.C.A. § 301 et seq.)

BRATTON, CIRCUIT JUDGE. . . . It is . . . provided that no person shall for compensation sell or offer for sale transportation subject to the act or make any contract, agreement, or arrangement to provide, procure, furnish, or arrange for such transportation, or hold himself out by advertisement, solicitation, or otherwise as one who does such things unless he holds a broker's license issued by the Commission, § 211, 49 U.S.C.A. § 311.

Appellants did not transport passengers. They were unlicensed brokers engaged in the business of making arrangements for compensation for transportation of passengers by motor vehicle in interstate commerce. They, therefore, came within the purview of section 211 of the act. But it is argued that the statute fails to provide any standard or guide by which it could be determined whether the persons who transported such passengers were engaged in transportation of that kind as a regular occupation or business and were required to obtain certificates of public convenience and necessity, or were not engaged in such transportation as a regular occupation or business but merely carried such passengers as casual, occasional, or reciprocal transportation, and for that reason no certificate was required. The act brings within its provisions those regularly engaged in the occupation or business of transporting persons or property by motor vehicle in interstate or foreign commerce and excludes casual, occasional, or reciprocal transportation of that kind as a regular occupation or business, without undertaking to define textually either class or to fix a standard by which to determine in advance whether certain conduct is in one class or the other. Reasonable definiteness and certainty is required in the enactment of statutes, but in the very nature of things rules of conduct oftentimes must be stated in general language and depend for their application upon diversified circumstances. It frequently is impossible to state in detail rules or formulae which will meet different conditions or varying qualities. A penal statute must be sufficiently explicit to enable a person of ordinary intelligence to understand its provisions but the employment of terms ordinarily used to express ideas is not fatal. The words "casual", "occasional", "reciprocal", "regular", "occupation", and "business" are in common use, and each has a well understood meaning; and in the absence of anything indicating otherwise it is to be presumed that Congress used them in their generally accepted meaning. It manifestly is possible through the exercise of ordinary intelligence to determine with reasonable exactness and certainty whether given facts and circumstances constitute engaging in the transportation of passengers or property as a regular occupation or business, or merely casual, occasional, or reciprocal transportation by one not engaged in it as a regular occupation or business. Accordingly, the statute is not so vague and indefinite that it offends the due process clause. . . .

The judgments are severally affirmed.

ROSCOE POUND, WHAT OF STARE DECISIS?

10 Fordham L.Rev. 1, 10-11 (1941).

Due process of law is a standard. There is a precept in the Constitution prescribing that legislative and executive action shall not be arbitrary and unreasonable. It prescribes that standard. But there are no precepts anywhere defining reasonableness or prescribing in detail what is unreasonable. Nor can there be in the nature of things. The most that can be done is to measure action by its conformity or want of conformity to a received authoritative ideal, and that ideal itself must change with changes in the society of which it is a picture. Application of a standard in the light of a received ideal must be a matter of times and places and circumstances. What was a negligent speed in a horse drawn cart is not a negligent speed in an automobile. What was unreasonable in a rural agricultural society is not necessarily unreasonable in an urban industrial society. What was unreasonable under the circumstances of yesterday may or may not be under the circumstances of tomorrow. I repeat. It is the idea of law as no more than an aggregate of laws, and that a law is of necessity a rule of the type of a rule of property, that is at fault. If the difference between application of such a rule and application of a standard is seen and borne in mind, it will be apparent that decisions as to what was arbitrary and unreasonable under conditions of the past are not binding under the doctrine of stare decisis unless the conditions of the time and place and the surrounding circumstances are the same.

(ii) IN ADMINISTRATIVELY EXECUTED STATUTES

MAHLER v. EBY

Supreme Court of the United States, 1924.
264 U.S. 32, 44 S.Ct. 283, 68 L.Ed. 549.

This is an appeal from a judgment of the District Court of the United States for Northern Illinois, dismissing five writs of habeas corpus and remanding the appellants, who are aliens, to the custody of the Immigration Inspector at Chicago for deportation, in pursuance to warrants issued by the Secretary of Labor. The cases were consolidated in the court below.

In 1918, all the appellants were tried and found guilty of violation of section 5 of the Selective Service Act of May 18, 1917 (chapter 15, 40 Stat. 76, 80 [Comp.St.1918, Comp.St.Ann.Supp.1919, § 2044e]), and of section 4 of the Espionage Act of June 15, 1917 (chapter 30, 40 Stat. 217, 222 [Comp.St.1918, Comp.St.Ann.Supp.1919, § 10212d]). All but Petro Nigra were sentenced to the United States penitentiary at Leavenworth, Kan., for a period of 5 years, and Nigra was sentenced to the same place for 18 months. Upon error to the Court of Appeals these sentences were affirmed and became final.

Pending the imprisonment of appellants, the Secretary of Labor issued warrants for arrest of the appellants under the Act of May 10, 1920, c. 174, 41 Stat. 593 (Comp.St.Ann.Supp.1923, §§ 4289¼b [4] to 4289¼b [6]). . . .

The Act of Congress enacted May 10, 1920 (chapter 174, 41 Stat. 593) provides that aliens of certain classes described in the act, in addition to those for whose expulsion authority already exists, shall, upon the warrant of the Secretary of Labor, be taken into his custody and deported in the manner provided in sections 19 and 20 of the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917 (39 Stat. p. 889 [Comp.St.1918, Comp.St.Ann.Supp.1919, §§ 4289¼jj, 4289¼k]), "if the Secretary of Labor, after hearing, finds that such aliens are undesirable residents of the United States." The classes include all aliens interned as enemies by the President's proclamation under R.S. § 4067 (Comp.St. § 7615) and alien convicts under the Espionage Act, the Explosives Act, the act restricting foreign travel, the Sabotage Act, the Selective Draft Act, the act punishing threats against the President, the Trading with the Enemy Act, and certain sections of the Penal Code. Section 2 makes the decision of the Secretary of Labor in ordering expulsion of an alien under the act final.

The petitions for writs of habeas corpus charged that the warrant of deportation under which the petitioners were held were void because, at the time of the issue of the warrants, the Espionage Act (Comp.St.

1918, Comp.St. Ann. Supp. 1919, § 1012a et seq.) and the Selective Draft Act (Comp.St. 1918, Comp.St. Ann. Supp. 1919, § 2044a et seq.), for convictions under which they were about to be deported, had been repealed, that the Act of May 10, 1920, under which the warrant was issued, was an ex post facto law, because the convictions for which they were to be deported were for acts committed before its passage, that there was no legal evidence to establish that petitioners were aliens amenable to deportation under the act, that the hearing and proceedings were without due process of law, and that for these and other reasons the commitment was void.

Counsel for the appellants, in their brief and in their argument, attacked the constitutionality of the act of 1920, not only because it was an ex post facto law, but because it delegated legislative power to an executive officer, and because the criterion for his finding—i. e., that the persons to be deported should be “undesirable residents of the United States”—was so vague and uncertain that it left the liberty of the alien to the whim and caprice of an executive officer, in violation of due process required by the Fifth Amendment. They further attacked the validity of the warrants on the ground that they did not show a finding by the Secretary that the appellants were undesirable residents of the United States, a condition precedent to a legal deportation. They further alleged that as to all the petitioners there was no evidence to sustain such a finding, if it had been made, and that as to Petro Nigra there was also a fatal lack of evidence at his hearing to show that he had been convicted of the violations of the statutes charged in the warrant.

Nor is the act invalid in delegating legislative power to the Secretary of Labor. The sovereign power to expel aliens is political, and is vested in the political departments of the government. Even if the executive may not exercise it without congressional authority, Congress cannot exercise it effectively save through the executive. It cannot, in the nature of things, designate all the persons to be excluded. It must accomplish its purpose by classification and by conferring power of selection within classes upon an executive agency. Tiaco v. Forbes, 228 U.S. 549, 557, 33 S.Ct. 585, 57 L.Ed. 960. That is what it has done here. It has established classes of persons who in its judgment constitute an eligible list for deportation, of whom the Secretary is directed to deport those he finds to be undesirable residents of this country. With the background of a declared policy of Congress to exclude aliens classified in great detail by their undesirable qualities in the Immigration Act of 1917, and in previous legislation of a similar character, we think the expression “undesirable residents of the United States” is sufficiently definite to make the delegation quite within the power of Congress. As far back as 1802 the naturalization statute of that year (chapter 28, 2 Stat. 153) prescribed that no alien should be naturalized who did not appear to the court to have behaved during his residence in this country "as a man of good moral character, attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same." Our history has created a common understanding of the words "undesirable residents" which gives them the quality of a recognized standard. ✓

We do not think that the discretion vested in the Secretary under such circumstances is any more vague or uncertain or any less defined than that exercised in deciding whether aliens are likely to become a public charge, a discretion vested in the immigration executives for half a century and never questioned. Act Aug. 3, 1882, c. 376 (22 Stat. 214), and Act Feb. 5, 1917, c. 29 (39 Stat. 874 [Comp.St.1918, Comp.St.Ann.Supp.1919, § 4289¼a]). See Buttfield v. Stranahan, 192 U.S. 470, 496, 24 S.Ct. 349, 48 L.Ed. 525.

International Harvester Co. v. Kentucky, 234 U.S. 216, 34 S.Ct. 853, 58 L.Ed. 1284, and United States v. Cohen Grocery Co., 255 U.S. 81, 41 S.Ct. 298, 65 L.Ed. 516, 14 A.L.R. 1045, are cited on behalf of petitioners. In those cases, statutes were held invalid for vagueness. They were both criminal cases, in which the uncertain words of the statute encountered the limitation of the Fifth and Sixth Amendments. They did not inform the accused sufficiently of the nature and cause of the accusation. The rule as to a definite standard of action is not so strict in cases of the delegation of legislative power to executive boards and officers. Cases like the one before us were distinguished from the Cohen Case by Chief Justice White in his opinion in that case, when he said (page 92 [41 S.Ct. § 301]):

"The cases relied upon all rested upon the conclusion that, for reasons found to result either from the text of the statutes involved or the subjects with which they dealt, a standard of some sort was afforded." . . .

Accordingly the judgment of the District Court is reversed with directions not to discharge the petitioners until the Secretary of Labor shall have reasonable time in which to correct and perfect his finding on the evidence produced at the original hearing, if he finds it adequate, or to initiate another proceeding against them.

PEOPLE ex rel. RICE v. WILSON OIL CO.

Supreme Court of Illinois, 1936. 364 Ill. 406, 4 N.E.2d 847.

STONE, JUSTICE. Appellant seeks to reverse a judgment of the circuit court of Cook county against it for $2,000, the penalty on a bond executed by it as surety for the Wilson Oil Company, a corporation, executed under the provisions of section 3 of the Motor Fuel Tax Law of 1929, as amended (Smith-Hurd Ill.Stats. c. 120, § 419). The appeal is direct, as a constitutional question is raised. . . .

The grounds of the claimed invalidity of section 3 of the Motor Fuel Tax Law as amended in 1931 are that it does not provide sufficient standards to guide the Department of Finance in fixing the penalty of the bond required of a distributor of motor fuel; that the phrase "amount of business reasonably expected" is not a sufficiently definite standard to guide the Department of Finance in fixing the penalty on the bond, but requires the Department of Finance to guess, conjecture, and speculate concerning future events; and that the Department of Finance need only "take into consideration," but is not compelled to act upon, its or another's expectation of the amount of business reasonably expected in fixing the amount of the bond, and so the act was incomplete when it left the Legislature, resulting in a delegation of legislative power to an administrative department or officer.

Section 3, after providing for the application for and issuance of a license to act as a distributor of motor fuels, also requires that "the applicant shall also file with the department a bond in an amount not to exceed $5,000 on a form to be approved by and with a surety or sureties satisfactory to the department conditioned upon said applicant paying to the State of Illinois all moneys becoming due by reason of the sale or use of motor fuel by the applicant, together with all penalties and interest thereon. The department shall fix the penalty of such bond in each case taking into consideration the amount of business reasonably expected to be handled by him [the applicant], and the penalty fixed by the department shall be such, as in its opinion, will protect the State of Illinois against failure to pay the amount hereinafter provided on motor fuel sold and used." . . .

In considering whether section 3 was complete when it left the Legislature or incomplete, resulting in the delegation of legislative power, the test is whether the provision is sufficiently definite and certain to enable one reading it to know his rights and obligations. . . . If section 3 delegates to the Department of Finance power to make the law, which involves a discretion as to what the law shall be, it violates article 3 of the Constitution. If, on the other hand, it but confers authority or discretion on that department, to be exercised under the limits of the act, as to its execution, it is valid. . . .

The General Assembly cannot deal with the details of each particular case that may arise in the administration of an act, but must necessarily leave such to the reasonable discretion of administrative officers, and the exercise of such discretion does not constitute the exercise of legislative power. . . . An act which does not lay down rules and definitions by which the administrative officer may be guided in the exercise of the discretion vested in him is incomplete. . . . An administrative officer empowered to issue and revoke licenses to engage in a business or profession necessarily exercises quasi judicial powers in determining whether a license shall be issued or revoked, but such exercise of power is but incidental to the duty of administering the law relating to the regulation of a particular business or calling and does not constitute the exercise of judicial power within the prohibition of the Constitution. . . .

It is patent that the purpose of the Legislature in passing the Motor Fuel Tax Law and its amendments was to raise revenue and to provide a method of safeguarding the State in the collection of that revenue by providing that those to whom a license was granted to sell motor fuel, and on whom the act placed the duty of collecting the tax, should execute a bond to safeguard the State from loss of that tax by the failure of a licensee to account for and pay the State the tax collected. The Legislature could not determine the amount of the bond required to safeguard the State from each distributor, for the amount of tax collected by the different distributors would, necessarily, not be the same. Nor can the amount of such bond be more than estimated, particularly on first application for license. To have directed the fixing of the bond at an arbitrary amount or by any more definite measure would be likely to result either in loss to the State or in placing on the distributor an unnecessary burden. The purpose of the act is to secure the payment of the tax collected and nothing more. By no human agency can the amount of a bond to secure the payment of such tax be more than estimated. The distributor is dealing directly with the State. The department must be allowed to exercise some discretion in determining the amount of the bond in such a case. The act provides inquiry into such facts as might aid in such determination. To obviate any inequality in the requirement of a bond and still safeguard the State, some method by which the Director of Finance may ascertain, as nearly as possible, the number of gallons each distributor would likely sell each month, is necessary. The provision that "the department shall fix the penalty of such bond in each case taking into consideration the amount of business reasonably expected to be handled by him [the applicant] and the penalty fixed by the department shall be such, as in its opinion, will protect the State of Illinois against failure to pay the amount hereinafter provided on motor fuel sold and used," must be held to be but the vesting of a necessary discretion in the department. It is required that the applicant furnish such information as the department deems necessary, and from this information, and the necessary estimate of the tax resulting from business to be done, the amount of the bond is determined.

Appellant's application appears in the record. It shows that it operated one bulk plant and four retail outlets. It is, under the law, required to settle with the State monthly. It cannot be said that the act is invalid as delegating legislative or judicial powers to the department, nor that the amount fixed in the bond was an unreasonable exercise of the administrative discretion vested in the department. . . .

Judgment affirmed.

In United States v. Shreveport Grain & Elevator Co., 287 U.S. 77, 53 S.Ct. 42, 77 L.Ed. 175 (1932), Sutherland, J., in upholding "reasonable variations" as an administrative standard, said "That the legislative power of Congress cannot be delegated is, of course, clear. But Congress may declare its will, and, after fixing a primary standard, devolve upon administrative officers the 'power to fill up the details' by prescribing administrative rules and regulations."

YAKUS v. UNITED STATES.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1944.
321 U.S. 414, 64 S.Ct. 660, 88 L.Ed. 834.

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE STONE delivered the opinion of the Court.

The questions for our decision are: (1) Whether the Emergency Price Control Act of January 30, 1942, 56 Stat. 23, 50 U.S.C.App.Supp. II, § 901 et seq., 50 U.S.C.A.Appendix, § 901 et seq., as amended by the Inflation Control Act of October 2, 1942, 56 Stat. 765, 50 U.S.C.App. Supp. II, § 961 et seq., 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix, § 961 et seq., involves an unconstitutional delegation to the Price Administrator of the legislative power of Congress to control prices; (2) whether § 204(d) of the Act was intended to preclude consideration by a district court of the validity of a maximum price regulation promulgated by the Administrator, as a defense to a criminal prosecution for its violation; (3) whether the exclusive statutory procedure set up by §§ 203 and 204 of the Act for administrative and judicial review of regulations, with the accompanying stay provisions, provide a sufficiently adequate means of determining the validity of a price regulation to meet the demands of due process; and (4) whether, in view of this available method of review, § 204(d) of the Act, if construed to preclude consideration of the validity of the regulation as a defense to a prosecution for violating it, contravenes the Sixth Amendment, or works an unconstitutional legislative interference with the judicial power.

Petitioners in both of these cases were tried and convicted by the District Court for Massachusetts upon several counts of indictments charging violation of §§ 4(a) and 205(b) of the Act by the willful sale of wholesale cuts of beef at prices above the maximum prices prescribed by §§ 1364.451-1364.455 of Revised Maximum Price Regulation No. 169, 7 Fed.Reg. 10381 et seq. . . .

The Circuit Court of Appeals for the First Circuit affirmed, 137 F.2d 850, and we granted certiorari, 320 U.S. 730, 64 S.Ct. 190.

I.

The Emergency Price Control Act provides for the establishment of the Office of Price Administration under the direction of a Price Administrator appointed by the President, and sets up a comprehensive scheme for the promulgation by the Administrator of regulations or orders fixing such maximum prices of commodities and rents as will effectuate the purposes of the Act and conform to the standards which it prescribes. The Act was adopted as a temporary wartime measure, and provides in § 1(b) for its termination on June 30, 1943, unless sooner terminated by Presidential proclamation or concurrent resolution of Congress. By the amendatory act of October 2, 1942, it was extended to June 30, 1944.

Section 1(a) declares that the Act is "in the interest of the national defense and security and necessary to the effective prosecution of the present war", and that its purposes are:

"to stabilize prices and to prevent speculative, unwarranted, and abnormal increases in prices and rents; to eliminate and prevent profiteering, hoarding, manipulation, speculation, and other disruptive practices resulting from abnormal market conditions or scarcities caused by or contributing to the national emergency; to assure that defense appropriations are not dissipated by excessive prices; to protect persons with relatively fixed and limited incomes, consumers, wage earners, investors, and persons dependent on life insurance, annuities, and pensions, from undue impairment of their standard of living; to prevent hardships to persons engaged in business, . . . and to the Federal, State, and local governments, which would result from abnormal increases in prices; to assist in securing adequate production of commodities and facilities; to prevent a post emergency collapse of values;"

The standards which are to guide the Administrator's exercise of his authority to fix prices, so far as now relevant, are prescribed by § 2(a) and by § 1 of the Amendatory Act of October 2, 1942, and Executive Order 9250, 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix, § 901 note, promulgated under it. 7 Fed.Reg. 7871. By § 2(a) the Administrator is authorized, after consultation with representative members of the industry so far as practicable, to promulgate regulations fixing prices of commodities which "in his judgment will be generally fair and equitable and will effectuate the purposes of this Act" when, in his judgment, their prices "have risen or threaten to rise to an extent or in a manner inconsistent with the purposes of this Act."

The section also directs that

"So far as practicable, in establishing any maximum price, the Administrator shall ascertain and give due consideration to the prices prevailing between October 1 and October 15, 1941 (or if, in the case of any commodity, there are no prevailing prices between such dates, or the prevailing prices between such dates are not generally representative because of abnormal or seasonal market conditions or other cause, then to the prices prevailing during the nearest two-week period in which, in the judgment of the Administrator, the prices for such commodity are generally representative) . . . and shall make adjustments for such relevant factors as he may determine and deem to be of general applicability, including. . . . Speculative fluctuations, general increases or decreases in costs of production, distribution, and transportation, and general increases or decreases in profits earned by sellers of the commodity or commodities, during and subsequent to the year ended October 1, 1941."

By the Act of October 2, 1942, the President is directed to stabilize prices, wages and salaries "so far as practicable" on the basis of the levels which existed on September 15, 1942, except as otherwise provided in the Act. By Title I, § 4 of Executive Order No. 9250, he has directed "all departments and agencies of the Government" "to stabilize the cost of living in accordance with the Act of October 2, 1942."¹

Revised Maximum Price Regulation No. 169 was issued December 10, 1942, under authority of the Emergency Price Control Act as amended and Executive Order No. 9250. The Regulation established specific maximum prices for the sale at wholesale of specified cuts of beef and veal. As is required by § 2(a) of the Act, it was accompanied by a "statement of the considerations involved" in prescribing it. From the preamble to the Regulation and from the Statement of Considerations accompanying it, it appears that the prices fixed for sales at wholesale were slightly in excess of those prevailing between March 16 and March 28, 1942,² and approximated those prevailing on September 15, 1942. Findings that the Regulation was necessary, that the prices which it fixed were fair and equitable, and that it otherwise conformed to the standards prescribed by the Act, appear in the Statement of Considerations.

That Congress has constitutional authority to prescribe commodity prices as a war emergency measure, and that the Act was adopted by Congress in the exercise of that power, are not questioned here, and need not now be considered save as they have a bearing on the procedural features of the Act later to be considered which are challenged on constitutional grounds.

Congress enacted the Emergency Price Control Act in pursuance of a defined policy and required that the prices fixed by the Administrator should further that policy and conform to standards prescribed by the Act. The boundaries of the field of the Administrator's permissible action are marked by the statute. It directs that the prices fixed shall effectuate the declared policy of the Act to stabilize commodity prices so as to prevent war-time inflation and its enumerated disruptive causes and effects. In addition the prices established must be fair and equitable, and in fixing them the Administrator is directed to give due consideration, so far as practicable, to prevailing prices during the designated base period, with prescribed administrative adjustments to compensate for enumerated disturbing factors affecting prices. In short the purposes of the Act specified in § 1 denote the objective to be sought by the Administrator in fixing prices—the prevention of inflation and its enumerated consequences. The standards set out in § 2 define the boundaries within which prices having that purpose must be fixed. It is enough to satisfy the statutory requirements that the Administrator finds that the prices fixed will tend to achieve that objective and will conform to those standards, and that the courts in an appropriate proceeding can see that substantial basis for those findings is not wanting.

² The use of the March 16-28, 1942, base period is explained by the fact that wholesale meat prices had already been stabilized at approximately that level by Maximum Price Regulation No. 169 as originally issued on June 19, 1942, 7 Fed. Reg. 4653, and by the General Maximum Price Regulation issued April 28, 1942, 7 Fed. Reg. 3153, which forbade the sale of most commodities at prices in excess of the highest price charged by the seller during March, 1942. The Statement of Considerations accompanying the latter, 2 C. C. H. War Law Service—Price Control, ¶ 42,081, explains in some detail the considerations impelling the Administrator to the conclusion that stabilization at the levels obtaining in March, 1942 would be fair and equitable and would effectuate the purposes of the Act; it considers the price levels prevailing during October 1-15, 1941, and gives reasons why price stabilization at those levels would not be practicable. The Statement of Considerations accompanying Maximum Price Regulation No. 169 as originally issued, 2 C. C. H. War Law Service—Price Control, ¶ 43,369A, refers to this discussion in explanation of the continuance of the use of March, 1942, levels as a base.

The Act is thus an exercise by Congress of its legislative power. In it Congress has stated the legislative objective, has prescribed the method of achieving that objective—maximum price fixing—and has laid down standards to guide the administrative determination of both the occasions for the exercise of the price-fixing power, and the particular prices to be established. Compare Field v. Clark, 143 U.S. 649, 12 S.Ct. 495, 36 L.Ed. 294; Hampton Jr. & Co. v. United States, 276 U.S. 394, 48 S.Ct. 348, 72 L.Ed. 624; Curran v. Wallace, 306 U.S. 1, 59 S.Ct. 379, 83 L.Ed. 441; Mulford v. Smith, 307 U.S. 38, 59 S.Ct. 648, 83 L.Ed. 1092; United States v. Rock Royal Co-op., 307 U.S. 533, 59 S.Ct. 993, 83 L.Ed. 1446; Sunshine Anthracite Coal Co. v. Adkins, 310 U.S. 381, 60 S.Ct. 907, 84 L.Ed. 1263; Opp Cotton Mills v. Administrator, 312 U.S. 126, 657, 61 S.Ct. 524, 85 L.Ed. 624; National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, 319 U.S. 190, 63 S.Ct. 997, 87 L.Ed. 1344; Kiyoshi Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S. 81, 63 S.Ct. 1375, 87 L.Ed. 1774.

The Act is unlike the National Industrial Recovery Act of June 16, 1933, 48 Stat. 195, considered in Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 295 U.S. 495, 55 S.Ct. 837, 79 L.Ed. 1570, 97 A.L.R. 947, which proclaimed in the broadest terms its purpose "to rehabilitate industry and to conserve natural resources." It prescribed no method of attaining that end save by the establishment of codes of fair competition, the nature of whose permissible provisions was left undefined. It provided no standards to which those codes were to conform. The function of formulating the codes was delegated, not to a public official responsible to Congress or the Executive, but to private individuals engaged in the industries to be regulated. Compare Sunshine Anthracite Coal Co. v. Adkins, supra, 310 U.S. at page 399, 60 S.Ct. at page 915, 84 L.Ed. 1263.

The Constitution as a continuously operative charter of government does not demand the impossible or the impracticable. It does not require that Congress find for itself every fact upon which it desires to base legislative action or that it make for itself detailed determinations which it has declared to be prerequisite to the application of the legislative policy to particular facts and circumstances impossible for Congress itself properly to investigate. The essentials of the legislative function are the determination of the legislative policy and its formulation and promulgation as a defined and binding rule of conduct—here the rule, with penal sanctions, that prices shall not be greater than those fixed by maximum price regulations which conform to standards and will tend to further the policy which Congress has established. These essentials are preserved when Congress has specified the basic conditions of fact upon whose existence or occurrence, ascertained from relevant data by a designated administrative agency, it directs that its statutory command shall be effective. It is no objection that the determination of facts and the inferences to be drawn from them in the light of the statutory standards and declaration of policy call for the exercise of judgment, and for the formulation of subsidiary administrative policy within the prescribed statutory framework. See Opp Cotton Mills v. Administrator, supra, 312 U.S. at pages 145, 146, 61 S.Ct. at pages 532, 533, 85 L.Ed. 624, and cases cited.

Nor does the doctrine of separation of powers deny to Congress power to direct that an administrative officer properly designated for that purpose have ample latitude within which he is to ascertain the conditions which Congress has made prerequisite to the operation of its legislative command. Acting within its constitutional power to fix prices it is for Congress to say whether the data on the basis of which prices are to be fixed are to be confined within a narrow or a broad range. In either case the only concern of courts is to ascertain whether the will of Congress has been obeyed. This depends not upon the breadth of the definition of the facts or conditions which the administrative officer is to find but upon the determination whether the definition sufficiently marks the field within which the Administrator is to act so that it may be known whether he has kept within it in compliance with the legislative will.

As we have said: "The Constitution has never been regarded as denying to the Congress the necessary resources of flexibility and practicality . . . to perform its function." Currin v. Wallace, supra, 306 U.S. at page 15, 59 S.Ct. at page 387, 83 L.Ed. 441. Hence it is irrelevant that Congress might itself have prescribed the maximum prices or have provided a more rigid standard by which they are to be fixed; for example, that all prices should be frozen at the levels obtaining during a certain period or on a certain date. See Union Bridge Co. v. United States, 204 U.S. 364, 386, 27 S.Ct. 367, 374, 51 L.Ed. 523. Congress is not confined to that method of executing its policy which involves the least possible delegation of discretion to administrative officers. Compare McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 413 et seq., 4 L.Ed. 579. It is free to avoid the rigidity of such a system, which might well result in serious hardship, and to choose instead the flexibility attainable by the use of less restrictive standards. Cf. Hampton v. United States, supra, 276 U.S. at pages 408, 409, 48 S.Ct. at pages 351, 352, 72 L.Ed. 624. Only if we could say that there is an absence of standards for the guidance of the Administrator's action, so that it would be impossible in a proper proceeding to ascertain whether the will of Congress has been obeyed, would we be justified in overriding its choice of means for effecting its declared purpose of preventing inflation.

The standards prescribed by the present Act, with the aid of the "statement of the considerations" required to be made by the Administrator, are sufficiently definite and precise to enable Congress, the courts and the public to ascertain whether the Administrator, in fixing the designated prices, has conformed to those standards. Compare Kiyoshi Hirabayashi v. United States, supra, 320 U.S. at page 104, 63 S. Ct. at page 1387, 87 L.Ed. 1774. Hence we are unable to find in them an unauthorized delegation of legislative power. The authority to fix prices only when prices have risen or threaten to rise to an extent or in a manner inconsistent with the purpose of the Act to prevent inflation is no broader than the authority to fix maximum prices when deemed necessary to protect consumers against unreasonably high prices, sustained in Sunshine Anthracite Coal Co. v. Adkins, supra, or the authority to take possession of and operate telegraph lines whenever deemed necessary for the national security or defense, upheld in Dakota Cent. Tel. Co. v. State of South Dakota, 250 U.S. 163, 39 S.Ct. 507, 63 L.Ed. 910, 4 A.L.R. 1623; or the authority to suspend tariff provisions upon findings that the duties imposed by a foreign state are "reciprocally unequal and unreasonable", held valid in Field v. Clark, supra [143 U.S. 649, 12 S.Ct. 504, 36 L.Ed. 294].

The directions that the prices fixed shall be fair and equitable, that in addition they shall tend to promote the purposes of the Act, and that in promulgating them consideration shall be given to prices prevailing in a stated base period, confer no greater reach for administrative determination than the power to fix just and reasonable rates, see Sunshine Anthracite Coal Co. v. Adkins, supra, and cases cited; or the power to approve consolidations in the "public interest", sustained in New York Cent. Securities Corp. v. United States, 287 U.S. 12, 24, 25, 53 S.Ct. 45, 48, 77 L.Ed. 138 (Compare United States v. Lowden, 308 U.S. 225, 60 S.Ct. 248, 84 L.Ed. 208); or the power to regulate radio stations engaged in chain broadcasting "as public interest, convenience or necessity requires", upheld in National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, supra, 319 U.S. at page 225, 63 S.Ct. at pages 1013, 1014, 87 L.Ed. 1344; or the power to prohibit "unfair methods of competition" not defined or forbidden by the common law, Federal Trade Commission v. R. F. Keppel & Bro., 291 U.S. 304, 54 S.Ct. 423, 426, 78 L.Ed. 814; or the direction that in allotting marketing quotas among states and producers due consideration be given to a variety of economic factors, sustained in Mulford v. Smith, supra, 307 U.S. at pages 48, 49, 59 S.Ct. at page 652, 653, 83 L.Ed. 1092; or the similar direction that in adjusting tariffs to meet differences in costs of production the President "take into consideration" "in so far as he finds it practicable" a variety of economic matters, sustained in Hampton Jr. & Co. v. United States, supra [276 U.S. 394, 48 S.Ct. 349, 36 L.Ed. 294]; or the similar authority, in making classifications within an industry, to consider various named and unnamed "relevant factors" and determine the respective weights attributable to each, held valid in Opp Cotton Mills v. Administrator, supra. . . .

Affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE ROBERTS.

I dissent. I find it unnecessary to discuss certain of the questions treated in the opinion of the court. I am of opinion that the Act unconstitutionally delegates legislative power to the Administrator. As I read the opinion of the court it holds the Act valid on the ground that sufficiently precise standards are prescribed to confine the Administrator's regulations and orders within fixed limits, and that judicial review is provided effectively to prohibit his transgression of those limits. I believe that analysis demonstrates the contrary. I proceed, therefore, to examine the statute.

The Powers Conferred.

When, in his judgment, commodity prices have risen, or threaten to rise, "to an extent or in a manner inconsistent with the purposes" of the Act the Administrator may establish "such maximum price or maximum prices as in his judgment will be generally fair and equitable and will effectuate the purposes" of the Act.

"So far as practicable" in establishing any maximum price he is to ascertain the prices prevailing in a specified period in 1941 but may use another period nearest to that specified because necessary data for the period specified is not available; and may make adjustments "for such relevant factors as he may determine and deem to be of general applicability," including several factors mentioned. Before issuing any regulation he shall "so far as practicable" advise with representative members of the industry affected.

Any regulation may provide for adjustments and reasonable exceptions which, in the Administrator's judgment, are necessary and proper to effectuate the purposes of the Act. If, in his judgment, such action is necessary or proper to effectuate the purposes of the Act, he may, by regulation or order, regulate or prohibit speculative or manipulative practices or hoarding in connection with any commodity (50 U.S.C.Appendix § 902, 50 U.S.C.A.Appendix § 902).

It will be seen that whether, and, if so, when, the price of any commodity¹ shall be regulated depends on the judgment of the Administrator as to the necessity or propriety of such price regulation in effectuating the purposes of the Act.

The Supposed Standards for the Administrator's Guidance.

The Act provides that any regulation or order must be "generally fair and equitable" in the Administrator's judgment; but coupled with this injunction is another that the order and regulation must be such as, in the judgment of the Administrator, is necessary or proper to effectuate the purposes of the Act.

I turn, therefore, to the stated purposes to ascertain what, if any, limits the statute places upon the Administrator's exercise of his powers.

Section 1(a), 50 U.S.C.Appendix, § 901(a), 50 U.S.C.A.Appendix, § 901(a), states seven purposes, which should be set forth separately as follows:

"to stabilize prices and to prevent speculative, unwarranted, and abnormal increases in prices and rents;"

In order to exercise his power anent this purpose the Administrator will have to form a judgment as to what stabilization means, and what are speculative, unwarranted and abnormal increases in price. It hardly need be said that men may differ radically as to the connotation of these terms and that it would be very difficult to convict anyone of error of judgment in so classifying a given economic phenomenon.

"to eliminate and prevent profiteering, hoarding, manipulation, speculation, and other disruptive practices resulting from abnormal market conditions or scarcities caused by or contributing to the national emergency;"

To accomplish this purpose the Administrator must form a judgment as to what constitutes profiteering, hoarding, manipulation or speculation. As if the administrative discretion were not sufficiently broad there is added the phrase "other disruptive practices", which seems to leave the Administrator at large in the formation of opinion as to whether any practice is disruptive.

"to assure that defense appropriations are not dissipated by excessive prices;"

It is not clear—to me at least—what is the limit of this purpose. I can conceive that an honest Administrator might, without laying himself open to the charge of exceeding his powers, make any kind of order or regulation based upon the view that otherwise defense appropriations by Congress might be dissipated by what he considers excessive prices. How his exercise of judgment in connection with this purpose could be thought excessive it is impossible for me to say.

"to protect persons with relatively fixed and limited incomes, consumers, wage earners, investors, and persons dependent on life insurance, annuities, and pensions, from undue impairment of their standard of living;"

The Administrator's judgment that any price policy will tend to affect the classes mentioned in this purpose from what he may decide to be "undue impairment of their standard of living" would seem to be so sweeping that it would be impossible to convict him of an error of judgment in any conclusion he might reach.

"to prevent hardships to persons engaged in business, to schools, universities, and other institutions, and to the Federal, State, and local governments, which would result from abnormal increases in prices;"

Of course Congress might have included in the catalogue of beneficiaries churches, hospitals, labor unions, banks and trust companies and other praiseworthy organizations, without rendering the "standard" any more vague.

"to assist in securing adequate production of commodities and facilities;"

Here is a purpose which seems, to some extent at least, to permit the easing of price restrictions; for it would appear that diminishment of price would hardly assist in promoting production. Thus the Administrator, and he alone, is to balance two competing policies and strike the happy mean between them. Who shall say his conclusion is so indubitably wrong as to be properly characterized as "arbitrary or capricious".

"to prevent a post emergency collapse of values;"

This purpose, or "standard", seems to permit adoption by the Administrator of any conceivable policy. I have difficulty in envisaging any price policy in support of which some economic data or opinion could not be cited to show that it would tend to prevent post emergency collapse of values.

These seven purposes must, I submit, be considered as separate and independent. Any action taken by the Administrator which, in his judgment, promotes any one or more of them is within the granted power. If, in his judgment, any action by him is necessary or appropriate to the accomplishment of one or more of them, the Act gives sanction to his order or regulation.

Reflection will demonstrate that in fact the Act sets no limits upon the discretion or judgment of the Administrator. His commission is to take any action with respect to prices which he believes will preserve what he deems a sound economy during the emergency and prevent what he considers to be a disruption of such a sound economy in the post war period. His judgment, founded as it may be, on his studies and investigations, as well as other economic data, even though contrary to the great weight of current opinion or authority, is the final touchstone of the validity of his action.

I shall not repeat what I have said in Bowles v. Willingham, 321 U.S. 503, 64 S.Ct. 641. I have there quoted the so-called standards prescribed in the National Industrial Recovery Act. Comparison of them with those of the present Act, and perusal of what was said concerning them in A. L. A. Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 295 U.S. 495, 55 S.Ct. 837, 79 L.Ed. 1570, 97 A.L.R. 947, leaves no doubt that the decision is now overruled. There, as here, the "code" or regulation, to become effective, had to be found by the Executive to "tend to effectuate the policy" of the Act. (See footnote A, p. 521.)

LOUIS I. JAFFE, AN ESSAY ON DELEGATION OF LEGISLATIVE POWER

47 Colum.L.Rev. 561, 581, 583-592 (1947).

Delegation In The States

. . . Many state courts have been reluctant to remain consistently on the broad, generous ground taken by the United States Supreme Court. They have pursued a wavering course. The archaic, narrow formulation is sometimes taken seriously and is as frequently disregarded. The explanation is only in part a conservative disinclination to tolerate modern forms of administrative activity. State delegations are more varied in content; and some of them raise peculiar problems. . . .

In the early days the Illinois Supreme Court took a broadly understanding view of the need and uses of delegation.⁷⁹ Approval of the reasonable rate formula might have been thought a basis for lesser delegations. Even as late as 1909 in *Block v. Chicago*⁸⁰ the court knows how to take the high government line. The chiefs of police were authorized to refuse licenses to show "obscene and immoral" motion pictures. "The welfare of society demands that every effort of municipal authorities to afford such protection should be sustained, unless it is clear that some constitutional right is interfered with." The legislature may "authorize others to do those things which it might properly but cannot understandingly do." Otherwise "legislation would become oppressive and yet imbecile."⁸¹ The court relied on earlier cases approving power to determine the number and location of dramshops⁸²; the number, location, material and construction of fire escapes.⁸³ But then comes a series of cases holding acts unconstitutional. The best known is People ex rel. Gomber v. Snolem.⁸⁴ The fire marshals were given power to order demolition or repair of a building "especially liable to fire and which is so situated as to endanger other buildings." No hearing was provided prior to the marshal's decision. Violations were punishable by fines of $10 to $50 per day. This, said the court, was "arbitrary power." No standard was given as to what was a fire hazard. Judgments might vary from city to city. In distinguishing the Block case, the court said "the average person of healthy and wholesome mind knows what the words 'immoral' and 'obscene' mean"! In 1929 a statute authorizing the secretary of state to require a broker to post a bond up to $50,000 was held bad.⁸⁵ The legislature amended the Act to provide that the amount was to be determined by the broker's (1) method of business, (2) financial standing, (3) experience, ability, and reputation. Again the act was held bad: it did not specify how much ability or what financial standing!⁸⁶

Comm'n*, 236 U.S. 230 (1915) ("moral, educational or amusing and harmless" film to be passed—the lower court judge commented that "it would be next to impossible to devise language that would be at once comprehensive and automatic").

In all of the cases there was, in the more illuminating phrase of Taft, "an intelligible principle"; in none of them is there the latitude of ends and means denounced in the Schechter case. The judicial uncertainty and subjectivism shown by these cases is not restricted to Illinois, and is an undoubted weakness of the delegation doctrine as presently interpreted in the states.

Judicial antipathy to social legislation is not the only factor contributing to this interpretation. The state courts are troubled by the spectre of discriminatory administration. In the field of general business regulation state decisions are not notably different from the federal decisions. Rate regulation has been uniformly upheld. . . .

It is when delegated power affects the use of real property or the practice of a profession that the judicial nerve tingles. The doctrine of delegation is then likely to be invoked against delegations which because of an uncertainty of standards (in phrase or in fact) encourage undetectable discrimination⁸⁷ or subjective notions of policy. The Sholem case⁸⁸ is a prime instance of this sensitivity. A power given to a local fire chief to condemn or order repair of buildings "especially liable to fire" is capable of a species of abuse not present, for example, in a rate regulation. The common law is particularly tender toward the owner of real property, and such legislation allows action drastically modifying his position. Unless the fire chief announces specifications, the incidence of his action may be most capricious. One can sense in these and similar cases a concern that arises from due process scruples. Yet surely some form of law against fire hazards must be allowed. In a brace of cases the Maryland Court of Appeals revealed the dilemma in which the state courts have placed themselves. Building permits were not to be allowed where to do so would create "hazards from fire or disease" or menace "public welfare, security, health, or morals." Over the dissent of three judges, this delegation was held void.⁹⁹ The following year, this time over the dissent of two, the vice was held cured by substituting for the offending words "public welfare," the words "public security."¹⁰⁰ In the absence of precisely developed modern standards many courts are apt to be governed by the static "nuisance" concept. It has recently been pointed out that the administrator's case will be enormously strengthened if he has devised general rules which have run the gauntlet of opposition prior to summary action in particular cases.¹⁰¹

Powers to license the use of real property have produced a welter of decisions, sometimes in conflict even within a single jurisdiction. Many of the statutes are old. A number of them contain no express standard at all, yet until this century it probably did not occur to anyone to question these ancient and humble grants of power. When the licensed use may promote immorality, e.g., a pool hall, no standard will be required or one will be implied. It is a "nuisance per se"¹⁰²; or permission to engage in it is a "privilege."¹⁰³ The Illinois courts' righteous distinction between a power to ban "immoral or obscene" motion pictures and a power to demolish fire hazards illustrates the operation of this moral factor. Courts do not, however, agree as to the presence of this factor: the power to license junk dealers without any avowed standard has been held good and bad.¹⁰⁴ The point should be made that in this type of case the court may imply a standard where none is stated. Particularly is this true where the delegation is of long standing. In the leading case of *Lieberman v. Van De Carr*¹⁰⁵

Other well-known cases to the effect that the lack or apparent lack of standard for guiding discretion does not violate due process: Wilson v. Eureka City, 173 U.S. 32, 19 S.Ct. 317, 43 L.Ed. 603 (1899); Fischer v. St. Louis, 194 U.S. 361, 24 S.Ct. 673, 48 L.Ed. 1018 (1904); Bradley v. Richmond, 227 U.S. 477, 33 S.Ct. 318, 57 L.Ed. 603 (1913). The reasons given in such cases vary: (a) a matter of privilege, (b) standard implied, (c) will not assume that action will be "arbitrary." Davis v. Massachusetts the sanitary code provided for milk licensing. The lack of standard was attacked on delegation and due process grounds. The court quite legitimately held that the licensing power appearing in a sanitary code was concerned solely with hygiene. The New York court, particularly, has drawn one paradoxical but sound conclusion in these cases. In the absence of a stated standard, the implied standard will be severely limited to the most immediately obvious reason for the grant of power.¹⁰⁶ Otherwise the power would be in danger of failing for uncertainty of standard. Thus, in exercising a power to license building operations, the only consideration is whether the existing building laws have been satisfied; traffic factors are excluded.¹⁰⁷ In the licensing of junk dealers fitness alone is relevant; the licensing authority may not adopt a policy of limiting licenses to a number deemed sufficient.¹⁰⁸

Some courts, recently more conscious of the delegation problem, have become less disposed to imply standards, even where the context would allow it.¹⁰⁹ The Missouri Supreme Court in the leading case of St. Louis v. Fischer,¹¹⁰ upheld a statute forbidding a dairy or cow stable within city limits unless permission was given. No doubt, the decision was influenced by the notion that such a use was a prima facie nuisance, somewhat like a pool hall or a saloon. But later cases have overruled or distinguished it. The court, expressly overruling the Fischer case, has held bad a prohibition of wooden buildings within fire limits of the city unless licensed;¹¹¹ a stable with more than 10 horses unless

¹⁰⁶ Freund in Administrative Power Over Persons and Property 89, 90 (1928) has observed this phenomenon. He notes that the absence of an express standard may be due to a belief that that standard is obvious.

The court argued that what is not a nuisance cannot be made one. This restrictive "nuisance" theory underlies many of these decisions and is independent to some extent of the delegation issue.

licensed.¹¹² In neither of these cases, indeed, is it as easy to imply a standard as it would be in the milk or junk dealer cases. This increased or new emphasis on a standard in licensing may be a response to the modern proliferation of the licensing function and the greater variety of purposes to which administration may put it. The solution is not only greater care in drafting but the formal adoption in rule or decision of precisely articulated administrative policies which, indeed, if of long enough standing, may save an otherwise unconditional delegation.

One delegation previously mentioned as denied by the Illinois court¹¹³ was the power to grant exemptions from zoning restrictions in cases of practical difficulty or unnecessary hardship. Here to be sure is a fertile ground for discrimination in reverse, for more favorable treatment of the successful applicant. What is more, it is a field where the operation of local political favoritism is notorious. But due process itself is thought to require exemptions in cases where zoning renders a parcel nearly valueless; it would seem unquestionable that the legislature may provide for exemptions from the limits which it itself imposes. The basis for this exemption is clearly "unnecessary hardship." Such statutes have usually been upheld.¹¹⁴ In New York the Court of Appeals has severely limited the exercise of the power, lest the zoning law be riddled by exemptions. It has required a showing that the use to which the property was limited would be overwhelmingly uneconomic.¹¹⁵ No doubt some such words might be written into the statute, but again we must question the propriety of such judicial tutelage of the legislature.

It is not only in zoning laws that the power to grant exceptions is found. State courts generally look with hostility on these "suspending" or "dispensing" powers as involving some peculiar power to make or to set aside the law.¹¹⁶ There is, no doubt, a reasonable fear of favoritism. But essentially these powers are no different than the discretion which is inevitably committed to most agencies whether or Steinhilber*, 282 N.Y. 71, 24 N.E.2d 851 (1939). These cases illustrate how little inclined is the Court of Appeals to sustain the action of the administrator when he grants a variation and per contra how difficult it will be to upset him when he denies it.

¹¹⁶ An excellent treatment is found in Note, The Power of Dispensation in Administrative Law—A Critical Survey, 87 U. of Pa.L.Rev. 201 (1938).

A power to "alter" or "modify" a statute or to "suspend" its operation seems in terms to be a power to make or break law in a way that mere delegation is not. But, if such powers are controlled by a standard, they are essentially no different not to proceed with enforcement or whether or not to adopt a rule or order. The power to act pursuant to a complex standard ordinarily involves the power not to act.¹¹⁷ For this reason a power to grant exemptions is ordinarily unnecessary. But the legislature may desire to enact a fairly precise and detailed regulation. If the regulation is not to produce hardship, administrative power to exempt may be advisable; and the usual discretion to overlook justifiable violation does not provide adequate protection since it is unsafe to rely on a promise of non-prosecution. If the power is equipped with an "intelligible principle" it should be as valid as any other. The courts may scrutinize its use as they do in zoning to prevent indiscriminate or corrupt variations from the general rule of the statute.

The licensing of trades and professions is another field in which understandably the courts have been sensitive to the absence of adequate standards. Refusal of a license to practice is a heavy blow; revocation almost fatal. Furthermore, it has been customary to entrust the licensing function to the profession. The licensing authority, whether it be the professional association itself, or persons sworn as public officials, will normally represent dominant influences. The medical profession has shown hostility to unorthodox methods of treatment such as the Sister Kenny paralysis treatment and the systems of homeopathy, osteopathy, and the like. It has shown even greater hostility toward practices labelled "unethical": advertising, fee-splitting, "running," and toward such innovations as group medicine. To entrust the profession with the power to discipline its fellows under general standards of "fitness" and "good character" undoubtedly gives a wide opening to prejudice and self-interest. Yet what, it may be asked, is the practical alternative?

The licensing power has been more readily sustained than the power of revocation. It is true that in *Replogle v. Little Rock*¹¹⁸ an Arkansas from any other delegation. They are in a sense just a further elaboration by way of qualification of the basic standard to which they are appended.

The Committee on Ministers Powers, Report Cmd. 4060 (1936) 36, 61 regarded powers of this sort as exceptional and dangerous, particularly the so-called Henry VIII clause enabling the administrator to modify the act or even some other act where necessary. In form, indeed, such a power does seem dangerously unlimited and rather to make the whole business of legislation superfluous. But in their contexts most such powers have been relatively modest and probably little more than the usually upheld powers of administration. Thus it has ordinarily been conferred to enable a Minister "to modify the provision of the Act so far as may appear to him to be necessary for the purpose of bringing the Act into operation." Such a clause is understood as having reference to administrative detail. The Committee would limit it to a power incident to bringing an act into operation and subject to lapse in one year. See comment by Willis, Parliamentary Powers of English Government Departments 185 (1933) who admits that such a power potentially entrenches on parliamentary sovereignty but believes that its limited use should not be a cause for concern.

court held that a power to examine plumbers as to their knowledge of plumbing was void because the legislature had not prescribed the requisites of the examination! Perhaps these august juris consults were unaware that plumbing as well as law has its curriculum. Even Illinois holds to the contrary and joins in the great weight of authority which upholds the licensing power for plumbing and for other skills and professions.¹¹⁹ The licensing authority may be empowered to determine skill and moral qualification. In setting an examination, the administrator is in a sense prescribing ad hoc a uniform treatment which sets limits to discretion. The requirement for rules in a field where the general standard is difficult to formulate is a wise one, and might save a delegation otherwise questionable.

In *Seignious v. Rice*¹²⁰ the New York Court of Appeals considered a power to refuse to renew a license. A refusal to renew is, of course, nearly equivalent to revocation of a license.¹²¹ The statute said that the licensing authority "may require as a condition of renewal of any plumber's license issued after January first, nineteen hundred twenty, that the holder of such license qualify for such renewal by successfully passing an examination. . . ." Judge Lehman writing for a unanimous court held the statute unconstitutional. The legislature had not indicated "a standard or measure" by which the authority could determine who was and was not to be examined. "The Legislature is free to choose among conflicting considerations. . . . It cannot delegate the same freedom of choice. . . ." ¹²² The judge does not allude to the background of this curious statute, but the record shows it. An investigation had revealed administrative corruption since 1920. The legislative remedy was not easy to discover. Must all well-established master plumbers be subjected to the hazards of re-examination? Should the statute speak out hard and clear, precisely stipulating that any one who had corruptly secured his license should be re-examined? Think of the difficult, exacerbated, scandalous hearings! In this dilemma the legislature may have hoped that the court recognizing the difficulty would accept any tolerable solution evolved by the commissioner: the commissioner's ruling was to require examination of all who had been licensed since 1930. The Court perhaps thought it a sufficient protection of the public interest that if a corrupt plumber was in fact a bad one, his license could be revoked.

In two of the best known cases, it was unsuccessfully claimed that the discretion granted was so arbitrary as to deny due process. *Dent v. In the recent Kotch v. Board of River Port Pilots [67 S.Ct. 910 (1947)] a majority of the Court refused to invalidate a system of licensing pilots which operated on a tradition of limiting candidates to relatives and friends of the licensees.

(June 11, 1946)], for example, prescribing a separation of prosecuting and judging functions, by specifically exempting from its coverage applications for initial licenses, impliedly covers renewals, thus treating the latter proceedings as equivalent to revocation proceedings.

Early decisions were hostile to the power of revocation. In 1906 the Supreme Court of California¹²³ disallowed a power to revoke a medical license for advertising "grossly improbable statements"; no rule provided what was improbable, no moral standard was in question, the injunction was too "vague." Yet this standard seems precise compared to a power to revoke for "unprofessional conduct," which is now quite generally upheld. The legislature, Judge Lehman has said recently, could not delegate "unfettered discretion" in the power to revoke for "conduct not defined in advance" but "the standards of conduct generally accepted by practitioners . . . are not so indefinite that they cannot be determined by qualified persons."¹²⁴ In a case shortly following this, a dentist had paid a "runner" for bringing in sailors' business from the waterfront. The majority upheld¹²⁵ a finding of unprofessional conduct. Two judges dissented: "If one is to be deprived of his professional livelihood he is entitled to be warned in advance (i.e., by rule) that conduct which is neither reprehensible nor prohibited by law may have such consequences."¹²⁶ Both majority and minority relied heavily on Lehman's remarks in the earlier case.

Such a power when lodged in the officialdom of a profession is dangerous. The legislatures and courts should consider certain safeguards. In New York a committee of the profession is subordinate to the Board of Regents, a non-professional body of great dignity and notable standing. The Board exercises the final power. This admirable device should be universally adopted. To be sure the Board must ordinarily accept the views of its professional committees, but it may temper their fanaticism. Where a specific issue of "ethics"—advertising, fee-splitting—is acute, the legislature should settle it. Rule making by the Board should be encouraged. The courts should not permit the use of the general phrase to impose upon professional minorities conceptions of ethics which have not more general recognition.

SECTION 3. ARRANGEMENT OF LANGUAGE AND SOME OTHER MECHANICS OF DRAFTING

A. Establishment of Policy and Substance of the Bill

ORDRONAUX, CONSTITUTIONAL LEGISLATION IN THE UNITED STATES

Philadelphia: 1891. T. & J. W. Johnson & Co., pp. 578-586.

Every law being in the nature either of a command or a prohibition, is a displacement of existing civil relations, in which society, as well as individuals, have acquired rights; and its possibilities to work harm must be duly estimated as well as its power to do good. How, it may be asked, can these things be known even inferentially, without a preceding knowledge of the legal nature and consequences of such civil relations? Society is an arch built of legal and moral rights. The moment we displace one of these rights we threaten the stability of the whole structure, unless we at the same time carefully re-adjust their points of inter-dependence. Can such dangers be comprehended intuitively? Or do they not require the same degree of learning to provide for their consequences, as was necessary to erect the original structure?

No writer upon law has failed to perceive the disadvantages to legislation arising from want of preparation in legislators, and no one has more emphatically expressed himself upon this subject than Sir William Blackstone. This is his language:—

“Indeed, it is perfectly amazing that there should be no other state of life, no other occupation, art or science in which some method of instruction is not looked upon as requisite, except only the science of legislation, the noblest and most difficult of any. Apprenticeships are held necessary to almost every art, commercial or mechanical; a long course of reading and study must form the divine, the physician and the practical professor of the laws; but every man of superior fortune thinks himself born a legislator. Yet Tully was of a different opinion, ‘it is necessary,’ says he, ‘for a senator to be thoroughly acquainted with the Constitution; and this,’ he declares, ‘is a knowledge of the most extensive nature; a matter of science, of diligence of reflection; without which no senator can possibly be fit for his office.’”

But if the difficulty of correctly framing laws be even conceded, when the matter of a new law is the question at hand, how much greater will that difficulty not become when the question deals with amendments to existing laws, many of which may have already been the subject of legal contention possibly not yet settled, and under whose operation large moneyed interests, or municipal privileges may have long been exercised. Here again Blackstone exclaims with just indignation: “And how unbecoming must it appear in a member of the Legislature to vote for a new law, who is utterly ignorant of the old!

What kind of interpretation can he be enabled to give, who is a stranger to the text upon which he comments!"

No one, for instance, who intelligently examines a statute like the Statute of Frauds, can fail to see why, after having been in operation over 200 years, it should still give rise to the necessity of fresh judicial interpretations, under the varying conditions of human society requiring it at times to be regarded, now as a rule of substance, and then again as a rule of procedure. No modern statute has ever been subjected to such frequent and conflicting interpretations. It has been overwhelmed by commentaries and decisions, and has filled our reports with legal adjudications to the number of many thousands. One section alone, comprising but eighty-six words, has required 171 pages for its elucidation in Mr. Benjamin's Treatise on Sales; and the cases cited in support of the distinctions noted, may be numbered by hundreds. These distinctions largely dependent upon phraseology, have been a source of ceaseless discussion by Courts and text-writers, in both England and the United States. To undertake now to amend some of its provisions without a previous knowledge of their judicial history, would be tantamount to throwing aside the labors of hundreds of Courts, which have had occasion to adjudicate upon them in some particular litigation. Yet any Legislature may, at its pleasure, alter and revise this, or any other similarly important statute, bringing to the work as little special knowledge, as it would to a statute to lay out a county highway, or to regulate the method of calling a town meeting.

It is evident therefore, that the function of lawmaking being always in the nature of a tentative effort to create new civil relations, or to re-adjust old ones, renders it necessary, before framing any statute, that the following facts as fundamental propositions should be kept constantly in view:—

- 1st. The necessity of such a law in order to prevent some present mischief, or remedy some outstanding defect in legislation.
- 2d. The constitutional power to pass it.
- 3d. The means by which it is to be operated.
- 4th. The rights it is to bestow or restrict.

DUNCAN L. KENNEDY. LEGISLATIVE BILL DRAFTING

31 Minn.L.Rev. 103-105 (1946).

Bill drafting involves the drawing up of bills, resolutions, memorials, and amendments for introduction in the legislature. The general directions set forth in the laws creating bill drafting agencies usually state that the draftsmen, in preparing bills, shall consider, in addition to technical form, the constitutionality of the proposal, its consistency with existing laws, whether it is necessary or already substantially covered by an existing law, and its structural relationship with the body of law.

As a practical matter legislative research is an essential part of legislative bill drafting. The problem to be solved or the situation to be remedied by a proposed statute must be clearly understood, and the method of remedying it clearly thought out before a statute to remedy it can be drafted.

The problem of drafting relates to the formal side of legislation. The draftsman should not be called upon until after social and economic issues have been disposed of and a policy has been agreed upon. It then becomes a distinct function to translate the legislative policy into the terms of a statute.

Before beginning to prepare a bill it is essential to master the subject matter. Before devising a remedy it is needful to know the existing law and practice and to have a clear conception of the mischief or defects for which the remedy is required.

The law is to be found in acts of the legislature, in judicial decisions and in legal textbooks. The way in which the law actually works is less easily learned. Information is not always available in a written form. It must often be derived from personal experience or supplied by persons having such experience.

For the purpose of studying the acts the most convenient plan is to obtain and fasten together copies of the several acts and then to strike out those portions which have been repealed by subsequent legislation, adding marginal notes to show how they have been repealed.

Lists of relevant judicial decisions, arranged in chronological order, showing the point decided in each case, will often be useful.

So also will be a short bibliography of the textbooks, etc., bearing on the subject of the measure.

It will save much trouble if the results of the information collected are embodied in a memorandum. Several documents of this kind may be required. It may be necessary to trace historically the course of previous legislation, and of discussions in the legislature and elsewhere, and to show how the existing statute law has been interpreted by judicial decisions and has been construed in practice. A memorandum stating the leading features of the proposed legislation and raising clearly the question of principle to be decided will usually be required.

EXPLANATORY NOTE

Determination of the purpose, policy and substantive and other effects of the proposed new law is an absolute prerequisite for successfully writing a bill or any other type of legislative measure. This requires careful research, the result of which should be embodied in a memorandum. The following questionnaire is designed as a guide for that research.

After completion of the memorandum, the first step in drafting is to express the result in writing, concentrating upon substance. The measure should then be rewritten as many times as necessary to:

- (1) attain utmost clarity, with careful regard for choice and arrangement of language;
- (2) comply with formal requirements (see Chapter 5 supra);
- (3) take into account judicial techniques of applying statutes; (see Chapter 7, infra.)
- (4) ensure constitutionality as far as possible; and
- (5) guard against the exigencies of passage through the legislature.

QUESTIONNAIRE TO BE ANSWERED IN PREPARING A MEMORANDUM AS THE BASIS FOR DRAFTING A BILL.

(The purpose of this questionnaire is to enable you to determine whether or not there ought to be a new law on the matter before you, and, if so, what its scope and effect should and would likely be. Before answering any of the following questions read all of them, treat them as constituting a unit, and answer each in its relation to the others.)

1. What is the subject matter of the proposed new law, i. e. with exactly what phases of human affairs, economic, social, or political is the proposed law concerned?
2. What reliable data, literature, expert opinion and advice on the present problem in its economic, social, and political aspects are available? What is their accumulative effect?
3. What is the present law of this state (or country) on the subject?
4. What is the broad objective of the proposed new law?
5. What are the specific fact situations for which the present law is alleged to provide an inadequate or undesirable solution?
6. Does the alleged defect actually exist?
7. If so, is the situation unique to this state (or country), or has the same or a similar defect in the law been dealt with by the legislature of any other state or country?
8. If another state or country has dealt with such a defect, what statutory remedy did it devise?
9. What has been the experience of such other state or country in applying its statute judicially and administratively? Have any-

- theoretical and practical difficulties been encountered? If so, what means have been taken to overcome them?
10. Have the above mentioned statutes of other states or countries been judicially or administratively construed?
 11. Have the governmental officers charged with the administration of such statutes any criticism or suggestion for improving them?
 12. Has the legislature of this state (or the Congress) ever considered or enacted legislation in any phase of human affairs essentially related to the subject now under consideration? If so, what has been its general policy? Would any statutes be in pari materia with the proposed new law? If so, how would they interplay? Adapt and answer questions 9 to 11 to any statutes included in question 12.
 13. What specific solution do you recommend to remedy the defect you are now considering?
 14. Does your solution involve legislative administration or law making in the sense of laying down rules of general application?
 15. If the latter, what is the immediate and specific object or purpose of the new law that you propose?
 16. What are the likely economic, social, and political results and implications of your proposed solution?
 17. What are the various sanctions and other devices available for use in obtaining the objects of your proposed law?
 18. With particular reference to question 17, does the subject matter of your proposed law indicate that it will be self-executory, or must administrative machinery be utilized?
 19. What modifying effect, express or implied, will your new law have on presently existing law, both common and statutory?
 20. Is there any question concerning the constitutionality of your proposed law:
 - (a) under the federal constitution;
 - (b) under the constitution of this state?
 21. In the light of careful appraisal of your answers to the foregoing questions, do you recommend the enactment of a new law? If so, draft the necessary bill.

NOTE

Assistance in discovering some of the answers to the above questionnaire is derivable from: Brandt, "How to Find the Law", (3rd ed. 1940); Hicks, "Materials and Methods of Legal Research", (3rd ed. 1942); Dwyer, Ness and Beutel, "Brief Guide to Federal Legal Bibliography", 31 Fed.Bar Jour. 170 (1945); Doubles and Farmer, "Manual of Legal Bibliography", (1947); "New York State Legislative Annual", (First volume issued in 1946).

Questions 9 to 12 will often necessitate inquiry directed to the governmental officers concerned.

B. Style and Arrangement of Language

DUNCAN L. KENNEDY,* DRAFTING BILLS FOR THE MINNESOTA LEGISLATURE

St. Paul: 1946. West Pub. Co., p. 7.

Legislative drafting requires more definite, more exacting qualities of language, and demands greater skill in composition than other writing. There is no language of sonorous phrases or rhetorical flourishes; it is the language of the exact word and clear sentences, driven home with swift, direct, accurate, inescapable, incisive strokes. Simple English, but exact simple English; certain English, but powerful or delicate as occasion requires; common words, but precise common words; brevity, but the brevity of completeness, definiteness, and clarity. Bill drafting must have the accuracy of engineering, for it is law engineering; it must have the detail and the consistency of architecture, for it is law architecture.

NOTES

1. The same author in "Legislative Bill Drafting", 31 Minn.L.Rev. 103, 104 (1946), says: "It may be said that the rules of good drafting are simply the rules of literary composition, as applied to cases where precision of language is required, and that accordingly anyone who is competent to draw in apt and precise terms a conveyance, a commercial contract, or a pleading is competent to draw a bill; but this is a superficial view."

ALFRED F. CONARD, NEW WAYS TO WRITE LAWS

56 Yale L.J. 458 (1947).

This article is written in the belief that there are definite and positive goals to be attained by simpler statute-writing. There are definite techniques which will help in attaining these goals. When the goals and techniques are known to the profession, better laws will be written.

The Law and the Law-Maker

A law should be clear, first of all, to the law-makers who are called on to vote it into the statute books. This objective has naturally escaped notice in the past because of the assumption that the law is the word of the legislator. The assumption is daily reasserted in references to the "intent of the legislature."

As most people know when they stop to think about it, the man who actually writes the law is not usually a Senator or a Representative. He is a lawyer employed either by a government department or by a politically influential group of citizens which is trying to get the law passed. After it leaves the draftsman's hands, it passes through a hierarchy of officials (if government-sponsored) or of clients (if privately pushed) before it ever reaches the legislative chambers. The officials and clients are the people who know what the law is supposed to say, and in whose minds is born the "intention" behind the original choice of words. Only then does it reach a Congressional committee which is told what it later will be said to have "intended." ⁷

Recently the writer attended a conference of government executives who argued gravely for half an hour about what Congress "intended" by a particular phrase. "Let's quit kidding," one of the conferees finally remarked. "This law was written around this very table, and most of us were here writing it." ⁸

This fiction of legislative authorship is one of the principal obstacles to better drafting. For a draftsman seldom dares to think about how he would write the law if he had a free hand. He adopts the style in which earlier laws have been written, lest the words should fail to sound like the words of a legislature. This practice insures that laws will be written in a style as ancient as the draftsman's learning permits. It is like the habit which made lawyers write pleadings in French and Latin long after these languages had ceased to be current.⁹

The jargon which results is not of course the language of present day Congressmen. Most of them probably feel more like Maury Maverick, who in his famous attack on "gobbledygook" threatened to shoot at sunrise any federal employee who should give him any more of it.¹⁰

⁷ Sec, e.g., Hearings before House Committee on the Judiciary on H.R. 4840, 78th Cong., 2d Sess. (1944) 16:

Congressman Celler (in reference to a provision of a proposed bill): "That would include nationals of Italy, wouldn't it?"

Mr. Cutler (then Assistant General Counsel for the Allen Property Custodian, sponsor of the bill): "It would."

Congressman Celler: "Would it include nationals of Finland?"

Mr. Cutler: "No; the United States has not been at war with Finland." [Reads a passage referring to residents of enemy countries.]

Congressman Celler (interposing): "That is, whether they are a national or a resident?"

Mr. Cutler: "It refers only to citizens or subjects of enemy states in this subsection. To have no right to return, he must have been a citizen of an enemy country and have resided at some time since Pearl Harbor in enemy territory."

Congressman Celler: When you say "Within any [enemy] territory," does that mean territory, for example, that the Nazis have acquired, like Bulgaria and so on?"

⁹ See 2 Holdsworth, History of English Law (3d ed. 1923) 477-84. Holdsworth quotes an English statute of 1362 which complained that "the laws, customs, and statutes of this realm are not commonly known in the same realm, for that they be pleaded, shewed, and judged in the French tongue, which is much unknown in the said realm, so that the people which do implead, or be impleaded in the king's court, and in the courts of others, have no knowledge nor understanding of that which is said for them or against them by their serjeants and other pleaders."

¹⁰ Maverick, Gobbledygook (1944) 4 Pub. Adm. Rev. 151.

The jargon has to be translated to Congressmen so that they can vote understandingly on the bills. Accordingly, a well-drawn committee report contains a full paraphrase of the statute, in shorter sentences and simpler terms, for the Congressmen to read.

A good example of the translation procedure can be found in the House Report on the recent Administrative Procedure Act. Since this Act is one of the more readable works of the Seventy-Ninth Congress, the difference between the official text and the paraphrase is not vast. It is just enough to indicate the difference between something meant to be read by lawmakers and something to be read by Supreme Court judges. A paragraph of the bill is given below on the left with its paraphrase on the right:¹¹

The Act

There shall preside at the taking of evidence (1) the agency, (2) one or more members of the body which comprises the agency, or (3) one or more examiners appointed as provided in this Act; but nothing in this Act shall be deemed to supersede the conduct of specified classes of proceedings in whole or in part by or before boards or other officers specially provided for by or designated pursuant to statute. The functions of all presiding officers and of officers participating in decisions in conformity with section 8 shall be conducted in an impartial manner.

The Paraphrase

The hearing must be held either by the agency, a member or members of the board which comprises it, one or more examiners, or other officers specially provided for in or designated pursuant to other statutes.

All presiding and deciding officers are to operate impartially.

Because of the system of obscure bills accompanied by simpler committee reports, there are usually two versions of each law that passes Congress. The draftsman likes to imagine that when the statute gets into court, the obscure official version will be applied by the judges, and the simpler paraphrase disregarded. But modern judges show a great inclination to disregard the official language and apply the version that Congress consciously agreed to.¹²

So the draftsman's subtlety ends by defeating itself. Instead of controlling judicial rulings by his artfully drawn clauses, he simply causes the judges to rely on the legislative record, over which he has less control. Opposing factions pack the legislative record with conflicting statements, each favoring a particular interpretation.¹³

¹³ A recent example of conflicting legislative history is furnished by the Administrative Procedure Act, Pub.L.No. 404, 79th Cong., 2d Sess. (June 11, 1946). The

A better way for the draftsman to approach his objectives would be to write the statute itself in language he expects a Congressman to read. There would then be no reason for committees to prepare a different text for law-makers to read, nor for judges to suppose that Congressmen really understood the law to mean something it does not say. The statute itself should be as detailed, concrete, and simple as the writer would want to be if he were explaining the law personally to the men who are to vote on it.

So far, we have been discussing cases where the draftsman has been obscure because he was thinking of the judge who would interpret the law, and overlooked the Congressmen who must vote on it. There are also cases where the draftsman is thinking very much about the Congressmen and wants to prevent their discovering what is involved. Sir Courtenay Ilbert, former legislative counsel to the British Parliament, tells without embarrassment of an instance where he used this method in order to sidestep a stormy issue that was being saved for a later date.¹⁴

Examination of a 1941 amendment to the Trading with the Enemy Act¹⁵ suggests that an American draftsman was there trying the same thing. This was an amendment to section 5 of the Act, which had been used by the Treasury for control of foreign exchange transactions. Almost hidden in it was a long sentence giving the President powers to

Attorney General, anxious to show that the Act did not expand the right to judicial review, declared that the section on right to review "reflects existing law." His statement was printed in the Senate Report (Sen.Rep.No. 752, 79th Cong., 1st Sess. (1945) 44), and read by Senator McCarran, sponsor of the bill, on the floor of the Senate (92 Cong.Rec., Mar. 12, 1946, at 2195).

Senator Austin, anxious to show that the Act broadened the right of review, induced Senator McCarran to assent to statements which were substantially contradictory, in this colloquy:

Senator Austin. Is it not true that among the cases cited by the distinguished Senator were some in which no redress or no review was granted, solely because the statute did not provide for a review?

Senator McCarran. That is correct.

Senator Austin. And is it not also true that . . . this bill is brought forward for the purpose of remedying that defect and providing a review to all persons who suffer a legal wrong or wrongs of the other categories mentioned?

Senator McCarran. That is true; the Senator is entirely correct in his statement. (92 Cong.Rec., Mar. 12, 1946, at 2195.)

In this passage, Senator Austin's statements are not directed to the question of whether the bill should be passed, but to building a legislative history to influence its interpretation after it should become law.

A less direct conflict exists between statements of the Attorney General and of Congressman Walter on statutes precluding judicial review. The former emphasized that a statute which does not in terms preclude review may "be interpreted as manifesting a congressional intention to preclude review." (Sen. Rep. No. 752, 79th Cong., 1st Sess. (1945) 44). The latter contended that, "Legislative intent to forbid judicial review must be, if not specific and in terms, at least clear, convincing, and unmistakable. . . . The mere fact that Congress has not expressly provided for judicial review would be completely immaterial. . . ." (92 Cong.Rec., May 24, 1946, at 5759). Again, both the Attorney General and the Congressmen were packing the record of "legislative intent" rather than telling legislators how to vote.

"vest" foreign property—a subject previously dealt with in another section of the Act, and under the more revealing term, "seize."¹⁶ Four years later, the government contended that this amendment had repealed by implication other sections of the Act that gave remedies to American citizens. The argument was plausible enough on the face of the statute, but the Supreme Court overruled it.¹⁷ Mr. Justice Burton, who had been a member of the Senate when the law was passed, wrote a long concurring opinion to explain that Congress meant to leave untouched the rights of citizens which other sections of the law protected.

The Law and the Citizen

The citizens who have to obey the laws—or possibly go to prison for their violations—have been even more neglected by draftsmen than have the legislators. A cursory examination of most laws is enough to persuade a reader that they can hardly be understood by the laymen who are bound by them. To this there may now be added a virtual demonstration.

A series of experiments by Dr. Rudolph Flesch has made it possible to determine quite definitely the readability of various kinds of writing.¹⁸ Through tests of a large number of adult readers, he devised a scale for grading passages with scores running from zero upward. From 0 to 1, for example, is the level of comic strips, which can be easily read by people with a fifth grade education. From 3 to 4, which Dr. Flesch calls "standard," can be easily read by high school students. This is the level of Readers' Digest and Time. From 5 to 6 is the level of academic journals and quarterlies, which can be easily read by college graduates. Anything above 6, according to these observations, can be easily read by practically no one, and cannot be understood, even with effort, by most people who lack a college education.

On Dr. Flesch's scale, most statutes register a score over 10—several degrees above the comprehension of average college graduates. Since only about five percent of the population have a college education, laws are unintelligible to a large proportion of the people who are supposed to obey them. In fact, they are probably beyond the understanding of nearly everyone except the lawyers who make their living by interpreting them.

This state of affairs is not hard to explain. Bentham thought it arose because jurists would rather hang a man for his misdeeds than warn him in advance against committing them.¹⁹ But no such sinister explanation is necessary. The fact is that legal science has consisted in studying the effect of laws on the decision of appellate cases. Draftsmen schooled in this system naturally fix their eyes on the judge of the highest court.

It seems evident that there are tremendous advantages to be gained from writing laws so that citizens can understand them. We know that it would be impossible to police all the business enterprises in the country. The state cannot, for example, fine or enjoin each enterprise that follows any of the practices supposed to constitute "restraint of trade." If illegal practices are to cease, business men must be able to understand which of their practices are illegal. But the language of the Clayton Act is quite inadequate to inform the average business man that he must, for example, abandon basing-point pricing.²⁰

The advantages of making laws understandable was brought home most effectively to the Office of Price Administration, which started out to write its regulations in the strictest tradition of legalistic obscurity.²¹ It was soon embarrassed by a Supreme Court decision refusing to enjoin violations by a Washington department store which showed that it was employing twenty-eight clerks in an effort to apply the price regulations.²² Fortunately, Professor David F. Cavers had already persuaded the agency to try writing its regulations in a down-to-

²¹ Price Section Memorandum No. 3, Feb. 16, 1942, directed all lawyers to follow this model for the first section of each regulation:

"On and after February 16, 1942, regardless of any contract, agreement, lease or other obligation, no person shall sell or deliver second-hand bags, and no person shall buy or receive second-hand bags in the course of trade or business, at prices higher than the maximum prices set forth in Appendix A hereof, incorporated herein as Section 16; and no person shall agree, whether on condition that this Maximum Price Regulation No. — is thereafter amended or is thereafter determined by any court to be invalid or on any other condition or otherwise to do any of the foregoing; and no person shall offer, solicit or attempt to do any of the foregoing."

earth style²³ which some commentators called "pidgin English."²⁴ A large number of merchants, OPA concluded, were willing to obey the law if they knew what it was. But if they could not understand the regulations, they would run their businesses to suit themselves. What was true for OPA regulations is equally true for a great many statutes.

To the argument for intelligible laws, it is sometimes answered that citizens do not read laws anyway. Chicken thieves, for example, do not steal from ignorance of the larceny statutes. That argument is perfectly good for the class of common law crimes which merely codify the Ten Commandments. It is not true for the great mass of legislation which is on the statute books today. The immense business done by the loose leaf services shows how eager business men are to know what rules they must live by. A popular weekly, the United States News, has a regular feature called "News-Lines," telling readers what "you can" and what "you cannot" do under Washington's latest rulings.

It is also argued that citizens can go to lawyers to have laws interpreted.²⁵ To this contention, it should be enough to reply that in fact many citizens do not. What is more important, they can not. A business man must make hundreds of decisions about competitive practice without waiting for opinions of his general counsel. If he cannot grasp the rule he is meant to follow, he will follow the rule that appeals to him and hope it is right.

Moreover, if a business man's lawyer can translate a law into terms that a business man can understand, a draftsman should be able to do the same. He will save time and expense for citizens when he does.

The Law and the Public Official

Laws must also be read and understood by the public officials who have to apply them and enforce them. These are the only people concerned with a considerable portion of the statutory law—the portion that tells how the various departments of government shall be run, who shall appoint their employees, and what they shall be paid.

Public officials are also some of the most important readers of the other kinds of laws, which tell citizens what they must do and refrain from doing to keep out of court. Police, detectives, and inspectors have to know what conduct has been forbidden before they can crack down on violators. Officials who issue licenses and assess taxes have to understand the categories in which licenses should be granted and taxes imposed.

²⁵ See Carter, The Provinces of the Written and the Unwritten Law (1890) 24 Am.L.Rev. 1.

Many public officials have just as hard a time understanding statutes as do many citizens. That is one reason why they are bound to fasten on mechanical interpretations that irk the citizen or provoke needless litigation. It is also a reason why they apply their personal standards of justice instead of applying the law. Not infrequently, the results are better than if they tried to follow the letter of the law as they understand it.

It is only a partial solution to fill public offices with lawyers, or with men who have taken a night law course. Often the job needs a good accountant, an engineer, or a social worker. But if it gets the specialist it needs, it gets a man who has trouble understanding the laws. More often it gets a poorer specialist than it needs, or no specialist at all, in order to get a man who can make out the law or is willing to ignore it.

Neither is it a solution to provide every official with a legal adviser. The man who makes the decisions should not only be told the law; he should understand it.

The Law and the Judges

At last we reach the men for whom most laws are consciously written—the judges. When a draftsman labors over a nascent bill, it is the judge who is nearly always in his mind. Treatises and casebooks are filled with examples of how judges construed ill-fated laws in the past. These are the precedents which guide draftsmen in conceiving the ill-fated laws of the future.

The draftsman's preoccupation with the judge is evidenced in a hundred ways. Sometimes it appears in the form of the law, which says that taking money from the employer's coffer "shall be deemed" (by the judge, obviously) to be embezzlement, and that the malefactor "shall be punishable" (by the judge) with one to ten years' imprisonment. A draftsman who was thinking about influencing the conduct of citizens would tell them that "employees must not" take money from the coffer, and that if they do they "will be punished."

In other laws, concentration on the judge is evidenced more subtly, but just as surely. A sentence a page long, winding up in a string of provisos, is no tool for telling either citizens or officials what has been forbidden. It is tool, the draftsman hopes, for putting the judge in a box where he can rule only one way.²⁶

One of the lesser reasons why this kind of drafting is bad is that the judge is the last man to read any statute. It must first be read by the legislators, and accepted by them. It must then be read, or exposed for reading, by citizens. If the law is understood and obeyed by the citizens, it need never be re-read by anyone else. If it is disobeyed, the public official has his turn at reading the law, deciding whether the citizen has disobeyed it, and catching him in the infraction.

Only after all these other stages have been passed does the law ordinarily come to the judge.²⁷ This alone is a reason for writing so that some of the earlier parties may comprehend.

To this argument, the traditional draftsman will respond that it does no good for legislators, citizens, and officials to comprehend if judges, in the end, will misconstrue. This response reveals the crux of the whole question, which is the peculiar views about judges that underlie traditional drafting. The judge, according to a widely held superstition, is a man determined to thwart the intention of legislators by twisting every sentence from its normal meaning. But if you tie each word firmly enough to the next one, according to this bit of scribes' lore, the judge cannot get out of the trap and must sentence the defendant.

Cases of a past century furnish some apparent examples of this kind of judicial conduct. There is the case of the English statute which prescribed a penalty—"if any person or persons shall wantonly and cruelly beat, abuse, or ill-treat any horse, mare, gelding, mule, ass, ox, cow, heifer, steer, sheep, or other cattle." A defendant was charged under this law with conducting a bull-fight. The judge let him off, ostensibly because "bull" was not in the list of animals, and the judge would not construe "other cattle" to include something not listed.²⁸

Then there is the judge who reversed a conviction for rape because the indictment concluded "against the peace and dignity of State," instead of "against the peace and dignity of the State." The constitution, the judge pointed out, required indictments to conclude in a certain form, and he was bound by the constitution.²⁹

A trial lawyer who lost an argument in a case like this would probably conclude that the judge had a bad breakfast, or that he enjoyed bull-fighting. But office lawyers prefer the conclusion that if lists were more complete and exceptions more explicit, the judges' conduct would become more predictable. So statutory style becomes (to paraphrase Lord Thring)³⁰ a wordy cairn, on which each practitioner must from time to time throw a new word, until the whole becomes a huge heap of unintelligibility.

In the battle of wits between apparently whimsical judges and ever more diligent draftsmen, victory went always to the judges. They had the last word. When exclusio unius would not work, noscitur a sociis could always be brought to play. Today, it is clear that judges are not prisoners of language and do not even pretend to be.³¹ . . .

Today, judges do not even pretend to make a mechanical application of the words of statutes. They much prefer to discover and apply the purposes of statutes.* Under these circumstances, the concatenations of words which delighted old time draftsmen are worse than lost labor.

They oblige the judges to guess at the main purpose of the law, instead of finding it clearly stated. They insure that the judges will look outside, instead of inside, the law to find the rules they should apply to particular situations.

A Restatement of Objectives

The tricks that make a law easy to understand are countless. Many of them are as subtle as the touches that make good style in essays, short stories, and every other kind of literary creation. What is essential is that the writer should really want his readers to understand what is commanded and what is forbidden by the law. His object is different from that treated in books on composition, which seek an appeal to the cultivated literary taste; they strive for a certain sophistication and subtlety which may mystify while it charms.

The law-writer's object is more like that of the man who writes directions on how to use a Kodak or how to operate a Burroughs calculator. He may be addressing a very alert and eager audience, but he wants to be understood with as little effort as possible. And he wants above all to prevent his reader from throwing down the directions in disgust.

How technical he will be should depend on his audience. A statute on judicial procedure may properly use phrases that lawyers alone can comprehend, and sentences as complex as those in legal treatises and law reviews.³² But there is no excuse for using sentences which he would be ashamed to put in a bar association committee report, addressed to the same audience.

Postal regulations should be a good deal simpler. Here is an essentially good sentence from a recent law on what can be mailed:

"Pistols, revolvers, and other firearms capable of being concealed on the person . . . shall not be deposited in or carried by the mails. . . ." ³³

³² This article is not intended to be as simple as most statutes should be. It is meant for lawyers, while most laws are to be read by laymen.

Laws on restraint of trade should be pitched to the reading level of average business men. The draftsman of a law like the Robinson-Patman Act should ask himself whether it would make a good circular to the buyers of a large merchandising organization like Sears Roebuck. If it would not, it is a poor device for inducing business men to change their ways of buying and selling.

Internal Revenue laws and regulations may be pitched to several different levels. Those which apply to small individual incomes need to be on a very simple level. The excess profits tax law, on the other hand, had every reason to be more complex; it would be used almost exclusively by accountants. But there was no excuse for writing it in such terms that a bulletin of several hundred pages had to be issued to tell the accountants how to apply it.⁴⁰ The text which the accountants could read should have been the text of the law.

While many of any draftsman's problems are unique, he has others which have confronted scores of draftsmen before him. For these, standard techniques can be evolved and copied from one law to another. Some of these problems are discussed in the paragraphs that follow.

What the Act is About

The first thing that any law-reader wants to know is what the law is about. Does it affect him or doesn't it? Most laws fail so utterly to answer this question that they are likely to be thrown in the waste basket before the reader even tries to decipher them.

A typical example is the Trading with the Enemy Act,⁴¹ which in time of war suddenly applies to tens of thousands of Americans. But if it came in the mail to an American who was about to send some money to a foreign creditor, he would have to parse two or three pages before he found out whether he was likely to be affected by it.

The first thing the citizen would notice is that the Act begins with section 2 (maybe section 1 got lost, he thinks).⁴² Section 2, which has

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the 'Republic of the Philippines Military Assistance Act.'"

"Sec. 2. Notwithstanding the provisions of any other law. . . ."

On the other hand, Pub.L.No. 485, 79th Cong., 2d Sess. (July 3, 1946) begins this way:

no subtitle, contains a long list of definitions, starting with a half-page definition of "enemy."

Somewhere in the middle of the second page begins section 3, also with no subtitle. If the citizen is still looking, he will see—

That it shall be unlawful—

- (a) For any person in the United States, except with a license of the President, granted to such person, or to the enemy, or ally of enemy, as provided in this Act, to trade, either directly or indirectly, with, to, or from, or for, on account of, or on behalf of, or for the benefit of any other person. . . .

If he keeps on for a few lines more, and understands what he reads, he will at last find out what the law is about.

A better way to start a statute is suggested by the way OPA finally learned to open its price regulations. It learned by experience ⁴³ to start them this way:

"This regulation fixes ceiling prices for sales by retailers of certain commodities." ⁴⁴

The same approach could have been used in the Trading with the Enemy Act:

"This law applies to everyone in the United States who has any dealings with foreigners."

It could then have proceeded to explain what foreigners and what dealings were specifically affected.

Where an act is addressed chiefly to public officials, rather than to citizens, the important thing is to set out the moving purpose behind the statute. The Employment Act of 1946⁴⁵ (originally proposed as the Full Employment Act of 1945) starts with a declaration of the national "policy and responsibility" to provide for employment through free enterprise. This tells the purposes with which the later sections (which can never provide for all eventualities) should be carried out.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

"Section 1. This Act may be cited as the 'Philippine Property Act of 1946.'

"Sec. 2. There shall remain vested in the Government of the United States.
. . . ."

Apparently the statutes which get more drafting attention usually have a separate section 1, as do the Administrative Procedure Act and the Employment Act of 1946 passed by the last session. But both of these acts had earlier drafts in which the first section was unmarked.

When the statute is edited for the United States Code, its first section is always given a section number; e.g., 50 U.S.C.App. § 1 (1940). But the statutes at large, and the official government reprints circulated for information of the public, are in the original form.

Guide Lines

Another simple means of enticing the reading public into the heart of a statute is to put headings on the various subdivisions. A citizen who tackles an official print of the Trading with the Enemy Act to find out which if any of its provisions affects him finds twenty-five pages of closely printed text unadorned by a single guide line.⁴⁶ If he runs over the introductory words of a series of sections, he finds these beginnings for the various paragraphs:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives . . .

"Sec. 2. That the word 'enemy,' as used herein, shall be deemed . . .

"Sec. 3. That it shall be unlawful . . .

"Sec. 4. (a) Every enemy or ally of enemy insurance or reinsurance company, and every enemy or ally of enemy, doing business within the United States . . .

"Sec. 5. (a) That the President, if he shall find it compatible with the safety of the United States and with the successful prosecution of the war. . . ."

This sort of thing is so obviously unenlightening that no compilation of laws is ever published without the compiler adding boldface titles to the various sections in order to guide the reader around. The official United States Code⁴⁷ provides the following guideposts:

2. Definitions

3. Acts prohibited.

4. Licenses to enemy or ally or enemy insurance or reinsurance companies; change of name; doing business in United States.

5. Suspension of provisions relating to ally, of enemy; regulation of transactions in foreign exchange of gold or silver."

Compilers' headings are seldom carried below the main section headings, but occasional statutes carry useful captions down through the subsections and paragraphs. Internal Revenue legislation has been particularly forward in this direction, as in the following example:⁴⁸

"Tax on transportation of persons, etc.—

(f) Exemptions.

(1) Governmental exemption.

(2) Exemption of members of military and naval service."

⁴⁶ 40 Stat. 411 (1917), 50 U.S.C.App. § 1 et seq. (1940).

⁴⁸ 26 U.S.C. § 3469 (Supp.1946).

The technique to which the Bureau of Internal Revenue has been driven by its thousands of statutory sections would be no less useful in a great many smaller legislative masses. Yet the great majority of bills entering the legislative hopper, and of statutes leaving it, are as devoid of subdivision headings as the Trading with the Enemy Act of 1917.

Cutting Out the Jargon

One of the things that annoys readers in legal writing is the tireless repetition of words that do not need to be repeated. "Such," "afore-said," and "hereinbefore" are the most familiar offenders.⁴⁹

The argument for them is that they eliminate any possible doubt that the person meant is the same one who was meant before. But it is quite certain that people read stories, articles, and even legal treatises which are not filled with "such," "aforesaid," and "hereinbefore." They do not misunderstand. Laymen find legal documents hard to read precisely because of this strenuous struggle against ambiguity. The only justification for these terms is the myth about the perverse judge who will misinterpret the law by pretending to misunderstand it. Once we have decided that we have to trust the judge anyway, we can do away with these backward-looking modifiers. When we mean the same person as before, we can simply say "the person."⁵⁰

"Such" and its companions can be got rid of simply by dropping them. A slightly harder problem is presented when the law-writer has to use two or three different terms, and finds himself repeating them again and again like leit-motifs in a Wagnerian opera. Here is an example of this fault, with one of the recurrent themes put in italics, and the other in capitals:

"Any requirement made pursuant to this Act, or a duly certified copy thereof, may be filed, registered, or recorded in any office for the filing, registering, or recording of CONVEYANCES, TRANSFERS, OR ASSIGNMENTS of any such property or rights as may be covered by such requirement (including the proper office for filing, registering, or recording CONVEYANCES, TRANSFERS, OR ASSIGNMENTS of patents, copyrights, trade-marks, or any rights therein or any other rights); and if so filed, registered, or recorded shall import the same notice and have the same force and effect as a duly executed CONVEYANCE, TRANSFER, OR ASSIGNMENT to the Alien Property Custodian so filed, registered, or recorded."⁵¹

⁵¹ Trading with the Enemy Act, 40 Stat. 1020 (1918), 50 U.S.C., App. § 7c (1940).

This paragraph could have been written as follows:

"Any order under this Act, or a certified copy of it, may be filed in any office for the filing of other transfers of the same kind of property. The effect will be the same as for any other transfer. 'Filing' includes registering and recording; 'transfers' include conveyances and assignments; 'property' includes patents, copyrights and trademarks."

Short Sentences

One of the hardest things for a lawyer to do is to write short sentences. Here is an example of a lawyer-like sentence, from an OPA regulation on work clothing:

"Any tax upon, and incident to, the sale or delivery of staple work clothing, imposed by any statute of the United States or statute or ordinance of any state or subdivision thereof, shall be treated as follows in determining the seller's maximum prices for staple work clothing, and in preparing the records of such seller with respect thereto: . . .

"(2) In all other cases, if, at the time the seller determines his maximum price, the statute or ordinance imposing such tax does not prohibit the seller from stating and collecting the tax separately from the purchase price, and the seller does state it separately, the seller may collect, in addition to the maximum price, the amount of the tax actually paid by him or an amount equal to the amount of tax paid by any prior vendor and separately stated and collected from the seller by the vendor from whom he purchased and in such case the seller shall not include such amount in determining the maximum price under this Maximum Price Regulation No. 208."⁵²

Here is how OPA wrote a similar provision after it had decided it wanted citizens to understand:

"The ceiling prices determined under the pricing rules in section 7 are your ceiling prices exclusive of tax. If the tax law permits the tax to be separately stated, you may charge or collect the tax on the sale or delivery of the article in addition to the ceiling price fixed under the pricing rules: Provided, that you state the tax separately. This applies, however, only to a tax on a particular sale or delivery such as a sales tax or compensating use tax. You may separately state the tax by any method you choose, except that the Retail Federal Excise Tax on fur-trimmed articles and certain items of leather goods and other articles imposed by the Revenue Act of 1943 must be stated as provided in Supplementary Order 85."⁵³

Some of the explanation for the failings of the earlier draftsman lies in the same old story. He was thinking of some judge who might let off a chiseler if there were any break between the idea that the tax could be added and the restriction to special kinds of taxes. He was not thinking at all about the country storekeeper who would have to make sense out of the whole provision.

But the principal explanation for lawyers' labyrinthian sentences is more ironic. It is their passion for brevity. Most sentences start short, and grow longer as each member of a legislative committee adds ideas. After a couple of additions, the sentence needs to be split into two. Any draftsman would split it in a letter, but not in a statute, because that would make him repeat the subject and verb. The statute appears to take less space in one sentence than in two.

What the draftsman forgets is that the reason for brevity is to avoid tiring the reader. Most readers find one sentence of eighty words more tiring than five with twenty each. The thing to keep down is not the number of lines of type, but the reading time. The easier the style, as Readers' Digest knows, the shorter the reading time.

Giving Examples

Another tradition which discourages citizens from reading laws is the draftsman's habit of describing his subject in the least specific terms he can find. An example of this approach is furnished by a bill in the last Congress which provided,

"That hereafter, except as otherwise specially provided by Act of Congress, no action for the recovery of wages, penalties or other damages, actual or exemplary, pursuant to any law of the United States shall be maintained in any court unless the same was commenced within one year after such cause of action accrued: . . ." ⁵⁴

The only way a lawyer can know whether the one-year limitation of this law applies is to search the United States Code from stem to stern. If he can't find a limitation anywhere else, then this is it.

A catch-all limitation may be a good thing, just to cover the unknown and forgotten cases. But this wasn't that kind of a law. The draftsman knew precisely what actions he wanted to limit, and he listed them, with citation, in the Committee report. If he had listed them in the statute, he would have saved hours of research for thousands of lawyers. Why didn't he? Possibly he prided himself on the brevity of his product, occupying a minimum of space in the Statutes-at-Large, but consuming a maximum of other lawyers' time and making it likely that some would be misled until, on an appeal, a more resourceful opponent produced the Committee Report and showed what the legislators really "intended." More likely, he did not think at all. He simply followed the legal tradition of using vague, general terms instead of specific ones. If the draftsman had wanted to enlighten his reader, he would have written—

"The following actions must be brought within one year after the cause of action accrued:

"(1) Suits for treble damages based on infringement of a registered trademark (17 U.S.C., § 25);

⁵⁴ H.R.Rep.No. 1141, 79th Cong., 1st Sess. (1945).

"(2) Suits based on infringement of copyrights (17 U.S.C., § 25);" and so on down the list.

Later in the same bill occurs another provision of unenlightening vagueness:

"Provided further, That no liability shall be predicated in any case on any act done or omitted in good faith in accord with any regulation, order, or administrative interpretation or practice, notwithstanding that such regulation, order, interpretation, or practice may, after such act or omission, be amended, rescinded, or be determined by judicial authority to be invalid or of no effect."

No doubt a lawyer can sit down and figure out some of the situations to which this provision might apply, but they are not immediately evident. A layman would be unlikely to figure them out at all.

The reason for leaving the reader in the dark is not the difficulty in explaining the situations, for they were very lucidly set forth in the Committee Report:

"A good illustration arises from the operation of the Fair Labor Standards Act. An employer who violates the provisions of this law relating to wages or hours may be subjected to suit for twice the amount involved together with costs and attorney fees. The application of this law has been greatly extended by administrative regulations. As a result an employer who may have, in good faith, relied upon a certain ruling, regulation, or practice, suddenly finds himself confronted with many suits, when a change is made either by the Administrator or by the courts. The enforcement of this new liability dating back to the enactment of the law would in many cases bankrupt the employer."⁵⁵

This problem cannot be solved, like the preceding one, by listing the situations where the law applies, because they are innumerable. If the draftsman were to say "no liability shall be predicated in the following situations—," and list only some of them, he would run the danger of implying that it does exist in the other situations.

But there is a simple solution. Give an example and call it an example. Below is a passage from an OPA regulation where a hard-to-read legal provision is given concreteness by an illustration of how it works:

"Rule 3: . . . If the article you are pricing has a net cost lower than the lowest net cost listed for that category in column 2 of your chart, you figure your maximum price by applying to the net cost of the article the percentage markup listed in column 4 for the lowest net cost shown for that category.

Example 6: You wish to price a girl's sweater costing \$1.94 net. The lowest net cost which you have listed for category 208 is \$2.07, for which you have a listed percentage markup of 55.6%. Therefore your maximum price is \$3.02. ($1.94 \times 0.556 = \1.079; $1.94 + \$1.079 = \3.019 .)"⁵⁶

⁵⁶ Maximum Price Regulation 580, § 7c, 10 Fed.Reg. 2017 (1945).

The rule of law is hard reading; with the example, a merchant can see what it means. If examples can be used in regulations, which have the force of law, they can also be used in statutes. When they are, many more citizens will understand the law.

Giving Directions

Law-writers are usually talking about who shall go to jail, and what epithet shall be applied to him. "Every person who shall do such and such shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punishable. . . ." Or else they seem to be engaged in making preposterous predictions like "No person shall make any agreement. . . ."

What the citizen wants to know is not how to get in jail but how to stay out. It seems more logical to him to say "Persons must not do such and such." This is the style of the Ten Commandments, which are good examples of direct speech to the common citizen.

In complex laws, this oblique approach of the law-writer is a real obstacle to understanding. Consider, for example, the confusion of the ordinary taxpayer if he had to figure out his income tax by reading the Internal Revenue Code and regulations. Fortunately, he does not even attempt it. He reads the form and the instructions. And this is all the Bureau of Internal Revenue expects him to do.⁵⁷

Since that is what the Bureau expects, a sensible internal revenue law would ask him to do just that: "Every person who received more than $500 in a year, and not more than $3000, must fill out form 1041 A, according to the instructions that go with it. He must also pay the tax which is shown by the form, when properly completed. Form 1041 A for 1947 is as follows. . . ."

Any criminal code contains examples of both types of laws—those which tell the judge what he should think about it if a man is brought before him charged with certain acts, and those which tell the citizen what acts he must refrain from doing.

Here is an example of the first method:

"Whoever shall enter, remain in, leave, or commit any act in any military area or military zone . . . shall, . . . be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction shall be liable to a fine. . . ." ⁵⁸

This tells what a law lecturer would presumably want to know about a crime—what it is called, and when a man is guilty of it.

"Pistols, revolvers, and other firearms capable of being concealed on the person . . . shall not be deposited in or carried by the mails. . . ." ⁵⁹

⁵⁷ The writer was refused copies of the Treasury Regulations until he persuaded the clerk that he was a lawyer or accountant.

This tells the citizen what he is not to do.

The former approach illustrates another habit of draftsmanship which reveals the workings of the draftsman's mind. He is not thinking about telling the citizen what not to do, but about telling the judge what to do with the offending citizen.

Mathematics in Law

Speaking the reader's language does not always mean using a primer style. It means using the style that will be best understood, considering the kind of readers and the kind of ideas which must be presented.

So far, we have been talking about kinds of sentences. But sometimes sentences are not the best way to present the kind of material at hand. When material is largely mathematical, it should be presented in tables and formulas.

Consider, for example, two ways of setting out the tax rates. Before 1942, surtax rates were stated in this cumbersome way:

"$80 upon surtax net incomes of $6,000; and upon surtax net incomes in excess of $6,000 and not in excess of $8,000, 5 per centum in addition of such excess.

"$180 upon surtax net incomes of $8,000; and upon surtax net incomes in excess of $8,000 and not in excess of $10,000, 6 per centum in addition of such excess."⁶⁰

Obviously this is the kind of information which anybody but a law-writer would have put in a table. In 1942, when the Bureau first went in seriously for tax simplification, it adopted a semi-tabular presentation, far easier to follow, like this:

IF THE SURTAX NET INCOME IS:	THE SURTAX SHALL BE:
Over $4,000 but not over $6,000 . .	$580, plus 20% of excess over $4,000.
Over $6,000 but not over $8,000 . .	$980, plus 24% of excess over $6,000. ⁶¹

In the same year, a completely tabular presentation was adopted for the new optional tax on incomes of $3000 and under, in this manner:

IF THE GROSS INCOME IS OVER—	BUT NOT OVER—	THE TAX SHALL BE—
		SINGLE PERSON (NOT HEAD OF A FAMILY)	MARRIED PERSON MAK- ING SEPARATE RETURN	(1) MARRIED PERSON WHOSE SPOUSE HAS NO GROSS IN- COME OR (2) MARRIED PERSON MAK- ING JOINT RETURN OR (3) HEAD OF A FAMILY

Although the Bureau of Internal Revenue has outdistanced other law-writing departments in adapting its technique to its problems, many of its opportunities for improvement have remained untouched. It continues to use sentences to describe mathematical calculations which anyone else would describe by formula. For example, it provides that a shareholder in a holding company must include in his gross income

“ . . . the amount he would have received as a dividend if on such last day there had been distributed by the company, and received by the shareholders, an amount which bears the same ratio to the undistributed Supplement P net income of the company for the taxable year as the portion of such taxable year up to and including such last day bears to the entire taxable year.”⁶³

This passage requires a calculation which no one but a statutory draftsman would ever think of writing out in this way. This is hard reading for anybody. It can be handled in a number of ways, depending on who is the reading class.

If the readers are miscellaneous laymen, like those who file individual income tax returns, the only thing to do is to make a form with directions like this:

- Line 11. Enter the number of days from the beginning of the taxable year to the “last day” named above
- Line 12. Divide the number in line 11 by 365, and enter the result here and so on.

⁶² 56 Stat. 802 (1942) § 104(a), 26 U.S.C. § 400 (Supp. 1943).

⁶³ 53 Stat. 96 (1939), 26 U.S.C. § 337b (1940).

But this particular section will be used only by bookkeepers and accountants, so the draftsman could have said more briefly:

The taxpayer must include in his gross income an amount A which he calculates as follows:

- (1) Find the fraction of the entire taxable year which had elapsed on the "last day" described above, and call it f .
- (2) Find the undistributed supplement P net income of the company for the entire taxable year, and call it P .
- (3) Multiply f times P . The product is the amount A .

The Rest of the Job

Knowing how to write readable laws will not make citizens read laws. It will only open the way for other changes which must be made before the goal is reached.

For one thing, the job of law-writing must be delegated. It is a specialty, as good journalism is a specialty. The effect of a group of legislators amending a law around a table is the same as the effect of a lot of executives amending an advertising slogan around a table. They should make their suggestions, but the job of working them into the product should be left to the specialist.⁶⁴

This does not mean that law-making must be delegated. The same thing happens in administrative agencies as in legislatures when policy-making officials take over the writer's pen. It means that amendments by law-makers should be directions to the draftsman, and the draftsman should knit them into the law or regulation.

After laws are written, they must be publicized. It is not enough to put laws in a statute book where a diligent attorney, aided (when the law is months or years old) by a compiler's index, may discover them. Ways must be found of bringing them to the attention of the people who are supposed to obey them.

Administrative agencies usually recognize this need. They send out bulletins to all the classes of citizens who are supposed to be affected. But laws of Congress and of state legislatures are left to the caprices of newspaper editors, where their chance of presentation depends on the amount of competition offered by the day's more exciting headlines.

Laws also need to be made in separable parts. The citizen does not need to know all about the make-up of an administrative commission or the frequency with which reports must be submitted to Congress. He needs to know what is compelled and what is forbidden. If he has to sort this out from all the rest, he will probably never read it at all. OPA made some useful experiments in separating what the citizen needs to have at hand and what he does not.⁶⁵ The same thing should be tried with laws of Congress.

⁶⁴ Ibert, The Mechanics of Law Making (1913) 14 quotes the following from Sir Frederick Pollock: "Many an Act of Parliament, originally prepared with the greatest care and skill, and introduced under the most favourable circumstances, does not become law till it has been made a thing of shreds and patches hardly recognizable by its author, and to any one with an eye for the clothing of ideas in comely words no less ludicrous an object than the ragged pilgrims described by Bunyan: 'They go not uprightly, but all awry with their feet; one shoe goes inward, another outward, and their hosen out behind; there a rag and there a rent, to the disparagement of their Lord.'"

At the same time, laws need to be consolidated. Related laws should be combined, duplications eliminated, and all put in better order.⁶⁶ The present mass of statutes is almost as forbidding as the mass of cases which, a century ago, awoke the drive for codification of the unwritten law. Today it is the written law itself that needs to be codified.

Conclusion

Laws should be written with more emphasis on making readers understand what the law commands, and with less emphasis on controlling the judges by rigid grammatical constructions. Judges are more likely to be controlled by clear statements of purpose.

Many ways of making laws more readable are already in use. They should be brought into the open, to be more widely adopted if valid and abandoned if unsound. The law needs a literature on how to write laws that is not contained in present treatises on statutory interpretation.

NOTE

A draftsman should always consult the applicable general interpretation act for definitions of words and phrases, and for legislatively prescribed rules of construction. The Kansas act, like several others, provides that: "In the construction of the statutes of this state the following rules shall be observed, unless such construction would be inconsistent with the manifest intent of the legislature or repugnant to the context of the statute: . . ." Concerning the effect of this provision, Huxman, J. in Dwyer v. Matson, 163 F.2d 299, 301 (1947), remarked: "This definition (in the general construction act) defines legal residence and makes residence the equivalent of domicile. In the end, this statute is not very helpful because it expressly provides that the definitions contained therein shall not control if such definitions are inconsistent with the manifest intention of the Legislature or repugnant to the context of the statute. We are therefore forced to look to the legislation in question to determine the sense in which the word 'residence' was used when the Legislature provided that a married person could convey real estate without the signature of the spouse when such spouse was not and had not during the marriage been a resident of Kansas."

DRAFTING RULES AND SUGGESTIONS

Prepared by the Committee on Legislative Drafting of the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws in Accordance with Resolutions Adopted by the Conference at Saratoga, in 1917, and Amended by the Conference at Cleveland, in 1918, and Further Amended by the Conference at Washington, in 1932.

1. Title.—The title of the uniform acts shall be: An act concerning (or relating to) . . . and to make uniform the law with reference thereto.

2. Numbering of Sections.—Sections shall be numbered by arabic figures, consecutively or progressively throughout the act. Schedules shall be numbered as sections.

3. Length of Sections.—(1) Long sections should be avoided. (2) Each proposition that is separable from other propositions should be placed in a separate section.

4. Detaching of Clauses.—Where a section covers a number of contingencies, alternatives, requirements or conditions, or is too long to be written as a single paragraph, the section should be broken into sub-sections designated by figures. Sub-sections may be broken into paragraphs designated by letters. A section should not be further subdivided. (Amended, 1937).

Illustration.—Section 1 of Uniform Negotiable Instruments Act:

An instrument to be negotiable must conform to the following requirements:

- (1) It must be in writing and signed by the maker and drawer;
- (2) Must contain an unconditional promise or order to pay a sum certain in money;
- (3) Must be payable on demand, or at a fixed or determinable future time;
- (4) Must be payable to order or bearer; and
- (5) Where the instrument is addressed to a drawee, he must be named or otherwise indicated therein with reasonable certainty.

5. Definitions.—Definitions should be placed at the beginning of the act, not at the end.

6. Language.—a. Present tense. The present tense should be used for descriptive matter, or matter stating a legal effect; the word "shall" should be reserved for requirements or prohibitions. b. Unnecessary words. The words "said," "such," "aforesaid," "whatever," etc., should as far as possible be avoided. c. Provided. The term "provided that" should be avoided.

7. Severability Clause.—In uniform acts in which a constitutional severability clause is deemed desirable the following form should ordinarily be used.

If any provision of this act or the application thereof to any person or circumstances is held invalid, such invalidity shall not affect other provisions or applications of the act which can be given effect without the invalid provision or application, and to this end the provisions of this act are declared to be severable

8. Use of the Form "and/or."—The use of this form or expression in uniform acts is not desirable.

(Published in 1890. Now out of print.)

(Sec. 278.)—It is desirable to cut up the matter of enactment into short sections for several reasons: 1. The person preparing the statute will compel himself to detach and lay out clearly his ideas and finish up one thing at a time. 2. The sense of the statute will be more easily grasped if it is made easy to proceed step by step than if it is seemingly or actually made necessary to assimilate much matter at once. 3. Parts of the statute will be more easily referred to and designated in discussion. 4. The statute can be more easily amended in parts which may need amendment without disturbing other parts or reprinting long paragraphs.

(Sec. 285.)—There is a difficulty in the way of making sentences short in statutory expression which arises from the necessity of joining many predicates to one subject or many subjects to one predicate or many dependent clauses of co-ordinate value to one leading statement. In such cases European statute-writers have resorted to the expedient of detaching these co-ordinate expressions by the manner of setting out the law on the written or printed page. The attempt is made by a system of paragraphing to more clearly indicate the equivalent value of what is co-ordinate, also to indicate what is dependent and upon what it depends, when the same end could not be reached by any system of mere punctuation, and when the matter could not be broken up into a number of separate sentences without much repetition.

(Sec. 324.)—There is a fashion of introducing nouns, verbs, adjectives, and even conjunctions by pairs in statutory expression. The practice of using these combinations originally arose in part from a wish to be more elegant, and in part from imitation of the practice in drawing legal instruments where it was an object of the draftsman to multiply words. Where they now occur, they are used in general without deliberate choice. Their employment does not indicate that the person using them wishes to discriminate between the compound and the simple expression, but indicates that he is obeying precedent or instinctively adopting forms which have become traditional. One word may be made to do duty for two or three in the case of many of these expressions.

(Sec. 352.)—The legislator is tempted to make an extravagant use of broadsounding words, multiplying the word "any" and adding "whatsoever" and "wheresoever" where a simpler expression would answer the purpose. The multiplication of these words serves in many cases only to give to the statute a pretentiousness.

out increasing the breadth of its application. There need be no forced avoidance of the use of the word "any" where it is the natural expression, or of the other words where their use is needed to show a sweeping intent in a statute liable to receive strict construction. But it is a good plan after a statute is put in its first form to look it over and prune out the extravagances when they are perceived to be clearly such.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON LEGISLATIVE DRAFTING

Proceedings of the Conference of Commissioners on Uniformity of Legislation in Canada, 1919, pp. 9-11, 14-15; 1942, pp. 90-94, 96, 98. (Quoting Coode, Legislative Expression, Pub. 1848; now out of print.)

Formation of a Legislative Sentence

The arrangement of sentences in detached or tabular form and the use of mechanical devices for graphic presentation of enactments are common in English and Canadian Statutes. Clearness is materially increased by these expedients. They enable the reader to readily distinguish between the main and the dependent clauses, and to see the relation of the subject to its various predicates.

Coode in his analysis of a legislative expression considers it as consisting of four elements: First, the description of the legal subject; second, the enunciation of the legal action; third, the description of the case to which the legal action is confined; and, fourth, the conditions on performance of which the legal action operates. (Coode, p. 6.)

The analysis presented by this writer and the rules which he develops from that analysis are strikingly clear and logical. The following brief extracts only can be presented here, but his entire book will well repay a careful study by every draftsman:—

"The purpose of the law in all cases is to secure some benefit to some person or persons. . . .

"It is only possible to confer a Right, or Privilege, or Power, on one set of persons, by imposing corresponding Liabilities or Obligations on other persons, compelling these to afford the benefit conferred, or to abstain from invading it. . . .

"Now no Right, Privilege, or Power can be conferred, and no Obligation or Liability imposed, otherwise than on some person.

"The person who may or may not or shall or shall not do something or submit to something is the legal subject of the legal action.

"The importance of a just discrimination and correct expression of the legal subject cannot easily be exaggerated. The description of the legal subject determines the extent of the law. On this portion of every legal sentence it depends whether a right or privilege shall be limited to too few persons or extended to too many; whether an obligation is imposed on more persons than is necessary or is not extended to sufficient persons in order to secure the correlative right; whether powers are reposed in right or wrong persons; whether sanctions are or are not made to fall on the proper subjects." (Coode, pp. 7, 9.)

"The legal action is that part of every legislative sentence in which the Right, Privilege, or Power, or the Obligation or Liability, is defined, wherein it is said that a person may or may not or shall or shall not do any act, or shall submit to some act.

"As the legal subject defines the extent of the law, so the description of the legal action expresses the nature of the law. It expresses all that the law effects, as law. The selection of the legal subject is important; but it is on the description of the legal action that the whole function of legislation exercises and exhausts itself." (Coode, pp. 9, 10).

"The rules of most effect as to the expression of the legal subject are:—

"First, to keep the legal subject distinct in form and in place from other parts of the legal sentence.

"Secondly, not to permit it to be withdrawn from view, or disguised by the non-description of persons, or by the substitution of things instead of persons, or by the use of impersonal forms of expression." (Coode, p. 14).

"Not one case can be imagined in which it is necessary or convenient to use any other than permissible or imperative language in the enacting verb; and these two rules, therefore, ought never to be allowed to be infringed:—

"1st. That the copula, which joins the legal subject and the legal action, is to be may, or may not, or shall, or shall not, as, 'any person may,' 'no person may,' 'every person shall,' or 'no person shall.'

"2nd. That the whole of the enacting verb is always to be an active verb, excepting only where the legal subject is to submit or suffer, as where executory force, or punishment (sanctions), are directed to be submitted to by the person described in the legal subject. . . .

"There could arise no difficulty if these rules were observed:—

"Whenever an act is allowed as a right, or as a privilege, that is to all the members of the community, or to certain persons for their own benefit, the proper copula is 'may.'

"Whenever the act is authorized as a power, that is to certain persons to perform, not for their own benefit, but for the benefit of others on whose behalf the power is given, the proper copula is 'shall.'" (Coode, pp. 16, 17).

"As on the due expression of the legal subject the extent of the law depends, and as on that of the legal action the nature of the law depends; so on the expression of the case, and of the conditions, do the clearness, precision, and form of our statute law mainly depend.

"The rule to be observed is of such simplicity as to make its utterance appear almost an absurdity; but, simple as it is, it is the most frequently neglected of any rule of composition.

"It is, that wherever the law is intended to operate only in certain circumstances, those circumstances should be invariably described BEFORE any other part of the enactment is expressed.

"If this rule were observed, nine-tenths of the wretched provisos and after-limitations and qualifications with which the law is disfigured and confused would be avoided, and no doubt could ever possibly arise, except through the bad choice of terms, as to the occasions in which the law applied, and those in which it did not. . . .

"It would add much to the facility of discovering the case immediately in every legal sentence, if it invariably commenced with the words 'when' or 'where' or 'in case'." (Coode, pp. 22, 24).

"A law universal as to its subjects, and restricted or not restricted to certain occasions (cases), may still operate only upon the performance by some person of certain conditions. It is not till something has been done that the right can be enjoyed, or that compliance with the obligation can be enforced, or that the liability can be applied.

"These conditions are invariably conditions precedent. The action of the law never takes place till these are complied with. . . .

"For the reason that the legal action is postponed, and cannot act upon the legal subject, until these conditions are all complied with, the expression of the conditions ought immediately to precede that of the legal subject." (Coode, pp. 28, 29, 31).

"Every form of every possible legislative enunciation resolves itself into two or more of these four elements, of which the legal subject and the legal action are essential, and must necessarily be present, while the case or the condition may or may not be present.

"If the enactment is to operate on its subject universally, constantly, and unconditionally, the sole elements are the legal subject and the legal action.

"If the enactment is only to operate on its subject in certain circumstances, the case must express these circumstances in the first words of the sentence, and not in a subsequent phrase inserted parenthetically in the description of the subject or the action, nor in a separate proviso.

"If the enactment is only to operate on its subject after performance by somebody of certain precedent conditions, these conditions should be all expressed immediately before the legal subject and in the order in which they must be executed; that is, in their chronological order.

"Next comes the legal subject, immediately followed by the appropriate modal copula, introducing the legal action." (Coode, pp. 33, 34).

"Parliamentary considerations favour the accumulation of materials into one clause. But as a question of composition and interpretation, there can be no doubt that the more strictly each clause is limited to one class of cases, one class of legal subjects, and one class of legal actions, the better; and that it is a mischief to confer in one sentence two distinct species of rights, to impose two distinct kinds of obligations, to confer two distinct kinds of powers, and so on: where parliamentary convenience does not prevail, no good draftsman ever does so." (Coode, p. 42).

"It will perhaps seem to be a great waste of care to make all these distinctions, as to the elements, the method of distribution, and the expression of a single legislative sentence. . . .

"But it is of these simple elements that the whole law consists. If these be not well discriminated and well marshalled in each sentence, there is no hope for their being well combined in the whole law." (Coode, p. 68).

Use of Present Tense

A rule of construction, common to all our interpretation Acts, which is too frequently overlooked by draftsmen, is that dealing with the application of expressions in the present tense. This rule is that the law is considered as always speaking, and whenever any matter or thing is expressed in the present tense, the same is to be applied to the circumstances as they arise.

"If the law be regarded while it remains in force as constantly speaking, we get a clear and simple rule of expression, which will, whenever a case occurs for its application, accurately correspond with the then state of facts. The law will express in the present tense facts and conditions required to be concurrent with the operation of the legal action; in the perfect past tense, facts and conditions required as precedents to the legal action." (Coode, p. 63).

"This mode of expression, assuming the law to be always speaking—reciting facts concurrent with its operation, as if they were present facts, and facts precedent to its operation as if they were past facts,—has two very considerable advantages:—

"First, it avoids the necessity of very complicated grammatical construction in the statement of cases and conditions, often involving the use of futures, perfect futures, and past conditionals—

"If a person shall be convicted of, &c.; and if he shall have been before convicted of the same offence; and if he shall not have undergone the punishment which he should have undergone for the offence of which he shall have been so before convicted.

"Secondly, keeping the description of cases and conditions in the present and in the perfect tenses, it leaves the imperative and potential language of the legal action clearly distinguished, by the broadest and most intelligible forms of expression. Narration will appear in narrative language, instead of being allowed, as now, to usurp imperious language, and thus to confound the facts and the law." (Coode, p. 66).

DALE E. SUTTON, USE OF "SHALL" IN STATUTES

4 John Marshall L.Q. 204 (1939).

In 1835, Arthur Symonds observed, in his work on English statute law:

"Most men, lawyers in particular, have become accustomed to the jingle of words, and though sensible people, they can scarcely believe, even on reflection, that the meaning is full and clear, if the usual formularies of expression are not employed."¹

The word "shall" is an accepted part of the statute-writer's formula. It appears in his product many times more often than in the speech or writing of everyday use. And that is an indication that the word is now a "legal" word, and need not be examined critically before use.² The objection to this uncritical acceptance of the word is not merely a matter of grammatical nicety, nor of constructing readable law. The possibilities of misinterpretation, which are illustrated below, make this a serious problem.

² In People v. Simmons, 130 Misc. 821, 226 N.Y.S. 397, 407, the court says ". . . the legal meaning of 'shall' is not the lay meaning." Why this should be so, if it is, is not apparent to the writer.

"Shall", as used in statutes, is not only, in many cases, superfluous from the standpoint of good writing, but has too many meanings to make its unnecessary use safe. The courts, in following their well-defined policy of looking to the intent, rather than to the language, have variously held that "shall" is imperative, is directory, means "may", expresses a mandate, either permissive or peremptory, applies to the past, to the future, and to the present.³

In general, the various meanings of the word fall in two classes, ordinarily distinguishable by the context in which used: (1) in the sense of time or condition, and (2) in the sense of mandate.

The Future "Shall"

In 1937 the General Assembly of Illinois passed an act to provide for the creation of annuity benefit funds for municipal public utility employees, a typical paragraph of which is set out below with the word "shall" italicized, and beside it, the same paragraph with superfluous "shalls" deleted:

"Any future entrant who shall resign or be discharged from the service after he shall have served ten (10) or more years and who at the time of such resignation or discharge shall be less than fifty-five (55) years of age shall have a right to receive annuity from and after the date when he shall attain an age of fifty-five (55) or more years while out of the service and shall apply for such annuity; provided, that prior to his attainment of an age of fifty-five (55) years, such future entrant shall not have withdrawn nor applied for refund of the sum accumulated to his credit from deductions from this salary for age and service annuity purposes and widow's annuity purposes. Any such annuity shall be of such amount as can be provided from the entire sum accumulated to his credit for age and service annuity purposes on the date such employee years of age. It will be noted that not all of the “shalls” deleted are of simple future meaning, but 14 uses of the word have been reduced to two without changing the meaning of the section. The example quoted is, of course, complicated somewhat by the subject—the future entrant—which is all the more reason for the changes. And this is not an isolated case. It is an example which might be duplicated in the laws of almost every state and in federal statutes. . . .

It is, of course, a well-defined and frequently expressed rule that laws are generally prospective in their operation, and the courts often say that they are “presumed” to be so.¹² This being the case, however, it seems less than ever necessary to use the future “shall,” for despite its presence or absence, the act would carry the same presumption. This is illustrated by the fact that in the case of remedial legislation, the rule frequently is not applied, and this is true whether or not “shall” is used. The decisions sometimes say that “shall” is used in remedial statutes to include both past and future.¹³ Here the courts attempt to interpret a word which they might simply disregard. It is obvious that the word “shall,” in itself, cannot “include” the past.

Many valuable hours and needless paragraphs have been wasted on this word by the courts. In Meadowcroft v. People,^{13a} the court let its decision hinge, unnecessarily, on the word “shall.” A statute recited that if any banker shall be lost to the depositor, said banker . . . so receiving said deposit shall be deemed guilty of embezzlement."

“shall receive . . . money . . . when at the time of receiving such deposit, said banker is insolvent, whereby the deposit so made

It seems plain that two things are necessary parts of the crime thus defined—receiving a deposit while insolvent, and loss of the deposit—and that the element of time is not material. But the court says:

"The word 'shall' is in the future tense, and is indicative of a future event. It is only when the deposit so made shall be lost to the depositor, that the bankers shall be deemed guilty of embezzlement."

Compare this case with the one in a federal court in which the defendant was charged with violation of a statute which provided that "any owner . . . who shall, with intent to defraud the revenue, make, or attempt to make any entry of imported merchandise by means of any fraudulent or false invoices, affidavit, . . . by means whereof the United States shall be deprived of the lawful duties . . . shall . . . be imprisoned . . ."

The court points out that it is apparent that the United States cannot be deprived of duties by a mere attempt to make fraudulent entry, and there could be no conviction if it were necessary to prove in such a case that duties were lost. It then says, "Shall and will are frequently used indiscriminately, and it is apparent from the reading of the whole section that 'shall' was used here in the sense of 'will' or 'may'."¹⁴

The decision appears to be sound, substantively, but again, a poorly written piece of legislation leads the court into a long discussion of the interpretation to be placed on one word, and that word an unnecessary one. The court is led, also, to make an exaggerated statement. It is true that "shall" and "will" are frequently used interchangeably in common speech to denote the simple predictive future, but even statute-makers do not use them "indiscriminately" to signify the contingent future, as was done here.

Another undesirable result of the use of the simple future tense is the consequent use of the awkward future perfect tense. A case arose in Missouri out of a statute which provided that "if any action (relating to damages for torts) shall have been commenced within one year after the cause of action shall accrue and plaintiff suffer a nonsuit. . . . he may commence a new action within one year after the nonsuit . . ."

The court held that the statute applied to actions pending at the time the act took effect, as well as to future actions, and the writer of the opinion gravely remarked:

"We may presume all legislators grammarians, but that presumption would not drive us to the conclusion that they meant only future action when they wrote "shall have been commenced."

To illustrate the logic employed in reaching his decision, the learned justice continued:

¹⁴ U. S. v. Boyd, C.C.N.Y., 24 F. 692, 695.

"C, a plantation owner, is building barns and writes his overseer, 'Paint all barns red that shall have been commenced.' Would B, his overseer, take that command to mean that only barns commenced after the order should be painted red?"¹⁵

The answer to that, if the writer may supply one for this rhetorical question is No—but B would doubtless think his employer had gone daft. When the language of the legislature so defies common usage a layman's guess as to its meaning is as good as a judge's, or a grammarian's.

The Commanding "Shall"

The difficulties arising from the use of the word "shall" to express a command fall into two classes, and the cases arising from them revolve around an interpretation of the word either (I) as imperative or permissive; or (II) as mandatory or directory. The two are sometimes confused. Throughout the decisions, moreover, one gains the impression that the writers sense, and are not able to set forth, explicitly, a connection between the future and the commanding "shalls." It is difficult to trace, but there seems to be a sound basis for this feeling, and it may account for the extensive use of the future "shall" in statutes.

Jeremy Bentham linked the two meanings, saying:

"Thus, in the English language, the command expressed by the future which is expressed by the word 'shall', is more imperative, indicative of a stronger exertion of will, than the command expressed by the word to which alone the denomination of imperative mood has been commonly affixed by grammarians By the future above mentioned, not only the existence of the will is denoted, but the futurity of the event which is the object of it, is predicted as certain"

The use of the word as a command is now firmly fixed, both in common speech, in the second and third persons, and in legal phraseology.¹⁷ Frequently, however, the courts find that circumstances, or the context of an act, overcome the usual meaning, and the mandate conferred is held to be merely permissive, rather than imperative. The effect is to make the word "shall" have no stronger meaning than "may," and the courts so interpret it. It has been said that "the cases reading 'shall' as 'may' in fact are without value to a billdrafter, since they represent merely a misuse of 'shall' which is corrected by judicial construction."¹⁸

A reading of the cases indicates that this statement is perhaps too inclusive. It is not at all certain that the fault lies always with the legislature, or that the courts always are right in "correcting" statutes.

¹⁸ Notes on Bill Drafting in Illinois, page 57.

In any event, it seems that a better procedure would be to declare, in cases in which the statute is obviously not intended to be imperative, simply that the mandate conferred is discretionary, and not to obscure the issue by deciding that the legislature meant to say "may" when it said "shall."

The circumstances upon which the interpretation of "shall" as "may" is based have been stated thus:

"It (shall) may be construed to mean 'may' when no right or benefit depends on its imperative use; when no advantage is lost, when no right is destroyed, when no benefit is sacrificed, either to the public or to any individual by giving it that construction, or when it is absolutely necessary to prevent irreparable mischief, or to construe a direction so that it shall not interfere with vested rights, or conflict with the proper exercise of power, by either of the fundamental branches of government, and it also means 'may' when used by a legislature in a grant of authority to a court."¹⁹

A strong factor in overcoming the primary meaning of "shall" appears in cases in which the validity of a statute is at stake.

A Nebraska statute provided that in case of disputed surveys of boundaries, the owners of land "shall refer same to the state surveyor and draughtsman for settlement." The state surveyor was given the power to summon and compel attendance of witnesses, and to appoint an arbitrator, whose decision was to be prima facie evidence of the correctness thereof. The court held that the statute, which was alleged to be invalid as taking away the constitutional right of appeal to the courts, was valid, by construing the word "shall" to mean "may." The court said:

"Where to construe the statute as mandatory would make it unconstitutional, such construction will be rejected if any other is possible."²⁰ . . .

The courts go even further than this. They sometimes disregard the primary meaning of "shall" when to do otherwise would lead to what they consider an absurd or unjust result. . . .

It leads to such statements as this by a Missouri court:

"The words, 'may,' 'must' and 'shall' are constantly used interchangeably in statutes and without regard to their literal meaning."²⁵

Substantially the same idea is more and more frequently expressed in the decisions.²⁶ It is an idea which not only does legislatures an injustice, but seems to cover up with a generality a disinclination to study the matter deeply.²⁷

II

The second commanding "shall" presents a problem which has not always been recognized.

When "shall" is construed to be directory, the idea of permission is not involved. The legislature directs the course of action to be taken, and the person or body undertaking to proceed under the statute is vested with no discretion to vary or omit parts or all of the designated procedure. The question is simply one of whether or not such variance or omission, if it occurs, will invalidate what has been done. If the court considers it necessary to follow exactly the outlined procedure, the statute is mandatory. If not, it is directory.

This situation arises frequently in cases involving election laws.²⁸

There appears to be substantial unanimity as to the test to be employed in holding an enactment directory or mandatory. Lord Mansfield made it depend on whether that which was to be done was or was not of the essence of the thing required.³¹ The Connecticut Supreme Court, adopting this rule, said:

"The test most satisfactory and conclusive is whether the prescribed mode of action is of the essence of the thing to be accomplished, or in other words, whether it relates to matter material or immaterial—to matter of convenience or substance."³²

But of what substance is the essence composed? The court, in this case, described the test as

"whether or not it is on the one hand, affirmative and such as would naturally be chosen to prescribe directions for an orderly and proper dispatch of business, or . . . negative or prohibitive or expressive of a condition precedent, or appropriate to the creation of a limitation of power."

The phrase "directions for the orderly dispatch of business" is many times repeated, in varying forms, in the decisions. It is said that "provisions regulating the duties of public officers and specifying the time for their performance are in that regard generally directory, though the statute uses the word 'shall.'"³³

In adopting this principle, the California Supreme Court has taken the abrupt stand that "It is a general rule of construction that the word "shall" when found in a statute is not to be construed as mandatory, unless the intent of the legislature that it shall be so construed is unequivocally evidenced."³⁴ The case involved a street widening assessment, the completion of which by the street superintendent took longer than the statutory 60 days after he received the diagrams. This is a simple case of a direction for the orderly conduct of business. No such broad language was necessary to the decision, and it does not appear that the court has since put the implications of its words into effect.

The weight of authority seems to be, however, that "shall" is used in a mandatory and not a directory sense, even when applied to public officials, unless the context of the statute or purpose of the requirement justifies a different meaning.³⁵ In any event, when some public or private right requires that the word be given a mandatory construction, that is usually done. For that matter, the word "may" is likewise held to impose an enforceable duty when the public or individuals have a claim de jure that the power conferred should be exercised.³⁶ So it seems the literal meaning of the word does not control in such situations.

A rule of interpretation sometimes expressed is that, as against the government, a statutory "shall" is to be construed as "may," unless a contrary intent is manifest.⁴⁰ In Richborg Motor Co. v. U. S., 281 U.S. 528, 534, 50 S.Ct. 385, 74 L.Ed. 1016, it is expressed thus:

"Undoubtedly 'shall' is sometimes the equivalent of 'may' when used in a statute prospectively affecting the government. The usual provisions of criminal statutes that the offender 'shall' be punished as the statute prescribes is not necessarily to be taken, as against the government, to direct prosecution under that rather than some other applicable statute."

But if we substitute "may" for "shall" in this example, we find the government with discretion to prosecute or not to prosecute, which does not appear to be intended. It seems that this is a variation of the directory "shall," rather than the permissive.

The courts frequently fail to distinguish between these two problems, and while the decisions, in some cases, are probably the same as though the distinction were made, the need for careful draftsmanship and careful interpretation is thus accentuated.⁴¹

There is no broad and easy way out. More sparing use of "shall" and more careful draftsmanship are the first requisites.

Statutory definition has been used, as in the Canadian Interpretation Act, to declare "shall" imperative and "may" permissive.⁴² But this does not preclude a directory construction for "shall."⁴³ Any attempt to do so would merely have the legislator tugging at his own statutory bootstraps.

There seems no question as to the first step to be taken—the use of the present tense in all statutes for descriptive matter or matter stating a legal effect, as suggested by the commissioners on uniform state laws.⁴⁴ Automatically, most of the unnecessary "shalls" would be eliminated. The law would speak with greater emphasis; it would be easier to read, and consequently, harder to misinterpret. The future would not be confused with the imperative.⁴⁵ The remaining "shalls" would have greater authority.

An excellent piece of draftsmanship which might serve as a model in this respect, are the new Rules of Civil Procedure for the district courts of the United States, which are written entirely in the present tense, and are notable for their clarity and force.⁴⁶

In granting a right, the present form of "to be" speaks more authoritatively than does the future. For example, a statute might say;

"The holders of the outstanding shares of a class are entitled to vote as a class," rather than "The holders . . . shall be entitled etc. . . ."⁴⁷

At times, with the negative, "may" better expresses prohibition than does "shall". The statutory section now reading "No dividend shall be declared or paid at a time when the corporation is insolvent"⁴⁸, might be written: "A dividend may not be declared or paid, etc. . . ." The latter form not only removes the "shall", but also does away with the weak negative form of expression which starts with "no".

imperative use, that word may be held directory merely, and by legislative intention to be used synonymously with the word 'may'". And a Minnesota court, even more confusingly, says, "Ordinarily the word 'may' is directory and 'shall' is mandatory in meaning, but not always so". (In re Trusteeship of First Minneapolis Trust Co., 202 Minn. 187, 277 N.W. 899). Also cf. Rockwell v. Junction City, 92 Kan. 513, 517, 141 P. 299; State v. Likewise the expression "it shall be lawful", which is merely a permissive mandate, may be revised to say simply that the persons intended to be affected thereby "may" do the thing permitted.

There are ways in which the mandatory "shall" can be reinforced. The use of "negative words plainly importing that the act should be done in a particular manner and time, and not otherwise" is noted by Cooley as frequently conclusive.⁴⁹ And Willard suggests that the words "'and not afterwards' may be added to the specification" of the time in which an act is to be performed.⁵⁰ Certainly a plain statement that failure to comply exactly with certain requirements will render the attempted procedure void or voidable would override any disposition to interpret rules as directory. When it is not intended that a variation should render the act performed invalid, it may be stated what the effect will be, or what penalty is to be inflicted for the erroneous action.

These suggestions are by no means exhaustive of the subject. Other means of correcting the present situation would occur to one in drafting a particular piece of legislation.

E. E. BROSSARD,* PUNCTUATION OF STATUTES

Report of the Committee on Legislative Drafting, National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws, 1938. 3-4, 8-9, 19-20.

. . . At every conference considerable time is spent in discussing the punctuation of proposed uniform acts. Hence some study of that topic may be worth while.

"Punctuation is no part of the statute" said Justice Harlan speaking for the court in Hammock v. Loan & Trust Co., 105 U.S. 77 (1881). "Punctuation marks are no part of an act" of Congress said Justice Sutherland speaking for the court in United States v. Shreveport Grain & Elevator Co., 287 U.S. 77, 82, 53 S.Ct. 42, 77 L.Ed. 175 (1931). "For the purpose of arriving at the true meaning of a statute, courts read with such stops as are manifestly required" said Chief Justice Fuller in United States v. Lacher, 134 U.S. 624, 10 S.Ct. 625, 33 L.Ed. 1080. In Cushing v. Worrick, 75 Mass. 382 (1857) the court said: "It is unnecessary to resort to the draft of the bill as passed to be engrossed, in order to explain the statute as actually engrossed; for the general rule is that punctuation is no part of a statute" (p. 385). The law of England is the same as ours: "211. Punctuation and brackets do not form parts of a statute, and if found on the Parliament Roll, or a statute as printed by the King's Printer, can only at the most be regarded as contemporanea expositio." 27 Laws of England (Earl of Halsbury) 122. The last quotation is the entire text on punctuation in that monumental work of 31 volumes covering all the laws of England. Said Lord Esher in Devonshire v. O'Connor (1890): "To my mind, however, it is perfectly clear that in an Act of Parliament there are no such things as brackets any more than there are such things as stops." 24 Q.B.D. 468, 478.

The pronouncements above quoted are definite and should be accepted as final. Texas has clinched the point by enacting a statute which declares that "in no case shall the punctuation of a law control or affect the intention of the legislature in the enactment thereof." Article 3269, R.S. 1895; Art. 5503, Vernon's Texas Statutes 1914; Art. 11, Vernon's Texas Statutes 1936. All states should enact a like statute. Wisconsin has kindred provisions. Section 35.19, Statutes, provides that "subchapter, section, sub-section and paragraph titles, and history notes constitute no part" of the law. That section should be amended by adding a provision like that of Texas upon the subject of punctuation. The alternative is to adopt some text-book on the subject as the official standard and decisive of all questions of punctuation. Some states have resorted to that expedient for settling disputed spellings and maybe capitalizing and compounding. That no state has adopted that alternative as to punctuation is a strong reason for suspecting that the idea is unsound.

Possibly this report should end here. The foregoing authorities assert a sound and sufficient rule for the guidance of courts in disposing of punctuation problems. Yet in spite of what was said and often repeated by the Supreme Court of the United States about punctuation of statutes the subject will not down. Attorneys continue to wrangle and worry over punctuation; and courts occasionally defend or fortify their decisions with commas—absent or present or misplaced. "There be men who can a hair divide 'twixt east and northeast side."

Although punctuation is no part of a statute still punctuation serves a very useful purpose; and no draftsman of statutes can afford to disregard the subject. In fact he should give very careful attention to the punctuation of his drafts. . . .

Nearly all of the discussions recorded in the law books upon the subject of punctuation involve the internal pointing of a sentence and 90 per cent involve the comma. "The questions in court relating to punctuation as affecting construction have generally arisen on the presence, omission or misplacing of commas." Lewis' Sutherland on Statutory Construction (1904) Section 361, page 688.

Now if the points in a sentence are to decide its meaning there must be a code or standard to determine the meaning of the points in question. But there is no single standard. Double or multiple standards fail to answer the need. The many codes or systems of punctuation are not intended to serve that purpose. The textbooks on punctuation are intended as guides for composers and secretaries and compositors, for proof readers and printers. And all of those codes have for their purpose the making of printed matter easy to read. They proceed on the theory that a sentence is correctly punctuated when the marks enable the reader to extract the contained idea with the least mental exertion. The object sought to be obtained is much like that of the teacher of penmanship. The meaning of a sentence is the same whether it is scribbled or is written Spencerian style. The difference between the two is a difference in the labor required to read them. None of the codes of punctuation deals with putting meaning into the language used. It is assumed that the words used carry the author's meaning and that the reader can get along if all internal points were omitted, but that his progress would be much retarded. The punctuation aims at lifting the meaning of the words into plain view so that the reader may catch the sense at first glance and with the minimum of effort.

Quoting again from the Style Manual of the United States Printing Office: "The punctuation required even in well-phrased text should aid clearness. If the use of a punctuation mark is in doubt, the question to be asked is 'Why?' rather than 'Why not?' If doubt persists, the mark should be omitted to aid the smooth flow of words. Marks interrupt. They are needed only to make the thought clearer or to facilitate oral expression. Beyond that they are detrimental to speed, ease and exactness of understanding. Rules for punctuation may be arbitrary in origin and may be observed from habit or inertia." (Page 101.)

Not one of these punctuation codes deals with the subject from the standpoint of interpretation of statutes. . . .

Both reason and experience are against reliance upon punctuation. The interior points of a sentence and their absence should not control the meaning or make it different from what it would be if there were no such marks. We go to the dictionaries for the meaning of words, be they spoken or written. Where should a law student look for a standard work on punctuation, if there is such a standard applicable to the construction of statutes? In the law libraries. Well, there is no work (standard or otherwise) on that subject in the Wisconsin State Law Library. If there were agreement as to the meaning or significance of a comma we might safely use it to help convey our ideas. In the absence of such common understanding we are, if we rely on the presence or absence of commas, in the predicament of Boy Scouts trying to wigwag without having a common system of signals.

Punctuating is interpreting. For he who points a statute thereby puts his construction upon it. Now the interpretation of statutes is the prerogative of the judicial branch of our government. The Supreme Court is the final word. Any other theory throws our political structure out of plumb. Beyond the word definitions inserted in the statute the legislature does not control the meaning of the language which it employs. The same holds true of punctuation. Pursuing the advice of Dick to Jack Cade at Blackheath: The first thing we do let's kill all the commas (Henry VI—Part 2—Act 4).

SANTOS v. DONDERO

District Court of Appeal of California, 1936. 11 Cal.App.2d 720, 54 P.2d 704.

LEMMON, JUSTICE PRO TEM., delivered the opinion of the court.

Appellant entered a plea of guilty in the justice's court of township 3, Lake county, to a charge of using artificial light in night hunting of game mammals in violation of section 1151 of the Fish and Game Code (St.1933, p. 494). By the judgment and sentence pronounced upon the plea, the justice's court ordered that certain personal property, including a Ford coupé automobile, be forfeited to the fish and game commission, and the defendant herein, a game warden, in pursuance thereof, took the automobile into his possession. An action in claim and delivery against the game warden, defendant herein, was thereupon instituted in the superior court of Lake county by appellant, to recover the possession of the automobile, or its value. From a judgment adverse to him, appellant prosecutes this appeal.

It appears that the appellant, in the commission of the offense charged against him, used a spotlight which was attached to the automobile in question. Section 1414 of the Fish and Game Code (St.1933, p. 509) provides in part: "The judge or justice before whom any person is tried for a violation of any provision of this code may, in his discretion, upon the conviction of the accused, order the forfeiture of any device or apparatus designed to be, and capable of being used, to take birds, mammals or fish, and which was used in committing the offense charged." . . .

It is to be noted that in the description of the property which may be forfeited, set forth in section 1414 of the Fish and Game Code, the clauses are conjunctive. The device or apparatus must not only have been used in the commission of the offense charged, but it must also be capable of being used, "and" designed to be used, to take birds, mammals and fish. Obviously, an automobile is not "designed" for such purpose. While it is true that, wherever necessary to arrive at the evident intent of the statute, courts will substitute "or" for "and," and vice versa, this exceptional rule of construction can only be resorted to where the act itself furnishes cogent proof of the legislative error. State v. Tiffany, 44 Wash. 602, 87 P. 932. The Legislature apparently intended to draw a distinction between property not designed or intended primarily to be used in hunting and fishing, but which might be incidentally used in such pursuits, and property manufactured for these definite purposes. There is nothing in the context or the words used which justify the giving to the word "and," as there used, a disjunctive construction. . . .

The judgment is reversed.

NOTE

In recent years the symbol "and/or" has crept into drafting usage to an extent which renders obsolete an Illinois judge's reference to it as a "confusing fad". The attitude of laymen and courts toward this meaningless "conjunctive/disjunctive" is exemplified by the following:

Editorial in the New York Sun, Feb. 5, 1935. "The use of the expression 'and/or' is an indication of sloppy thinking and/or a deliberate intention to befuddle and/or confuse. . . . How came the expression 'and/or' to drag its bifurcated and ungainly form into our language? Our secret conviction is that it is the creation of lawyers and/or bankers. Lawyers notoriously write a graceless gibberish, lawyers notoriously love a cumbrous phrase. The notion of inserting a new sort of 'and', which was not merely an 'and' but was divisible by 'or', is just the sort of thing that would occur to a lawyer."

Employer's Mut. Liability Ins. Co. v. Tullefson, 219 Wis. 434, 263 N.W. 376 (1935):

"We are confronted with the task of first construing 'and/or,' that befuddling, nameless thing, that Janus-faced verbal monstrosity, neither word nor phrase, the child of a brain of some one too lazy or too dull to express his precise meaning, or too dull to know what he did mean, now commonly used by lawyers in drafting legal documents, through carelessness or ignorance or as a cunning device to conceal rather than express meaning with view to furthering the interest of their clients. We have even observed the 'thing' in statutes, in the opinions of courts, and in statements in briefs of counsel, some learned and some not."

See "An And/Or Symposium," 18 A.B.A.Jour. 574 (1932); Parsons, "And/Or", 10 Cal.S.B.J. 77 (1935); Morton, "For And/Or on Behalf of; or Against And/Or", 10 Cal.S.B.J. 89 (1935); Note in 45 Yale L.J. 918 (1936); Paramount Productions Inc. v. Smith, 91 F.2d 863, 864 (1937).

Do not use "and/or". Say what you mean, e.g. "Either A or B or both of them".

The dangers inherent in conjunctives and disjunctives may often be avoided by intelligent use of tabular construction.

HORACE E. READ, REGULATIONS REVISION COMMITTEE MANUAL

Canadian Naval Service: 1943. 11-18, 24.

(Articles in the regulations correspond to sections of a statute or clauses of a bill. While a measure is in the form of a bill, that is at all stages until its enactment into a statute, it is customary to refer to the parts designated as sections as "clauses". Ed.)

IV. Arrangement.

6. The Sentence.

. [a] . . . [a]

(e) Examples of Legal Subjects and Actions.

(Article 351, K.R. & A.I., in part.)

Subject	Action
Medical Officers of the rank of Surgeon Captain and below	will be allowed to undergo courses of post graduate instruction.
The duration of the course	will be determined by the Medical Director-General, according to requirements.

This Article illustrates both good and bad practice. In the first sentence, since a privilege is conferred and not a duty imposed, the action should read "may be allowed to undergo" or, preferably, simply "may take". The subject of the last sentence is a thing, which should not have been made the subject, although there happens to be no resulting uncertainty or ambiguity in this instance. The last sentence should read:

Subject	Action
The Medical Director-General	shall determine the duration of the course according to requirements.

(f) Use of Active Voice in Stating Legal Action.

(See Canadian Uniformity of Legislation Commissioners' Report, 1942, pp. 92 and 99.)

You will have observed that both legal actions in Art. 351, K.R. & A.I. are expressed in the passive voice. There are many instances of that manner of drafting in K.R. & A.I., and it is almost unavoidable when a thing is made the subject. The result is often uncertainty and obscurity.

- (i) Revisers should when drafting adhere to the Uniform Commissioners' Rule 6:
"The active voice should be used and the passive voice avoided."
- (ii) When there is any doubt concerning the identity of the person who is given the right, power, or privilege or is subjected to the duty or liability, change the subject from thing to person, and usually the voice from passive to active.
- (iii) Reserve the passive voice for use ordinarily when the person who is the legal subject is merely passively to submit or suffer, as where he is directed to suffer or submit to executory force, or punishment.

(g) The Case. If a draftsman desires to limit the extent or application of a legal rule he should do so by stating the case in which it operates. This method effectively decreases the need for provisos or exceptions. In fact, if the case is well stated there is never any occasion to use a proviso and the necessity for using an exception is rare.

Since the case sets out the state of facts where the rule is to operate, it should, normally, be stated at the beginning of the legislative sentence. It is fair notice to the reader that the law is limited in application if the case starts with the words "Where" or "When", and he is thus early informed whether the rule concerns a state of facts about which he desires to know the law. But where a single rule applies to numerous cases it may be more convenient to arrange them as a list following the rule.

When stating the case adhere to the following instructions:

- (i) A single case precedes the rule.
- (ii) Multiple cases may precede or follow the rule in the reviser's discretion.
- (iii) Use the word "Where" or "When" in preference to "In case", "In event that" or "Whenever" to introduce the statement of the case. Use "Where" if frequent occurrence of the event is contemplated. "When" may be used if a single or rare occurrence is contemplated.
- (iv) Cases may be stated in the alternative.
- (v) Express the case in the indicative mood.
- (vi) Always use the present or past tense of the verb to state the case, never the future. In addition to the logical absurdity of stating the case in the future, the future tense form is easily confused with the imperative. For example, say "Where the Captain satisfies himself that there is good reason (he may)"; or "When the Captain has satisfied himself"; using the present or past tense according to the time order of the case relative to the legal action. Never say "Where the Captain shall have satisfied himself".
- (vii) The case must always be so expressed as to be clearly distinguished from the other parts of the sentence, but it need not, and should not, be comprised in a consecutive sentence when rules of composition require a different arrangement.

(h) The Condition.

(See Canadian Uniformity of Legislation Commissioners' Report, p. 93)

It may be that both laws which are unrestricted in operation and those confined to certain cases are called into action only upon the fulfilment of stipulated conditions.

- (i) The logical position for a condition is directly after the statement of the case; and since the legal action is suspended until the condition is fulfilled, it should evidently be placed before the action, resulting in the operation of the law being brought into strong contrast with the condition on which it operates. Where there are several conditions it is good draftsmanship to enumerate them in the chronological order in which they are to be performed or to occur.
- (ii) When the legal action is stated affirmatively, a condition is aptly introduced with "If" or "Until"; when the action is stated negatively with "Unless". For example "If accommodation is available a Commanding Officer may permit", as compared with "Unless accommodation is available a Commanding Officer shall not permit".

- (iii) Do not use the future tense of a verb when stating a condition. Never say, for example "If there shall be accommodation available".
- (iv) Never phrase a condition in the form of a proviso. Provisos should never be used. If the legislative sentence is properly drafted there is never an occasion to use a proviso. The proviso is a badge of the lazy or incompetent draftsman.

(i) The Exception. An exception exempts some matter, which would otherwise be within its scope and meaning, unconditionally from the application of the law. There are few occasions when expression of an exception as applying to the entire legislative sentence is justifiable. In fact most authoritative writers do not include the exception as a distinct part of the legislative sentence. Expert draftsmen are agreed that no single element contributes more to confusing legislation than the inept use of exceptions (and, still worse, of provisos) where the matter should be covered by a direct statement. They concur in applying the following rules:

- A. If certain persons are to be excluded from the operation of the law this should appear in the language of the legal subject.
- B. Limitations on time, place, manner, or circumstance of the operation of the law should be stated in the legal action.
- C. If particular conditions are to be dispensed with, that should be done by qualifying the statement of the condition.
- D. All other limitations on the application of the law should be put in the case.

Additional Rules:

- (i) Reserve the use of exceptions as far as possible to incorporate by reference exemptions from the operation of the instant provision that are contained in another provision; for example "(1) Except as provided in (2) and (3) of this article".
- (ii) Introduce an exception with the word "Except," but take care to avoid using the device to create an ambiguity. Only such substantives should follow the word "Except" as are intended to be governed by it.
- (iii) When they are few, state exceptions at the beginning of the article or legislative sentence.
- (iv) If for some good reason it becomes necessary to use numerous exceptions, place them in list form at the end of the article or sentence or even in a separate article or clause.

7. References.

(a) When Not Used. Do not in one article apply or incorporate the terms of another by reference if the matter expressed in the article referred to can as easily be expressed as the reference, and in as few words.

- (b) Be Specific. Make every reference specific; none general.
- (i) For example, never say "As provided in this Chapter".
 - (ii) Do not use the words "hereinbefore", "hereinafter", "preceding", or "following" to make references, since they lead to uncertainty.
- (c) Forms of Specific Reference to be Used.
- (i) Where it is necessary in one article to apply or incorporate terms of another article, refer to the other article by number; for example "in Article 3.26".
 - (ii) Where it is necessary in the body of an article to refer to a clause of the same article, write, for example "In (3) of this Article".
 - (iii) When the purpose of a reference is to limit the referring provision by the terms of the one to which reference is made, always use the phrase "Subject to". For example "26.10 Subject to Article 15.12, a man may".
 - (iv) When the purpose of a reference is to except the provision to which reference is made from the referring provision, always use the phrase "Except as". For example "10.62. Except as provided in Article 10.23, an officer may".
 - (v) Where in an article reference is made to another article as constituting the authority for the doing of certain things, the word "under" should be used—e.g., "where under article 7.30, a man is sentenced. . . . etc."
- (d) Method of Cross-reference. Where an article or an appendix is cited merely for cross-reference, underline (italicize) the citation and place it in parentheses at the end of the article or clause in which the cross-reference is made, thus: "(See Article 6.10)" or "(See Appendix VII)".

9. Tabular Construction

Clearness is materially increased by breaking up the body of a legislative provision into its parts and presenting them in tabular arrangement. By this device the co-ordination of the subject-matter is portrayed readily to the eye. Where a succession of rights, powers, privileges, duties, or liabilities is referred to a single person or group, space may often be saved and the meaning made clearer by this method of setting out the law on the page. Arrangement of a provision in this way is especially recommended where the subject-matter makes short sentences impossible. Relation of the main and dependent clauses and the relation of the legal subject to the legal action and the other parts of a legislative sentence can then in no other way be so clearly brought out.

Instructions:

- (i) Where clearness of presentation is improved thereby, arrange the material in tabular form, normally within articles, in the form of clauses, sub-clauses, enumerations, or lists, as analysis of the particular subject-matter dictates.
- (ii) Occasionally it may be more advantageous to use a formal table arranged in parallel columns. This form is especially useful as a comparative device.

V. Language.1. General.

Remember that K.R.C.N. is primarily designed for the use of persons who are not lawyers. The constant aim must be to use language that can be readily understood by the young officer and enlisted man who is new to the Naval Service and unversed in technical and legal phraseology. At the same time the Regulations will have the force of a statute, and will on occasion be applied by a Court. Apply the following general rules:

- (i) Use modern language.
- (ii) The Regulations should be simple as distinguished from complex. As far as possible reduce them to plain propositions, free from technical terms.
- (iii) Be as concise as possible consistent with clarity.
- (iv) Avoid synonyms.
- (v) Never use a phrase when a word is its exact equivalent.
- (vi) Use nouns in preference to pronouns even though you must repeat the noun.
- (vii) Brevity is desirable, but full treatment of the subject-matter is more desirable. Greater harm may often be done by a provision which dismisses a complicated subject with a few sweeping rules than by one that is verbose or too repetitious. Avoid both extremes.
- (viii) If a provision is to apply to a class as a whole, it is safest to name the class in general terms rather than to mention particulars either preceded or followed by general language. It is best to enumerate only the particulars that are being excepted.
- (ix) Always consider carefully whether an enumeration of particulars is necessary. It is almost impossible to make the enumeration exhaustive, and accidental omission may be construed as implying deliberate exclusion, in accordance with the canon "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius".
- (x) It will sometimes, in order to comply with rules (viii) and (ix) of this paragraph or to shorten a sentence, be necessary to use a generic term to include several particulars. Define generic terms in either the interpretation article of the chapter or in the interpretation chapter of K.R.C.N., according to the generality of their use.

- (xi) Attain, if possible, such precision in the language of a Regulation that a person reading in bad faith cannot misunderstand it.

NOTE

See Henderson, "Report of Revisor of Statutes to the Minnesota Legislature, 1941, Appendix B" 57-62; and Kennedy, "Legislative Bill Drafting", 31 Minn.L.Rev. 103 (1946) for similar and other rules.

VII. Marginal Notes (Article and Clause Headings).

The Uniform Commissioners have adopted the following rules concerning marginal notes. They should be applied.

"14. (1) Marginal notes should be short and distinctive and should describe but not summarize the provisions to which they relate.

"(2) When read together, marginal notes should have such a consecutive meaning as will give a reasonably accurate idea of the contents of the provisions to which they apply.

"(3) Marginal notes should usually be in substantive form.

"(4) Marginal notes should be prepared by the draftsman of the Act.

"(5) Where a marginal note must be long to be distinctive, a presumption is raised that the section or subsection to which it relates should be broken into two or more subsections."

See generally, Ilbert, "Legislative Methods and Forms" (1901); Thring, "Practical Legislation" (1902); Ilbert, "The Mechanics of Law Making" (1914); "Statute Law-making in Iowa" (Vol. III of Applied History, a State Historical Society of Iowa publication) (1916); "Proceedings of (U.S.) National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws, 1917;" "Reports of the Revisor of Statutes to the Minnesota Legislature, 1941, Appendix B"; "Proceedings of the Conference of Commissioners on Uniformity of Legislation in Canada, 1942"; Cullen, "Mechanics of Statutory Revision," 24 Ore.L.Rev. 1 (1944). The following useful books are now out of print: "Legislative Expression" by George Coode; "A Legislative Handbook" by Ashton R. Willard.

2. The following illustrate:

(1) A draft by an expert in real property law with an eye primarily to substance:

"Realty of a competent owner whose spouse is under actual and subsisting guardianship by reason of insanity or incompetency may be conveyed, mortgaged or leased by separate instruments and/or one instrument executed by such guardian and/or owner. Before such execution by the guardian, he shall petition the Probate Court for authority therefor, but if such guardian refuses to petition, said competent owner may with notice to said guardian as ordered by said court, petition on behalf of said guardian; and upon proof of the said petition, the court may order and decree the said guardian to execute or join in the execution of such instrument."

(2) Redraft, rearranging and rephrasing for clarity:

"When the spouse of a competent owner of land is under general guardianship, that owner and the guardian may convey, mortgage or lease the land either by instruments executed by the owner and guardian separately or by one instrument executed by both.

"Before the guardian executes either instrument he must petition the Probate Court for authority.

"If the guardian refuses to petition, the owner may do so on his behalf, giving the guardian whatever notice the court in its discretion directs.

"Upon proof of the petition in either case, the court may order the guardian either to execute or join in executing the proper instrument."

PREFACE TO MINNESOTA STATUTES 1945, p. 6

8. Numbering System. The only system of numbering that lends itself completely to continuous revision is that in use in Wisconsin. It is based on having a decimal point in it so as to show on one side the chapter number and on the other the section number. The number at the left of the decimal indicates the chapter. The number at the right indicates the section. The section number 43.12, broken into component parts, would read chapter 43, section 12. Section numbers may run from .01 to .99. New sections may be placed at the end of a chapter, but, if logical sequence requires they should be inserted between certain sections, an additional decimal denominator may be used. For example, new sections not more than nine in number may be placed between 20.13 and 20.14 and may be designated 20.131, 20.132, or similar. It is easy to turn to a section for which you are looking. A citation of one number includes the chapter and the section designations. No two chapters and no two sections will ever have the same number. Future sections or chapters may be added easily without disturbing existing chapter and section numbers.

SOME DRAFTING DEVICES ILLUSTRATED

An example of the new way of writing laws advocated by Professor Conard (supra) is found in the Regulations for the Canadian Naval Service (Short Title—K. R. C. N.), of 1945. During 1943, 1944 and part of 1945 the naval regulations were completely revised and almost entirely re-written. The chairman of the Naval Regulations Revision Committee was given a free hand by the naval authorities in drafting both the regulations and the Canadian Naval Service Act of 1944 which they implement. He was therefore able to use the devices which experience proves aid the clarity and convenient use of laws. Consequently, the more than 900 pages of the book are written in simple, straightforward language with all legal jargon eliminated. The language of the legislative sentences is carefully arranged to enhance clarity, subheadings of articles are designed to appeal readily to the eye, and various forms of tabular construction are utilized.

The new regulations, although covering more subject matter, are expressed in less than half the language comprised in the old.

Use of devices appropriate to various types of subject matter is shown in the following illustrations.

K.R.C.N.

Chapter 1—Introduction and Definitions.

1.18—SYSTEM OF NAVAL GENERAL ORDERS(2) General Orders and Confidential Orders.

- (a) Naval General Orders shall be issued in two series, called, respectively, General Orders (G.O.'s) and Confidential General Orders (C.G.O.'s).
- (b) General Orders shall contain orders mainly of a non-confidential nature, marked "Restricted".
- (c) Confidential General Orders shall contain orders of a confidential nature, marked "Confidential", that should be seen only by officers; but Commanding Officers shall cause technical information contained in Confidential General Orders to be communicated to men under their command to the extent necessary to ensure the efficient performance of their duties.

(See article 1.25—"Classified Matter".)

(3) Form and Arrangement.

- (a) General Orders and Confidential General Orders shall be separate loose-leaf books, and each of these books shall be compiled in two parts entitled, respectively, "Part I, Administration, Personnel and Finance" and "Part II, Technical".

(Diagram showing basic organization of Naval General Orders:

- (b) Part I (Administration, Personnel and Finance) of both General Orders and Confidential General Orders shall be arranged in chapters whose titles shall correspond exactly with those of K.R.C.N. Within each chapter every order shall bear the number of the article of K.R.C.N. which the order implements and shall be placed accordingly. Under each article number the orders shall be arranged and numbered in chronological order of issue. (e.g. 10.25/1, 10.25/2, etc.)

(c) Part II (Technical) shall be arranged in sections as follows and orders placed within them and numbered in chronological order of issue: (e.g. A1, A2, etc.)

- A. Gunnery and Stores Relating Thereto.
- B. Torpedo and Stores Relating Thereto.
- C. Navigation and Stores Relating Thereto.
- D. Engineering and Stores Relating Thereto.
- E. Anti-Submarine and Stores Relating Thereto.
- F. Hull.
- G. Communications and Stores Relating Thereto.
- H. Electrical and Stores Relating Thereto.

Except for those orders which are the responsibility of the Electrical Department and are included in Section H.

(d) Immediately beneath every order there shall be printed, each in parentheses, the

- (i) date of taking effect,
- (ii) the number of the relevant Naval Service file, and
- (iii) if it was issued by the Chief of the Naval Staff, the letters "C.N.S."

(4) When and by Whom Promulgated. The Naval Secretary, shall promulgate both General Orders and Confidential General Orders at regular periods throughout each year, as directed by the Minister from time to time.

K.R.C.N.

Chapter 4—Officers' Status.

Section 4—Retirement, Resignation and Discharge.

4.57—REASONS FOR DISCHARGE

(1) Under the provisions of Article 4.55 (Authority to Discharge Officers) an officer may be discharged from the Naval Forces for the reasons shown in the table entitled "Article 4.57—(Table)".

(2) (a) The discharge of an officer under the provisions of Article 4.57—(Table), column (1), item (b), (c), (d), (e), (g), (i), (j), or (k), shall be effective 14 days from the date on which he is informed that his discharge has been approved.

(b) If for any cause it is not possible to effect a discharge within 14 days of the officer being informed, the reason shall be reported to Naval Service Headquarters.

- (c) An officer discharged under the provisions of Article 4.57—(Table), column (1), item (b), (d), (j), or (k) may at the discretion of the Minister be granted the leave (normally due to him), to which he is entitled prior to being informed that his discharge has been approved. When it is proposed to grant leave under this clause the matter shall be referred to Naval Service Headquarters for approval.
- (d) An officer discharged under the provisions of Article 4.57—(Table), column (1), item (h) shall be granted the pension leave to which he is entitled, his discharge being effective the day after the day on which his pension leave expires.
- (3) An officer discharged under the provisions of Article 4.57—(Table), column (1), item (h) shall have the word "Pensioned" added to the reason for his discharge, e.g. "Appointment terminated—Invalidated—Pensioned".
- (4) (a) An officer whose discharge is recommended under Article 4.57—(Table), column (1), item (c) shall immediately be informed of the recommendation for his discharge.
- (b) He shall within three days of being so informed, either
 - (i) render in writing his reasons against the carrying out of the recommendation, or
 - (ii) state in writing that he has no such reasons.
- (c) The statements rendered in accordance with (b) of this clause shall be forwarded to Naval Service Headquarters as soon as practicable.
- (5) (a) An officer whose discharge is recommended under Article 4.57—(Table), column (1), item (i) shall be informed of the recommendation and given the opportunity of tendering his resignation.
- (b) If he was promoted from the lower deck, he shall be granted the opportunity of re-enlisting in the rating he held immediately prior to his promotion.
- (6) A discharge effected under Article 4.57—(Table), column (1), item (f) shall be effective on the date of the sentence of the court.

NOTE

By using this form of tabular construction 34 pages of complicated description were reduced to three pages of relatively clear instructions. The duty to carry out these instructions is imposed on designated officers and administrative officials by various other articles; thus the use of the passive voice. [Items j to p of the Table are omitted. Ed.]

ARTICLE 4.57—(TABLE)

ITEM	REASONS FOR WHICH A DISCHARGE MAY BE EXPECTED	DESIGNATION OF DISCHARGE IN NAVY LIST AND APPOINTMENT LISTS	WHEN APPLICABLE	TO WHOM APPLICABLE	REMARKS
a.	Death of an Officer.	Commission (or warrant) terminated—Discharged dead.	At all times.	All Officers.	See Chapter 49—Casualties, Deaths and Funerals.
b.	An Officer who has been declared unfit by the Medical Director General under (i) of article 38.15—Procedures Regarding Discharge and Release. (i) a report of Medical survey (See Article 39.04, or —“Medical Categories and Records of Survey”.) (ii) In the case of an officer of the Reserve who is declared unfit by the Medical Director General, the disability must be attributable to the performance of naval duty, the Medical Officer.	Appointment Terminated—Invalidity, or in the case of an officer of the Reserve, disability is not attributable to the performance of Naval Duty— Appointment terminated — Medically Unfit.	At all times.	All Officers.	See clause 2 (a) See clause 2 (c)
c.	An officer by reason of: (i) incapacity, (ii) pecuniary of temperance, or (iii) inefficiency, or (iv) unsatisfactory performance of duties, as (v) intemperance, or (vi) irregular habits of life, or (vii) drunkenness, or (viii) for any other reason is considered unfit for or unworthy of further employment.	Commission (or warrant) terminated—Unsuitable for Naval Service.	At all times.	All Officers.	See clause 2 (a) See clause 4
d.	An Officer reaches the age limit for his rank under the provisions of Article 4.58 (Age for Retirement).	Appointment terminated—Over age.	At all times.	All Officers.	See clause 2 (a) See clause 2 (c)
e.	An officer tenders his resignation from the Naval Service.	Appointment terminated — Resignation accepted.	At all times.	All Officers.	See clause 2 (a)
f.	An Officer is sentenced by: (i) Court Martial to “Dismissal with disgrace from the Naval Service”, or “Dismissal from the Naval Service”, or (ii) Disciplinary Court to “Dismissal from the Naval Service”.	Commission (or warrant)—terminated, (i) Dismissed with disgrace from the Naval Service, or Dismissed from the Naval Service, (ii) Dismissed from the Naval Service.	(i) At all times. (ii) When the Naval Forces are on Active Service.	All Officers.	See clause (b).
g.	When for the good of the Naval Service a reduction must be made in the complement of officers.	Appointment terminated — To promote economy.	At all times.	All Officers.	See clause 2 (a)
h.	An officer whose release from service is approved and who, under the provisions of the Militia Pension Act, is eligible for and granted a pension.	Appointment terminated—Pensioned.	At all times.	Officers of the Royal Canadian Navy.	See clause 2 (d) See clause 3
i.	A probationary officer fails to qualify in his training course.	Appointment terminated — Failed to qualify.	When the Naval Forces are on Active Service.	Officers of the Reserve.	See clause 2 (a) See clause 3

Chapter 15—Courts-Martial.

Section 6—Opening of Court and Commencement of Trial

(N.B.—The procedure at the trial is, in articles 15.33 to 15.43, laid down step by step, in chronological order.)

15.40—PLEA OF ACCUSED—“NOT GUILTY” OR “GUILTY”

(1) The judge-advocate shall inform the accused that he is not required to plead either “Not Guilty” or “Guilty”, but if he desires to plead “Guilty” he should now do so.

(2) The accused may plead “Not Guilty” or “Guilty” to all or any of the charges, or he may refrain from pleading, in which latter event the trial shall proceed as if the accused had pleaded “Not Guilty” to the charge or charges in respect of which he made no plea.

(3) When the accused pleads “Guilty” to any charge or charges, the court shall, in the following cases, reject the plea of “Guilty” and proceed with the trial in the same manner as if the accused had pleaded “Not Guilty” to the charge or charges:

(a) when the statement in mitigation of punishment (see article 15.41) amounts, in the opinion of the court, to a plea of “Not Guilty”;

(For example, when the accused alleges that

(i) he was subject to great provocation, or

(ii) his state of body or mind was such as to render him incapable of appreciating the nature and quality of the act constituting the offense charged, or

(iii) in the case of a charge of desertion, he intended to return to his place of duty, or

(iv) in the case of a charge of absence without leave, he was prevented, by circumstances beyond his control from returning at the appointed time, and that the absence without leave was not due to any misconduct or fault of his own).

(b) when the court is satisfied from the statement in mitigation, or by any other means, that the accused does not understand the effect of a plea of “Guilty”;

(c) when the court is of opinion that the full circumstances must be investigated before a proper sentence can be awarded.

(4) Subject to (3) of this article, when the accused pleads “Guilty” to a charge, the court shall accept his plea of “Guilty”, and the accused shall be deemed to have admitted the accuracy of all material statements relative to that charge, contained in the Circumstantial Letter.

DUNCAN L. KENNEDY, DRAFTING BILLS FOR THE MINNESOTA LEGISLATURE

St. Paul: 1946. West Pub. Co. 25-29.

[The following specifications and forms are in conformity with the Minnesota constitutional requirements concerning titles and enacting clauses (See supra Chapter 5), the rules of the houses of the Minnesota Legislature, and a Memorandum on Drafting Bills by the Minnesota Attorney General. They can be readily adapted to corresponding requirements and rules of any other jurisdiction. Ed.]

SPECIFICATIONS OF MEASURES FOR INTRODUCTION (IN MINNESOTA).

Number of Copies. For introduction in the House, 4 copies are required of each bill or other measure; for the Senate, 4 copies.

Paper. Measures must be typed on 8½ x 13 bond paper, light weight.

Margin. Left-hand margin, three-quarters of an inch; right-hand, one inch; top, one and one-half inches; bottom, one and one-half inches.

Numbering Sheets. Number each sheet at the bottom.

Spacing. Single space title and double space text.

Binding. Cover original and each copy with a good quality manuscript cover, and bind with wire staples. For the cover of House and Senate bills, use white.

Title on Cover. Fold covers twice, from bottom toward the top. On the back of the second fold, above the heading, H.F.——— or S.F.———, as the case may be, on the original type "ORIGINAL", on each copy type "COPY". On the back of the second fold, under the heading, H.F.——— or S.F.———, as the case may be, type the full title in capitals.

Chapter 7

THE METHODS OF INTERPRETATION AND CONSTRUCTION

SECTION 1. INTRODUCTORY

INTRODUCTORY NOTE

Skill in interpretation of statutes demands essentially an understanding of judicially developed techniques for applying legislative enactments to the solution of issues. The language of statutes is neither formulated nor applied in a vacuum, and the task of the interpreter is to give it meaning with reference to concrete factual situations. It has been aptly said that "where the Legislature provides that when . . . a certain state of facts exists, certain liabilities or rights shall result, it always contemplates these results flowing from a finding of the facts by a judicial tribunal, not from the existence of the facts in the absolute."¹

The interpretative process does not consist of merely applying rules devised to ensure predictable decisions. The process is complex, not simple. It differs radically in many respects from that familiar to the application of judicial precedent. An accurate knowledge of the postulates, approaches, presumptions, aids and other judicially created tools of interpretation is but pre-requisite to learning the art of selecting and using them to assist the exercise of judgment.

Invocation of one or more of various historically founded presumptions as a supplement or alternative to one of the available approaches is an important interpretative device. Since, however, the tendency of a court to resort to presumptions and its manner of using them is a reflection of its attitude toward legislation as an element of law, treatment of them is most effective within the context of Chapter 8, "Fitting Legislation Into a Unified Legal System".

ERNST FREUND, LEGISLATIVE REGULATION

New York: The Commonwealth Fund, 1932, at p. 132.

It is a mistake to treat statutory construction like other branches of the common law, as a body of doctrine to be gathered from particular precedents and judicial utterances; the only proper method of approaching the problem is the inductive one, gathering from the mass of decisions certain tendencies and seeking to determine whether some of these tendencies are strong enough to impose themselves upon courts by reason of inherent fitness and necessity. . . .

And most of the current maxims stated in textbooks and judicial decisions are of little value. . . .

KARL N. LLEWELLYN, THE MODERN APPROACH TO COUNSELLING AND ADVOCACY

46 Colum.L.Rev. 167, 179-183 (1946).

. . . In presenting the better advocates' realistic, operational approach one does better (as in any operational approach) by describing first the situation which the advocate is up against. His task is to persuade the court to his view of the law and of the facts of his case. What he is up against is therefore the court and its way of doing its work, its way of seeing the law and the facts of any case. The new development in this picture is not so much that the courts' ways have changed greatly in these war years as that the best advocates are beginning to realize more accurately (though often still dimly) what the courts' ways are. It is not, again, that the best advocates' best ways of work have changed greatly, but that those best ways are now becoming conscious techniques, and so available for more consistent use, available also to any man within the range of his own powers, no longer limited to the odd gifted few who are "born" artists in the craft and who then come to have "sufficient experience".

The realistic or operational approach to advocacy rests on facts like these (and they are carefully tested facts):

(1) While the courts have and know a duty to the Law, their office forces on them also, and they have and know and labor to live up to, a duty to Justice, to decency and fairness of result.

(2) Despite this felt duty to Justice, it is also their office to stay within the Law as they seek for Justice; and they do so stay within the Law. But the range of leeway which our case-law system offers both in readjustment of the Law and in its application is much greater than most lawyers let themselves realize. And the fact that a case-law court's duty to its case-law system is (and always has been) to take advantage of that leeway to further Justice and to improve the Law—that is a thing that the schooling of our lawyers has been slow to make adequately clear.

(3) Justice is a thing easier to feel than to think about. The conscious thought of courts runs rather in terms of "What is fair in the situation", or "What is good sense and decent in the situation"; and of course judgments on fairness or good sense or decency can and to some extent must differ, so that one needs to study the personnel of the court, and their ways of seeing sense.

(4) No court can feel happy with a decision unless the decision fits comfortably, under our accepted techniques of handling authorities, with the accepted body of the law. But the techniques which are accepted and in standard use are contradictory and alternative techniques. This holds equally in regard to prior cases, to statutes, and to administrative regulations. . . .

. . . Our whole body of authoritatively accepted ways of dealing with authorities, ways in actual use in the daily work of the courts, is a body which allows the court to select among anywhere from two to ten "correct" alternatives in something like eight or nine appealed cases out of ten. That is, technically our system could find any of these alternatives to be correct. Judicially, our system does not allow most of them. That is not because the authorities and our accepted techniques for handling the authorities do not allow huge leeway. It is because judges have a duty to use the available leeways to make for sense and to accomplish decency, and because upright judges, these days, also want to and try to do just that. Whether consciously (as sometimes) or less consciously (as more often), they therefore use their two-faced or multi-faced accepted techniques to make the authorities take on some one of the (doctrinally) possible aspects which does seem to make for sense and to accomplish decency—always with the upright judge's ultimate and underlying drive to see the thing as best he can in terms of Justice-for-All-of-Us.

From these facts about the courts' methods and objectives a number of practical rules or principles or guides for the advocate emerge at once.

First, and negatively: it is plainly not enough to bring in a technically perfect case on "the law" under the authorities and some of the accepted correct techniques for their use and interpretation or "development". If the case is really worth litigating (and perhaps half of today's appealed cases are), then there is an equally perfect technical case to be made on the other side, and if your opponent is any good he will make it. The struggle will then be for acceptance by the tribunal of the one technically perfect view of the law as against the other. Acceptance will turn on something beyond "legal correctness". It ought to.

Second, a "technically" perfect case is equally unreliable in regard to the interpretation or classification of the facts. For rarely indeed do the raw facts of even a commercial transaction fit cleanly into any legal pattern; still less so do the "trial facts" as they emerge from conflicting testimony. No matter what the state of the law may be, if the essential pattern of the facts is not seen by the court as fitting cleanly under the rule you contend for, your case is still in jeopardy. This is of course the reason for the commercial counsellor's concern with "fixing" the transaction by a well-drawn document which does fit cleanly into known and certain legal rules. But even documents can have their difficulties (especially in commercial finance). Thus despite any and every document and the parol evidence rule, the "form" of outright sale will regularly be disregarded if oral testimony and circumstances persuade the tribunal that the "true transaction" was one for security only. Despite any document and the parol evidence rule, the "form" of legitimacy may even become an adverse factor if the tribunal from oral testimony and circumstances is led to see in that form a "mask" for usury.

Per contra, and third: Without a technically perfect case on the law, under the relevant authorities and some one or more of the thoroughly correct procedures of their use and interpretation, you have no business to expect to win your case. Occasionally a court may under the utter need for getting a decent result go into deliberate creative effort; but few courts like to. Such effort interferes with the court's sense of duty to the law; such effort requires also skill and labor from a hard-pressed bench. Sound advocacy therefore calls for providing in the brief a job all done to hand; it calls as of course for not stirring up any conflict between the court's two major duties. If there is any difficulty with or about the authorities, the solving rule that takes care both of those authorities and of the sound solution calls thus for careful, clear, adequate phrasing in the brief: "The true rule is . . ." (with any needed qualifications taken care of). A court can recognize the good solution which gives satisfaction in regard to a tough problem rightly worked out.

All of this serves only to lead up to the crux:

Fourth: the real and vital central job is to satisfy the court that sense and decency and justice require (a) the rule which you contend for in this type of situation; and (b) the result that you contend for, as between these parties. Your whole case, on law and facts, must make sense, must appeal as being obvious sense, inescapable sense, sense in simple terms of life and justice. If that is done, a technically sound case on the law then gets rid of all further difficulty: it shows the court that its duty to the Law not only does not conflict with its duty to Justice but urges along the exact same line. . . .

EXPLANATORY NOTE

In Bloomer v. Todd, 3 Wash.T. 599, 19 P. 135, 138 (1888), Jones, C. J., said "Interpretation differs from construction in this: That it is used for the purpose of ascertaining the true sense of any form of words, while construction involves the drawing of conclusions regarding subjects that are not always included in the direct expression. . . . The administration of public justice . . . is conferred upon the courts, and the courts perform that duty by first ascertaining the facts in any case, and giving effect to their conclusions of fact by applying the law to the facts ascertained. In doing so, a construction or interpretation of law is necessary."

In United States v. Keitel, 211 U.S. 370, 387, 385-386, 29 S.Ct. 123, 53 L.Ed. 230 (1908), White, J., said: ". . . It is insisted that the construction of a statute is one thing and its interpretation another and a different thing. That abstractly there may be a difference between the two terms is not denied . . . and finds support in works of respectable authority. But, conceding the abstract distinction, . . . it may not be doubted that in common usage interpretation and construction are usually understood as having the same significance. This was aptly pointed out in Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, 6th edition, where, after stating the theoretical difference, it is observed (p. 51): 'In common use, however, the word construction is generally employed in law in a sense embracing all that is properly covered by both, when each is used in a sense strictly and technically correct.'

The student should bear in mind the technical distinction here drawn between interpretation and construction while reading the material contained in this chapter, and determine (a) how far the courts adhere to the distinction, and (b) its utility in the process by which meaning is given to statutes in the solution of concrete issues.

FREDERICK J. de SLOOVERE, STEPS IN THE PROCESS OF INTERPRETING STATUTES

10 N.Y.U.L.Q.Rev. 1, 17, 22 (1932).

Steps in the judicial process of interpreting statutes, taking interpretation in its broadest sense, may be divided into three parts: (1) finding or choosing the proper statute or statutes applicable (and incidentally, the authentication of the text); (2) interpreting the statute law in its technical sense; and (3) applying the meaning, so found, to the case at hand. In short, one must first find the relevant statutes, determine what they mean, and then apply that meaning to the case at hand. The first—choosing the statute—may likewise be divided into three: (a) finding the unitary body of law applicable—a problem in conflict of laws; (b) finding which statute or statutes of that body of law are relevant to the particular case; and (c) determining what section or sections, paragraphs, phrases or words, the particular case involves more directly. . . .

. . . Interpretation, strictly speaking, includes the process of determining (1) whether several statutes, a single statute or any part or parts thereof are relevant to the case at hand; (2) whether the text or texts, so chosen as relevant, are susceptible of more than one sensible meaning in light of the case at hand; and (3) which of the several sensible meanings is the proper one. Interpretation properly so called, then, only includes these three definite steps. On the other hand, application of a statute, which is often included under interpretation, is the process of determining whether the facts of the case at bar are within or without the single, sensible meaning of the statutory law already chosen as relevant to the case. Interpretation is therefore based upon the assumption that there is but one meaning—that the legislature did not intend to give two inconsistent commands—with regard to any given case. Although determining one meaning from several possible meanings is therefore imperative, application of that meaning may give rise to difficulties and doubts which are not problems of interpretation at all. For example, a statute provides that a penalty shall be imposed on "every tradesman, laborer and other person who carries on his worldly calling on a Sunday. . . ." Determining a choice from the several possible meanings of these words is a question of interpretation. This may involve no more than choosing among the popular or technical or other meanings of the words, "tradesman" and "laborer" and determining the limitations by definition to be placed upon the words "other person" by the eiusdem generis rule. It does not include the question whether the acts or persons involved in the case at hand are within classes or definitions so chosen, for this is purely application. . . .

In short, after the proper statute has been chosen, determining whether it is plain and explicit for the case at hand is necessary; if it is not plain, to find a single meaning out of the several possible meanings in view of the case at hand is the next step, which may involve many problems of interpretation, properly so-called. The facts of the case serve at this stage only as a focal point for narrowing the problem of interpretation to the part or parts of the statutes actually involved, so as to eliminate possible inconsistencies and conflicts in these aspects of the statute. The facts focus one's attention on the part of the statute actually involved and help to crystallize the problems as to the meaning. Finally, application is determining whether the statute, now plain and explicit and reduced to one meaning, covers the case at hand. Often both processes are accomplished simultaneously. Analytically, application cannot be indulged in until the statute has been reduced to a single meaning. Of course, to say in any case that the statute for the case at hand has only one meaning often involves a fine and difficult task. To determine what possible meanings the text or context will bear, whether other possible meanings are reasonable, and to choose one among the reasonable meanings may involve the whole gamut of interpretative processes, without as yet having applied the statute at all.

The distinction between interpreting and applying statutes has significance, however, in many phases of the subject: (1) in explaining away what appear to be contradictions in the cases as to the meaning and exceptions that courts have read into general words and phrases; (2) in distinguishing more clearly the exact functions of judge and jury in applying statute law; (3) in determining what phases of the whole process of interpretation and application of statute law are questions of fact and of law; and (4) in explaining the basic theories underlying the reading of exceptions into statutes by way of interpretation or the applying of common-law defenses to persons whose acts come within the express and clear wording of statutes. . . .

HARRY WILLMER JONES, THE PLAIN MEANING RULE AND EXTRINSIC AIDS IN THE INTERPRETATION OF FEDERAL STATUTES

25 Wash.U.L.Q. 2, 8-9 (1939).

In a still influential article,²⁴ published in 1913, Dean Pound divided the judicial process in dealing with statutes into three stages: (1) finding the statute; (2) interpreting it, that is, arriving at its meaning; and (3) applying it to the facts of a given case. This analysis gives the impression that the discovery of the meaning of a statute and the determination of its applicability to a particular fact-situation are separate operations, successive in point of time. Professor de Sloovere, who has accepted the analysis as a working principle, has carried the distinction between "meaning" and "application" to its logical conclusion.²⁵ . . .

What Dean Pound and Professor de Sloovere seem to be suggesting is that in determining the effect of a statute in particular situations of fact, the court must first determine the *connotation*²⁶ of the general terms of the statute, and then determine their denotation, that is, their applicability to the concrete facts of an actual case. Whatever merits this distinction may have, and the present writer doubts even its general validity,²⁷ it may lead to misunderstanding in an attempt to analyze the significance of "plain" and "unambiguous" as those terms are employed in judicial decisions on the plain meaning rule. A distinction between the "meaning" of a statute and its "application" would appear to suggest that a statute may have a "plain meaning" which would bar resort to extrinsic aids, although the effect of the statute upon the particular case in question is subject to serious doubts. The courts, however, employ the phrase "plain meaning" without regard to the jurisprudential distinction drawn between "meaning" and "application."

²⁴ Courts and Legislation (1913) 77 Cent.L.J. 219, 222. The analysis is also found in Pound, An Introduction to the Philosophy of Law (1922) c. 3.

For further implications drawn from the distinction, see de Sloovere, The Functions of Judge and Jury in the Interpretation of Statute (1933) 46 Harv.L.Rev. 1086.

²⁶ "A term may be viewed in two ways, either as a class of objects (which may have only one member) or as a set of attributes or characteristics which determine the objects. The first phase or aspect is called the denotation or extension of the term, while the second is called the connotation or intension." Cohen & Nagel, An Introduction to Logic and Scientific Method (1934) 31. (Italics are the present writer's.)

²⁷ When a judge refers to a statute it is for guidance as to the decision of a case, the particular facts of which are already known to him. His thinking is affected throughout by his awareness of the facts of the controversy which it is his duty to decide. Is it not an unrealistic description of actual judicial thinking to suggest that the judge arrives at a determination of the abstract meaning of a statute before he considers its applicability to the particular case?

SECTION 2. POSTULATES AND APPROACHES

A. Introductory Note

During the past six centuries courts in England, the United States and elsewhere in the common law system have consistently adhered verbally to their unchanging postulates of the nature of the interpretative process. During this period, however, gradual changes have occurred in the techniques and relative functions of the legislature, courts and executive as new needs of government have developed. In response to those changes and to styles of drafting prevalent at certain times, the courts have taken chronologically the so-called literal, equitable, "mischief rule" and "golden rule" approaches to the fulfillment of their practical task of utilizing statutes as legal precepts.¹ Preference for each approach has varied from time to time with the rise and wane of conflicting ideas about consistency of one or another with the established postulates and about the constitutional theory of separation of powers. When reading each case on this topic consider how far the choice of approach may have predetermined the result, and weigh the considerations, expressed and otherwise, that led to the particular approach being preferred. Observe closely the method and limitations peculiar to each approach.

The Problem of Interpretation

Until late in the middle ages, lawyers tried to avoid facing the problem of interpretation. Indeed, even the word connoted in their minds fraud or evasion. Nor was the division of labour into law-making and law-interpreting generally accepted in fourteenth-century thought; the canonists, for example, had a maxim that interpretation properly belonged to the power that ordained, which alone could authoritatively interpret its own acts. The civilians were of the same mind: ejus est interpretari cujus est condere. There was a possibility that the common law might accept this principle, which the best legal opinion seemed to approve. Early in the reign of Henry III dispute arose on the interpretation of the great charter between certain sheriffs and the inhabitants of their shires; the King therefore called the disputants before him to clear the matter up. The same procedure was followed eight years later, when the greater part of the bishops, earls and barons, by their common counsel, placed an interpretation upon c. 35 of the great charter, which the King then published by letters close. Nor was this merely a royalist theory, for a quarter of a century later when Henry III was at the mercy of his barons they wrote in his name a warning to the Bishop of Durham in these terms—

¹ See especially Willis, "Statute Interpretation in a Nutshell," 16 Can Bar Rev. 1, 9-16 (1938). Cf. Bruncken, "Interpretation of the Written Law," 25 Yale L.J. 129 (1915).

[* License of 2nd ed. in the United States: The Lawyers Co-operative Pub. Co.]

“in view of the fact that the interpretation of laws and customs belongs to us and our nobles, and none other, we of the counsel of our nobles forbid you, as you would desire to use those royal liberties which you pretend are yours, to put any interpretation on them contrary to the laws and customs current in our realm.”

Edward I frequently put the principle into practice; the King and his justices published an extra-judicial “exposition” of the statute of Gloucester in 1278, and in 1281 the King in Council made a “correction” in the same statute.

The common law courts themselves acknowledged the principle of appealing to the legislator when faced with difficulties of interpretation. In 1303 Hengham, C. J., cut short a discussion of the statutory procedure of eligiti by saying: “this statute was put before the king and his council, who accorded that when the debtor came with the debt ready, his lands should be restored to him; so will you take your money?” Even as late as 1366 Thorpe, C. J., recalled that there had been a discussion before him on the interpretation of a statute, “and Sir Hugh Green, C. J., K. B., and I went together to the council where there were a good two dozen bishops and earls, and asked those who made the statute what it meant.” The archbishop told them what the statute meant, after remarking (with some justification) that the judges’ question was rather a silly one.

Practice, however, was setting the other way, and after this date interpretation was relinquished to the courts. The inherent reasonableness of the principle that the legislator was the best interpreter was still, however, admitted by those who gave thought to the problem. For example, a tract attributed to Lord Ellesmere maintains that it would be more reasonable for statutes to be interpreted by Parliament which made them than by the courts. More recently, Lord Nottingham in an early case on the Statute of Frauds reports himself thus:

“I said that I had some reason to know the meaning of this law for it had its first rise from me who brought in the bill into the Lords’ House, though it afterwards received some additions and improvements from the judges and the civilians.”

Such would appear to be the attitude of some Continental systems at the present day, but the common law courts have completely reversed their policy since the days of Nottingham. No greater contrast to his words just quoted could be imagined than this statement of Lord Halsbury:

"I have more than once had occasion to say that in construing a statute I believe the worse person to construe it is the person who is responsible for its drafting. He is very much disposed to confuse what he intended to do with the effect of the language which in fact has been employed. . . . I was largely responsible for the language in which this enactment is conveyed, and for that reason, and for that reason only, I have not written a judgment myself."

With the growth of international legislation this divergence of view has already created difficulty.

The Judicial Interpretation of Statutes

If we had completely adopted the principle that the law-giver was the only competent interpreter, we should have had to erect a chamber or council specially devoted to the work as legislation grew in bulk and complexity. This in fact is the solution which the canonists reached in the end, and the tendency which we have already noticed for the enforcement of statute law to be entrusted to special bodies is perhaps a symptom of the same trend in the common law.

The principal reason, however, for the triumph of the present system in the common law may be sought in the history of Parliament. While legislation was the work of a very small group of judges and councillors in close contact with the King, recourse to the same small group was easy when an interpretation was desired. The rise of Parliament and its increasing participation in the task of law-making created a very different situation. We have already noted the proposition that things settled by Parliament cannot be altered save by Parliament. Now Parliament served well as a legislature and as a political assembly, but its sessions were too irregular and its activities too much engaged in other directions to allow it to become a permanent organ for the interpretation of statutes. Declaratory acts represent the best that Parliament could be expected to do under such circumstances. In the meantime, there was the important fact that the legislature and the judiciary did actually have a common membership in the thirteenth century, and so nothing was more natural than to allow the judges considerable latitude in the reign of Edward I and even of his son, for they were intimately connected with the group which in fact drew up the statutes.

Early Freedom of Interpretation

It must also be remembered that the earlier mediaeval statute had very little in common with modern legislation. It was possible to handle these enactments with an easy unconcern as to their authenticity and precise content, and obviously there was no trace of the modern notion that every letter of the statute may be significant. Nor did the judges have difficulty in deciding what the real intention of an act was. The famous Chief Justice Hengham, for example, settled a difficult question in these words, "We agreed in Parliament that the wife if not named in the writ should not be received," and when counsel suggested an interpretation of another statute, Hengham again had an authoritative answer: "Do not gloss the statute," he said, "for we know better than you; we made it." In short, the court was well aware of the intention of a statute because the judges had had the biggest share in making it, and consequently there was little difficulty; the law-maker was simply explaining his own policies. A little later we find the next stage. The great Hengham had gone, but his successors remembered his words. When counsel suggested a particular construction of a statute, Shareshulle, J., replied that when he was at the bar he had used the same argument, and Herle, J., had informed him that Hengham, who had made the statute, read it another way. Again in a remarkable case involving the Statute De Donis, Chief Justice Bereford used these words:

"He that made the statute meant to bind the issue in fee tail, as well as the feoffees, until the tail had reached the fourth degree, and it was only through negligence that he omitted to insert express words to that effect in the statute; therefore we shall not abate this writ."

In short there is a tradition among the judges as to the intention of the principal statutes. Finally, as we approach the middle of the fourteenth century, the judges have separated from the Council to such an extent that they treat legislation as the product of an alien body, of which they know nothing save from the words of the statute itself, and from that wording alone can they infer its intention—and with the rise of this idea we reach the modern point of view.

CHARACTERISTICS OF FREE INTERPRETATION

This impression is confirmed when we examine the way in which statutes were interpreted in the fourteenth century. Sometimes their wording is strictly applied; sometimes it is stretched very considerably; sometimes the court finds it necessary to restrict the operation of a statute which was too widely drawn; on other occasions the court simply refuses to obey the statute at all. But in this connection two points must be emphasised.

"First, the courts undoubtedly did disregard statutes when they thought fit, and secondly, they expressed no principle of jurisprudence or political theory which would serve as an explanation—still less as a reason—for their attitude. The evidence has been recited here with as little gloss as possible, and the absence of any discussion in the reports of the juridical and constitutional questions involved is really its most significant feature. Only one explanation is possible, and put quite simply it is this—that such questions as these were not asked during our period. If reasons of however great technicality made it desirable to neglect some words of a statute, then they were quietly set aside, but in doing so neither counsel nor judges enquired into the nature of statutes and legislation, the sovereignty of Parliament, the supremacy of the common law, the functions of the judicature, and all the other questions which the modern mind finds so absorbingly interesting. They made no fuss about it, either. No sensational judgment that a statute was 'void,' no thrilling vindication of the common law and Magna Carta, nothing of the judges' professional pride as Coke felt it, will be found in these cases. The reporters note them in just the same way as all the other cases, and with as little expression of surprise or question. It is needless to pretend that such a state of mind is easy to imagine, but on the other hand it is not impossible in these days when historians recognize the value and the necessity of thinking in unfamiliar dimensions. We shall be getting nearest the truth, it seems, when we remember that the fourteenth century was in urgent need of good law, firmly enforced, for then we shall understand that the judges' great preoccupation was to apply the best law they knew as courageously as they could, and that our modern difficulties, whether political or juridical, to them would have seemed, if not unintelligible, at least irrelevant and pedantic."—(Plucknett, "Statutes & Their Interpretation," 70.)

The Limitation of Judicial Discretion

In the middle of the fourteenth century this free and easy attitude begins to disappear. We are beginning to find statements in the Year Books that statutes ought to be interpreted strictly, while in other matters, too, the bench is less confident in using its ancient powers of discretion. By 1340 or thereabout the Court of Common Pleas had developed an elaborate procedure which required considerable technical skill to work. More than that, the intimacy between the Council and the judges which had been such a feature of Edward I's reign had almost ceased. As a result the judges no longer felt themselves in the position of councillors whose nearness to the King enabled them to exercise the wide royal discretion which, as we have seen, was the privilege of the King's closest advisers. Instead, the Court of Common Pleas regards itself as a government department whose function is to carry out its duties along prescribed lines. At about this time, therefore, we find such statements as that of Hilary, J., that "we will not and cannot change ancient usages," and "statutes are to be interpreted strictly," while at the same date we see the earliest distinctions drawn between strict law and equity. Then, too, it is highly significant that at this very moment the Chancery begins to appear as a court exercising the Council's discretion. Towards the middle of the fourteenth century, therefore the judges begin to interpret statutes strictly. No longer are they to be regarded as merely suggestions of policy within whose broad limits the court can exercise a wide discretion. Instead they are regarded as texts which are to be applied exactly as they stand, and so we find the beginnings of a radical separation into two functions: the first legislates and establishes a text, and the second adjudicates and interprets the text. This separation was momentous for English history, for more than anything else it promoted the isolation of the law courts and the judges, enabling them to develop an independent position and to act as checks upon the executive and as critics of the legislature. This became all the more significant since the legislature inevitably became a political body controlling the executive; the courts now stood outside of both. The extent to which the courts were conscious of this special position is clear from their endeavours to prevent any tribunal except the superior common law courts exercising the function of interpreting statutes. Ecclesiastical courts were to be resolutely barred, and the admiralty was attacked; even Chancery was expected to send to a common law court when the high mystery of interpretation had to be performed.

A Technique of Interpretation

As we pass through the fifteenth century to the sixteenth and the age of Coke, we find the courts applying themselves with great diligence to the task of interpreting statutes, which to this day is one of the most difficult functions which a judge has to perform. Shorn of their powers of openly exercising discretion, the common law judges took refuge in logic. Attempts were made to devise rules whereby the grammatical structure of a sentence, combined with a general consideration of the nature of the act, could be used as a guide to the interpretation of the text in question. Some statutes confirmed or amended previous law; others removed abuses; some commanded things to be done, while others prohibited certain actions; some statutes conferred benefits and others were penal. Combined with these general considerations a statute might be drawn in affirmative or negative terms, and out of all this the courts elaborated a system of great complexity.

The Equity of the Statute

As a result of this development, there was a multiplicity of rules available for the interpretation of any particular statute. So great was their variety, and so diverse were the rules, that almost any conclusion might be reached, simply by selecting the appropriate rule. The real problem therefore receded further back than ever, and the power of the courts to construe or misconstrue legislation was unimpaired, and indeed increased.

This became obvious by the reign of Elizabeth, and many lawyers, notably Plowden, gloried in the liberty which the courts enjoyed in playing fast and loose with statutes. "The judges who were our predecessors have sometimes expounded the words quite contrary to the text, and sometimes have taken things by equity contrary to the text in order to make them agree with reason and equity," said Bromley, C. J., in 1554. Rules of construction which produced such striking results were clearly inadequate as an explanation of this situation, and so, when a general theoretical justification was needed, lawyers turned to the convenient word "equity."

The "equity" of the chancellor and the "equity" of a statute have nothing in common; their nature is different, and their origins are different. The equity of the chancellor is a native growth (although, of course, some of its doctrines may have felt foreign influences); the equity of the statute, however, seems to be a Continental notion imported to explain the situation which had grown up in England. Blackstone was looking in the right quarter when he sought a definition of equity in Grotius' remark that equity was "the correction of that wherein the law (by reason of its universality) is deficient." When the courts therefore spoke of the equity of a statute they meant only that adjustment of detail which is necessary when applying a general rule to a specific case. Obviously it might sometimes amount to subordinate legislation by the courts, and such work had to be done by the courts if it was not done by the legislature or its deputy.

SAMUEL E. THORNE, INTRODUCTION TO ELLESMERE "A DISCOURSE UPON THE STATUTES," 42-68 (1942) *

The freedom with which legislation was handled by Hengham and Bereford, and their companions, in the early fourteenth century . . . must not be attributed to extraordinary powers in their possession, for there is no indication of the existence of these, but rather to the fact that no particular sanction attached to the words of statutes, which were merely suggestions of policy to be treated with an easy unconcern as to their precise content. An enactment might be radically supplemented by reading into it provisions that were wholly judicial in origin, yet for such actions judges did not feel it necessary to offer apologies, nor do explanations of any sort appear. Alterations of this kind were not regarded as interferences with legislative power, and thus ultra vires acts to be explained only in the light of a broad judicial discretion, but instead as an integral and in no way exceptional part of the judge's task, which had for its objects the reaching of legally sound results and the proper administration of justice between litigants. . . .

In the early fourteenth century, if the words of an act supplied a remedy for one complex of facts but did not provide for a comparable situation that deserved equal treatment, no difficulty was experienced in achieving justice by permitting the same result in the analogous case. To a modern mind such an extension, though it would today be regarded as judicial legislation on an excessively broad scale, is less drastic than others that were contemporaneously made, since it is interstitial in character and therefore more limited in scope. But a distinction of this kind, dependent as it is upon a more sophisticated concept of legislation, is not visible in the undifferentiated practice of the early fourteenth century, for at that time all extensions, whether circumscribed by the words of the statute or not, were equally proper or, with the advent of a stricter approach toward legislation, correspondingly improper. After the third quarter of the century, however, judicial action with respect to statutes is distinguished into that which is equivalent to legislation and that which falls short of it—a separation reflected in the emergence of the doctrine of 'lequity de lestatut.' If the words of an act remedied a particular hardship, for example, by giving an action de bonis asportatis to executors, the equity of the statute allowed administrators the same action, since, though they were not mentioned in the act, they were 'in the same mischief.' The appearance of that doctrine reflects the fact that a definition of legislation had been formulated, during the middle years of the fourteenth century, which now made it possible . . . to distinguish in some degree . . . between judicial action that was completely legislative in character and that which did not overstep the proper function of courts. Though the making of novel ley was not actually outside their province, judges no longer attempted to supplement the words of an act to the extent that a wholly new rule was provided, as had been done by Hengham and Bereford, but less drastic action on their part was clearly permissible. Put more precisely, the terms in which an act was phrased had gained greater importance than they had possessed earlier and could not be easily augmented without parliamentary action, but, on the other hand, a statute was not yet thought to provide solely for the one set of circumstances it mentioned, and thus its words had not acquired the sanction that was later to force courts to take the position that a case similar to that dealt with in a statute, but entirely unprovided for by it, must remain so.

The bold supplementation of statutes, recognized after the middle fourteenth century to be legislative action, was no longer within the province of judges, but, just as analogous cases were within a common-law rule, so situations unmentioned in an act but in the same mischief as that toward which it was directed were aided by 'lequity de lestatut. . . .

. . . . Definite principles indicative of the factors that must be present for a situation to be remedied by 'lequity de lestatut' did not evolve: if a useful result could be reached, or if no remedy was otherwise available, a case might be brought within an act that had not dealt with it in express terms. A rudimentary rule does appear in Henry IV's reign, though it was by no means always observed in practice: analogous cases are not to be taken by the equity of penal statutes. Later in the Year Book period, statutes in derogation of common right, and those that restrained or abridged the common law, are said to fall within that rule, and the argument was made that 'when a statute abridges the common law nothing will be taken by equity of it but it must be read stricte.' The answer to this contention was a denial that the act abridged common law or the counter-assertions that it enlarged the law, that it was beneficial, that if the act were not extended to the case before the court 'great mischief would ensue,' or, more rarely, that the act did not restrain but was an affirmance of the common law. Such reasoning, however, must not be given undue prominence, for the decisions in fact turned only on the answers to these questions: Is the case in the same mischief as that for which the statute provided? Is the result a legally reasonable and beneficial one? . . .

That acts of Parliament had achieved a new status by the middle sixteenth century, however, is reflected in the fact that the distinction between 'penal' and beneficial statutes then took its place as an objective rule of primary importance. As parliamentary enactments were removed from the ambit of private law and were no longer to be handled in essentially the same manner as common-law rules, the formulation of regulations governing their application naturally became necessary. . . . The eighth chapter of the Discourse notes the exceptions, amply supported by precedent, that were quickly made to the rule that 'penal' statutes must not be extended beyond their words, and similarly in Plowden many cases were brought forward to show that a 'penal' statute may be extended, for though it is 'penal against one, yet it is beneficial to all others,' or, in the words of Chief Justice Montague, 'although it restrains the liberty of the tenant in tail, Sir, every statute which shall be extended by equity restrains someone, and is penal to someone, but yet inasmuch as it is beneficial to the greater number, it shall be taken by equity, and so is this statute, for it tends to the suppression of deceit and to the advancement of truth.' The need for these arguments indicates the strength the distinction had acquired but also that it was, like the others that emerged contemporaneously, inadequate. One must not conclude, however, that it represents the fruit of three centuries of effort toward the formulation of a satisfactory rule: on the contrary, it was a pioneer attempt to treat statutes on a public- rather than a private- law level and as such an understandably imperfect and stumbling first step toward meeting a problem that had not pressed for solution earlier.

As the sanction behind statutes rather than their content is stressed, they lose their separateness and form a cognate group that must be dealt with as a whole. In response to this need the distinctions mentioned above became prominent and took their places as authentic rules of statutory interpretation. The change is no less apparent, however, in the transformation of 'equity de lestatut' to 'equity.' In the Year Books, each statute had been considered individually and cases that were in the same mischief as that for which an act had provided, though they were not expressly included within it, were considered to be within the equity of that statute. But in the sixteenth-century reports 'equity' appears unconnected with particular enactments, and clearly it is not accidental that Aristotle's general principle of epieikeia was then for the first time taken to form its foundation. Extensions of acts to analogous cases were now made by judges in the light of a controlling Equitas: 'the wise judges of our law deserve great commendation for having made use of it to enlarge the letter according to its discretion.' . . .

In the sixteenth century, then, the extension of an enactment to a situation not within its precise words could be justified by means of the doctrine of a controlling 'equity' which was 'no part of the law, but a moral virtue which corrects the law.' This was a more generalized form of the Year Book concept of 'equity de lestatut,' which in turn reflects the new attitude towards statutes which were now being recognized as a body of material to be treated as a whole; but other explanations were also offered. The Discourse met the difficulties by a theory grounded upon 'reason & the commen lawe.' Statutes that confirm the common law may be taken by equity to include similar cases, just as the common law itself advances ad similia; and so, too, may statutes that resolve a difficulty at common law by choosing between conflicting rules, for when 'doutes are determyned by parlyament, it shalbe said that that was the commen lawe, for so muche as it is presumed that which they doe to be upon beste reason.' Statutes which 'come in encrease of the commen lawe,' by broadening a particular remedy beyond its recognized common-law area, may be taken to indicate that the remedy may be further extended to others in like mischief, 'for synce the commen lawe is grounded upon commen reason yt is good that that which augmenteth commen reason shulde be augmented.' These cases were perhaps sufficiently clear, though it must be noted that no similar systematization had taken place in the Year Books; but where the common law had not dealt with a situation at all (which was most often true) there the reason of the statute may unaided serve to extend it to similar but unmentioned cases, 'for the reason of the lawe is the soule & pythe of the lawe, yea, the verie lawe itselfe.' Thus the ratio of the statute is its important part, and the extension of an act was explained as an application of its 'sence' or 'reason' (quia ratio legis est anima legis), rather than as a simple equalization of similar situations made without theoretical justification in the course of the administration of justice. The Discourse clearly does not visualize a statute as a rigid pronouncement of law in the Austinian sense, to be applied literally and no further; nevertheless, it is evident that extensions to analogous cases raised more difficulties and thus required a more complex explanation than the lawyers in the Year Books had felt themselves obliged to formulate.

As acts of Parliament take on the attributes of modern legislation, the intention of the legislator must grow in importance and take the place of the equity, conjectured purpose, or reason that had controlled earlier. It is therefore significant that only during the middle years of the sixteenth century did the intention of the makers begin to form the justification for extending a statute beyond its words. The Discourse had recognized that statutes must be taken ex mente legislatorum, and that the intention of the makers, whether secured directly 'by theire lyvinge voice,' or inferred from the actions of judges who had been 'mooste neerest the statute,' or from the words of the act itself, was important, but such considerations there occupied a position subordinate to 'reason' which was itself sufficient warrant for extension. Similarly, 'yf it maie be expresslye gathered to be the meanyng of the statute makers,' a 'penal' statute could be extended, but this was only one of several exceptions to the general rule. In Plowden's Commentaries, however, legislative intent was more heavily stressed: statutes were to be read 'according to common reason, and common intendment, and according to the minds of the makers.' The phrase 'the cases which are in the same mischief as those which are remedied by a statute are taken by the equity of that statute,' and other variations of the maxim ubi eadem est ratio ibi idem ius, gave way to another: 'for everything that is within the intent of the makers of the act, although it be not within the letter, is as strongly within the act as that which is within the letter and intent also.' The tract attributed to Hatton is more explicit: "For when the words express not the intent of the Makers, the Statute must be further extended than the bare words, but ever it must be thought that the meaning of the Makers was such, when there is any proceeding other than the words bear, for it were an absurd thing to make an exposition go further than either the words, or the intention of the Statutaries reached unto.' This new approach was immediately projected backward—a not unusual procedure in the common law—and it was recognized that in the past, when judges had extended the words of statutes, 'the reason for their interpretation has always been founded upon the intention of the makers of the act, which they have collected sometimes by considering the cause and necessity of making the act, sometimes by comparing one part of it with another and sometimes through extraneous circumstances. So that they have ever been guided by the intention of the makers, which they have always taken according to the necessity of the matter and according to that which is consonant with reason and good discretion.'

Plowden's use of the word 'interpretation' must be remarked. The word had been used earlier, though in other connections, and there is every indication that not until his period did extensions of the words of statutes become judicial 'interpretations' or 'constructions' of them. The appearance of the term 'interpretation' provides another indication of the growing sanction back of acts of Parliament, for as enactments acquire formal rigidity their words must be saved by regarding departures from them as 'interpretations' made by judges. These were founded, as has been indicated, upon reason or equity—words substantially synonymous with justice—and in the later sixteenth century they were being made as well in the light of the intention of the legislature. In Plowden this is taken in its widest sense—as the desire to reach results 'beneficial a le common weal' or to avoid 'enconuenience & mischief'—and under so broad a concept of legislative intention, similarly equivalent in all respects to that of justice, acts could be boldly extended, or (as will be shown later) narrowly restricted, without difficulty. The words 'lenten del feasons,' therefore, though they reveal a wholly different approach from that customary in the Year Books, did not immediately lead to results contrary to or more limited than those that had been reached earlier by means of 'equity de lestatut' or those that were contemporaneously achieved by 'equity'—by reliance upon the general purpose of the act or the ratio legis. Indeed, the last quotation shows that they were alternate methods for reaching the same end. An act may still extend to similar cases, though now that is explained as well by the presumption that the legislature could not have intended to permit the continuance of a mischief 'en equall degree.' The legislators alone know what they had intended, and therefore 'the life of the statute rests in their minds,' but 'if they are dispersed, so that their minds cannot be known, then those who may approach nearest to their minds shall construe the words, and these are the sages of the law whose talents are exercised in the study of such matters.' Finally, judges must, since the words of statutes are to be extended in the light of the legislative will, approach that as closely as may be by acting as the lawmaker would have acted had the case presented for decision been brought before him rather than the court.

Legislative intent, since it differed only verbally from the other reasons brought forward to explain the extension of statutory words, did not lead to their abandonment. Coke, it is true, used the doctrine of 'equity' sparingly; the explanation most frequently offered by him for the extension of the words of an act (whether it be 'penal' or beneficial) was the purpose of the statute or the legislative will or intention, sometimes secured from the preamble or title, but often simply drawn from the circumstances Plowden had enumerated. But, in the reports of the seventeenth century, arguments based upon 'equity'—often synonymous with the actual or presumed intention of the makers as revealed by the act, but occasionally used in its older sense—continued to be found useful. The other explanations are found as well, and in addition the results to which equity, purpose, reason, and intention all led could be reached by a 'benigne & fauourable interpretation.' As legislative intent narrowed in scope and became less clearly identified with the 'auauncement del veritie' or 'le conseruation de tranquillity, peace & concorde,' and as the purpose or intention of the statute came to be more rigidly limited by its words, the last-named grew more frequent, developing naturally into the liberal or equitable construction of beneficial acts characteristic of the early eighteenth century.

Though that century and much of the seventeenth fall outside the scope of the present essay, there was evidently no acceptance, prior to Blackstone's day, of the rule that, Parliament having spoken only of specific things and specific situations, all others were casus omissi within the maxim casus omissus habetur pro omisso. As Parliament became the sovereign and the duty of the judge was recognized to be merely to determine what Parliament has said and to 'apply' it, omitted particulars could no longer be supplied, since that would amount to a usurpation of or incroachment upon the power of the legislature. This is a view of the judicial function that differed fundamentally from that which had prevailed earlier, and one that in recent years has been the subject of increasingly vigorous attack. Its acceptance marks both the final abandonment of the powers of equitable construction assumed by judges in the sixteenth century (and thus of the older undifferentiated practice best described in terms of 'lequity de lestatut') and the beginning of a long series of apologetic explanations for their past use.

THEODORE F. T. PLUCKNETT, (REVIEW OF THORNE'S)
"ELLESMERE ON STATUTES"

60 Law Q. Rev. 242, 246-248 (1944).

That we are in for a lively debate is clear from the first sentence: 'the history of statutory interpretation begins in the sixteenth century' after the close of Henry VIII's outburst of legislation. As opposed to this, 'the currently received theory' which speaks of statutory interpretation as having existed during the Middle Ages (a) tacitly assumes a 'developed sanction' behind acts of Parliament so that strict adherence to their terms would be the norm, and (b) ascribes the observed deviations from that norm to a 'power wielded by the judges' which authorized them to depart at times from the legislative dictates. Professor Thorne objects to the 'current theory', first, that there was no compulsion to follow a statute strictly during the Middle Ages, and that the extension of a statute was no usurpation by the judges of the Legislature's functions; and hence he objects, secondly, that there is no need to postulate 'powers' in the judges of the year book period. This portentous dogma is something of a shock to one who has been accustomed for many years to write about what he fancied was the 'interpretation of statutes' in the Middle Ages. As a statement of the practice of a later age, Professor Thorne seems to profane those arcana of the law which ordinarily are not discussed; but since the matter is now raised, we may venture to ask what is the sanction behind statutes at the present day? Is there any compulsion upon a Court to interpret a statute in a particular way? (Similarly, what sanction compels a Court to regard certain precedents as binding?) What can we say of such sanctions (supposing them to exist) if we must also postulate a 'power' wielded by the judges permitting them to depart from the legislative dictate?

Clearly it is useless to talk of 'powers' in any sense adverse to the Legislature in England, and we are not aware that anyone has used such language of our mediaeval law; the whole burden of the present writer's contributions to the subject has been that mediaeval dealings with statutes were unfettered by theoretical considerations. True, the judicial attitude slowly changed—and it is changing still, and at no time was it logically consistent; but of a theory of interpretation there is little trace until the doctrine of the separation of powers became fashionable. Professor Thorne associates 'the currently received theory' which he criticizes with the present writer, 'though it is not usual to find the assumption that lies back of it so explicitly stated' as he himself has revealed it. Our defence may be stated very shortly: the omission to state the assumption is due simply to the fact that no such assumption was made.

All this arises on pages 4 and 5; the clue to the difficulty does not appear (or did not appear to this reader) until reaching page 62, and so it may be helpful to draw attention at once to a remark which does much to illuminate the author's position. The author there adopts the word 'interpretation' in the peculiar sense in which some sixteenth century writers used it: 'as enactments acquire formal rigidity their words must be saved by regarding departures from them as "interpretations" made by the judges'. This use of the word introduces the atmosphere of fiction and make-believe which certainly did become prominent in later times, and in this sense the word does imply a somewhat disingenuous evasion of a lawful command. The toleration of such a practice by the Legislature, and the language sometimes used by the Courts, combine to create the impression that the Courts are exercising some sort of 'power' to interpret statutes. But that is not the ordinary sense of the word to-day, and the fact that a modern book or article is entitled the 'interpretation of statutes' does not mean that the author accepts all the implications that the word held four hundred years ago.

There is indeed a difference between the fourteenth century and the sixteenth century attitude towards statutes, and Professor Thorne is assuredly right in thinking that the change is in the statutes—we have often felt that the Statute of Uses is typical of the new age, with its elaborate drafting methodically dealing with every possible aspect and detail of its general plan. The Legislature there took up the burden, which former ages had left to the Courts, of working out the detailed consequences of a legislative policy. We would venture the suggestion that the last years of the fifteenth century saw a change in parliamentary procedure which facilitated this development. Instead of a prayer by the Commons in general terms for a particular legislative remedy, we find the famous petition formam cuiusdam actus in se continens. As a result, Parliament considered not merely the general policy, but the exact wording of the proposed statute; and that wording had most often been settled in Government offices. The lawyers in the Commons, the judges in the Lords, and the council, which kept a close watch upon the proceedings, were all dealing with specific and carefully drafted texts. Under this improved and businesslike procedure it was inevitable that the words of a statute should acquire a new significance from the fact that they had been so often examined and finally adopted after prolonged deliberation. Legislation, in fact, was no longer the Government's vague reply to vaguely worded complaints, but rather the deliberate adoption of specific proposals embodied in specific texts emanating from the Crown or its officers. When the time came for lawyers and judges to apply these statutes, they perforce approached them with the knowledge that not only their general drift, but also their detailed wording, was the result of careful thought. Documents prepared by such a procedure inevitably invited the reader to think that they meant exactly what they said, and nothing else. In short, we are inclined to think that the new attitude towards statutes, and the new spirit within the statutes, was primarily the result of more businesslike methods of Parliamentary procedure.

The above suggestion is put forward as an explanation in part, at least, of the unmistakable change in thought upon which Professor Thorne rightly insists. The principal issue involved is that in our view the change in attitude towards statutes was not the outcome of changing political thought; instead, we believe that the change in attitude was the product of procedural and administrative processes. The new attitude towards statutes was not the result of new doctrine, but finally it did in its turn influence political thought. Having acquired the habit of setting great store upon the express wording of a statute, it became all the easier to accept an enhanced estimate of the nature of legislative authority. It is inevitably very difficult to find words which truly define that estimate. The author uses several phrases such as the 'inviolability' of a statute, the 'developed sanction' behind Acts of Parliament, or the 'compulsion to follow Acts of Parliament'. Taken literally, all these expressions seem to us too precise, more especially since the author himself insists upon them, and balances them against the correlative 'powers' which are implied in his use of the word interpretation. For our own part, we are inclined to believe that the greater reverence for Parliament and its statutes was primarily a matter of judicial sentiment rather than of theory. As for the 'powers' of interpretation, it is hazardous to use this word to mean more than the practical possibility of deciding a contested point of interpretation one way or the other—a possibility which will be wider or narrower as the sentiment of reverence for the ipsissima verba of Parliament varies.

J. A. CORRY, ADMINISTRATIVE LAW AND THE INTERPRETATION OF STATUTES

The constitutional theory after 1688 bore upon interpretation of statutes in several ways. It affected the form of legislation by tending to make its provisions particular rather than general, an enumeration of instances rather than a broad statement of principle. Prior to the revolution, the details of administration had been largely settled by the executive under the prerogative. With prerogative cut to the bone, and the command of the king no longer a justification for governmental action, anything of moment that was done in the name of government had to be authorized by a statute passed by parliament. However, to have given an authority in general terms would have created a statutory prerogative. Hence the tendency to specify in detail the exact powers given.⁵⁵ This spread to all branches of legislation and was accelerated by the judicial policy of strict construction.⁵⁶ When the judges cut down the operation of general expressions, parliament had to attempt to achieve its object by specific enumeration of all that the general expression was meant to include.⁵⁷ A vicious circle was established, and prolixity became a pronounced vice of eighteenth-century statutes. . . .

The great constitutional change was the supremacy of parliament. . . . The constitutional implications of the political victory of parliament were not at once perceived. Even at the date when Blackstone wrote, he took serious note of the contention that "where the main object of the statute is unreasonable, the judges are at liberty to reject it".⁶⁰ He himself held that this could not be so; and he added "if Parliament will positively enact a thing to be done which is unreasonable, I know of no power in the ordinary forms of the constitution that is vested with authority to control it".⁶¹ Yet he was close enough to older views to say that "if there arise out of them collaterally any absurd consequences, manifestly contradictory to common reason, they are, with regard to those collateral consequences, void".⁶² The eighteenth century was well advanced before the sovereign and absolute power of parliament was generally conceded.

. . . If parliament may legislate anything it wishes and no other power may legislate at all, the duty of the judge is to determine what parliament has legislated and nothing else. Furthermore, if parliament in legislating speaks only of specific things and specific situations, it is a legitimate inference that the particulars exhaust the legislative will. The particular which is omitted from the particulars mentioned is the casus omissus, which the judge cannot supply because that would amount to legislation. When general language is not used, there is little need for interpretation. The doctrine of literalness, the direct application of the particular expressions in the statute to the facts of the case, became hard to resist.

⁵⁵ "English legislation in the eighteenth century bears a wonderfully empirical, partial and minutely particularizing character. . . . In this 'age of reason', as we are wont to think it, the British Parliament seems rarely to rise to the dignity of a general proposition" (Maitland, "English Law," Encyc. Britt., Vol. 9, 11 ed., p. 605).

C. Enunciation of Postulates by American Courts

SPENCER v. THE STATE

Supreme Court of Indiana, 1853. 5 Ind. 41.

PERKINS, J. At the June term, 1853, of the Vigo Court of Common Pleas, Spencer, the appellant was convicted of bigamy, and sentenced to the state prison. He appealed to this Court; and he asks that said judgment and sentence be reversed, on the ground that the Court had no jurisdiction of the cause in which they were pronounced.

The statute creating the Court of Common Pleas, and conferring its jurisdiction, was approved on the fourteenth day of May, 1852, and it empowered said Court to take cognizance of certain civil cases, of certain misdemeanors, and of felonies in two specified cases: 1. When a person charged with that grade of crime was in custody; and, 2. When a person so charged, not in custody at the time, voluntarily submitted to the jurisdiction of the Court.

On the first day of June, 1852, eighteen days after the passage of the Common Pleas act, a statute was approved, entitled, "An act providing for the organization of Circuit Courts, the election of judges thereof, and defining their powers and duties." Said statute contained this clause, viz.: Such Circuit Courts, in their respective counties, "shall have original, exclusive jurisdiction in all felonies."

Both of the above statutes were enacted at the same session of the legislature, and are incorporated in the same volume of the revised statutes, the latter at page 5, the former at page 16.

The question presented is, does the act conferring exclusive jurisdiction of felonies upon the Circuit Courts, by implication, take away the limited jurisdiction previously possessed, in such cases, by the Courts of Common Pleas? . . .

. . . One of these acts, the first enacted, contains a provision, in substance, that the Court of Common Pleas shall have, in certain cases, concurrent jurisdiction of felonies; and the other of said acts, that last enacted, declares that the Circuit Court shall have original, exclusive jurisdiction of all felonies. These two provisions, touching this single point, are all that are alleged to conflict. In relation to these, and these alone, have we anything to determine.

It first devolves upon this Court, then, to inquire whether these two provisions do, in point of fact, conflict; whether they are irreconcilably repugnant; for the law does not favor repeals by implication, and requires clearly repugnant language to effect them.

Can, then, the Court of Common Pleas of a county possess a limited jurisdiction over some felonies, and the Circuit Court of the same county possess original, exclusive jurisdiction of all felonies?

It would seem that there could be but one opinion upon language so explicit as that contained in the Circuit Court act. Exclusive means without the participation of any other; and exclusive jurisdiction of all felonies means a jurisdiction of them in which no other Court has any participation. Hence the Common Pleas can not participate in such jurisdiction, and still leave it in the exclusive possession of the Circuit Court. . . .

The two provisions, then, being repugnant, the next question is, which provision shall be modified by the other? When two statutes directly conflict in any of their provisions, which of them, by implication, repeals or modifies the other? Does the one last enacted modify the one first enacted, or does the one first enacted modify the later statute. And now arises the necessity of consulting the authorities, and ascertaining the rule of decision applicable to this question.

We find that where such statutes are passed at different sessions of the legislature, there is no difficulty. The rule is settled by a cloud of authorities that the act last enacted controls the former. Bowen v. Lease, 5 Hill 221, and cases cited; Norris v. Crocker, 13 How. 429, and cases cited. . . .

And here we must be indulged in the remark that we regard the rules for the construction of statutes equally a part of the law of the land with, and a not much less important part than, the statutes themselves. This power of construction in Courts is a mighty one, and, unrestrained by settled rules, would tend to throw a painful uncertainty over the effect that might be given to the most plainly-worded statutes, and render Courts, in reality, the legislative power of the state. Instances are not wanting to confirm this. Judge-made law has overrode the legislative department. It was the boast of Chief Justice Pemberton, one of the judges of the despot Charles the second, and not the worst one even of those times, that he had entirely outdone the parliament in making law. We think that system of jurisprudence best and safest which controls most by fixed rules, and leaves least to the discretion of the judge—a doctrine constituting one of the points of superiority in the common law over that system which has been administered in France, where authorities had no force, and the law of each case was what the judge of the case saw fit to make it. We admit that the exercise of an unlimited discretion may, in a particular instance, be attended with a salutary result; still, history informs us that it has often been the case that the arbitrary discretion of a judge was the law of a tyrant, and warns us that it may be so again. . . .

We must now proceed to the inquiry whether the fact that the two statutes in question were passed at the same session of the legislature, makes any difference?

This precise point arose in The King v. The Justices of Middlesex, 2 Barn. and Adolph. 818. The question in that case was, "if two contradictory acts are passed in the same session of parliament, to come into operation on the same day, which is to take effect?" After the Court had advised, Lord C. J. Tenterden delivered the opinion of the Court. He said, "It appears that in this case the metropolitan act received the royal assent a few days after the local act, and, consequently, we are of opinion that so far as the two acts are contradictory to each other, the metropolitan act, which last received the royal assent, must have the effect of repealing the other." And again: "Our decision is conformable with the doctrine laid down in the Attorney General v. The Chelsea Water Works Company, (Fitzgibbon 195.) There it was resolved that where the proviso of an act of parliament is directly repugnant to the purview of it, the proviso shall stand, and be held a repeal of the purview, as it speaks the last intention of the makers." . . .

The repugnant acts involved in the case before us, then, are to be considered as though enacted at different sessions of the legislature. . . .

It will be observed that, thus far, we have devoted almost no space to the question of intention on the part of the legislature, while it is a prominent general doctrine, that statutes must be interpreted according to the intention of the makers. And the question arises, how is that intention to be ascertained?

Formerly it was the custom of the judges to go to the legislature, and inquire what they meant, where the language of an act was ambiguous or contradictory. Campbell, in the first volume of his Lives of the Lord Chancellors, p. 241, says: "The qualifications of the chancellor now became of great importance to the due administration of justice, not only from the increase of his separate jurisdiction, but from the practice of the common-law judges, when any question of difficulty arose before them in their several Courts, to take the advice of parliament upon it before giving judgment. In a case which occurred in the King's Bench, in the 39th of Edward 3, Thorpe, the chief justice, says, 'Go to the parliament, and as they will have us do, we will, and otherwise not.' The following year Thorpe himself, accompanied by Sir Hugh Green, a brother judge, went to the house of lords, where there were assembled twenty-four bishops, earls, and barons, and asked them, as they had lately passed a statute of jeofails, what they intended thereby. Such questions, which were frequent in this reign, must have been answered by the chancellor." Lord Campbell adds that "if the lords were still liable to be so interrogated, they would not unfrequently be puzzled; and the revival of the practice might be a check to hasty legislation."

But the practice has not been revived, and we now go, not to the legislature, but to the language of the statutes they enact for the public, and governed by certain established and binding rules of construction, we, from that, declare the legislative intention.

The first of those rules is, that where the legislature have enacted a statute capable of being executed, couched in plain, explicit language, Courts shall declare that the legislature meant what they said.

Such an act we find the Circuit Court act in question to be, which expressly declares that the Courts created by it shall have original, exclusive jurisdiction of all felonies. We are bound, then, to hold that on the first of June, the day said act was passed, the legislature intended the Circuit Courts should have such jurisdiction, no matter what their intention had been eighteen days before. Hence, applying the rule to the present case, where we find they had previously passed a statute which had given a portion of that jurisdiction to the Courts of Common Pleas; and the question is asked, what is now to be done? what did the legislature mean? The answer must be, the legislature shall be intended to have meant that what they last said shall govern, and that it shall, so far as repugnant to what they had formerly said, repeal that former declaration. Such, indeed, is another settled rule of construction.

There is no necessity, therefore, for us to inquire whether the legislature, or the members of it, really, personally did mean that a later statute, totally repugnant to a former, should repeal such former statute or not. This is not a case for such inquiry, and we are not at liberty to make it. And the legislature itself is not privileged to make an answer upon the point—an ex post facto interpretation to suit the times. That body is estopped by its language; and the law, the settled rules of construction, which this Court is bound to apply, make it imperative that we declare the later statute did repeal the former. It is only where the language of the statute is ambiguous—doubtful, or totally unreasonable—that Courts may proceed to hunt for intention, and then only to aid in giving a meaning to the language.

There is another point upon which we have said nothing thus far, viz.: in relation to the inconvenience, or failure of justice which it is supposed may result from a decision in accordance with the view we take; for, in the language of the Supreme Court of Ohio, in the Heirs of Ludlow v. Johnson, 3 Ohio 553, 17 Am.D. 609, "it is our duty to declare, not to make the law. To do this correctly, the ordinary rules of construction must be adopted, and the meaning of words, sentences and phrases must not be distorted in order to sustain a favorite opinion." And in that of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in Pitman v. Flint, 10 Pick 504: "A mere failure of justice would not be a sufficient ground for construing the statutes against their clear meaning, so as to give a Court jurisdiction. The proper mode of proceeding would be to apply to the legislature for remedy. It is only where the construction is doubtful, that the argument from a failure of justice applies." . . .

We will add that we are strengthened in the position we have taken upon the construction of the acts involved, by the nineteenth section of the criminal-practice act, an act still subsequent to both the aforementioned, but passed at the same session, and embodied in the same volume of the code, and to be construed with them. It reads thus:

"Informations are filed by the prosecuting attorney, upon affidavit, in any Court having jurisdiction of the offence. Criminal actions prosecuted by information, include all offences not within the jurisdiction of the grand jury, or the exclusive jurisdiction of justices of the peace."

Now, felonies are within the jurisdiction of the grand jury, and, hence, are not to be prosecuted by information; but prosecutions in the Common Pleas are by information, and, hence, must be limited to offences below felony. This statute, it will be observed, does not relate to particular cases of offence, but to the classes of offences as recognized by our statutes, and is a clear legislative expression that no felony shall be prosecuted in the Common Pleas, but that all of that class of offences shall be prosecuted by indictment, and in the Circuit Court. We regard it as conclusive upon the question, and as furnishing a complete answer, if any were needed, to the suggestion, so far as such suggestion could bear on this case, that perhaps the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court was intended to be limited to prosecutions according to the course of the common law; for it shows that felonies are to be prosecuted in no other way. This act is in pari materia with both the other acts involved in this case, as it relates to the practice in both the Courts organized by said acts. See, also, the act for the election of prosecuting attorneys. 2 R.S. 1852, p. 385.

If it be said that the constitution prohibits the effect given to the Circuit Court act, we reply that that act contains no provision other than upon the subject-matter of it as indicated by its title, and hence is in conformity to that instrument, and any effect it may have by implication upon prior statutes is not within any constitutional prohibition. It would be doing injustice to the convention to decide, upon slight conjecture, that they intended to change a long-established rule of law. We think, therefore, that the Court of Common Pleas had no jurisdiction of the case, and that the judgment against the appellant should be reversed.

STUART, J. . . . The question now presented is one of conflicting jurisdiction between the Common Pleas and the Circuit Court.

Since the decision in 3 Ind., the Revised Statutes have been published. The fifth section of the act to organize Circuit Courts confers on that tribunal "original, exclusive jurisdiction in all felonies." 2 R.S. 6. It is contended that this act, approved June 1, 1852, and taking effect May 6, 1853, repeals the seventeenth and eighteenth sections of the Common Pleas act, approved May 14, 1852, and taking effect October 1, 1852, as being the later expressed will of the legislature.

In favor of this view, Ham v. State, 7 Blackf. 314, McQuilkin v. Doe, 8 id. 581, State v. Miskimmons, 2 Ind. 440, and numerous other authorities, are adduced. But the rule in these cases is applicable only to enactments "clearly repugnant." In all such instances of "manifest repugnance," the maxim leges posteriores priores contrarias abrogant, must prevail. . . .

There are several considerations recognized by Courts in the exposition of statutes, which seem to exempt the sections in question from the operation of the rule.

A seeming or partial repugnance is not sufficient. Courts are invariably reluctant to declare a statute repugnant, unless it is clearly so. Accordingly, every hypothesis favorable to the harmonious co-existence of the two acts is to be first carefully weighed.

In this connection, the intention of the legislature in distributing jurisdiction between the two Courts is a primary object of inquiry.

It has been seen, 3 Ind., supra, that the new Court was intended to provide against the ruinous delays of the old system; to administer justice more promptly and, therefore, more efficiently, at less expense to the public, and without the intervention of a grand jury; to secure witnesses more easily and while the facts were yet fresh in the memory; and in the spirit of the new constitution, to administer justice "speedily and without delay."

So far, it is believed, the exercise of this jurisdiction by the Common Pleas has operated beneficially. Before a feature so satisfactory to the public is blotted out of the new Court, with all the confusion and consequences that must ensue, the intention of the law-maker to repeal should be clearly ascertained.

These two acts are now component parts of the revised statutes. In a legislative revision, the work of many hands, discrepancies were to be expected. No doubt there are many. At almost every step ambiguity and seeming conflict will meet the Courts. And yet the task of ascertaining the leading design of the legislature is not believed to be insuperable. By a cautious adherence to the settled rules of statutory construction, the Courts may, in most instances, reconcile seeming discrepancies, and carry out those beneficial reforms which the legislature contemplated.

This mode of interpretation is as far removed from "bending rules to meet cases" as it is from that narrow, literal adherence to mere words, insensible of principles, which would render almost any enactment a mass of ridiculous contradictions. "Scire leges, non hoc est verba earum tenere sed vim ac potestatem." In statutory exposition, the reason, the spirit, the intention of the law, is above the mere cavil about words. The chief thing to be explored is the intention. This the judiciary is to seek in the history of legislation; in the objects contemplated, the evils to be corrected, and the remedies provided.

It ill becomes the judiciary to affect to ridicule statutory exposition. So long as we have a judicial system, says a distinguished judge, we can not escape the power of judicial construction. "Wherever human language is used, except in mathematics," says Lieber, "interpretation is indispensable. Its necessity lies in the nature of things, in our minds and in our language. No code can provide for all specific cases, or be construed so as to close all further inquiry." It is quite visionary, says Kent, to expect, in any code of statute law, such precision of thought, and perspicuity of language, as to preclude all uncertainty.

This statutory interpretation, it is needless to add, is a work necessarily devolved upon the judiciary.

The case at bar is important in itself; but still more so as evolving the principles which are to govern the Courts of the state in the construction of the revision.

It will be observed that, in the Circuit Court act, there is no direct repealing clause. The repeal, if any, is by implication; and the policy of the law is not favorable to this species of repeal. . . .

This rule is applicable to penal, as well as to other statutes. Thus the act of 1 and 2 Philip and Mary, that all trials for treason should be according to the course of the common law, and not otherwise, was held not to repeal 35 H. 8, for trial of treason beyond sea. Dwarris, supra. So in Capen v. Glover, 4 Mass. 305, where one town was set off from another by act of the legislature, containing a stipulation that certain lands should not be taxed, it was held that a subsequent general tax law, though in terms it embraced these very lands, did not operate as a repeal of the former provision. So also in Dodge v. Gridley, 10 Ohio 177, by an act regulating estrays, passed in 1831, persons living outside of village corporations were entitled to have their stock at large exempt from liability of being taken up by the village authorities. The charter of the town of Harmer, passed in 1837, authorized the town council to prevent any description of animals from running at large in the streets. It was insisted that as to the limits of Harmer, the latter act repealed the former. But the Court says, "repeals by implication are not favored. When two affirmative statutes exist, the one is not to be construed to repeal the other by implication, unless they can be reconciled by no mode of interpretation." . . .

So also our own Court in The State v. Rackley, 2 Blackf. 249. The act of January 20, 1824, left it discretionary with the jury to find a verdict of guilty, in criminal cases, without costs. The act of January 30, 1824, expressly provided that, upon every conviction, the officers should be entitled to certain specified fees. The one act, it was held, did not repeal the other. The practical construction given to these acts, sustaining both, was, that upon every trial the costs should follow the conviction; the officers should have their fees, except when the jury expressly found otherwise. Here it will be observed, as in Goldson v. Buck, and as in the case at bar, the prior act was the exception, the latter act the rule. Thus were both acts upheld.

In each of these cases, and the first and last upon penal statutes, too, the seeming repugnance is quite as strong as in the case at bar. In the first example, the affirmative words are as comprehensive as those in the Circuit Court act—all treasons shall be tried according to the course of the common law, to which the strong negative language, "and not otherwise," is superadded. Yet in all these and numerous other parallel cases, scattered through the books, repeal by implication is denied and both statutes upheld. Bac. Ab., Statute, J.; Dwarris 674; Smith Comm., supra.

Judicial reasoning on this subject is, perhaps, more uniform than in almost any other. To ascertain the intent by settled rules of interpretation is the great problem. Thus, Smith on Statutory Construction. Where it is not manifestly the intention of the lawgiver, from the whole system of legislation on the subject, that the latter act should control the former, it shall not be construed to have that effect, even though the words, taken strictly and grammatically, would repeal the former act. Smith Comm., § 757. So, accordingly, Lord Kenyon, one of the most conservative of judges. . . .

Again, all the parts of a statute, and different statutes in pari materia, whether repealed or not, in short, the whole system of legislation on the subject-matter, are to be considered with reference to the intent. . . . For it is to be presumed that a code of statutes relating to one subject was governed by one spirit and policy, and was intended to be consistent and harmonious. 1 Kent 463. Thus, also, the Supreme Court of the United States. If, from a view of the whole law and other laws in pari materia, the evident intent is different from the literal import of the terms employed to express it in a particular part, the intention should prevail, for that is, in fact, the legislative will. United States v. Fisher, 2 Cranch 386. In such cases, some degree of implication will be called in to aid the intent. Durosseau v. United States, 6 Cranch 307. Nor shall a particular thing given in a prior statute in pari materia, be taken away by any subsequent general words. Dwarris 658. But in such case the particular intent is to be considered in the nature of an exception. Id. 658, 765. Or, as Marshall, C. J., states it, the general expressions were used in a particular sense. Adams v. Woods, 2 Cranch 336.

This mode of reasoning in regard to conflicting statutes has the greater significance when, as in the case at bar, the two acts were passed at the same session of the legislature. State v. Rackley, supra. For it is not to be presumed that the assembly would capriciously undo to-day what had been solemnly done yesterday on matters of such vital moment to the public.

Nor is it easy to conceive how, consistently with the reasoning and principles of the authorities cited, the jurisdiction of the Common Pleas over felony, being the particular thing, definitely and minutely pointed out, can be controlled by the general words in the Circuit Court act.

There are other rules of construction recognized in the books, which, at first view, might seem to militate against the jurisdiction claimed. Thus it is said that statutes which give a new remedy, or create a new jurisdiction, ought to receive a strict construction. But the same authority questions its correctness, and limits its application to commissioners, and other inferior officers, exercising summary powers. Dwarris 750.

Another salutary rule, sometimes perverted, is that penal statutes shall receive a strict construction. Dwarris 736. Yet according to the same author, this applies only to the fact and the punishment. Ibid. In the United States v. Morris, 14 Pet. 464. Taney, C. J., while admitting the rule, held, that the evident intention of the legislature ought not to be defeated by an over-strict construction. The rule, says Parker, C. J., does not exclude the application of common sense, in order to avoid an absurdity which the legislature ought not to be presumed to have intended. The Commonwealth v. Loring, 8 Pick. 370; 9 Bac.Ab. 252-3; 1 Kent 462; People v. Utica Insurance Co., 15 Johns. 380; 8 Am.D. 243. Accordingly, Spencer, C. J., in Sickles v. Sharp, 13 Johns. 497.

But in a question not so much affecting persons as it is a seeming conflict between two Courts, to what end should the construction be strict? It is a penal statute, either way. The felony over which both have jurisdiction, is punished to the same extent in both Courts. But, on other grounds, the preponderance seems in favor of the Common Pleas. The very object of that Court as explained in Lindville v. The State, supra, is dispatch and efficiency. The public is every way deeply interested in having prisoners promptly disposed of. So that of the two, the new Court, giving the accused a speedier adjustment of his constitutional rights, and the public a more efficient administration of justice, is entitled to the greater consideration.

Here, then, are two affirmative acts passed at the same session. As to felony, they are in pari materia. The words of both are explicit. It is not surely the first duty of the Courts curtly to announce that the one repeals the other, before the settled rules of construction have been carefully applied, to the end that both may, if possible, stand and have effect.

The practical operation of such a rule would be, it is feared, to repeal by implication a large part of the revision.

It is, therefore, deemed wiser and safer to adhere to the rule laid down by Judge Holman in the earlier days of this Court, (since quoted with approbation by the best elementary writers), that less violence is done to the intention of the legislature by giving a construction which shall support both acts, than there would be to suppose that by one act it was intended to repeal another enacted at the same session. State v. Rackley, 2 Blackf. 249.

Having thus deduced the rule from the adjudicated cases, it seems proper to inquire whether any light is to be obtained from other parts of the revision. . . .

It is believed the revision itself furnishes the very rule of construction contended for. 2 R.S. 339. "The construction of all statutes of this state shall be by the following rules, unless such construction be plainly repugnant to the intent of the legislature, or the context of the same statute." "Words and phrases shall be taken in their plain ordinary sense; technical words in their technical import."

Now taking this all together, it is substantially the rule of construction at common law, only, as we shall see, made still more liberal. 1 Kent 462. In cases of ambiguity or conflict, the Courts are as much bound as ever to resort to the well-settled rules of statutory exposition, to ascertain the intent of the legislature. It is still left, after all, as a matter of intent, whatever words are used. To so expound a statute as, on the one hand, to carry into effect the beneficial reforms contemplated by the lawgiver, and, on the other, not to assume legislative powers by making rather than expounding law, remain now as they have ever been, among the highest and most delicate duties of the judiciary.

The rule of construction, as to whether it shall be strict or liberal, is worthy of special notice. "The foregoing rules of construction and definition of terms shall be in addition to and part of those adopted in the code of civil practice; and, together with those, shall apply to all statutes or acts of the legislature." 2 R.S. 341. So it would seem that in the construction of statutes, penal acts shall not be distinguished from others. The same rule shall apply to all, civil and criminal.

What, then, are the rules adopted in the civil practice, as above alluded to? Among them are the following: "The provisions of this act shall be liberally construed, and shall not be limited by any rules of strict construction." 2 R.S. 223.

The sum of these various and scattered provisions is this: A liberal construction is extended to all statutes, and the plain intent of the legislature respected and carried out. This rule gives efficiency to remedial legislation. On any other principle, a technical judiciary, clinging narrowly to the letter, in disregard of the spirit of the statute, might retard, and even wholly defeat, the most useful and needed reforms.

It but remains to apply to the case at bar the canons of construction thus deduced.

Regarding the two acts in pari materia as to felony, they stand and may be interpreted thus: The Circuit Court shall have original, exclusive jurisdiction of all felony, except as is otherwise provided in the seventeenth and eighteenth sections of the act to establish Common Pleas. Thus may both be upheld.

The jurisdiction of the Common Pleas over felony is different from that of the Circuit Court. The one is purely statutory, dispensing with the grand jury and other common-law appendages. The jurisdiction of the other is according to the course of the common law. These powers severally conferred for different purposes, and to be exercised in a different manner, may well subsist together, and thus both acts be upheld.

The history of the legislature that passed these acts furnishes two remarkably strong facts against the intention to repeal. One of these is the strict observance of the parliamentary law, that an act passed is not to be repealed at the same session. Dwarris 673. This rule was obviously known and respected. For when the assembly of 1851-2, the same which passed the acts in question, wished to dispose of the act in relation to county boards and other enactments passed at an early day, and which were found to be duplicated, or inconsistent with the subsequent revision, it did not leave these conflicting acts in the statute-book, to be repealed by implication, to the embarrassment of the people and the Courts. Nor yet did the assembly violate the parliamentary law by repealing at the close what had been enacted at the beginning of the session. But an act was passed suspending the obnoxious statutes. Laws 1851-2, p. 31.

The second fact in the history of the legislature of 1851-2, relates to the repealing act. It must be conceded that, notwithstanding the parliamentary rule, the assembly had the power to repeal acts passed at the same session. The very claim that there was an implied repeal admits the right to repeal directly. Now, on the 18th of June, 1852, and long after the approval of both the Common Pleas and Circuit Court acts, another act was passed, entitled, "An act to repeal all former acts of the legislature except those therein named." The first section reads: "All laws not enacted at the present session of the general assembly are repealed." Had it been the intention to repeal the seventeenth and eighteenth sections of the Common Pleas act, that intent could have been easily and briefly expressed. That no such repeal is expressed, leaves, says Dwarris, a strong presumption that it was not intended. Dwarris 717. Had the seventeenth and eighteenth sections been obnoxious, we should have found them either suspended in the suspending act, or repealed in the repealing act. Instead of that, we find all the laws enacted during the session carefully excluded from the operation of the repealing act.

If the intention of the law is thus plain, and yet words are used which either in their usual sense or technical import are fatal to that intention, what are the Courts to do? The common-law rule of construction, as deduced from the authorities, and the legislative rule, as prescribed in 2 R.S., chap. 17, supra, make the judicial path plain. In such cases of repugnance between the intent and the language, the Court has only to follow the statutory rule, viz: ordinary words shall not be taken in their usual sense, nor technical words in their technical import; but the Courts shall give the words and phrases used such limited acceptation as shall make the law accord with the manifest intention of the legislature.

If this be judicial legislation, it is such as the common law and the statutes of this state authorize.

The opposite ground combines far more of the elements which define judicial law-making, without the merit of being either remedial or politic. For this Court to divest the Common Pleas of jurisdiction over felony—a jurisdiction so clearly, and upon such weighty considerations of public policy, conferred, is not easily distinguished from the assumption of power to repeal statutes, and repudiate the rules of construction which the coordinate branch had provided.

For these reasons, it is thought that both acts are in force. Passed at the same session, relating to the same subject-matter, and forming parts of the same general system, they require no judicial indulgence to enable them to stand together harmoniously in the revision.

I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of the Common Pleas should be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. The judgment is reversed.

In re COBURN

Supreme Court of California, 1913. 165 Cal. 202, 131 P. 352.

SLOSS, J. The superior court of the county of San Mateo having entered a judgment or order appointing M. J. Hynes guardian of the person and estate of Loren Coburn on the ground of incompetency, the alleged incompetent appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The proceeding was instituted in February, 1908, when Azro A. Coburn, nephew of Loren, filed a petition averring the incompetency of his uncle and praying for the appointment of a guardian. Upon a trial, the court found in favor of the allegations of the petition, and appointed Carl Coburn, the adopted son of a brother of Loren Coburn, guardian of the latter's person and estate. An appeal prosecuted by the alleged incompetent resulted in a reversal by the District Court of Appeal for the First Appellate District of the order appointing a guardian. In re Coburn, 11 Cal.App. 621, 105 P. 924. The present appeals are based upon the result of a second trial of the same issues.

The allegations of the petition, as amended, were as follows: "That said Loren Coburn is unable, unassisted, to properly manage and take care of his said property, and by reason thereof is likely to be deceived and imposed upon by artful or designing persons, and is mentally incompetent to manage his said estate. That he is mentally incompetent to manage his property; and that he is, by reason of old age and physical disability and weakness of mind, unable to take care of himself and manage his property." The court found that all of the allegations of the petition, and the amendment thereto, are true. It further found that at the time of the filing of the original petition "Loren Coburn was, for a long time prior thereto had been, ever since has been, and still is by reason of old age and weakness of mind, unable, unassisted, to properly manage and take care of himself and his property, and by reason thereof likely to be deceived and imposed upon by artful and designing persons"; and that at all the times stated, said Loren Coburn was and is "incapable of taking care of himself and managing his property."

The statutory provisions governing the appointment of guardians of incompetent persons are found in article 2 of chapter 14 of part 3 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 1763, the first section of this article, provides that "when it is represented to the superior court, or a judge thereof, that any person is insane, or from any cause mentally incompetent to manage his property, such court or judge must cause a notice to be given to the supposed insane or incompetent person of the time and place of hearing the case, not less than five days before the time so appointed, and such person, if able to attend, must be produced at the hearing. . . . Section 1764 reads: "If, after a full hearing and examination upon such petition, it appear to the court that the person in question is incapable of taking care of himself and managing his property, such court must appoint a guardian of his person and estate, with the powers and duties in this chapter specified." Both of these sections, in substantially the same form which they now present, were parts of the Code as originally adopted. In 1891 the Legislature added section 1767, which declares that "the phrases 'incompetent,' 'mentally incompetent,' and 'incapable,' as used in this chapter, shall be construed to mean any person, who, though not insane, is, by reason of old age, disease, weakness of mind, or from any other cause, unable, unassisted, to properly manage and take care of himself or his property, and by reason thereof, would be likely to be deceived or imposed upon by artful or designing persons." The appellant contends that the act adding section 1767 to the Code is, in various respects, in conflict with the Constitution and therefore void. For the purpose of upholding the sufficiency of the petition and findings, both of which papers are assailed by the appellant, it is necessary to look to section 1767. . . .

Section 1767 is a statute which purports to define certain terms used in existing sections of the Code. The first point made against the validity of section 1767 is that the act adding the section to the Code is an attempted exercise by the legislative branch of the government of a power belonging exclusively to the judiciary; the power, that is to say, of interpreting a pre-existing statute. The appellant quotes, in support of his position, this passage from Cooley's work on Constitutional Limitations: "If the Legislature would prescribe a different rule for the future from that which the courts enforce, it must be done by statute and cannot be done by a mandate to the courts which leaves the law unchanged, but seeks to compel the courts to construe and apply it, not according to the judicial, but according to the legislative judgment." Const. Lim. (7th Ed.) 137. But the decisions cited in support of this declaration, with one exception (Gov. v. Porter, 5 Humph. [Tenn.] 165), seem, when the facts are examined, to go no further than to deny the power of the Legislature to alter the construction of a statute in such manner as to affect rights existing when the declaratory statute was passed (People v. Board of Supervisors, 16 N.Y. 424; Reiser v. Wm. Tell S. F. Ass'n, 39 Pa. 137; Lambertson v. Hogan, 2 Pa. 22; Lincoln, etc., Ass'n v. Graham, 7 Neb. 173; Union Iron Co. v. Pierce, Fed. Cas. No. 14,367).

The weight of authority supports what we think to be the true rule, i.e., that such declaratory or defining statutes are to be upheld, except with regard to past transactions, as an exercise of the legislative power to enact a law for the future. Immediately following the passage above quoted from Cooley, the learned author says: "But in any case the substance of the legislative action should be followed rather than its form; and if it appears to be the intention to establish by declaratory statute a rule of conduct for the future, the courts should accept and act upon it, without too nicely inquiring whether the mode by which the new rule is established is or is not the best, most decorous, and suitable that could have been adopted." In Stebbins v. Board of Co. Com'rs (C.C.) 4 F. 283, Mr. Justice Miller, sitting in circuit, referred to an act similar to the one before us in these terms: "While it might not be true that rights existing prior to the explanatory or declaratory statute will be affected by that declaratory statute, yet, inasmuch as Congress or any legislative body has a right to pass a law for the future that such a statute shall be held to mean so and so, while it may not affect past transactions, it is equivalent to the passage of a statute of that character for the future." See, also, Stockdale v. Ins. Co., 20 Wall. 323, 22 L.Ed. 348; Singer Mfg. Co. v. McCollock (C.C.) 24 F. 667; State v. Com'rs, 83 Kan. 199, 110 P. 93.

Adopting the view, then, that section 1767 is a valid enactment, there can be no occasion to go beyond its terms to learn what conditions will justify the appointment of a guardian.

The grammatical construction of the section is not above criticism, but defects in this respect, while they may enhance the difficulty of interpreting the enactment, do not impair its binding force.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

STATE v. PARSONS

Supreme Court of Iowa, 1928. 206 Iowa 390, 220 N.W. 328.

Conviction for the crime of bootlegging, resulting in the imposition of sentence and judgment that the defendant pay a fine of $750 and in addition thereto be committed to the county jail of Marshall county, Iowa, for a period of nine months. The defendant appeals. Reversed.

DE GRAFF, J. . . . Assignment of error is predicated on instruction 9 given by the court, in which the statute (section 1922, Code 1924) is substantially quoted that "courts and jurors shall construe" the liquor laws of the state "so as to prevent evasion." We discover no reason why this statute should find a place in the instructions of the court in a case involving an alleged violation of the prohibitory liquor law. The jury has nothing to do with construing the law. That is the function of the court. The Legislature does have power to prescribe legal definitions of its own language, and it may be conceded that when a legislative act embodies a definition, it is binding on the courts. However, the Legislature has no power to direct the judiciary in the interpretation of existing statutes. State v. Schlenker, 112 Iowa, 642, 84 N.W. 698, 51 L.R.A. 347, 84 Am.St.Rep. 360. While a legislative construction of an act is entitled to due consideration from the courts, it is in no sense binding on the courts. Slutts v. Dana, 138 Iowa, 244, 115 N.W. 1115. See, also, 36 Cyc. 1143; 12 C.J. § 813, p. 1102.

If a jury could render any obedience to section 1922, supra, it would have to be on the evidence, and, although the statute law may prescribe rules of evidence, it is not the function of the Legislature to instruct the jury how it shall weigh evidence. We recognize that this statutory provision has frequently found lodgment in the charge given by the trial court in cases involving violation of the liquor law, but this fact does not constitute a justification for the continuance of the use of the challenged instruction. Nor are we unmindful that the instruction given in the instant case was approved by this court in State v. Comer, 198 Iowa, 740, 200 N.W. 185. We would not reverse the instant case on this ground, but we no longer approve, as a matter of practice, the giving of such an instruction.

The judgment entered is reversed (on other grounds)

NOTES

1. The important dictum in the principal case was specifically overruled in State v. Matthes, 210 Iowa 178, 189, 230 N.W. 522 (1930). The court in the Matthes case stated, "We are not concerned at this point with the question of how far, if at all, the legislature may bind the courts in the construction of statutes. We simply have a case where the court told the jury that it was their duty to construe the law so as to prevent evasion." De Graff, J., who wrote the opinion in the Parsons case, dissented on the basis of a lack of constitutional power in the legislature to tell a court how a statute shall be construed. He still leans heavily also on the conception of the jury as a fact finding body with no function construing statutes.

GORIN v. UNITED STATES

Supreme Court of the United States, 1941.
312 U.S. 19, 61 S.Ct. 429, 85 L.Ed. 488.

[The case appears supra, p. 871]

IN RE CAMERON'S ESTATE

Supreme Court of Wisconsin, 1946. 249 Wis. 531, 25 N.W.2d 504.

WICKHEM, JUSTICE. Decedent, an adult single person, was found insane and committed to the Winnebago State Hospital on June 25, 1926. He remained at this institution until August 4, 1938, when he was transferred to the Outagamie County Asylum at Appleton. He remained here until his death on August 17, 1944. Appellant, successor to the Board of Control, filed its claim in the county court against decedent's estate for care and maintenance during the entire period. The court applied the ten-year statute of limitation to the claim and it is this that appellant complains of. The heirs of decedent are two adult brothers. Appellant contends that the claim of the Department of Public Welfare from June 25, 1926 to August 17, 1934, is not barred by the statute of limitations. This requires a study of the applicable statutes and the several decisions that have construed them.

In 1935 sec. 46.10(7) Stats. was created by chapter 336, laws of 1935. This read as follows:

"46.10(7). The actual per capita cost, as defined by rule of the state board of control, of maintenance furnished an inmate of any state institution, or any county institution in which the state is chargeable with all or a part of the inmate's maintenance, may be recovered by the state board of control, or in counties having a population of five hundred thousand or more by the county, from such person, or from his estate, or may be recovered from the husband or wife, father, children or mother of such person. In any such action or proceedings the statutes of limitation shall not be pleaded in defense"

In State Dept. of Public Welfare v. Shirley, 243 Wis. 276, 10 N.W.2d 215 (1943), this court held that sec. 46.10(7) imposed no liability at all but merely authorized recovery of maintenance from relatives; that the liability of relatives was provided for in sec. 49.11; that sec. 46.10(7) merely vests authority for collection in the State Board and prescribes the manner of collection. The 1943 legislature, c. 548, amended sec. 46.10(7) and added the following:

"The legislature intends, and so intended at the time this section was enacted by chapter 336, laws of 1935, to impose, exclusively by this subsection and no other, a liability for care in those institutions to which this subsection has application, upon the person receiving such care, upon his estate, and upon the relatives named herein and upon their estates. The words 'may be recovered' appearing in this subsection are and were intended to impose this liability."

[The Court re-examined the Shirley Case in the light of legislative history and concluded that it was wrongly decided. The Court continued:]

. . . . It has always been regarded as a strong answer to a contention that we should change a construction of a statute that subsequent sessions of the legislature had come and gone without any attempt to amend it. This has been regarded as an indication of legislative concurrence with our interpretation. In this case, however, we have an especially pointed repudiation of the Shirley case at the first legislative session where the matter could be considered and in addition to making the meaning of 46.10(7) Stats. unmistakably clear, the legislature went on to state that it had always been the purpose of the section to impose liability. While the 1943 legislature cannot usurp the function of this court and authoritatively construe a statute enacted by a previous legislature, its immediate and forceful repudiation of a decision is entitled to at least as much weight as has always been given the failure of the legislature to act at all. . . .

Judgment reversed and cause remanded with directions to enter judgment for plaintiff in accordance with this opinion.

NOTES

1. In State ex rel. Johnson v. Broderick, — N.D. —, 27 N.W.2d 849, 866 (1947), the Supreme Court of North Dakota stated and applied the so-called "reenactment rule" as follows: "The rule is well settled that 'where a statute that has been construed by the courts of last resort has been reenacted in the same, or substantially the same, terms the legislature is presumed to have been familiar with its construction, and to have adopted it as a part of the law, unless a contrary intent clearly appears, or a different construction is expressly provided for.' 59 C.J. pp. 1061, 1063."

See Section 3 of this Chapter infra, p. 1088 et seq., concerning the re-enactment rule.

2. In Blumenthal v. United States, 88 F.2d 522 (C.C.A.Minn.1937), an issue was whether the Knox Act of 1909, regulating interstate shipment of alcoholic liquor, was impliedly repealed by the (Volstead) National Prohibition Act passed pursuant to the Eighteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution of 1920. The court concluded its argument on this point as follows (p. 527):

"It is also to be observed that by Act of June 25, 1936, § 8 (18 U.S.C.A. § 390), subsequent to the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act, Congress amended section 240 of the Knox Act. This amendatory act may be considered as a legislative interpretation, and as such has a direct bearing on the legislative intent. It was manifestly the understanding of Congress that the Knox Act had not been repealed; otherwise, there would have been nothing to amend. It is, of course, ultimately the province of the courts to interpret statutes, yet in so doing, they should give effect to the legislative intent, and hence, the legislative interpretation is entitled to consideration. [Citing cases.]

"If we were otherwise in doubt as to whether the Knox Act was repealed by the enactment of the Prohibition Act, this amendment should, we think, be accepted as persuasive evidence of the intention of Congress, and that, in the final analysis, is the province of the courts in construing congressional enactments."

D. The Literal Approach and the Plain Meaning Rule.

WALL v. PFANSCHMIDT

Supreme Court of Illinois, 1914. 265 Ill. 180, 106 N.E. 785.

CARTER, J. Plaintiffs in error filed a bill for the partition of certain real estate, in the circuit court of Adams county, to the June term, 1913. A demurrer thereto was sustained, and the bill, which had been amended, was dismissed for want of equity. Plaintiffs in error elected to abide by their bill as amended and the cause was dismissed at their costs. A writ of error was sued out to review that decree.

The amended bill averred that certain real estate was devised under the will of Christian Abel to his daughter, Matilda, for her natural life and at her death to her children; that said Matilda intermarried with one Charles A. Pfanschmidt and to them were born two children, Ray and Blanche; that said Charles A. owned certain real estate adjoining that devised to his wife, Matilda, all of which the family occupied as a farm, residing on that portion devised to the wife; that on or about September 27, 1912, Ray Pfanschmidt, one of said children, murdered his father, mother, and sister and Emma Kaempfen, a school teacher boarding with them, setting fire to the residence and partly burning the remains of said four persons so killed, and that the order of their respective deaths could not be determined; that said Ray Pfanschmidt had been indicted in the circuit court of Adams county for the murder of said four persons and pleaded not guilty; that under the indictment for the murder of his sister said Ray Pfanschmidt was tried and found guilty and his punishment fixed by verdict of the jury at death; The amended bill in this cause further alleged, that Ray Pfanschmidt could not acquire any estate, right, or title in and to said real estate through his act of murder;

The sole question in dispute is whether he could acquire an interest, by inheritance, in the real estate owned by his father, mother, and sister, who under the pleadings in this cause met their death by his acts intentionally committed.

Our statute on descent provides:

"That estates, both real and personal, of residents and nonresident proprietors in this state dying intestate, shall descend to and be distributed in manner following, to wit: First—to his or her children and their descendants, in equal parts; Second—when there is no child of the intestate, nor descendant of such child, and no widow or surviving husband, and if there is no parent living, then to the brothers and sisters of the intestate, and their descendants." Hurd's Stat.1913, p. 907.

This statute has never been construed by the courts of this state as to the question here involved. Counsel for plaintiffs in error admit that under the literal wording of the statute Ray Pfanschmidt would inherit, but their argument is to the effect that in construing this as well as all other statutes the maxims of the common law must be applied, and that according to those maxims no one can be permitted to take advantage of his own fraud or wrong or acquire property by his own crime; that it must be assumed that the Legislature, in passing the statute of descent, had these maxims in mind, and that the statute should be construed according to such legislative intent; that so construed Ray Pfanschmidt acquired no interest in the estate of his father, mother or sister.

If in a statute there is neither ambiguity nor room for construction, the intention of the Legislature must be held free from doubt. The question as to what the framers of the statute would have done had it been in their minds that a case like the one here under consideration would arise is not the point in dispute. The inquiry is as to what, in fact, they did enact, possibly without anticipating the existence of such facts. This should be determined, not by conjecture as to their meaning, but by the construction of the language used.

"Where there is no ambiguity in the words, there is no room for construction. The case must be a strong one, indeed, which would justify a court in departing from the plain meaning of the words, especially in a penal act, in search of an intention which the words themselves did not suggest." Chief Justice Marshall in United States v. Wiltberger, 5 Wheat. 76, 5 L.Ed. 37.

The statute of descent does not in any way, directly or indirectly, recognize this question. The wrong to be obviated and the remedy for it will guide the court in finding the intention of the Legislature, but this rule of law offers no authority for adding an important exception or limitation to a statute which in clear language states a rule of public policy. . . . Knowledge of the principles of statutory interpretation must be imputed to the Legislature. In plain language our statute of descent designates the persons who shall succeed to the estates of deceased intestates. That statute provides that in cases like this the son and brother shall take the estate. By what authority can this court say that although there is a son and brother he shall not take, but that relatives who under the wording of the statute have no right to these estates shall take? It is impossible for the court to designate different persons to take such estate without a violation of the law. Under the rules for the interpretation of statutes the courts cannot read into a statute exceptions or limitations which depart from its plain meaning. . . . If there were any ambiguity in this statute, or if it were the province of the court to settle this question with respect to the descent of property, then the argument of counsel for plaintiffs in error would have weight. When the Legislature has spoken in clear and unequivocal language the courts are bound thereby. . . . This court has held that the rules of the common law as to descent and devise have been wholly superseded by our statutes on those subjects. The courts have no concern with the wisdom of a statute unless it contravenes some constitutional provision.

Counsel for plaintiffs in error further contend that, if defendant in error obtained the title under the statute of descent, only the naked legal title passed to him; that he cannot hold it for his own benefit, but only as a trustee ex maleficio and in trust for the heirs equitably entitled thereto, as held by the Court of Appeals of New York (Riggs v. Palmer, 115 N.Y. 506, 22 N.E. 188), basing the argument on like principles to those under which devises or bequests procured by fraud have been held constructive trusts, and applied, in equity, to the benefit of the persons equitably entitled thereto. 3 Pomeroy's Eq.Jur. § 1054; Larmon v. Knight, 140 Ill. 232, 29 N.E. 1116, 33 Am.St.Rep. 229; 2 Tiffany on Real Prop. § 505a.

Counsel argue that, even though the grounds of public policy would not justify the construction of the statute of descent as contended for by them, public policy will forbid such a construction or enforcement of the statute as will encourage crime or give a reward for its performance. . . . This court has repeatedly held, in line with the general rule in other jurisdictions, that the public policy of a state must be sought in its constitution, legislative enactments, and judicial decisions. . . . In Collins v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 232 Ill. 44, 83 N.E. 544, . . . we said:

"When the sovereign power of the state has by written constitution declared the public policy of the state on a particular subject, the legislative and judicial departments of the government must accept such declaration as final. When the Legislature has declared, by law, the public policy of the state, the judicial department must remain silent, and if a modification or change in such policy is desired the lawmaking department must be applied to, and not the judiciary, whose function is to declare the law but not to make it. Limiting their actions to questions left open by the Constitution and the statutes, courts may, no doubt, apply the principles of the common law to the requirements of the social, moral, and material conditions of the people of the state and declare what rule of public policy seems best adapted to promote the peace, good order, and general welfare of the community; hence arises the rule that the decisions of its courts are to be investigated in determining the public policy of any government."

Statutes of descent and devise are declarations of public policy of this state on this subject. To hold that defendant in error obtained the naked legal title but only held it as trustee, as contended by counsel for plaintiffs in error, would be to hold that by his crime he forfeited the right to inherit.

Section 11 of article 2 of the Constitution of 1870 provides:

"All penalties shall be proportioned to the nature of the offense, and no conviction shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture of estate."

The Criminal Code, in fixing the punishment for murder, states:

"Whoever is guilty of murder, shall suffer the punishment of death, or imprisonment in the penitentiary for his natural life, or for a term not less than fourteen years." Hurd's Stat.1913, p. 835.

It does not state that the guilty person shall forfeit his right to inherit. In Collins v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., . . . supra, it was said:

These provisions are "clear and unequivocal declarations of the public policy of this state to the effect that no forfeiture of property rights shall follow conviction for crime."

Public policy does not demand this forfeiture, for the demands of public policy are satisfied by the proper execution of laws and the punishment of crime. If other punishment be required, the duty to so provide rests upon the legislative branch of the government. Whether this accords with natural right and justice is not for the courts to decide. The laws of descent do not depend upon the ideas of court or counsel as to justice or natural right but depend entirely upon the provisions of the statute. In re Kirby's Estate, 162 Cal. 91, 121 Pac. 370, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1088, Ann.Cas.1913C, 928.

"The line between legislation and interpretation is clear, and for the courts to declare a forfeiture for crime where the Legislature has remained silent is legislation by judicial tribunals—a subject with which they have no concern." Holdom v. Ancient Order United Workmen, 159 Ill. 619, 43 N.E. 772.

The decree of the circuit court must be affirmed.

Decree affirmed.

NOTES

1. The principal case was distinguished in Ill. Bankers Life Ass'n v. Collins, 341 Ill. 548, 173 N.E. 465 (1930), which construed an insurance contract so as to preclude a murderer beneficiary from reaping its benefits. It was stated that the Wall Case "involved solely the construction of the statute of descent as to real estate." Into the construction of a contract, say the court, "entered . . . the law and public policy of the state as evidenced by the decisions of this court."

2. Observe the varying degrees of reluctance with which the courts adhere to the "plain meaning", the reasons given for refusing to adopt the approach advocated by losing counsel, and the considerations of policy which influenced the courts' choice in the following cases in this Section: Duncan v. Magette, Caminetti v. United States, Chung Fook v. White, American Trucking Ass'ns v. United States (lower court), and cases noted to each.

*E. The Equity of the Statute*REPORTER'S NOTE TO EYSTON v. STUDD

2 Plowden 459, 465; 75 E.R. 688, 695-696 (1574).

. . . It is not the words of the law, but the internal sense of it which makes the law, and our law, (like all others) consists of two parts, viz. of body and soul, the letter of the law is the body of the law, and the sense and reason of the law is the soul of the law.

. . . And the law may be resembled to a nut, which has a shell and a kernel within, the letter of the law represents the shell, and the sense of it the kernel, and as you will be no better for the nut if you make use only of the shell, so you will receive no benefit by the law, if you rely only upon the letter, and as the fruit and profit of the nut lies in the kernel, and not in the shell, so the fruit and profit of the law consists in the sense more than in the letter. And it often happens that when you know the letter, you know not the sense, for sometimes the sense is more confined and contracted than the letter, and sometimes it is more large and extensive. And equity, which in Latin is called equitas, enlarges or diminishes the letter according to its discretion.

. . . And this correction of the general words is much used in the law of England. . . .

NOTE

In the course of his opinion in Guiseppi v. Walling, 144 F.2d 608, 616, n. 15a, Frank, J., notes that Aristotle, "in his remarks on 'equity,' said that 'all law is couched in general terms, but there are some cases upon which it is impossible to pronounce correctly in general terms. Accordingly, where a general statement is necessary, but such a statement cannot be correct, the law embraces the majority of cases, although it does not ignore the element of error. Nor is it the less correct on this account; for the error lies not in the law, nor in the legislature, but in the nature of the case. For it is plainly impossible to pronounce with complete accuracy upon such a subject matter as human action. Wherever then the terms of the law are general, but the particular case is an exception to the general law, it is right, where the legislator's rule is inadequate or erroneous in virtue of its generality, to rectify the defect which the legislator himself, if he were present, and had he known it, would have rectified in legislating . . . This is in fact the nature of the equitable; it is rectification of law where it fails through generality . . . For where the thing to be measured is indefinite the rule must be indefinite . . . ' Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. V, Ch. 10, 1137b, 13-31. "The equitable seems to be just and equity is a kind of justice, but goes beyond the written law. This margin is left by legislators, sometimes voluntarily, sometimes involuntarily; involuntarily when the point escapes notice, voluntarily when they are unable to lay down a definition, and yet it is necessary to lay down an absolute rule; also in cases where inexperience makes it hard to define . . . ; for life would not be long enough for a person to enumerate the case.' Rhetoric, Bk. I, Ch. 13."

BAKER v. JACOBS

Supreme Court of Vermont, 1891. 64 Vt. 197, 23 A. 588.

THOMPSON, J. In the county court the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff. Immediately after the verdict was returned the plaintiff directed the deputy-sheriff who had had charge of the jury to get them all together at the American House in Hyde Park, saying that he wanted "to pay the cigars." Thereupon the deputy-sheriff informed some of the jury that the plaintiff was going to treat, and several of the jury soon after met the plaintiff at the American House, and were treated by him with cigars furnished and paid for by him. At the same term the verdict was rendered the defendant moved to set it aside on account of the plaintiff's having thus furnished several of the jurors with cigars by way of treat. The facts not being contradicted, the county court held, as a matter of law and not as a matter of discretion, that the case was within R.L. § 997, and set the verdict aside and granted a new trial, to which holding of the court the plaintiff excepted.

By R.L. § 997, it is provided that "if a party obtaining a verdict in his favor shall, during the term of the court in which such verdict is obtained, give to any of the jurors in the cause, knowing him to be such, any victuals or drink, or procure the same to be done, by way of treat, either before or after such verdict, on proof thereof being made the verdict shall be set aside and a new trial granted." The determination of this case depends upon the construction to be given to this section. In ascertaining the intent of the legislature in enacting R.L. § 997, we are aided by the trend of previous legislation on this subject. The first act relating to it was passed November 1, 1791, and was entitled, "An act to prevent undue influencing of jurors," and was as follows: "Whereas, the very pernicious practice of treating jurors by parties in litigation before the courts of law within this state has become prevalent by the party recovering, which tends much to the corruption of the manners of the jurors, and is often subversive of justice by giving an undue bias, therefore, to prevent such evil practices in the future, it is hereby enacted by the general assembly of the state of Vermont that if any person obtaining a verdict in his favor in any court in this state shall, during the session of the said court in which such verdict is obtained, give to any of the jurors in said cause, knowing him or them to be such, any victuals or drink, or procure the same to be done, by way of treat, whether before or after such verdict, on due proof thereof being made, it shall be sufficient reason for arrest of judgment in said cause." By an act passed March 2, 1797, the provisions of this act of November 1, 1791, were re-enacted in the same words, with the exception of the change that such treating "shall be sufficient reason to set aside the verdict, and award a new trial in such cause," (Tolman's Comp. p. 82, § 71;) and this continued to be the law until the enactment of R.L. § 997, in 1880. We thus see that the constant tendency of our legislation on this subject has been to make the law more stringent against the evil sought to be remedied by the act of November 1, 1791, and more efficient to suppress it.

It is contended on the part of the plaintiff that cigars do not come within the meaning of "victuals or drink," as used in R.L. § 997, and hence the treating of the jury by the plaintiff with cigars is not within the prohibition of the law. We do not deem it necessary to decide whether tobacco falls within the strict meaning of the terms "victuals or drink," as has been ingeniously argued by the defendant's counsel. In construing a statute of this kind, as was said in Ryegate v. Wardsboro, 30 Vt. 746, we are to ". . . ascertain the true meaning of the legislature, though the meaning so ascertained conflict with the literal sense of the word." In that case the court quoted with approval from an old book the following summary of the rules of construing statutes: "In some cases the letter of an act of parliament is restrained by an equitable construction; in others, it is enlarged; in others, the construction is contrary to the letter. In order to form a right judgment, whether a case be within the equity of a statute, it is a good way to suppose the law-maker present, and that you have asked him this question: 'Did you intend to comprehend this case?' Then you must give yourself such answer as you imagine he, being an upright and reasonable man, would have given. If this be that he did mean to comprehend it, you may safely hold the case to be within the equity of the statutes; for while you do no more than he would have done you do not act contrary to the statute, but in conformity thereto." We think the rule thus laid down in Ryegate v. Wardsboro is the true rule of construction to be adopted in this case. . . . We think the furnishing a juror with a cigar by way of treat is as much within the true intent and spirit of the statute as the treating him with a glass of whisky. Indeed, among a large class of people, in treating, cigars are now given and received instead of intoxicating liquors. We hold that the treating of the jurors by the plaintiff as stated was clearly within the provisions of R.L. § 997, and that as a matter of law the court below was bound to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial. Judgment affirmed and cause remanded for a new trial.

IN RE TYLER'S ESTATE

HOLCOMB, J. From an order in probate proceedings setting over to respondent $3,000 worth of property out of the separate estate of his deceased wife under the provisions of section 1473, Rem.Comp.Stats., as amended by section 2, c. 142, of the Laws of 1923, entered in the court below, this appeal is taken.

On November 10, 1924, respondent murdered his wife. On January 5, 1925, Ida S. Spangler was appointed administratrix of the estate of Anna L. Tyler, deceased. Prior to the filing of the petition by respondent to have the property set over to him in lieu of homestead, he had been tried, convicted, sentenced, and committed to life imprisonment. An affirmative answer to the petition was filed by appellants alleging the above facts and that respondent killed his wife for the purpose of securing the property. A demurrer to the affirmative answer was sustained.

The question to decide is whether an uxoricide killing his wife for the purpose of getting possession of her separate property is entitled to the benefit of the above-cited statute. In that statute it is provided:

"If it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the court that no homestead has been claimed in the manner provided by law, either prior or subsequent to the death of the person whose estate is being administered, then the court," upon such notice as may be determined by the court, "upon being satisfied that the funeral expenses, expenses of last sickness and of administration have been paid or provided for, and upon petition for that purpose, shall award and set off to the surviving spouse, if any, property of the estate, either community or separate, not exceeding the value of three thousand dollars ($3,000). . . . The order or judgment of the court making the award or awards provided for in this section shall be conclusive and final, except on appeal and except for fraud. The awards in this section provided shall be in lieu of all homestead provisions of the law and of exemptions."

By the express terms of this statute the apparent duty of the court is to award and set off to the surviving spouse the amount of property therein mentioned in lieu of homestead provisions of the law and all exemptions. The only exception provided for in the statute is that of fraud. But the apparent duty above stated must be construed in connection with other statutory provisions and principles in such a case as this. His honor, the trial judge, rendered a very able judicial opinion upon this question, which, indeed, constitutes a brochure upon the subject. Nor is he to be criticized for accepting the one statute at its face value and feeling fettered thereby, for it is a fact that the majority of about 14 jurisdictions which have considered this and analogous questions sustain him.

It is so offensive to good conscience, repugnant to justice, and revolting to the mind of every right-thinking person that one should come into court with bloody hands and receive as it were a reward for his iniquity that we cannot conceive that the Legislature composed of persons of good sense and integrity should ever have intended, in enacting the statute and its amendment, that such consummation could be accomplished. It must be true that such a state of facts as appear in this case was not in the mind of the Legislature at the time the statutes were passed.

It is argued on behalf of respondent, in effect, with which the trial court agreed, that the courts must give effect to the language of the statute as written, it being plain and unambiguous; that to construe this statute so that it would provide that one as in the present case should not benefit by his own crime would be to judicially interpret into the statute a provision not there found. It is also declared that it cannot be said that the Legislature did not have in mind the making of exceptions, because it provided against fraud.

We are compelled to admit that a majority of the courts which have passed upon similar questions have held that the court has no power to write into an unambiguous law an exception which would prevent one from benefiting by his criminal act, when the Legislature has not so provided. Some of the cases which have been examined have dealt with statutes upon insurance policies where the beneficiary by homicide killed the insured so as to more speedily come into the money. Others have been upon statutes of inheritance or descent, where one has killed a person whose property had been willed to, or would descend to him, in order more speedily to come into the estate.

The New York Court of Appeals decided in Riggs v. Palmer, 115 N. Y. 506, 22 N.E. 188, 5 L.R.A. 340, that a murderer cannot take there, as legatee or heir, the estate of one whom he has murdered for the purpose of obtaining the property. It was well observed:

"Besides, all laws, as well as all contracts, may be controlled in their operation and effect by general, fundamental maxims of the common law. No one shall be permitted to profit by his own fraud, or to take advantage of his own wrong, or to found any claim upon his own iniquity, or to acquire property by his own crime. These maxims are dictated by public policy, have their foundation in universal law administered in all civilized countries, and have nowhere been superseded by statutes. . . . These maxims, without any statute giving them force or operation, frequently control the effect and nullify the language of wills. . . . Here there was no certainty that this murderer would survive the testator, or that the testator would not change his will, and there was no certainty that he would get this property if nature was allowed to take its course. He therefore murdered the testator expressly to vest himself with the estate. Under such circumstances, what law, human or divine, will allow him to take the estate and enjoy the fruits of his crime?"

And so in the case at bar, under the allegations of the petition, the murderer killed his wife so that he could possess himself of her property. The Legislature, thinking, of course, of the most common acts and conduct of mankind, provided only the exception for fraud, but is it to be supposed that, when providing against fraud as an exception in which the award should not be granted, it had in mind that the much blacker act and crime, homicide, should not bar one from taking the property as a homestead, while a mere fraud should? Such a supposition is unthinkable.

An English case (Cleaver v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Ins. Co., 1 Q. B. 147), a case interesting also because it grew out of the famous Florence Maybrick Case, held that the trust created by the insurance policy in favor of the wife under the English Married Woman's Property Act, was incapable of being performed by reason of Mrs. Maybrick's crime, and that the insurance money became a part of the estate of the insured.

In giving judgment, Lord Esher, M. R., said:

"Applying the rule of public policy to this construction of the section the wife here has, by her crime, rendered the trust in her favor incapable of performance. It must therefore be treated as if it did not exist."

Fry, L. J., in giving judgment, said that:

"It appears to me that no system of jurisprudence can with reason include amongst the rights which it enforces rights directly resulting to the person asserting them from the crime of that person. If no action can arise from fraud, it seems impossible to suppose that it can arise from felony or misdemeanor. . . . This principle of public policy, like all such principles, must be applied to all cases to which it can be applied without reference to the particular character of the right asserted or the form of its assertion."

A similar question arose from a devise by will by a testator who was killed by his beneficiary, reported in 24 Ont.Rep. 132. It was there held that by his felonious act in killing his wife, although the killing was manslaughter and not murder, the husband had absolutely precluded himself from obtaining any benefit under her will or out of her estate. This decision was affirmed in that respect by the Supreme Court of Canada, in 24 Can.Sup.Ct.Rep. 650. . . .

To allow respondent to reap the reward of his intentional homicide by granting him the separate property of his murdered wife is so utterly opposed to justice, good conscience, morals, and the maxims of the common law which are a part of the law of the land in force in this state that we are utterly unable to assent thereto.

The judgment is reversed, with instructions to overrule the demurrer to appellant's answer to respondent's petition, receive evidence in support of the answer, and proceed further in accordance herewith.

ASKREN, J. (dissenting). The majority opinion is a splendid exposition of what exceptions should have been placed in the statute. But the failure to place them there affords us no ground for supplying the deficiency. It may be, as the opinion says, offensive to good conscience to allow a guilty person to obtain the benefits of the statute, but I confess that the shock to my conscience is greater at the attempt of the court to legislate an exception into the statute.

As long as the Constitution provides that the Legislature alone shall enact laws for the people of the state, I shall deny that the court possesses that right.

NOTE

The principal case was summarily distinguished in In re Welch's Estate, 200 Wash. 686, 94 P.2d 758 (1930). After noting the holding in the case and the fact that the statute concerned had been amended so as to coincide with it, the court said, "Without further discussion of the cited case, we think neither the facts nor the reasons assigned for the decision applicable to the instant case," and went on to hold that a statute creating an award to the surviving spouse in lieu of homestead rights gave an absolute right in spite of countervailing equities. There is language in the case tending contra to the ideas of the principal case.

DUNCAN v. MAGETTE

Supreme Court of Texas, 1860. 25 Tex. 245.

This was a suit brought on the 28th day of March, 1857, by John J. Magette against John Duncan, for the sum of $730, with interest thereon from the 1st day of March, 1856, the date of the alleged promise. The defendant demurred to the petition, and answered to the facts by a general denial, and pleaded that the plaintiff, on the 9th day of August, 1856, whilst acting as his overseer, wantonly, and without lawful excuse, killed a certain slave of the defendant, of the value of $1500, "which he pleads in reconvention," and prayed for judgment for the same.

ROBERTS, J.: The defendant pleaded as an equitable offset, that Magette being his overseer, without any just cause, killed one of his (defendant's) slaves of the value of fifteen hundred dollars; and that said Magette was a transient person, and had no visible means, within the knowledge and belief of the defendant, sufficient to satisfy the said damage done to the defendant by said tort.

This is hardly a sufficient allegation of insolvency, or of his nonresidence. Admitting it was, we do not think the plea a good one. Our statute prescribes "that when any suit shall be commenced and prosecuted, in any court within this republic, for any debt due by judgment, bond, bill, or otherwise, the defendant shall have liberty, upon trial thereof, to make all the discounts he can against such debt; and upon proof thereof, the same shall be allowed in court." Again: "and when the defendant may have a claim against the plaintiff, similar in its nature [but they need not be of the same degree] to that of plaintiff, he shall be permitted to file in his answer a plea of reconvention, setting forth the amount due him," etc. And again: "that if plaintiff's cause of action be brought on a claim of unliquidated or uncertain damages founded on a tort or breach of contract, the defendant shall not be permitted to set-off or discount any debt due him by the plaintiff; and if the suit be founded on a certain demand, the defendant shall be permitted to set-off unliquidated or uncertain damages, founded on a tort or breach of covenant on the part of plaintiff." Hart. Dig., Arts. 606, 609, 610.

These clauses of the statute contain the general power given to the court to allow discounts and set-offs, with the limitations and restrictions of that power.

The case now before us falls clearly under the last restriction. The plaintiff has sued for a certain demand—seven hundred and thirty dollars, loaned money, and defendant attempts to set-off against this, uncertain damages founded on a tort—committed by killing his slave. This restriction has been modified somewhat, by the construction given to the word reconvention, used in this statute, in cases where the demand and the tort were a part of, or grew out of, or were connected with, the same transaction. (Walcot v. Hendrick, 6 Tex. Rep., 406.) This was by giving to that term the effect given to it in the civil law of Spain, by its being used in our statute,—it being a word peculiar to the civil law. We think this construction has been sufficiently liberal already.

It is now proposed to add another qualification or exception to this restriction by preventing its operation in case the plaintiff be insolvent. This exception is not contained in the statute; nor is such a case embraced within the scope of the general power granted to the court to allow discounts. (Art. 606.) And therefore if it be exercised by the court, it must derive the power from some source, other than the statute. A court of equity will set-off mutual demands, which cannot be set-off under the statute, in case of insolvency of the plaintiff. This is from an inherent power of a court of equity, independent of the statute allowing off-sets. It furnishes a remedy by permitting a cross action. This is a remedy in aid of the law, and in advancement of its spirit, in cases where its letter might permit an irreparable injury. But can it be truly said that a court of equity would be granting a remedy in aid of the law and in the advancement of its spirit by extending it to a case positively prohibited by the law? Our law positively prohibits the application of a set-off arising upon a tort to a certain demand. The cases of uncertain damages relied on by defendant arose out of contracts not torts. Such is not now regarded to be the province of a court of equity. If it be said that the law did not contemplate a case of insolvency in this provision, it may be answered, that upon the same reasoning every rule of law, however absolute or unqualified, may have implied exceptions annexed to it until it will almost cease to be a rule at all.

We think then that the statute prohibits this plea, and that the court below did not err in overruling it.

The counsel for the appellee applied for a rehearing.

ROBERTS, J.: Although the counsel on both sides rely upon the rules of law as respectively presented by them, it is obvious that the great argument, whether expressly developed or not, by which those rules are sought to be discovered, interpreted and enforced, consists in an appeal to the sense of justice of the court. The opinion of the court in this case does not yield to the force of that appeal. Having written it, I avail myself of the opportunity afforded by this application, to present my own views upon the foundation and force of this appeal to the sense of justice of the court, whether used as an influencing consideration, in interpreting and enforcing the rules of law, or directly urged as the basis of judicial action. A frequent recurrence to first principles is absolutely necessary in order to keep precedents within the reason of the law.

Justice is the dictate of right, according to the common consent of mankind generally, or of that portion of mankind who may be associated in one government, or who may be governed by the same principles and morals.

Law is a system of rules, conformable, as must be supposed, to this standard, and devised upon an enlarged view of the relations of persons and things, as they practically exist. Justice is a chaotic mass of principles. Law is the same mass of principles, classified, reduced to order, and put in the shape of rules, agreed upon by this ascertained common consent. Justice is the virgin gold of the mines, that passes for its intrinsic worth in every case, but is subject to a varying value, according to the scales through which it passes. Law is the coin from the mint, with its value ascertained and fixed, with the stamp of government upon it which insures and denotes its current value.

The act of moulding justice into a system of rules detracts from its capacity of abstract adaptation in each particular case; and the rules of law, when applied to each case, are most usually but an approximation to justice. Still, mankind have generally thought it better to have their rights determined by such a system of rules, than by the sense of abstract justice, as determined by any one man, or set of men, whose duty it may have been to adjudge them.

Whoever undertakes to determine a case solely by his own notions of its abstract justice, breaks down the barriers by which rules of justice are erected into a system, and thereby annihilates law.

A sense of justice, however, must and should have an important influence upon every well organized mind in the adjudication of causes. Its proper province is to superinduce an anxious desire to search out and apply, in their true spirit, the appropriate rules of law. It cannot be lost sight of. In this, it is like the polar star that guides the voyager, although it may not stand over the port of destination.

To follow the dictates of justice, when in harmony with the law, must be a pleasure; but to follow the rules of law, in their true spirit, to whatever consequences they may lead, is a duty. This applies as well to rules establishing remedies, as to those establishing rights. These views will, of course, be understood as relating to my own convictions of duty, and as being the basis of my own judicial action.

GREENVILLE BASEBALL v. BEARDEN

FISHBURNE, JUSTICE. At the 1941 session of the General Assembly the following Act was passed (Acts 1941, 42 St. at large, page 307):

"Section 1: . . . For a period of two years after the effective date of this Act, it shall be lawful to exhibit publicly motion pictures, athletic sports and musical concerts and to engage therein from and after two p. m. on Sunday in counties wherein the United States Government has established and maintains permanent or temporary Army Forts, Naval or Marine bases; Provided, that the exhibition of such motion pictures and engagements in athletic sports is lawful on other week days. Provided, However, that the theatre operator shall first obtain from the town or city council a special permit to run his theatre on Sunday. The terms of this Act shall in no way conflict with any Sunday evening church service.

"Section 2: Repeal.—All laws or parts of laws in anywise inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed." (Emphasis added.)

The primary question for determination presented in this action, which by permission was instituted in the original jurisdiction of this Court, is whether an army air base comes within the purview of the statute. The specific issue has to do with the air base located at Greenville. The plaintiff seeks injunctive relief restraining the sheriff of Greenville County and his duly authorized deputies from in any manner prohibiting or interfering with the plaintiff in the exhibition of baseball games for public amusement in Greenville County after 2 o'clock P. M., on Sundays, and from arresting plaintiff's employees, baseball players and baseball umpires engaged in and officiating at such baseball games. Under the order of this Court a temporary restraining order was issued pending the final decision of the case.

It appears that on Sunday afternoon, April 26, 1942, in Greenville, a baseball game was commenced between a team of the plaintiff and a team from Macon, Georgia, both teams being members of the South Atlantic League. The sheriff of Greenville County and his deputies stopped the game, and arrested the umpires upon a charge of violating Section 1733 of the 1932 Code. It is alleged and is admitted that the sheriff has threatened and intends to stop all future games played on Sunday, and to arrest those participating therein. The plaintiff sets forth that unless the sheriff and his deputies are restrained, it will suffer irreparable property loss and damage; and that the steps threatened by the respondents if carried into execution will involve numerous lawsuits, will result in a multiplicity of successive prosecutions, and will effectually deprive the plaintiff of its property and property rights without due process of law.

It is contended by the plaintiff that Section 1733, under which the respondents acted, has been repealed by the Act of 1941, and is clearly void in the County of Greenville. Section 1733 proscribes and prohibits public sports in this State on Sunday, and a violation of the statute is made a misdemeanor.

The respondents take the position that the Act of 1941 should be given a literal and narrow construction. They say that an army "fort" does not include an army "air base."

It often happens that the true intention of the Legislature, though obvious, is not expressed by the language employed in a statute when that language is given its literal meaning. In such cases, the carrying out of the legislative intention, which is the prime and sole object of all rules of construction, can be accomplished only by departure from the literal interpretation of the language used. Hence, Courts are not always confined to the literal meaning of a statute; the real purpose and intent of the lawmakers will prevail over the literal import of the words.

Modern authorities generally favor the interpretation of statutes according to the natural and obvious signification of the wording, without resort to subtle and refined construction for the purpose either of limiting or extending their operation. And Courts will reject the ordinary meaning of the words used in a statute however plain it may be, when to accept such meaning would defeat the plain legislative intent.

It is a familiar canon of construction that a thing which is in the intention of the makers of a statute is as much within the statute as if it were within the letter. It is also an old and well-established rule that words ought to be subservient to the intent, and not the intent to the words.

It is argued that the army air base at Greenville does not justify the application and operation of the Act in Greenville County, because an army "air base" does not come literally within the wording of the 1941 Act. In our opinion, however, an army air base does plainly come within the intent, purpose, spirit and design of the Act.

When the 1941 statute was adopted by the Legislature, the Congress of the United States had passed the Selective Service Act, 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix § 301 et seq., which called to the colors millions of young men. This Act was passed to meet the grave emergency which then and now confronts this nation. The United States Government by virtue of the Selective Service Act embarked upon a vast undertaking, all of which was well known to the General Assembly of this State,—the organization and training of an armed force of tremendous proportions. Upon induction into the service, these men were assigned and are still being assigned to the Army, the Navy, the Marine Corps, the Air Corps, and other branches of the service too numerous to mention. Training centers were established by the Federal Government in practically every State in the Union. These centers are designated as Forts, Camps, Naval and Marine Bases, Air Field, Airports, Air Bases, and words of like import and terminology. But regardless of name or particular designation, these centers are places generally devoted to the garrison and training of men in the art and science of modern warfare—whether they be soldiers, sailors, marines, air pilots or bombardiers.

We have in South Carolina several of these training centers, of which the Court takes judicial notice: Fort Jackson, formerly Camp Jackson, near Columbia; Camp Croft, at Spartanburg; the Marine and Naval Bases at Charleston and Parris Island; Air Bases in Richland and Sumter Counties. We may safely assume that the Legislature was fully cognizant of the history and conditions of the time, and that the 1941 Act was passed in the light of a realistic situation. The lawmakers were obviously confronted with the problem of legally allowing to the thousands of troops at all training centers reasonable recreation and diversion on Sunday afternoons,—relaxation from the hard and continuous work of their daily routine.

To construe the Act as contended for by the respondents would do violence to the evident intention of the General Assembly. We would have to hold that the lawmakers were more concerned with the recreational welfare of the troops at Fort Jackson than they were with the soldiers at Camp Croft, and that they completely ignored the exact similarity of situation and condition of those men undergoing training in aviation at the army air bases in Sumter and Richland County. If those in authority should tomorrow change the designation of Fort Jackson, to Camp Jackson then to be logical, in accordance with the contention of respondents, the thousands of soldiers now at Fort Jackson would ipso facto be prevented from attending athletic sports on Sunday in Richland County, because the mere change of name would take Richland County out of the operation of the Act.

It was held in the case of Hull v. Hull, 2 Strob.Eq. 174, 21 S.C.Eq. 175:

"Where the words of a Statute, in their primary meaning, do not expressly embrace the case before the Court, and there is nothing in the context to attach a different meaning to them, capable of expressly embracing it; the Court cannot extend the Statute, by construction, to that case, unless it falls so clearly within the reasons of the enactment as to warrant the assumption that it was not specifically enumerated among those described by the Legislature, only because it may have been deemed unnecessary to do so. [Emphasis added.]

"Where the general intention of the Statute embraces the specific case, though it be not enumerated, the Statute may, nevertheless, be applied to it by an equitable construction, in promotion of the evident design of the Legislature. But where this is done, it is always presupposed that such a case was within their general contemplation, or purview, when the Statute was enacted by them; for if the case be omitted in the Statute because not foreseen or contemplated, it is a casus omis-sus, and the Court, having no legislative power, cannot supply the defects of the enactment."

It seems to us too clear for argument that the present case falls clearly within the reasons of the enactment and warrants the assumption that an army "air base" was not specifically enumerated only because the lawmakers deemed it unnecessary. By an equitable construction, "air base" must be deemed included, although not enumerated, in promotion of the evident design and purpose of the Legislature.

Included in the record and attached to the return of the respondents are affidavits from several State Senators who were members of the State Senate when the Act of 1941 was adopted, which purport to show the construction placed by them upon the Bill in the course of its passage.

It is a settled principle in the interpretation of statutes that even where there is some ambiguity or uncertainty in the language used, resort cannot be had to the opinions of legislators or of others concerned in the enactment of the law, for the purpose of ascertaining the intent of the Legislature. . . .

Another question presented by the respondents, a discussion of which we deferred, is that the Greenville Air Base is not yet established or maintained in Greenville County. It will be recalled that the 1941 statute uses the words, "established and maintains permanent or temporary Army Forts," etc. . . . Unquestionably, the air base site has been established, and the air base project is nearing completion. But under the recited facts, we are unable to say, in the light of the 1941 Act, that the Greenville Army Air Base has yet been established and is being maintained as an air base. We do not think that it is, and for this reason alone a permanent injunction will not be issued at this time as prayed for in the complaint. Therefore, the temporary restraining order heretofore issued is vacated and discharged.

Contrary to the contention of the respondents, we are of the opinion that the plaintiff lacked an adequate remedy at law, and was warranted in bringing this suit in the court of equity.

Injunction denied.

NOTE

In In re Englewood Mfg. Co., 28 F.Supp. 653 (D.C.Tenn.1939), the court, in refusing to depart from the literal meaning to meet what it assumed to be the "equities" of the case, said (pp. 655-656): ". . . It must be remembered that an act of a legislative body is a mandate from the people, which is, in theory at least, promulgated for the greatest good for the greatest number. The Courts have no right to change legislation in a given case even though the Court might feel that the equities are not fully met."

F. The Mischief Rule Approach

HEYDON'S CASE

Exchequer, 1584. 3 Co. 7a, 76 E.R. 637.

And it was resolved by them, that for the sure and true interpretation of all statutes in general (be they penal or beneficial, restrictive or enlarging of the common law,) four things are to be discerned and considered:—

- 1st. What was the common law before the making of the Act.
- 2nd. What was the mischief and defect for which the common law did not provide.
- 3rd. What remedy the Parliament hath resolved and appointed to cure the disease of the commonwealth.

And, 4th. The true reason of the remedy. And then the office of all the Judges is always to make such construction as shall suppress the mischief, and advance the remedy, and to suppress subtle inventions and evasions for continuance of the mischief, and proprivato commodo, and to add force and life to the cure and remedy, according to the true intent of the makers of the Act, pro bono publico. And it was said, that in this case the common law was, that religious and ecclesiastical persons might have made leases for as many years as they pleased, the mischief was that when they perceived their houses would be dissolved, they made long and unreasonable leases: now the stat. of 31 Hen. 8, doth provide the remedy, and principally for such religious and ecclesiastical houses which should be dissolved after the Act (as the said college in our case was) that all leases of any land, whereof any estate or interest for life or years was then in being, should be void; and their reason was, that it was not necessary for them to make a new lease so long as a former had continuance; and therefore the intent of the Act was to avoid doubling of estates, and to have but one single estate in being at a time; for doubling of estates implies in itself deceit, and private respect, to prevent the intention of the Parliament. And if the copyhold estate for two lives, and the lease for eighty years shall stand together, here will be doubling of estates simul & semel, which will be against the true meaning of Parliament. . . .

SAMUEL E. THORNE, THE EQUITY OF A STATUTE

31 Illinois Law Review 202, 214-215, 217 (1936).

. . . We come finally to the celebrated rules in Heydon's Case. They are not new—Plowden had anticipated them years earlier—but in the light of the tyrannically strict theory of interpretation we have sketched above they are revealed in their true light. They represent an effort to substitute Sinnauslegung for the mechanical Wortauslegung that was current judicial theory. They are phrased in very wide terms, and on their face may seem to envisage the idyllic picture they are said to describe. But that picture is brought by the words only to a modern mind. Their kernel lies in the fourth rule—"the true reason of the remedy"—the purpose of the remedy—the Sinn of the remedy. The rules cannot be taken anachronistically as an early effort to inculcate in judges a view that the statute revealed an attitude that the appropriate exercise of judicial power permitted courts to advance. Courts had not yet reached the stage of looking beyond a statute's words. Two hundred and fifty years will elapse before Baron Parke enunciates his golden rule of statutory interpretation, narrow as it is. The resolutions in Heydon's Case are instead much closer to what courts were groping toward by means of the equity of the statute: and understanding of the ratio legis rather than the ratio verborum, an effort to make the interpretation of statutes, whether they be phrased in the singular or plural, something more than merely a grammatical exercise. The words, and not their sense, had heretofore absorbed complete attention: Heydon's Case points toward another side, and gives a rule of thumb for illuminating the words by reference to that which they are to do. The choice is not the modern one between what a statute said and what a statute intended to do, but rather between what it said in abstract, in vacuo, so to speak, and what it intended to do. It is needless, as Professor Plucknett has pointed out in another connection, to pretend that it is easy to think in these unfamiliar dimensions, and it may be urged that the distinction put forward here is a distinction without a difference. Nevertheless we think it one of much importance and one too frequently overlooked. . . .

Prior to Heydon's Case we find no effort to extend statutes (except those in affirmation of an already existing common law rule) beyond their literal word content in the light of what they were intended to do. Heydon's Case itself extends a statute only slightly, and that in view of an apparent and exceptionally clear ratio legis. After the case we similarly can find no insistence upon purpose distinguished from words: the meaning of the statute continues to be gathered from its words as they stand, and the process of interpretation is confined to the grammatical or literal meaning of the text.. . .

NOTE

In Allen, "Law in the Making", 3rd ed. (1939) the author states at p. 378, f.n. 1: "Thus Byles, J., in Shuttleworth v. Le Fleming (1865), 687, 703: 'I suppose "within the equity" means the same thing as "within the mischief" of the statute' (which scilicet, was not Plowden's meaning)."

NASHVILLE & K. R. Co. v. DAVIS

Supreme Court of Tennessee, 1902. 78 S.W. 1050.

WILKES, J. This is an action for damages against the railroad company for running over and killing three geese of the value of $1.50. The owner of the geese lived about one mile from the railroad, but permitted them to run at large, and they went upon the railroad track near a public crossing. The engineer blew the whistle and rang the bell for the crossing, but there is no proof that he rang the bell or sounded the alarm for the geese. Whether the geese knew of this failure to whistle for them does not appear. We think there is no evidence of recklessness or common-law negligence shown in the case, and the only question is whether a goose is an animal or obstruction in the sense of the statute (section 1574, subsec. 4, Shannon's Compilation), which requires the alarm whistle to be sounded, and brakes put down, and every possible means employed to stop the train and prevent an accident when an animal or obstruction appears on the track. It is evident that this provision is designed, not only to protect animals on the track, but also the passengers and employes upon the train from accidents and injury. It would not seem that a goose was such an obstruction as would cause the derailment of a train, if run over. It is true, a goose has animal life, and, in the broadest sense is an animal; but we think the statute does not require the stopping of trains to prevent running over birds, such as geese, chickens, ducks, pigeons, canaries, or other birds that may be kept for pleasure or profit. Birds have wings to move them quickly from places of danger, and it is presumed that they will use them (a violent presumption, perhaps, in the case of a goose, an animal which appears to be loath to stoop from its dignity to even escape a passing train). But the line must be drawn somewhere, and we are of the opinion that the goose is a proper bird to draw it at. We do not mean to say that in the case of recklessness and common-law negligence there might not be a recovery for killing geese, chickens, ducks, or other fowls, for that case is not presented. Snakes, frogs, and fishing worms, when upon railroad tracks, are, to some extent, obstructions; but it was not contemplated by the statute that for such obstructions as these trains should be stopped, and passengers delayed.

We are of the opinion that there is error in the court below giving judgment for the plaintiff, and the judgment is reversed, and the case having been heard without a jury, the suit is dismissed, at the plaintiff's cost.

SANDERSON v. HARTFORD EASTERN RY. CO.

Supreme Court of Washington, 1930. 150 Wash. 472, 291 P. 241.

BEALS, J. Robert Sanderson, Sr., the plaintiff in this action, recovered judgment upon the verdict of a jury against defendant for personal injuries suffered by him as the result of a collision between an automobile in which plaintiff was riding, the property of and driven by plaintiff's son, Samuel Sanderson, and a gasoline-driven motor car operated by defendant on its railway track in Snohomish county; the accident occurring at the point where the main highway . . . crosses defendant's railway.

Appellant railway contends that the court erred in instructing the jury as to the law upon certain phases of the case.

Section 2528, Rem.Comp.Stat., reads as follows: "Every engineer driving a locomotive on any railway who shall fail to ring the bell or sound the whistle upon such locomotive, or cause the same to be rung or sounded at least eighty rods from any place where such railway crosses a traveled road or street on the same level (except in cities), or to continue the ringing of such bell or sounding of such whistle until such locomotive shall have crossed such road or street, shall be guilty of misdemeanor."

Section 2303, Rem.Comp.Stat., defines the word "railway" in the following terms: "The term 'railway' or 'railroad' shall include all railways, railroads and street railways, whether operated by steam, electricity or any other motive power."

In the case at bar the court instructed the jury as follows:

"One of the statutes of this state provides that every engineer driving a locomotive on any railway who shall fail to ring the bell or sound the whistle upon such locomotive, or cause the same to be rung or sounded, at least eighty rods from any place where such railway crosses a traveled road or street on the same level, or to continue the ringing of such bell or sounding of such whistle until such locomotive shall have crossed such road or street, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

"I instruct you that the law is not satisfied with a mere formal observance of its requirements, but the statute which I have just quoted to you requires that the whistle or bell with which the locomotive is equipped must be of a size and character reasonably suited to warn travelers at railroad crossings of the approach of a train and that the bell or whistle must be sounded in such a manner as to give reasonable warning of such approach. And I instruct you that any violation of this statute, as I have just explained its provisions, would be negligence, as a matter of law, for which the railroad company would be liable in damages to anyone injured as a natural and proximate result."

Appellant does not contend that the horn of the gas car which it was operating along the track was sounded as far back from the crossing as is required by the statute above quoted. Testimony was introduced by appellant to the effect that the horn was sounded at a point approximately 700 feet from the crossing, and in this connection appellant requested the court to charge the jury as follows:

"You are instructed that the burden of proving that the defendant was negligent rests upon the plaintiff. If the motorman in charge of the car which collided with the automobile sounded his horn in sufficient time before the car reached the crossing to have enabled the driver of the automobile to stop before going on the track, in that event the defendant was not guilty of negligence, and your verdict should be for the defendant."

Appellant excepted to the instruction given by the trial court and to the refusal of the court to give the requested instruction, and argues here that the court committed reversible error in giving the instruction complained of and in failing to give the requested instruction. Appellant contends that a gas-driven motor car, driven along a railway track, is not a locomotive, and that the section of the statute above quoted has no application to the situation here presented. While it is true that the word "locomotive" generally suggests the idea of a large engine propelled by steam along a railway, we find no reason for holding that the statute is limited in its application to such a machine. The purpose of the section is clear; it requires a certain warning to be given of the approach to a crossing of a train moving along a railway track. The statute was passed for the benefit and protection of the traveling public, and should not be strictly construed so as to limit or restrict its manifest purpose. Appellant, having chosen to operate trains on its railway propelled by gasoline-driven motors, must be held, in the operation of such trains, to compliance with the statute now being considered. A railway track is in itself some notice to the traveling public that cars may be moving thereon, but the statute requiring the ringing of a bell or the sounding of a whistle when a train is approaching a grade crossing is well known, and these familiar sounds are listened for by persons approaching the track with the intention of crossing the same. To permit a person operating cars upon a track to employ, in propelling its cars, an engine driven by some power other than steam, and thus escape the operation of the statute, would have the effect of increasing the already considerable danger at grade crossings and subject the traveling public to an increased hazard. The sounding of a bell or whistle immediately suggests the approach of cars along the railway, while the sounding of an automobile horn carries no such intimation, but rather intimates the approach of an automobile along the highway. The authorities cited by appellant in support of its contention that a gas-driven car is not a locomotive are not applicable to the situation here presented. The trial court was correct in applying the statute above quoted, and in refusing to submit to the jury, as requested by appellant, the question of whether or not appellant's employee in charge of the gas car sounded his horn in sufficient time to enable the driver of the automobile to stop before reaching the track.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

NOTES

1. In Smith v. A. T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 145 Kan. 615, 66 P.2d 562 (1937), the principal case was distinguished on the ground that the "word 'whistle' is not modified by use of the word 'steam.'" The word was so modified in the Smith Case and it was found that it had remained unchanged through statutory revisions made in periods when the use of other motive power than steam was becoming common. The court refused to construe the statute "to require that a steam whistle, as distinguished from an . . . air horn must be placed on a railroad train propelled by an electric motor. . . ."

2. "While the language of . . . (the act) is clear and free from ambiguity, and for this reason there is nothing to construe, still, to carry out the true meaning and intent of the Congress, which enacted it and to understand what that intent was, it is proper to ascertain the mischief supposed to prevail at the time and which it was sought to remedy by the enactment of that statute." Trieber, D.J., in United States v. Lewis, 192 F. 633, 639 (D.C.Mo.1911).

NOTES

1. See discussion of the principal case and Cleveland v. United States, supra p. 823, in Note: "Interstate Immorality: the Mann Act and the Supreme Court, 56 Yale L.J. 718 (1947).

2. In Southern Ry. Co. v. Machinists' Local Union, 111 F. 49 (C.C.Tenn.1901), the court held that strikers who attempted to induce apprentices to go on strike were liable to penalty under the following act:

"Section 1. That hereafter it shall not be lawful for any person in this state knowingly to hire, contract with, decoy or entice away, directly or indirectly, any one, male or female, who is at the time under contract or employ of another; and any person so under contract or in the employ of another leaving their employ without good and sufficient cause, before the expiration of the time for which they were employed, shall forfeit to the employer all sums due for service already rendered, and be liable for such other damages the employer may reasonably sustain by such violation of the contract."

The court said, in part: "The only cases where the supreme court of Tennessee has considered this statute, so far as counsel or the court are advised, are those of McCutchin v. Taylor, 11 Lea. 259, and Morris v. Neville, Id. 271. By these cases the statute was most rigidly enforced against those who had decoyed and enticed away the laborers. They were negro farm laborers in both cases,—certainly in one case, and presumably in the other; and I have no doubt, as counsel argue, that this statute was intended solely for that class of laborers,—agricultural farm hands,—and possibly to prevent housewives from decoying or enticing away each other's cooks or other servants. But this nowhere appears on the face of the statute, or otherwise in any other way, than as an inference to be drawn from what counsel and the court know of the political and industrial conditions of this section of the country. It may be conceded that it is not at all likely that a Tennessee legislature intended to make by this statute a law against strikes and strikers and the labor unions. See Acts Tenn.1901, p. 146, c. 104. But this consideration cannot control the courts in the construction of the statute, if it be broad enough in the language used to cover the case of strikes and the labor unions. If a legislature intends to limit its enactment, they must do so by the terms of the act itself, and no other limitation is authoritative where the language is unambiguous and construes itself. It is not permissible to go outside a statute plain in its words, as covering all labor contracts and laborers, and to say, on any consideration whatever, that there was an intention to limit it to a particular class of laborers, white or black, or however else such classification may be made, as of agricultural or industrial workmen; not when the subject-matter and the language used comprehend both these and all other classes. Particularly is this so under constitutions forbidding race and class distinctions. If the legislature intended to limit this act to farm laborers, they should have said so, if they have the constitutional power to so limit such an act, as to which I express no opinion, because the act expresses no such limitation, and we cannot add it to the words of the act."

CABELL v. MARKHAM

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Second Circuit, 1945.
148 F.2d 737.

L. HAND, CIRCUIT JUDGE. This appeal depends upon the meaning of a part of the proviso to § 9(e) of the Trading with the Enemy Act, as amended on March 10, 1928, 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix, § 9(e), which we quote in the margin.¹ The plaintiff filed a complaint under § 9(a) of that act, alleging that he was a creditor of an Italian insurance company, whose assets in this country the predecessor in office of the defendant, Markham, had seized, as Alien Property Custodian; and that he had presented his claim in due form to the Custodian, who refused to recognize it. The defendants moved to dismiss the complaint because of its insufficiency in law, on the ground that the claim had not been in existence before October 6, 1917, and had not been filed before the date of the enactment of the Settlement of War Claims Act of 1928. The judge held that, since both these facts appeared in the complaint, the proviso of § 9(e) just quoted covered the situation; and for this reason he dismissed the complaint.

When the Trading with the Enemy Act was first passed on October 6, 1917, it contained the substance of what is now subdivision (a), but nothing more. It was amended again and again, but subdivision (e) was not added until 1920 (41 St. L. 980), though from the first it provided that no debt should be paid which had not been "owing" before October 6, 1917. The addition that the claim should be presented before March 10, 1928, dates from the amendment of that year (45 St.L.

271). The statute was not re-enacted when the present war broke out; nor was that necessary, for it automatically went into effect again. This appears, for example, from the definition of the phrase, "beginning of the war," in § 2, 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix, § 2 ("the day on which Congress has declared or shall declare war"); from § 302 of Title III of Chapter 593 of Laws of the First Session of the 77th Congress, 55 St.L. p. 839, 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix, § 617, which assumes that it had not been in force before December 8, 1941, and that it went into effect again at once thereafter; and because § 5(b) was amended without mention of any other part. 55 St.L. 839, 840, 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix, § 616. For this reason it seems proper for purposes of interpretation to interpret it as though it had been enacted on December 8, 1941, when the present war was declared. Were that literally the case, we should be faced with a statute, subdivisions (a) and (e) of which flatly contradicted each other. Subdivision (a) provides that "any person . . . to whom any debt may be owing . . . may file . . . a notice of his claim . . . and the President . . . may order the payment . . . of the money . . . held." If the President does not order payment, the "said claimant may institute a suit in equity . . . to establish the . . . debt so claimed, and if so established the court shall order the payment . . . to which the . . . claimant is entitled." This language is mingled with that giving a remedy for property mistakenly seized, and it is unnecessary to labor the point that it was intended to put creditors upon an equal footing with owners. Indeed, although we assume it to be true that for constitutional purposes it was not necessary to allow the alien's creditors any recourse to the seized property, since the alien himself remains liable; for practical purposes there is little difference between debts and claims to property.

It is at least arguable that the whole of subdivision (e) is limited to seizures made during the first war. It begins with a provision that "a citizen or subject of any nation which was associated with the United States in the prosecution of the war" may recover his property or collect his debt only in case that nation gave reciprocal rights to citizens of the United States. The use of the preterite is significant, particularly when coupled with the word, "associate," which it will be remembered was chosen during the last war in sedulous avoidance of any implication that we had "allies." If this be true, it would be indeed unreasonable not to confine the proviso similarly: that is, to read it otherwise than as limited to seizures made during that war. If we do not so read it, the result is really nonsense, for the remedy given in subdivision (a), which is prospective, is completely defeated by subdivision (e). Nobody can seriously believe that a general plan designed to be successively suspended and revived, as peace and war should alternate, was meant to be permanently mutilated by a statute of limitation expressly made applicable to only the first of its phases. The defendants have no answer except to say that we are not free to depart from the literal meaning of the words, however transparent may be the resulting stultification of the scheme or plan as a whole.

Courts have not stood helpless in such situations; the decisions are legion in which they have refused to be bound by the letter, when it frustrates the patent purpose of the whole statute.

As Holmes, J., said in a much-quoted passage from Johnson v. United States, 163 F. 30, 32, 18 L.R.A., N.S., 1194: "it is not an adequate discharge of duty for courts to say: We see what you are driving at, but you have not said it, and therefore we shall go on as before." . . .

Of course it is true that the words used, even in their literal sense, are the primary, and ordinarily the most reliable, source of interpreting the meaning of any writing: be it a statute, a contract, or anything else. But it is one of the surest indexes of a mature and developed jurisprudence not to make a fortress out of the dictionary; but to remember that statutes always have some purpose or object to accomplish, whose sympathetic and imaginative discovery is the surest guide to their meaning. Since it is utterly apparent that the words of this proviso were intended to be limited to seizures made during the last war, and could not conceivably have been intended to apply to seizures made when another war revived the Act as a whole from its suspension, it does no undue violence to the language to assume that it was implicitly subject to that condition which alone made the Act as a whole practicable of administration.

Judgment reversed.

[On certiorari the judgment of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in Markham v. Cabell, 326 U.S. 404, 66 S.Ct. 193, 90 L.Ed. 165 (1945).]

1. Sandy v. Walter Butler Shipbuilders, 221 Minn. 215, 21 N.W.2d 612 (1946), cites the principal case. The court construes portions of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1943 where a literal meaning would have limited the coverage of that act, to have a broader meaning since "The obvious purpose of the 1943 act was to broaden the scope and enlarge the field within which such occupational risks were to be covered."

2. In Brooklyn Nat. Corp. v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 157 F.2d 450 (2 Cir., 1946), Learned Hand, J., after holding that the plain meaning of the language of the act when applied to the facts resolved the issue in accordance with the purpose of Congress, said at p. 451: "True, there is often no surer way to misconceive the meaning of a statute or any other writing than to construe it verbally; indeed, interpretation is the art of proliferating a purpose which is meant to cover many occasions so that it shall be best realized upon the occasion in question. However, although there are no certain guides, the colloquial meaning of the words is itself one of the best tests of purpose, and situations of which Markham v. Cabell, is the last example are the exception. We have no doubt that this is not a situation in which it would be proper not to follow the literal meaning of the words."

The same judge in Central Hanover B. & T. Co. v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 159 F.2d 167 (2 Cir., 1947), said at p. 169: "There is no more likely way to misapprehend the meaning of language—be it in a constitution, a statute, a will or a contract—than to read the words literally, forgetting the object which the document as a whole is meant to secure. Nor is a court ever less likely to do its duty than when, with an obsequious show of submission, it disregards the overriding purpose because the particular occasion which has arisen, was not foreseen. That there are hazards in this is quite true; there are hazards in all interpretation, at best a perilous course between dangers on either hand; but it scarcely helps to give so wide a berth to Charybdis's maw that one is in danger of being impaled upon Scylla's rocks."

JUDD v. LANDIN

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1942. 211 Minn. 465, 1 N.W.2d 861.

JULIUS J. OLSON, JUSTICE. Action to recover damages for personal injuries. Defendants Robert E. and Allyn K. Ford are the owners and lessors of Hotel Marquette in Minneapolis; defendant Woman's Christian Association of Minneapolis (hereafter referred to as W.C.A.) has been the lessee over a term of years; and defendant Virginia R. Landin is the sublessee of W.C.A. Plaintiff recovered a verdict for $1,500. The Fords and W.C.A. separately moved for judgment notwithstanding. Both motions were granted, and plaintiff appeals from the judgments.

During the afternoon of July 10, 1938, plaintiff, a guest at the hotel, left her room on the third floor to go to the street. When about halfway down the stairway between the third and second floors, the heel of her left shoe caught in a protruding slit in the rubber stair tread, causing her to trip and fall. In falling, she reached out with her right hand for something to avert her fall, but, there being no handrail on that side of the stairway, she fell violently against the floor of the stair landing below and was seriously injured.

The hotel was built during or prior to 1890, and for a year or more prior to February, 1931, had been vacant. During that month the Fords executed a lease of the building for a period of ten years, effective May 1, to the W.C.A., to be used as a club or hotel. By its terms the Fords agreed that "any changes required by present or future building ordinances will be complied with by owners." Suitable alterations and repairs were to be made to put the property in shape for its intended use. The estimated cost of alterations and repairs was stated to be $25,000. The Fords applied for and obtained from the building inspector's office a permit to make the improvements. The work progressed under the inspector's directions, with frequent inspection. Although an official record of the improvements including plans and specifications, was to be filed and kept in his office, "there were no plans filed for this particular job."

The stairway on which plaintiff fell was 50 inches wide. When these improvements were made the 1916 building code was applicable. By § 111, it was provided that "stairways which are more than three feet six inches (3' 6") wide shall have not less than two handrails." The 1934 code provides (§ 604) that "the following general rules shall govern in all cases." And § 604.1 specifies that "handrails shall be provided on both sides of all stairs three feet six inches (3' 6") or more in width in all buildings except single family dwellings." After completion of the work, W.C.A. took over the premises and remained in possession under its lease until June 1935, when it sublet the premises, with consent of the owners, to defendant Landin and one Marguerite Hauser, who later assigned her interest to Miss Landin.

By § 3101 of the 1934 code, adopted April 3, 1934, the 1916 code was expressly repealed. By § 107.2 of the new code, it is provided: "Existing buildings may be maintained in their present condition and occupancy except that such changes as are specifically required hereby or may become necessary for safety, shall be made when ordered by the Inspector of Buildings." (Italics supplied.)

That the requirement in respect to two handrails has not been complied with here is conceded. Therefore, plaintiff claims, as the basis for imposing liability upon all defendants, that they were negligent in failing to install such handrails, and such negligence was the proximate, or a contributing, cause of plaintiff's accidental fall and consequent injuries. She does not claim that respondents are responsible for the condition of the rubber stair treads, since these oftentimes become frayed or torn and as such must be replaced from time to time.

Respondents contend that only the 1934 code is applicable in this action, and that, since the building inspector made no affirmative order requiring installation of a second handrail (§ 107.2), there was no duty imposed upon them to install it. So the first issue to be determined is whether the handrail sections of the codes to which we have referred imposed a duty upon respondents to comply therewith, absent official direction from the building inspector.

1. In construing legislative enactments, it is well to bear in mind that (Winters v. City of Duluth, 82 Minn. 127, 129, 84 N.W. 788, 789), "canons of construction are not the masters of the courts, but merely their servants, to aid them in ascertaining the legislative intent"; and when it is ascertained the statute must be so construed as to give effect to such intention, even if it seem contrary to such rules and the strict letter of the statute."

We think it is clear from the terms of both codes that the legislative intent—its real purpose—was to prescribe minimum requirements to safeguard and protect from injury guests and occupants of buildings governed thereby which reasonably might result from defective construction or unsafe conditions.

2. Since § 101 of the 1934 code provides that "this ordinance is . . . hereby declared a remedial ordinance, and is to be construed so as to secure the beneficial purposes intended" (italics supplied), it is entitled to such fair and "large" construction as will meet the essential legislative purpose. As said in State ex rel. City of Minneapolis v. St. Paul M. & M. Ry. Co., 98 Minn. 380, 397, 108 N.W. 261, 266, 28

L.R.A.,N.S., 298, 120 Am.St.Rep. 581, 8 Ann.Cas. 1047: "It is an old and unshaken rule in the construction of statutes that the intention of a remedial statute will always prevail over the literal sense of its terms, and therefore when the expression is special or particular, but the reason is general, the expression shall be deemed general.' . . . A 'large construction is to be given to statutes having for their end the promotion of important and beneficial public objects.' "

There certainly is nothing "to justify our looking upon the law with strictness or aversion." State ex rel. City of St. Paul v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. S. M. Ry. Co., 190 Minn. 162, 164, 251 N.W. 275, 276.

3. The adoption of these codes was induced by public considerations of safety. The motivating cause was to protect from injury those inhabiting defective or unsafe structures. The framers of these codes realized that they were required to provide rules and regulations for new structures as well as old ones which had been or were to be rehabilitated. Courts therefore should be careful not to apply such (98 Minn. page 396, 108 N.W. page 266, 28 L.R.A.,N.S., 298, 120 Am.St. Rep. 581, 8 Ann.Cas. 1047) "a rigid and literal reading [as] would in many cases defeat the very object of the statute and exemplify the maxim that 'the letter killeth, while the spirit keepeth alive.' "

4. Both §§ 107.2 and 604.1 of the 1934 code should be considered and interpreted together, since it is the duty of courts, even where a legislative act "is imperfectly drawn . . . to ascertain the legislative purpose from a consideration of the act as a whole, and to interpret it, if possible, so that it will accomplish" that purpose. "To bring this about obvious mistakes and omissions may be corrected or supplied, and contradictory expressions, and language of doubtful import should be given a meaning consistent with the legislative intention as disclosed by the act taken as a whole." Kempien v. Board of County Com'rs, 160 Minn. 69, 72, 199 N.W. 442, 443; State ex rel. Maryland Cas. Co. v. District Court, 134 Minn. 131, 158 N.W. 798.

5. Since § 604.1 expressly requires two handrails on stairways of the width here presented, we think it logically follows that it properly applies to the building in question. Such requirements should not be denied by any technical or mere fanciful interpretation of § 107.2 which has for its basis only a misplaced comma, 6 Dunnell, Dig. & Supplement § 8974; nor will bad grammar alone vitiate a statute, Id. § 8972. The net result of such narrow interpretation would be to deny recovery here to a guest in an old hotel, which is required to compete with others built later, and to impose such liability upon the latter only because it has a newer building. Such a deviation from the obvious intent of the framers of these codes would be to give these sections a meaning inconsistent with legislative purpose. We think it must be held that § 604.1 affirmatively requires two handrails and that such a change is "specifically required" thereby. . . .

The judgments are reversed. Rehearing denied.

NOTES

1. The appellant's brief in Judd v. Landin contains the following:

"The public policy underlying these building codes is too obvious to need much elaboration. The purpose was to bring all building operations, including the construction of new buildings and the repair and alteration of old buildings, under the direct supervision of the building department for the safety and protection of the occupants of such property, and the public in general. For practical reasons it has, of course, been necessary to make certain exceptions in the case of existing buildings which still have some usefulness. The fact that such buildings are permitted to be maintained without the safety precautions provided by the codes has been the cause of numerous accidents sometimes resulting in the loss of many lives. We have had several of such catastrophes in the city of Minneapolis in recent years.

"While the owner of such property is permitted to maintain it without full compliance with the code he should never be permitted to repair, alter or change such property without the closest supervision. In connection with any such operations he should be made to comply, in so far as practical, with all requirements of the code. Any other policy would only serve to perpetuate the inherent danger lurking in such structures. That is why the 1934 Code grants no exemptions or privileges to existing buildings where the owner has attempted to perform work on such buildings without procuring a proper permit therefor.

"This case is a fair example of what can happen when any evasion of the law is resorted to. If proper plans for this remodeling work had been submitted to the engineers in the building department and there had been any reasonable inspection of this work it seems incredible that the installation of a second handrail on this stairway would not have been required. Here, however, the owners, through their contractor acting as their agent, were permitted to proceed in violation of the ordinance. While this was done with the consent of the inspector, it was obviously for the benefit of the owners and their contractor. It gave them more or less of a free hand in this work, and they were not tied down to any scrupulous observation of the law."

The record discloses no evidence introduced at the trial tending to establish the policy and purpose of the codes.

2. In a petition for rehearing the main argument of the respondent in Judd v. Landin was as follows:

"I. The decision of the Court . . . is based upon the point that Section 604.1 of the Minneapolis Building Code enacted in 1934 applies to all buildings, existing buildings as well as new buildings. This point was never raised, either at the trial of the case or upon the appeal thereof and respondents (petitioners herein) have never had an opportunity to be heard with respect to said point. This point comes as a bolt from the blue so far as respondents are concerned.

". . . For the reasons set forth in the following subsections of this Section I it is respectfully submitted that there is a strong reason to believe that the Court has erred in its decision in this case.

"a. The decision of the Court in the above entitled appeal assumes that Section 604.1 of the Minneapolis Building Code adopted in 1934 and other specific requirements of that Code apply generally to all buildings, existing buildings as well as new buildings in the absence of limiting or qualifying language directly within each such section, and that said Section 604.1 and other general requirements of the Code therefore would apply to existing buildings, notwithstanding the express provisions of Section 107.2 of the Act.

"(1) It would seem that such interpretation is contrary to the express language of the Code itself in section 107 and the several subsections of said section, because said Section 107 of the Code unequivocally limits the application of the general provisions of the Code to new buildings 'unless otherwise specified' and then sets forth in the other subdivisions of said Section 107 the situations in which the general requirements of said Code may become applicable to 'existing buildings.'

"It is respectfully submitted that by the . . . language, which appears almost at the very beginning of the Code, the City Council of the City of Minneapolis unmistakably expressed its intention that the general requirements of the Code should be inapplicable to existing buildings except in the particular situations specified in the subsections of Section 107.

"b. That it was not the intent of the City Council of the City of Minneapolis that Section 604.1 should apply to existing buildings is further confirmed by a subsequent specific provision in Part 6 of said 1934 Building Code. (In this connection, the Court's attention is called to the fact that the Code is divided into definite parts, and at the beginning of each part there is a heading which indicates the subject-matter covered by such part. The subject-matter of Part 6 is 'Classification of Buildings and General Requirements.') Following Section 604 and its subdivisions in said Part 6 there appears Section 610, which expressly refers to 'existing buildings,' and the inescapable effect of which is to make Section 604 and its subdivisions, including Section 604.1, inapplicable to existing buildings. (In this connection it should be noted that in the tenth section of each part, beginning with Part 6 and up to and including Part 12, there is a specific provision with respect to the requirements for 'Existing Buildings'.) Said Section 610 reads as follows:

"Section 610. Existing Buildings. The requirements of this code as to existing buildings are given in the tenth section of the Part governing the occupancy thereof."

Was this the most effective approach by which respondent could have attempted to convince the court that it might have erred in the principal case? If not, what argument would you have presented?

G. The Golden Rule Approach

THE GOLDEN RULE

"The rule by which we are to be guided in construing acts of Parliament is to look at the precise words, and to construe them in their ordinary sense, unless it would lead to any absurdity or manifest injustice; and if it should, so to vary and modify them as to avoid that which it certainly could not have been the intention of the legislature should be done." Parke, B., in Perry v. Skinner, 2 M. & W. 471, 476 (1837).

NOTES

1. In Grey v. Pearson, 10 E.R. 1216 (House of Lords, 1857), Lord Wensleydale, after enunciating the golden rule (at p. 1234) refers to the statement of the rule by Burton, J., in Warburton v. Loveland, 1 Hudson & Brooke (Ireland) 1828, at top of 648, who said:—

"However, it is, for the present, sufficient to say, that no necessity for adopting it is shown; and I apprehend it is a rule in the construction of statutes, that, in the first instance, the grammatical sense of the words is to be adhered to. If that is contrary to, or inconsistent with any expressed intention, or any declared purpose of the statute; or if it would involve any absurdity, repugnance, or inconsistency in its different provisions, the grammatical sense must then be modified, extended, or abridged, so far as to avoid such an inconvenience, but no farther."

(This case went to the House of Lords, 2 Dow & C. 493). The decision was written a year before Baron Parke became a Judge.

Blackstone sets out what seems to be the same rule. After having stated that "words are generally to be understood in their usual and most known signification" (Vol. 1, 1st ed. p. 59), he then says (p. 60)—

"As to the effects and consequence, the rule is, that where words bear either none, or a very absurd signification if literally understood, we must a little deviate from the received sense of them. Therefore the Bolognian law, mentioned in Puffendorf, which enacted 'that whoever drew blood in the streets should be punished with the utmost severity', was held after long debate not to extend to the surgeon, who opened the vein of a person that fell down in the street with a fit'.

2. See The People v. Commissioners of Taxes of New York, 95 N.Y. 554 (1884), esp. at 558-559.

3. J. A. Corry, "Administrative Law and the Interpretation of Statutes", 1 U. Toronto L.J. 286, 299, 301 (1936), says: "The golden rule conceded full effect to the literal meaning of the words except where that meaning led to an absurdity or manifest injustice. In such case, the words might be modified so as to avoid a result which the legislature could never have intended. But it must have been an absurdity so great as to make perfectly clear that the legislature did not intend it. The rule was designed to avoid the harshness of literal interpretation and at the same time prevent the courts from legislating. . . .

"The doctrine of literalness can never be applied successfully to general words. For they always include something more than the scope and object of the statute require and so it leads to ridiculous results. General words have significance over a wide range of human experience. No statute ever purports to deal with more than a narrow sector of it. Judges are torn between a feeling of obligation to adhere to the doctrine and a feeling of revolt against what they regard as an absurdity and injustice."

STATE v. CLARK

New Jersey Supreme Court of Judicature, 1860. 29 N.J.L. 96.

WHEPLEY, J. The section of the act upon which this indictment was found provides that if any person or persons shall willfully open, break down, injure, or destroy any fences, rails, or enclosures belonging to or in the possession of any other person or persons, or cut down, injure, or destroy the wood, timber, trees, herbage, grass, or hay standing or growing upon the lands of any other person or persons, or shall dig up, pull up, injure, destroy, or carry off the vegetables standing, growing, or being in or upon the lands of any other person or persons, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction, be punished by imprisonment in the county jail, not less than two months, nor more than six, or by fine, not exceeding three hundred dollars, or both, at the discretion of the court in which such offence shall be tried.

The 70th section of the act to which this is a supplement, makes it an indictable offence willfully, unlawfully, and maliciously to set fire to, or burn or destroy, any fences, piles of wood, boards, or other lumber.

From the different phraseology employed in the two sections, it is evident the legislature intended, by the act of 1855, to render punishable by indictment mischief and injuries to property of the kind described in both sections which were not reached by the 70th section. Under that the crime was not complete, unless the act was malicious as well as willful and unlawful. To destroy a fence by breaking it down, if for the purpose of honestly asserting a right to the locus in quo, and not out of wantonness or malice, was not within the statute.

The act of 1855, in terms, makes the willful opening, breaking down, or injuring of any fences belonging to or in the possession of any other person a misdemeanor. In what sense is the term willful used? In common parlance, willful is used in the sense of intentional, as distinguished from accidental or involuntary. Whatever one does intentionally he does willfully. Is it used in that sense in this act? Did the legislature intend to make the intentional opening of a fence for the purpose of going upon the land of another indictable, if done by permission or for a lawful purpose, or the intentional cutting down of any timber upon land in the possession of another, by his permission, or the intentional pulling up of any vegetable growing on the land of another, by his permission, or the intentional carrying off of the vegetables being on the land of another, by his permission, or the entry of an officer to execute a writ of possession, a misdemeanor? We cannot suppose such to have been the actual intent. To adopt such a construction would put a stop to the ordinary business of life. The language of the act, if construed literally, evidently leads to an absurd result.

If a literal construction of the words of a statute be absurd, the act must be so construed as to avoid the absurdity. The court must restrain the words. The object designed to be reached by the act must limit and control the literal import of the terms and phrases employed. 1 Kent's Com. 462; Commonwealth v. Kimball, 24 Pick. 370; United States v. Fisher, 2 Cranch 400; 1 Bl.Com. 60.

No one but a trespasser can be amenable to the provisions of the act. Any other construction of the act involves us in inextricable confusion and absurdity.

If this be the sound construction, then any evidence that would constitute a lawful defence in an action of trespass would be competent upon the trial of the indictment. The evidence offered by the defendant was of that character, and should have been received.

NOTES

1. In The People v. Admire, 39 Ill. 251 (1866), the court departed from the plain meaning of the language of the statute of wills to the extent necessary to avoid requiring a demand on a non-existent administrator. The court said: "The law is not so unreasonable as to require the performance of impossibilities, and when the legislatures use language so broad as apparently to lead to such results, the courts must say . . . that the legislatures cannot have intended to have included those cases. . . ."

2. In Altringham Electric Supply Co. Ltd. v. Sale Urban District Council, 154 L.T.R. 379 (1936), the House of Lords finally rejected the Golden Rule as a permissible approach. After finding that the meaning of the language was plain as applied to the facts, Lord MacMillan said: ". . . By what criterion are your Lordships to judge whether a particular enactment, if literally read, is so absurd that Parliament cannot have intended it to be so read and that the courts ought not to give effect to its plain meaning? I agree with Lord Bramwell who said that the phrase which I have quoted 'opens a very wide door' and adds: 'I should like to have a good definition of what is such an absurdity that you are to disregard the plain words of an Act of Parliament. It is to be remembered that what seems absurd to one man does not seem absurd to another' . . ."

"I do not doubt that, if the language of an enactment is ambiguous and susceptible of two meanings, one of which is consonant with justice and good sense while the other would lead to extravagant results, a court of law will incline to adopt the former and to reject the latter, even although the latter may correspond more closely with the literal reading of the words employed. . . ."

His Lordship then quoted the following statement of Lord Halsbury in Commissioners of Income Tax v. Pemsel, [1891] A.C. 531, 549 with approval: "But I do not think it is competent to any court to proceed upon the assumption that the Legislature has made a mistake. Whatever the real fact may be, I think a court of law is bound to proceed upon the assumption that the Legislature is an ideal person that does not make mistakes. It must be assumed that it has intended what it has said, and I think any other view of the mode in which one must approach the interpretation of a statute, would give authority for an interpretation of the language of an Act of Parliament which would be attended with the most serious consequences."

3. In Hopkins, "The Literal Canon and the Golden Rule," 15 Can.Bar Rev. 689, (1937), the author approves the rejection of the Golden Rule in the principal case and its relegation to the status of a mere canon to be used only as an aid in resolving ambiguity. He says at page 696: "In our constitutional theory the function of innovation rests primarily with legislative bodies. It is true that the final word in law-making must rest with the courts and that the exercise of any conscious mental process involves an element of discretion: yet, if the assignment of legislative power to parliament is to be otherwise than fictional, the process of interpretation must be divorced so far as may be from that of legislation. What must be sought for by the courts are criteria of meaning as objectivized and impersonal as can be found, so that the initial discretion inherent in legislation will be impaired as little as possible by a supervening discretion in interpretation." Assuming the validity of his argument, in so far as it is founded on the supremacy of parliament doctrine, is it tenable in the United States where that doctrine does not prevail? See Radin, "A Short Way with Statutes," 56 Harv.L.Rev. 388, esp. 394-307 (1942).

CHUNG FOOK v. WHITE

Supreme Court of the United States, 1924.

264 U.S. 443, 44 S.Ct. 361, 68 L.Ed. 781.

MR. JUSTICE SUTHERLAND delivered the opinion of the Court.

Chung Fook is a native-born citizen of the United States. Lee Shee, his wife, is an alien Chinese woman, ineligible for naturalization. In 1922 she sought admission to the United States, but was refused and detained at the immigration station, on the ground that she was an alien, afflicted with a dangerous contagious disease. No question is raised as to her alienage or the effect and character of her disease; but the contention is that, nevertheless, she is entitled to admission under the proviso found in section 22 of the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917, 39 Stat. 891, c. 29 (Comp.St.1918, Comp.St.Ann.Supp.1919, § 4289¼¹). The section is copied in the margin.¹

A petition for a writ of habeas corpus was denied by the federal District Court for the Northern District of California, and upon appeal to the Circuit Court of Appeals, the judgment was affirmed. 287 F. 533.

The pertinent words of the proviso are:

"That if the person sending for wife or minor child is naturalized, a wife to whom married or a minor child born subsequent to such husband or father's naturalization shall be admitted without detention for treatment in hospital. . . ."

The measure of the exemption is plainly stated and, in terms, extends to the wife of a naturalized citizen only.

But it is argued that it cannot be supposed that Congress intended to accord to a naturalized citizen a right and preference beyond that enjoyed by a native-born citizen. The court below thought that the exemption from detention was meant to relate only to a wife who by marriage had acquired her husband's citizenship, and not to one who, notwithstanding she was married to a citizen, remained an alien under section 1994, Rev.Stats. (Comp.St. § 3948):

"Any woman who is now or may hereafter be married to a citizen of the United States, and who might herself be lawfully naturalized, shall be deemed a citizen."

To the same effect, see Ex parte Leong Shee (D.C.) 275 F. 364. We are inclined to agree with this view; but, in any event, the statute plainly relates only to the wife or children of a naturalized citizen and we cannot interpolate the words "native-born citizen" without usurping the legislative function. [Citing cases.]

The words of the statute being clear, if it unjustly discriminates against the native-born citizen, or is cruel and inhuman in its results, as forcefully contended, the remedy lies with Congress and not with the courts. Their duty is simply to enforce the law as it is written, unless clearly unconstitutional.

Affirmed.

NOTES

1. In DeRuiz v. DeRuiz, 66 App.D.C. 370, 68 F.2d 752 (1936), in refusing to extend the words of the act beyond their plain meaning, Van Orsdel, J., said at pp. 753-754:

"In Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. 122, 202, 4 L.Ed. 529, Chief Justice Marshall announced the following rule which has been generally followed by the courts of this country: 'Where words conflict with each other, where the different clauses of an instrument bear upon each other, and would be inconsistent, unless the natural and common import of words be varied, construction becomes necessary, and a departure from the obvious meaning of words, is justifiable. But if, in any case, the plain meaning of a provision, not contradicted by any other provision in the same instrument, is to be disregarded, because we believe the framers of that instrument could not intend what they say, it must be one in which the absurdity and injustice of applying the provision to the case, would be so monstrous, that all mankind would, without hesitation, unite in rejecting the application.'

"The difficulty which confronts the courts in their attempt to apply Marshall's rule and find justification for giving the words of a statute a meaning which literally they do not bear in order to escape absurd consequences, so nearly approaches the twilight zone between the exercise of judicial power and legislative power as to call for great care in avoiding usurpation of the latter.

"Nor should we be controlled by the argument that hardship may result in this and similar cases from a strict interpretation of the words . . ., since the language is plain and the courts must follow it. In Commissioner of Immigration v. Gottlieb, 265 U.S. 310, 313, 44 S.Ct. 528, 68 L.Ed. 1031, the court said: 'The case, as the evidence shows, is one of peculiar and distressing hardship, and it is not unnatural that any appropriate canon of construction should be laid hold of to justify a conclusion favorable to respondents. But if the plain words of the statute are against such a conclusion, leaving no room for construction, the courts have no choice but to follow it, without regard to the consequences.' "

2. Observe disregard of practical results of literal interpretation, in Zazove v. United States, 162 F.2d 443 (1947).

AMERICAN TRUCKING ASS'NS v. UNITED STATES

District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, 1939.
21 F.Supp. 35.

GRONER, C. J. The main question we have to answer is whether defendant, Interstate Commerce Commission, has jurisdiction and power under Sec. 204(a) (1) and (2) of the Motor Carrier Act of 1935 to establish reasonable requirements with respect to qualifications and maximum hours of service for all employees of common and contract carriers by motor vehicle.

Plaintiff, American Trucking Associations, Inc., is an organization of motor carriers subject to regulation under the Act, and its principal place of business is in the District of Columbia. The other plaintiffs are common carriers by motor vehicle in interstate commerce, likewise subject to regulation.

The Motor Carrier Act, which is Part II of the Interstate Commerce Act, contains a declaration of policy, as follows:

"Sec. 202 [§ 302]. (a). It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to regulate transportation by motor carriers in such manner as to recognize and preserve the inherent advantages of, and foster sound economic conditions in, such transportation and among such carriers in the public interest; promote adequate, economical, and efficient service by motor carriers, and reasonable charges therefor, without unjust discriminations, undue preferences or advantages, and unfair or destructive competitive practices; improve the relations between, and coordinate transportation by and regulation of, motor carriers and other carriers; develop and preserve a highway transportation system properly adapted to the needs of the commerce of the United States and of the national defense; and cooperate with the several States and the duly authorized officials thereof and with any organization of motor carriers in the administration and enforcement of this part [chapter]."

The duties and powers of the Commission are described in Sec. 204 (a):

"(1) To regulate common carriers by motor vehicle as provided in this part [chapter], and to that end the Commission may establish reasonable requirements with respect to continuous and adequate service, transportation of baggage and express, uniform systems of accounts, records, and reports, preservation of records, qualifications and maximum hours of service of employees, and safety of operation and equipment.

"(2) To regulate contract carriers by motor vehicle as provided in this part [chapter], and to that end the Commission may establish reasonable requirements with respect to uniform systems of accounts, records, and reports, preservation of records, qualifications and maximum hours of service of employees, and safety of operation and equipment.

"(3) To establish for private carriers of property by motor vehicle, if need therefor is found, reasonable requirements to promote safety of operation, and to that end prescribe qualifications and maximum hours of service of employees, and standards of equipment. In the event such requirements are established, the term 'motor carrier' shall be construed to include private carriers of property by motor vehicle in the administration of sections 204 [304] (d) and (e), 205 [305], 220 [320], 221 [321], 222 [322] (a), (b), (d), (f), and (g), and 224 [324] of this part [chapter]."

Shortly after the passage of the Act, the Commission established qualifications and maximum hours for drivers of motor vehicles operated by common and contract carriers. It left undecided the extent of its jurisdiction over other employees. Subsequently, and after the passage in 1938 of the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Commission again instituted proceedings to determine the previously undetermined extent of its jurisdiction. It concluded that its power over employees was limited to the promotion of safe operation, in consequence of which it had jurisdiction to establish hours of work and qualifications of drivers, but of no other employees.

Plaintiffs filed their petition June 9, 1939, asking the Commission to hear evidence and establish regulations as to all employees. The Commission declined to do so, adhered to its former ruling, and declared that any further consideration would be futile, since it had no power to do the things asked. This action was then begun against the United States and the Commission. The Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division was allowed to intervene. . . .

At the hearing counsel stated that, if the Act be construed as plaintiffs insist, the Commission will have to prescribe qualifications and hours for stenographers, clerks, accountants, mechanics, solicitors, and other employees of whose duties and qualifications it has no special knowledge; in this function its determination would not be based upon considerations of transportation—on which it is held to be expert—but upon social and economic considerations, matters on which it is not qualified or equipped, and which would entail the performance of a duty wholly foreign to its normal activities. But even if this be granted, we think there is no doubt that Congress had the power to impose the challenged duty. And the answer to the query cannot be found in the fact of inconvenience to the Commission,⁶ but must be first looked for in the language of the statute. If the words are clear, there is no room for construction.

"To search elsewhere for a meaning either beyond or short of that which they disclose is to invite the danger, in the one case, of converting what was meant to be open and precise, into a concealed trap for the unsuspecting, or, in the other, of relieving from the grasp of the statute some whom the Legislature definitely meant to include." Van Camp & Sons Co. v. American Can Co., 278 U.S. 245, 253, 49 S.Ct. 112, 113, 73 L.Ed. 311, 60 A.L.R. 1060.

This rule has been applied even where the literal meaning leads to a hard or unexpected result. Crooks v. Harrelson, 282 U.S. 55, 60, 51 S.Ct. 49, 75 L.Ed. 156; Armstrong Paint & Varnish Works v. Nu-Enamel Corp., 305 U.S. 315, 333, 59 S.Ct. 191, 83 L.Ed. 195. Statutes have been annulled by construction only where the effect of giving the words their clear meaning would "offend the moral sense . . . [involve] injustice, oppression, or absurdity". United States v. Goldenberg, 168 U.S. 95, 103, 18 S.Ct. 3, 4, 42 L.Ed. 394; Van Camp & Sons Co. v. American Can Co., 278 U.S. 245, 253, 254, 49 S.Ct. 112, 73 L.Ed. 311, 60 A.L.R. 1060.

Guided by this rule, we find that Congress in the first section of the Act declared the definite policy to regulate motor transportation (1) so as to foster sound economic conditions in the public interest; (2) to promote adequate, economical, and efficient service and reasonable charges; (3) to prevent unjust discriminations, undue preferences or advantages; (4) to avoid destructive competition; (5) to coordinate transportation by motor carriers and other carriers; (6) to develop and preserve a highway transportation system adapted to the needs of commerce and the national defense. The stated objects demonstrate beyond question that Congress has preempted the entire field. To the achievement of the ends sought, Congress provided that it should be the duty of the Commission to regulate carriers by establishing reasonable requirements with respect to (a) service; (b) transportation of baggage and express; (c) uniform systems of accounts, records, and reports; (d) qualifications and maximum hours of service of employees; (e) safety of operation and equipment.

In (d) the word "employees" is inclusive. There is nothing in its use or in its relation to other words in the section which, considered in the ordinary sense, can be said to indicate only a particular class of employees. If Congress had intended to distinguish between those employees engaged in the actual operation of motor vehicles and those engaged in other work, it could have done so, as it did in a former statute,⁷ by the addition of less than half a dozen words. Hence, to read that limitation into the section would be not only to disregard the letter of the law but to find, without guide or compass in the Act, a legislative intent to that end. To the contrary, such guide as there is—outside the distinct and definite meaning of the words—supports the view that Congress used the language of the section advisedly, and meant precisely what it said. For the third paragraph of Sec. 204, which concerns private carriers, expressly limits the power of the Commission over qualifications and hours to those employees whose work relates to safety of operation. This distinction between the two classes of carriers is convincing of a definite purpose, and the reason for it is obvious: private carriers are defined to be persons who transport for themselves—in furtherance of a commercial enterprise—or as bailees, their own or another's property in interstate commerce.⁸ As to such carriers, Congress properly concluded that to bring all their employees under the Commission's jurisdiction—as well those engaged in the manufacturing or commercial end of the business, and having in themselves no direct relation to motor transportation—would create an anomalous situation, as it would.

Unless what has been said is incorrect, nothing remains except to ascertain whether, in giving effect to the words of the statute, we create a situation so "glaringly absurd" as to impel the conclusion Congress could not have intended such a result. With due deference to the dilemma of the Commission we are unable to say that this is true. At the time of the passage of the statute, the Fair Labor Standards Act had not been passed or even considered by Congress, but there was in effect a law known as the "National Industrial Recovery Act",⁹ under which codes were established to regulate the hours of service of all classes of employees of motor carriers. The Motor Carrier Act expressly provided that it should supersede the provisions of the former codes.¹⁰ There was also in effect in a majority of the states some sort of legislation covering, with diversity of detail and lack of uniformity, hours of service of employees, including drivers of motor vehicles. It is not unreasonable, in these circumstances, to assume that Congress, aware of the problem as it applied to interstate commerce and the advisability of uniformity, chose to place upon the Commission the details of its solution. Certainly, aside from the consumption of the Commission's time, there is nothing glaringly absurd in this, nor reason to suppose a better agency could be found for the purpose. The Commission's fear that it may be called upon to establish qualifications for executive officials, solicitors, and lawyers, is overstrained. None of these classes is within the category of "employees" as that word is used in public service or labor legislation. The hearings before the committees of Congress developed that the percentage cost of labor was equal to nearly half the total gross revenue of motor carriers, and the special attention of Congress was directed by representatives of the unions to the labor aspect as applied to the problems of uniformity and stabilization, because of widely diversified business organization, absence of labor organization in some regions, and the claimed unreasonable practices of many operators.

⁸ Sec. 203(a) (17). The term "private carrier of property by motor vehicle" means any person not included in the terms "common carrier by motor vehicle" or "contract carrier by motor vehicle", who or which transports in interstate or foreign commerce by motor vehicle property of which such person is the owner, lessee, or bailee, when such transportation is for the purpose of sale, lease, rent, or bailment, or in furtherance of any commercial enterprise.

And it is easy to see that stabilization of labor conditions as applied to this industry is an important, and indeed a necessary, part of the establishment of rates and general business regulation, matters as to which the Commission admittedly is expert, and these objectives appear as part and parcel of the purposes of the legislation. In this aspect, it is reasonable to conclude that Congress had them in mind when later, upon the passage of the Fair Labor Standards Act, it provided specifically that Sec. 7 thereof¹¹—which establishes maximum hours of service—should not apply "with respect to (1) any employee with respect to whom the Interstate Commerce Commission has power to establish qualifications and maximum hours of service pursuant to the provisions of section 204 [304 of Title 49] of the Motor Carrier Act, 1935 or (2) any employee of an employer subject to the provisions of Part I of the Interstate Commerce Act." 29 U.S.C.A. § 213(b). The necessity of separate provisions for the exemption of employees of the two classes of carriers is manifest. There are no private carriers by rail subject to the Commission's jurisdiction. Congress, therefore, used inclusive language as to the employees of railroads. There are, however, many private motor carriers who are subject to a limited regulation by the Commission, and this is true for reasons which we have already explained. Their employees not subject to the jurisdiction of the Commission would, by the use of the language employed in the case of railroads, have been left outside of the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act. It was obviously the recognition of this fact alone that induced the use of different language in each instance.

In the view we take, the language of the disputed section is so plain as to permit only one interpretation, and we find nothing in the Act as a whole which can with any assurance be said to lead to a different result. The circumstances under which the section was placed in the bill may possibly have created a situation not contemplated by its sponsors, but to say that this is true would be pure speculation, in which we have no right to indulge and upon which we can base no conclusion. We are, therefore, obliged to hold that the Commission was mistaken in limiting its powers to the drivers of trucks and buses.

NOTES

1. In Leader v. Duffey, 13 App.Cas. 294 (1888), Lord Halsbury, L.C., in the course of his opinion in which he gave effect to what he considered to be the plain meaning of the words of a power of appointment, declared at p. 301: ". . . Whatever the instrument, it must receive a construction according to the plain meaning of the words and sentences therein contained. . . . It appears to me to be arguing in a vicious circle to begin by assuming an intention apart from the language of the instrument itself, and having made that fallacious assumption to bend the language in favour of the assumption so made". Is this criticism valid, and, if so, is the means of avoiding such a circle offered by any of the approaches to statutory construction other than the literal approach?

Anderson*, [1942] A.C. 207: "Theoretically the canons of construction forbade consideration of policy until the words were found doubtful or ambiguous. What is here interesting is that despite these canons, assessments of policy seemed to base both the minority and majority decisions ab initio, in determining the very question whether there was ambiguity." Appeal from the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia.

MR. JUSTICE REED delivered the opinion of the Court. . . .

In the interpretation of statutes, the function of the courts is easily stated. It is to construe the language so as to give effect to the intent of Congress. There is no invariable rule for the discovery of that intention. To take a few words from their context and with them thus isolated to attempt to determine their meaning, certainly would not contribute greatly to the discovery of the purpose of the draftsmen of a statute, particularly in a law drawn to meet many needs of a major occupation.

There is, of course, no more persuasive evidence of the purpose of a statute than the words by which the legislature undertook to give expression to its wishes. Often these words are sufficient in and of themselves to determine the purpose of the legislation. In such cases we have followed their plain meaning. When that meaning has led to absurd or futile results, however, this Court has looked beyond the words to the purpose of the act. Frequently, however, even when the plain meaning did not produce absurd results but merely an unreasonable one "plainly at variance with the policy of the legislation as a whole" this Court has followed that purpose, rather than the literal words. When aid to construction of the meaning of words, as used in the statute, is available, there certainly can be no "rule of law" which forbids its use, however clear the words may appear on "superficial examination." The interpretation of the meaning of statutes, as applied to justiciable controversies, is exclusively a judicial function. This duty requires one body of public servants, the judges, to construe the meaning of what another body, the legislators, has said. Obviously there is danger that the courts' conclusion as to legislative purpose will be unconsciously influenced by the judges' own views or by factors not considered by the enacting body. A lively appreciation of the danger is the best assurance of escape from its threat but hardly justifies an acceptance of a literal interpretation dogma which withholds from the courts available information for reaching a correct conclusion. Emphasis should be laid, too, upon the necessity for appraisal of the purposes as a whole of Congress in analyzing the meaning of clauses or sections of general acts. A few words of general connotation appearing in the text of statutes should not be given a wide meaning, contrary to a settled policy, "excepting as a different purpose is plainly shown."

The language here under consideration, if construed as appellees contend, gives to the Commission a power of regulation as to qualifications and hours of employees quite distinct from the settled practice of Congress. That policy has been consistent in legislating for such regulation of transportation employees in matters of movement and safety only. The Hours of Service Act imposes restrictions on the hours of labor of employees "actually engaged in or connected with the movement of any train." The Seamen's Act limits employee regulations under it to members of ships' crews. The Civil Aeronautics Authority has authority over hours of service of employees "in the interest of safety." It is stated by appellants in their brief with detailed citations, and the statement is uncontradicted, that at the time of the passage of the Motor Vehicle Act "forty states had regulatory measures relating to the hours of service of employees" and every one "applied exclusively to drivers or helpers on the vehicles." In the face of this course of legislation, coupled with the supporting interpretation of the two administrative agencies concerned with its interpretation, the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Wage and Hour Division, it cannot be said that the word "employee" as used in Section 204(a) is so clear as to the workmen it embraces that we would accept its broadest meaning. The word, of course, is not a word of art. It takes color from its surroundings and frequently is carefully defined by the statute where it appears.

We are especially hesitant to conclude that Congress intended to grant the Commission other than the customary power to secure safety in view of the absence in the legislative history of the Act of any discussion of the desirability of giving the Commission broad and unusual powers over all employees. The clause in question was not contained in the bill as introduced.³⁰ Nor was it in the Coordinator's draft.³¹ It was presented on the Senate Floor as a committee amendment following a suggestion of the Chairman of the Legislative Committee of the Commission, Mr. McManamy.³² The committee reports and the debates contain no indication that a regulation of the qualifications and hours of service of all employees was contemplated; in fact the evidence points the other way. The Senate Committee's report explained the provisions of Section 204(a) (1), (2) as giving the commission authority over common and contract carriers similar to that given over private carriers by Section 204(a) (3).³³ The Chair-

³² See the testimony of Mr. McManamy in Hearings on S. 1629 before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, 74th Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 122, 123:

"The regulation of the hours of service of bus and truck operators is far more important from a safety standpoint than the regulation of the hours of service of railroad employees because the danger is greater. . . . This could be accomplished by inserting in section 304(a) (1) and (2), lines 9 and 15, page 8, following the word 'records' in both lines, the words which appear in S. 394, as follows: 'qualifications and maximum hours of service of employees.'"

The clause in question came from § 2(a) (1) of S. 394, 74th Cong., 1st Sess., a subsection otherwise substantially like the corresponding subsection in S. 1629.

Senator Wheeler, Chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce and sponsor of the bill, explained the provision on the floor of the Senate:

" . . . the committee amended paragraphs (1) and (2) [of § 204] to confer power on the Commission to establish reasonable requirements with respect to the qualifications and maximum hours of service of employees of common and contract carriers. . . . This suggestion came to us, I think, from the chairman of the legislative committee of the Interstate Commerce Commission. . . .

"In order to make the highways more safe, and so that common and contract carriers may not be unduly prejudiced in their competition with peddler trucks and other private operators of motor trucks, a provision was added in subparagraph 3 giving the Commission authority to establish similar requirements with respect to the qualifications and hours of service of the employees of such operators. . . ."

79 Cong.Rec. 5652.

man of the Senate Committee expressed the same thought while explaining the provisions on the floor of the Senate.³⁴ When suggesting the addition of the clause, the Chairman of the Commission's Legislative Committee said: ". . . it relates to safety."³⁵ In the House the member in charge of the bill characterized the provisions as tending "greatly to promote careful operation for safety on the highways," and spoke with assurance of the Commission's ability to "formulate a set of reasonable rules . . . including therein maximum labor-hours service on the highway."³⁶ And in the report of the House Committee a member set out separate views criticizing the delegation of discretion to the Commission and proposing an amendment providing for an eight-hour day for "any employee engaged in the operation of such motor vehicle."³⁷

The Commission and the Wage and Hour Division, as we have said, have both interpreted Section 204(a) as relating solely to safety of operation. In any case such interpretations are entitled to great weight. This is peculiarly true here where the interpretations involve "contemporaneous construction of a statute by the men charged with the responsibility of setting its machinery in motion; of making the parts work efficiently and smoothly while they are yet untried and new."³⁸ Furthermore, the Commission's interpretation gains much persuasiveness from the fact that it was the Commission which suggested the provisions' enactment to Congress.³⁹

It is important to remember that the Commission has three times concluded that its authority was limited to securing safety of operation. The first interpretation was made on December 29, 1937, when the Commission stated: ". . . until the Congress shall have given us a more particular and definite command in the premises, we shall limit our regulations concerning maximum hours of service to those employees whose functions in the operation of motor vehicles make such regulations desirable because of safety considerations."⁴⁰ This expression was half a year old when Congress enacted the Fair Labor Standards Act with the exemption of Section 13(b) (1). Seemingly the Senate at least was aware of the Commission's investigation of its powers even before its interpretation was announced.⁴¹ Under the circumstances it is unlikely indeed that Congress would not have explicitly overruled the Commission's interpretation had it intended to exempt others than employees who affected safety from the Labor Standards Act.

It is contended by appellees that the difference in language between subsections (1) and (2) and subsection (3) is indicative of a congressional purpose to restrict the regulation of employees of private carriers to "safety of operation" while inserting broader authority in (1) and (2) for employees of common and contract carriers. Appellants answer that the difference in language is explained by the difference in the powers. As (1) and (2) give powers beyond safety for service, goods, accounts and records, language limiting those subsections to safety would be inapt.

Appellees call our attention to certain pending legislation as sustaining their view of the congressional purpose in enacting the Motor Carrier Act. We do not think it can be said that the action of the Senate and House of Representatives on this pending transportation legislation throws much light on the policy of Congress or the meaning attributed by that body to Section 204(a). Aside from the very pertinent fact that the legislation is still unadopted, the legislative history up to now points only to a hesitation to determine a controversy as to the meaning of the present Motor Carrier Act, pending a judicial determination.⁴²

One amendment made to the then pending Motor Carrier Act has relevance to our inquiry. Section 203(b) reads as set out in the note below.⁴³

⁴³ "(b) Nothing in this part, except the provisions of section 204 relative to qualifications and maximum hours of service of employees and safety of operation ~~or~~

The words, "except the provisions of section 204 [304] relative to qualifications and maximum hours of service of employees and safety of operation or standards of equipment," italicized in the note, were added by amendment in the House after the passage of S. 1629 in the Senate with the addition of the disputed clause to Section 204(a) (1) and (2).⁴⁴ It is evident that the exempted vehicles and operators include common, contract and private carriers. It seems equally evident that where these vehicles or operators were common or contract carriers, it was not intended by Congress to give the Commission power to regulate the qualifications and hours of service of employees, other than those concerned with the safety of operations.

Our conclusion, in view of the circumstances set out in this opinion, is that the meaning of employees in Section 204 (a) (1) and (2) is limited to those employees whose activities affect the safety of operation. The Commission has no jurisdiction to regulate the qualifications or hours of service of any others. The decree of the district court is accordingly reversed and it is directed to dismiss the complaint of the appellees. It is so ordered.

Reversed with directions.

BEACH v. UNITED STATES

United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, 1944.
79 App.D.C. 208, 144 F.2d 533.

GRONER, C. J. Appellant was indicted and convicted in the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia of violation of the Mann White Slave Act. The evidence disclosed that she was the operator of a house of prostitution in the City of Washington and on the day in question accompanied one of the inmates of the house to the Hamilton Hotel, some four blocks away, for purposes of prostitution. The trip from the house to the hotel was made in a taxicab, appellant paying her own and her companion's fare.

The question we must decide is whether the Mann Act ¹ is applicable in a prostitution case involving transportation solely within the District of Columbia.

We are obliged, at the outset, to admit that the literal language of the Act justifies the judgment below and its affirmance by this court. But as Mr. Justice Frankfurter recently remarked, "The notion that because the words of a statute are plain, its meaning is also plain, is merely pernicious oversimplification."² And this, he said, is true, because "A statute, like other living organisms, derives significance and sustenance from its environment, from which it cannot be severed without being mutilated. Especially is this true where the statute, like the one before us, is part of a legislative process having a history and a purpose. The meaning of such a statute cannot be gained by confining inquiry within its four corners. Only the historic process of which such legislation is an incomplete fragment—that to which it gave rise as well as that which gave rise to it—can yield its true meaning."

Long before the Mann Act, which, as everyone knows, was passed in an effort to put an end to commercialized interstate vice, Congress had legislated for the District of Columbia with relation to the subjects covered in that Act. And at the time of passage of the Act a local law of the District fitted like a glove the offence charged in the indictment we are now considering. By its terms it was made unlawful for "any prostitute" (which expression is descriptive of appellant in this case) to invite or persuade any person to go with her to any house or building for the purpose of prostitution.³ At the time of the passage of the Mann Act, perhaps the same day, since both Acts were approved June 25, 1910, Congress passed a local pandering statute,⁴ making it a misdemeanor to entice or force any woman to go to a house of assignation, which is this case, except that here the "victim", herself a professional prostitute, went to the assignation willingly and expectantly. In the debate on a bill punishing pandering in the District of Columbia, Congressman Mann objected stating: "The bill which has already passed the House (referring to the Mann Act), and which I introduced, covers this entire subject in the District of Columbia."⁵ Congressman Borland, who had introduced the District bill, replied: "I will say to the gentleman that it does not. The bill that passed the House was designed to regulate the national part of it, so far as it affected interstate commerce, and could regulate nothing else. This is a local bill, as much as a bill of a state legislature regulating police power."⁶ In the debate on the Mann Act, Congressman Sims, one of its leading exponents and a member of the District Committee, stated on the floor that the suggestion had occurred to him that the Mann Act should include "at least the maintaining of a house for such purposes in the District of Columbia." He went on to say: "We discussed that informally. Some members of the Committee thought it might be regarded as an unfavorable amendment to the bill itself. I called up Major Sylvester (Superintendent of Police) and talked with him about the matter, and asked him if he thought such legislation as I proposed would be of benefit to the District. He said it would not be of any benefit whatever. He said he thought at present that the matter was in the best condition for police control, and inasmuch as the gentleman whose duty it is to enforce laws governing such matters in the District so expressed himself, I thought it was my duty not to set up my individual judgment as against his. Therefore, I did not offer the amendment, and I would not vote for it now, believing as I do, that it would not help the measure, and neither would it help the conditions in the District of Columbia."⁷ evidenced by legislative bills introduced and passed from time to time after the enactment of the Mann Act, to cover the local situation and to reach every aspect of the offence defined in that Act,—and which in addition cover completely the whole subject of prostitution, however committed, in the District of Columbia. One section of the present law prohibits the offence itself;⁸ another, the offence of operating a house of prostitution;⁹ another, the act of procuring a person to live in prostitution;¹⁰ or procuring a person for acts of prostitution;¹¹ or procuring a person for the immoral enjoyment of a third person;¹² another, for inviting or inducing a person to go with him or her for purposes of prostitution anywhere in the District, or to a residence, or any other house or building (including a hotel), or to accompany or follow him or her to any place whatever within the District, including parks or elsewhere, for purposes of prostitution;¹³ and finally the Pandering Act itself,¹⁴ which makes it a felony for any person in the District of Columbia to induce any female to reside in a house of prostitution, to engage in prostitution, or to reside with any other person for the purpose of prostitution. So complete is the coverage that about the only place in which the act can be done without running athwart the local law is in an anchored balloon.

It is, we think, too clear for argument that Congress in the enactment of these local laws designed and intended them to cover the entire local field, and neither at the time of the passage of the Mann Act, nor since, considered it—except in its interstate aspect—to apply to the District of Columbia. Any other conclusion would, it seems to us, convict Congress of doing the wholly useless and unnecessary thing of repeatedly giving thought and attention to the passage of local laws paralleling in every essential aspect the provisions of the Mann Act, and in many respects going well beyond its provisions. In this view it is proper to bear in mind the well-considered Supreme Court dictum in the recent case of Mortensen v. United States,¹⁵ in which Mr. Justice Murphy, speaking for the Court, said: “We do not here question or reconsider any previous construction placed on the Act which may have led the federal government into areas of regulation not originally contemplated by Congress. But experience with the administration of the law admonishes us against adding another chapter of statutory construction and application which would have a similar effect and which would make possible even further justification of the fear expressed at the time of the adoption of the legislation that its broad provisions ‘are liable to furnish boundless opportunity to hold up and blackmail and make unnecessary trouble, without any corresponding benefits to society.'"

It is difficult to think that this language was inadvertent, when it so plainly admonishes us not to impose on the Mann Act a new phase of construction which, with no corresponding benefits to society, will open wider than it is the door to blackmailing.

Considered then in that light, we think it not only proper but mandatory to apply here the rule announced by the Supreme Court in Holy Trinity Church v. United States, 143 U.S. 457, 472, 12 S.Ct. 511, 516, 36 L.Ed. 226, in which the literal construction of a statute, just as plain as the one we are considering, was rejected because—"It is the duty of the courts, under these circumstances, to say that, however broad the language of the statute may be, the act, although within the letter, is not within the intention of the legislature, and therefore cannot be within the statute."

In that case, as in this, the statute was the result of a definite evil, to control which the legislature, the Supreme Court said "used general terms with the purpose of reaching all phases of that evil; and thereafter, unexpectedly, it is developed that the general language thus employed is broad enough to reach cases and acts which the whole history and life of the country affirm could not have been intentionally legislated against."

We think we should also give weight to the canon of statutory construction not long ago referred to by Mr. Justice Stone in the case of United States v. Katz, 271 U.S. 354, 357, 46 S.Ct. 513, 514, 70 L.Ed. 986, as follows: "All laws are to be given a sensible construction; and a literal application of a statute, which would lead to absurd consequences, should be avoided whenever a reasonable application can be given to it, consistent with the legislative purpose."

In the spirit of that principle, when we come to examine the consequences of the application of the Mann Act to pandering in the District, we at once confront an unhappy situation of divided authority between local and national prosecuting agencies. Such an undesirable situation would assuredly not make for responsible government; but apart from that, the line of division between the jurisdiction of local and national authorities would be based on the accidental circumstance of who induced the woman to ride in a taxi, or a street car, or a public elevator. The guilt or innocence of the accused would under the Mann Act depend upon the ludicrous circumstance whether the woman was "transported" by any means or in any manner without cost to herself. In every such case the offense which, had she walked, would have constituted a misdemeanor, would become at once a felony and an invitation to extortion and all similar kindred evils.

It does not appear from the record in this case why a prosecution of doubtful validity was brought under the Mann Act, when a conviction certainly could have been obtained on the same or less evidence under the local statutes.

Furthermore, once we apply locally the provisions of the Mann Act, we should also be required to accept the results implicit in the doctrine of the Caminetti case;¹⁶ and this, notwithstanding the Department of Justice has sought to avoid some of these by instructing district attorneys to exercise discretion in the prosecution of what are called "non-commercial" cases; and also, to avoid, as far as possible, prosecution of cases involving elements of blackmail. And this may be all very well as a national policy; but when we consider that not since the passage of the Mann Act has the prosecution of an offense of this nature been begun in the District of Columbia under that Act, and when we recognize, as we do, that this is true because of the preemption by Congress of the local field in the passage of local laws fully covering the whole subject, we think we should be slow to write-in this new chapter of literal interpretation contrary to what is shown to be the real Congressional purpose.

Reversed.

EDGERTON, ASSOCIATE JUSTICE (dissenting).

The question as I see it is whether we may amend an Act of Congress by striking out a clause which we think unfortunate. The Mann Act provides: "Any person who shall knowingly transport or cause to be transported . . . in interstate or foreign commerce, or in any Territory or in the District of Columbia, any woman or girl for the purpose of prostitution¹ or debauchery . . . shall be deemed guilty of a felony"²

Since the words that Congress used in the Mann Act can mean only one thing it is unnecessary to consider their legislative history. But their legislative history confirms their deliberate use and their plain meaning. . . .

Of the intention of Congress, in every sense and by every test, to deal with transportation which does not cross the District line, there is in my opinion not the slightest doubt. It is true that words do not always mean what they superficially appear to say. Sometimes they are used in special and unfamiliar senses, and sometimes in entirely new senses. But with deference to my colleagues, I think this has nothing to do with the case since (1) the context, (2) the Committee reports, and (3) the debates in Congress all show that the words "in the District of Columbia" mean exactly what they say and there is no evidence that they mean anything else. The court makes a case for the proposition that the inclusion of the District of Columbia in the Mann Act is unfortunate, but that is not the question. I submit this dissent not in defense of the Mann Act but in defense of the authority of Congress. Courts have often construed statutes in novel and questionable ways, but they have not often read an entire phrase completely out of a statute. They did not do so in any of the cases which this court cites. No euphemism can obscure the fact that this court does so when it imposes upon clear and simple words a construction which allows them no effect. It thereby substitutes for a constitutional and relatively democratic legislative process one that is neither democratic nor constitutional.

NOTES

1. On certiorari the decision of the Court of Appeals was reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States in United States v. Beach, 324 U.S. 193, 65 S.Ct. 602, 89 L.Ed. 865 (1944), on the ground that none of the enactments of local application to the District of Columbia speaks of "transportation" for immoral purposes and hence the Mann Act conflicts with no other legislation applicable to the District. The plain meaning, being in accord with the Act's legislative history showing its intended application, must be given effect.

PEOPLE v. MINTER

Appellate Department, Superior Court of California, 1948.
73 Cal.App.2d Supp. 994, 167 P.2d 11.

BISHOP, JUDGE. The defendant sold a pint of whiskey, and as he had no license, he stands convicted on the charge that, by the sale, he had exercised a privilege and performed an act which a person holding a license might exercise and perform under the authority of his license. In support of his appeal from the judgment of conviction the defendant argues that as the sale took place at an hour when a licensee could not legally make a sale, it follows that he had not done an act which a holder of a license might perform. . . .

Defendant's first contention is made possible by the backhanded manner in which the legislature has made it a misdemeanor to sell whiskey without a license. The offense is created in section 3 of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act (Act 3796, Deering's General Laws, Stats. 1935, p. 1123, as amended) by these words: "No person shall exercise the privilege or perform any act or acts which a licensee under this act may exercise or perform under the authority of a license issued under this act unless such person is authorized to do so by a license duly issued pursuant to the provisions of this act. Any person violating any provision of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor . . ."

Later in the act, in section 59.6, we find that it is made a misdemeanor for an off-sale licensee to sell any alcoholic beverage after 8 o'clock p.m. or before 10 o'clock a.m. . . .

The sale which got the defendant into trouble occurred, all witnesses agreed, about 2 o'clock a.m. One of the witnesses had asked the defendant if he could sell him a bottle of good whiskey. The defendant, who was driving a cab, indicated that he could comply with the request. He drove to a place where two other bottles were later discovered, went to the rear of the premises, and returned with a pint bottle. He then drove a short distance before he stopped at a street light, stated the price was $7.00, and in exchange for marked bills gave the witness a pint bottle, labelled "Old Crow Whiskey—100 Proof."

Defendant's first argument, which is that a sale of whiskey at 2 o'clock in the morning is neither performing an act nor exercising a privilege which a licensee might legally perform or exercise, has just enough foundation in the literal structure of the charge, and in the wording of section 3, upon which the charge was based, to make it plausible. However, to place the interpretation upon section 3 contended for by the defendant would result in permitting an unlicensed person to sell intoxicating liquor with impunity during the hours a licensed person is expressly forbidden to do so. Such an interpretation would be out of harmony with the injunction contained in the first section of the act, that "all provisions of this act shall be liberally construed for the accomplishments of these purposes," one of the purposes referred to having been earlier declared in the section to be "to eliminate the evils of unlicensed . . . selling . . . of alcoholic beverages." In addition to the rule of interpretation expressed in the act itself, we know that "Once the intention of the legislature is ascertained it will be given effect even though it may not be consistent with the strict letter of the statute (citing cases). In construing a statute it must be remembered that no law is to be construed in such a manner as to result in a palpable absurdity." People v. Black, 1941, 45 Cal.App.2d 87, 94, 113 P.2d 746, 750. . . .

MAX RADIN, A CASE STUDY IN STATUTORY INTERPRETATION

33 Calif.L.Rev. 219, 228 (1945).

It is . . . true that the consideration of the consequences of a decision has at all times been a controlling factor in the judicial process. Those courts who declare vigorously that they are completely indifferent to the consequences of what they decide, and would decide as they do though the heavens fell, merely mean that they do not really believe that the consequences will be seriously harmful. If they meant what they said, and acted on it, they would be taking a long step toward the destruction of our judicial system.

NOTE

In Jewish Kasher Provision Corp. v. Gottfried, 63 N.Y.S.2d 160 (1946), the question was whether an employee's wrong in embezzling his employer's money by short-weighting the employer in delivery of meats so permeated a contract for restitution as to render it non-dischargeable by the employee's bankruptcy. In the course of his opinion answering the question affirmatively, Benjamin, J., said: "To aid in determining this question, counsel have been unable to furnish the Court with any authority in our State and as far as this Court knows the question is one of original impression in our jurisdiction.

"Section 103, subdivision a(4) of the Bankruptcy Act, 11 U.S.C.A., provides that debts which arise on a contract, express or implied, may be proved in bankruptcy. Section 17 of the Bankruptcy Act, 11 U.S.C.A. § 35, provides as follows:

"A discharge in bankruptcy shall release a bankrupt from all of his provable debts, except such as . . .

"(second) are liabilities for obtaining property by false pretenses or false representations, or for willful and malicious injuries to the person or property of another, or . . .

"(fourth) were created by his fraud, embezzlement, misappropriation, or defalcation while acting as an officer or in any fiduciary capacity . . ."

"The intent of Congress with respect to these provisions must be determined in the light of the results sought to be achieved by the Congressional enactment. Statutory construction to be vital must necessarily involve more than a mere exercise in semantics. We are not concerned merely with form, choice of words or punctuation but must look beyond, to the substance. Certainly, it was never intended by Congress that persons guilty of larceny from their employers could be freed of their obligation to make restitution by a discharge in bankruptcy. On the contrary, the opposite purpose was expressly stated. The provisions relating to the discharge of contracts must be read in the light of the provisions preserving the obligation ex maleficio. The ultimate result can be arrived at only through a reasonable reconciliation of all of the appropriate provisions of the Bankruptcy Act."

"The position of the defendant, reduced to simple language, is that having induced the plaintiff to waive its right to immediate repayment and to agree to take payments in installments, that he may now by the relatively simple process of a discharge in bankruptcy evade the civil consequences of his original crime. Such a result places a premium upon cunning, intrigue and fraud to the complete discouragement of the sociological and humane values inherent in the forbearance of the employer.

"This Court would be unwilling to say that a humane employer who makes an agreement funding the obligation for the restoration of the stolen property in easy installments, thereby places himself in a position where his right of recovery may become barred. This Court would be extremely reluctant to place such a penalty upon the quality of mercy. Rather does it appear to the Court that to suffer such a result would be merely to encourage an additional item of fraud since the agreement of restitution, followed by a petition in bankruptcy, would then be a convenient subterfuge for the evasion of the original obligation. Such a result would tend to prevent and render impossible all reasonable attempts to achieve restitution by agreement.

"It is the opinion of the Court that the Bankruptcy Law was not intended to provide a mechanism to impose a second fraud upon the earlier one. Congress intended that obligations having an ordinary commercial inception be dischargeable while obligations ex maleficio continue in force and effect."

SECTION 3. INTRINSIC AND EXTRINSIC AIDS AND THE PROBLEM OF AMBIGUITY

A. Introductory

INTRODUCTORY NOTE

The elaborate apparatus of so-called intrinsic and extrinsic aids which fills most text-books on statutory interpretation has resulted mainly from judicial adherence to the literal approach. In case after case, having chosen the literal approach and read the letter of the text in reference to the found facts, and having adjudged the meaning to be ambiguous rather than plain, assistance was sought from the sources regarded as most likely to resolve the ambiguity in accordance with the "intention of the legislature". Concerning the modern use of intrinsic aids John Willis has said: "You will observe that your court always adopts a single uniform technique: it asks three questions; (1) what is the meaning of these words when read alone; (2) what is the meaning of these words when read together with the rest of the words of the Act; (3) what is the meaning of these words when read against the background of that part of human conduct with which the Act deals. Put more shortly it takes into account, (1) ordinary meaning, (2) context, (3) subject matter. You should not be too much impressed by this heartening phenomenon of judicial uniformity, or by the amount of space which judges devote to it in their opinions. No technique has much effect on final result—least of all this technique. If the court decides that the meaning of the words is 'plain', then, of course, . . . 'interpretation' is unnecessary and the technique is inapplicable. If, on the other hand, the words are ambiguous enough to induce two people to spend good money in backing two opposing views as to their meaning, no man of sense would expect to find the question settled by a reference to such a vast and vague field as 'the rest of the words of the Act' or 'the part of human conduct with which the Act deals'. Examine the cases and you will see that the court, after discussing 'ordinary meaning', 'context', and 'subject matter', always concludes its opinion in one of two ways: either it refers to the 'object' of the Act, i.e., calls to its aid the 'mischief rule' . . . , or else it invokes one of the 'presumptions'." ¹

The intrinsic aids most often used today were considered supra in Chapter 6, Section 2, in relation to the problem of choice and arrangement of language for legislative drafting, and incidentally in connection with other topics (e.g. Chapter 5, Section 5). They should now be reviewed from the point of view of the counsellor and advocate, and the material is regrouped here accordingly.

In this Section the main emphasis is placed upon the use of aids extrinsic to the statute; an area of law in which is manifested one of the most significant trends in the development of modern legal method.

O. W. HOLMES, THE THEORY OF LEGAL INTERPRETATION

12 Harv.L.Rev. 417, 418, 419-420 (1899); Collected Papers 203-204, 206-207; New York, 1920 (Harcourt, Brace and Howe).

It is true that in theory any document purporting to be serious and to have some legal effect has one meaning and no other, because the known object is to achieve some definite result. It is not true that in practice (and I know no reason why theory should disagree with the facts) a given word or even a given collocation of words has one meaning and no other. A word generally has several meanings, even in the dictionary. You have to consider the sentence in which it stands to decide which of those meanings it bears in the particular case, and very likely will see that it there has a shade of significance more refined than any given in the word-book. But in this first step, at least, you are not troubling yourself about the idiosyncrasies of the writer, you are considering simply the general usages of speech. So when you let whatever galvanic current may come from the rest of the instrument run through the particular sentence, you still are doing the same thing. How is it when you admit evidence of circumstances and read the document in the light of them? Is this trying to discover the particular intent of the individual, to get into his mind and to bend what he said to what he wanted? No one would contend that such a process should be carried very far, but, as it seems to me, we do not take a step in that direction. It is not a question of tact in drawing a line. We are after a different thing. What happens is this. Even the whole document is found to have a certain play in the joints when its words are translated into things by parol evidence, as they have to be. It does not disclose one meaning conclusively according to the laws of language. Thereupon we ask, not what this man meant, but what those words would mean in the mouth of a normal speaker of English, using them in the circumstances in which they were used, and it is to the end of answering this last question that we let in evidence as to what the circumstances were. But the normal speaker of English is merely a special variety, a literary form, so to speak, of our old friend the prudent man. He is external to the particular writer, and a reference to him as the criterion is simply another instance of the externality of the law. . . .

I have stated what I suppose to be our general theory of construction. It remains to say a few words to justify it. Of course, the purpose of written instruments is to express some intention or state of mind of those who write them, and it is desirable to make that purpose effectual, so far as may be, if instruments are to be used. The question is how far the law ought to go in aid of the writers. In the case of contracts, to begin with them, it is obvious that they express the wishes not of one person but of two, and those two adversaries. If it turns out that one meant one thing and the other another, speaking generally, the only choice possible for the legislator is either to hold both parties to the judge's interpretation of the words in the sense which I have explained, or to allow the contract to be avoided because there has been no meeting of minds. The latter course not only would greatly enhance the difficulty of enforcing contracts against losing parties, but would run against a plain principle of justice. For each party to a contract has notice that the other will understand his words according to the usage of the normal speaker of English under the circumstances, and therefore cannot complain if his words are taken in that sense.

Different rules conceivably might be laid down for the construction of different kinds of writing. In the case of a statute, to turn from contracts to the opposite extreme, it would be possible to say that as we are dealing with the commands of the sovereign the only thing to do is to find out what the sovereign wants. If supreme power resided in the person of a despot who would cut off your hand or your head if you went wrong, probably one would take every available means to find out what was wanted. Yet in fact we do not deal differently with a statute from our way of dealing with a contract. We do not inquire what the legislature meant; we ask only what the statute means. . . .

CHARLES B. NUTTING, THE AMBIGUITY OF UNAMBIGUOUS STATUTES

24 Minn.L.Rev. 509-513 (1940).

. . . What is ambiguity? Resort to Webster produces the following: "Ambiguousness in meaning arising from language admitting of more than one interpretation; duplexity in meaning." Undaunted, we refer to "ambiguous," and discover that it indicates that which is "capable of being understood in either of two or more possible senses; equivocal." Light begins to dawn. A word is ambiguous if it has two or more possible meanings. But what is meaning? Immediately gloom descends once more. To formulate an adequate conception of "meaning" for the purposes of statutory interpretation is a task of surprising difficulty. "Words," say Ogden and Richards, "as everyone now knows, 'mean' nothing by themselves. . . ."¹ But this general knowledge seems not to have permeated some tribunals of last resort.²

¹The Meaning of Meaning (3d ed. 1930) 9. The authoritative character of this work, which has been used extensively in the preparation of the following article, may have been overemphasized, due to the present writer's inexperience in the field of semantics. It is intended, however, merely to cite it as representing an interesting and reasonable point of view, and to follow some of its implications as they relate to statutory interpretation.

²It is believed, for example, that much of the difficulty underlying the application of the contracts clause to legislation enacted under the "police power" is due to the assumption on the part of some courts that the word "contract" has a settled "meaning" which can easily be ascertained and applied. Cf. the following: "I necessarily conclude that the prohibition against the impairment of contracts by the legislature is so clear that it is only by an unwarranted judicial distortion

If words "mean" nothing by themselves, it seems the sheerest nonsense to assert that words are either ambiguous or unambiguous. Students of semantics seem to agree, though perhaps not all would adopt the same terminology, that a word has "meaning" when it symbolizes a referent.³ Words such as "fascism" or "democracy" have no "meaning" because they do not stand for any referent. The word "apple" may have "meaning" if it stands for a particular object, the existence of which may be verified. Complex symbols such as "contract," "ownership" and "title" may have "meaning" since they stand for a group of referents, each of which must be present.⁴ It might be said that a word is ambiguous if it stands for more than one referent. But this is against the rules. Quoting again from Ogden and Richards, "One symbol stands for one and only one referent."⁵ If a word is not a symbol it has no "meaning." If it is a symbol, it cannot be ambiguous. Therefore words either "mean" nothing or have but one "meaning." But Webster says that an ambiguous word is one which is "capable of being understood in either of two or more possible senses." This may indicate that if it is possible for hearers to find more than one referent for a word it is ambiguous. It is possible, though perhaps not reasonable, for hearers to make more than one reference when any word is pronounced. Thus, when the word "apple" is heard the reference "orange" or "tomato" may be made and so on, ad infinitum. Or, if the word "dog" is pronounced, reference to either "Rover" or "Spot" is possible. If this position is taken, all words become ambiguous. This tends to become discouraging, and of its plain provisions that the moratory law could be upheld. The meaning of the constitutional provision is so clear that it is not subject to construction. The idea that an existing emergency could change its meaning is clearly disproved by a reading of the simple language contained in the provision itself. . . ." Carter, J., specially concurring in First Trust Company v. Smith, (1938) 134 Neb. 84, 129, 277 N.W. 762, 784. But if the word "contract" may "mean," among other things, an agreement entered into between parties in the light of existing laws, including the power of the legislature to act in furtherance of the general welfare, the invalidity of moratory legislation becomes less obvious. As to the "meaning" of the expression "freedom of contract," compare Adkins v. Children's Hospital (1923) 261 U.S. 525, 43 S.Ct. 394, 67 L.Ed. 785, and West Coast Hotel Co. v. Parrish (1937) 300 U.S. 379, 57 S.Ct. 587, 81 L.Ed. 703.

induces a type of verbal paralysis which is common to amateurs in the field of semantics.

Experts on statutory interpretation, however, have never studied semantics. This is perhaps a good thing. At any rate, certain basic assumptions seem to underly the interpretive process. One of these appears to be that "intention" has something to do with interpretation. In the case of private integrations⁶ it is usually said that words are to be interpreted in accordance with the "intention" of the parties.⁷ When statutes are involved, the "intention" of the legislature is said to control.⁸ This may indicate that the words of a contract or statute will be held by the courts to be symbols of the referents the parties or the legislature had in mind.⁹ This assumes first that the parties and the legislature did have referents in mind; second, that all the parties and all the members of the legislature had the same referents in mind; and third, that it is possible to discover what the referents are. In the case of integrations by private parties, it seems obvious that this idea is not to be taken seriously. Not the "subjective intent," but the "objective manifestations of intent" are considered by the courts.¹⁰ Thus, the fact that an integration is ambiguous in the sense that the parties actually had different referents in mind, or "meaningless" in the sense that the words used did not symbolize referents, becomes irrelevant in many cases. The court will select its own referents, and hold that the words are symbols of those referents. In other words

¹⁰ "It is customarily said that mutual assent is essential to the formation of informal contracts, but it should further be stated that the mutual assent must be manifested by one party to the other, and except as so manifested is unimportant. In some branches of the law, especially in the criminal law, a person's secret intent is important, but in the formation of contracts it was long ago settled that secret intent was immaterial, only overt acts being considered in the determination of such mutual assent as that branch of the law requires." Williston and Thompson, Contracts (rev. ed. 1936) § 22. See Restatement of the Law of Contracts, § 20.

the court will declare that an integration "means" what it (the court) thinks it "means."¹¹ This will ordinarily be explained by the statement that the parties have made an objective manifestation of their intention in clear and unmistakable terms, and that they cannot vary those terms by the introduction of parol evidence to show their actual intention.¹²

However, on occasion, the court will not be satisfied as to what the referent is. In this case, the integration will be called "ambiguous" and an attempt will be made to determine the referent understood by the parties. Here, moral considerations seem to enter into the picture. If each party is innocent with respect to the existence of the "ambiguity," the words used will be held to symbolize the referent which each party had in mind. If it happens that the court is satisfied that each party had the same referent in mind, it will say that a "contract" is present; otherwise there will be no contract. On the other hand, if one of the parties was at fault with respect to the occurrence of the "ambiguity," then the referent the other party had in mind is selected as being the true one, and it will be said that there is a "contract" on the basis of the "meaning" attached by the innocent party.¹³ Therefore it appears that, dependent on such circumstances as have been indicated, a "contract" may "mean" what both parties think it "means," what neither party thinks it "means" or what one of the parties thinks it "means."

Much the same sort of thing is to be found if statutes rather than private integrations are considered. . . .

MAX RADIN, "STATUTORY INTERPRETATION"

43 Harv.L.Rev. 863, 868-869 (1930).

. . . A statute is neither a literary text nor a divine revelation. Its effect is therefore neither an expression laden with innumerable emotional overtones nor a permanent creation of infallible wisdom. It is a statement of a situation, or rather of a group of possible events within a situation, and as such is essentially ambiguous. This word is a pejorative expression in the mouths of most persons and seems to suggest that an ambiguous sentence can have two contradictory meanings; that, for example, it can permit what it seems to forbid. But of course that is not what the word "ambiguous" ought to suggest. A statement is ambiguous if there are two possible meanings—any two

¹¹ Perhaps this is not an entirely fair way of putting it. It is not intended to convey the suggestion that courts are often capricious or unreasonable. The "meaning" given an integration by the courts will usually coincide with that which would be given it by any other unbiased observer. But since the courts actually make the decisions, it is their "meaning" which is really adopted rather than that of a hypothetical reasonable man.

¹³ Restatement of Contracts, sec. 233.

—and it can make no difference whether or not they partially contradict each other.

If therefore a group of events is described in a statute, there must at least be two which will fit that description, and since events are unique, any description of a group is almost by definition ambiguous. But although “unambiguous” and “plain” have been equated, the equation is not quite justified. It is still possible to find a plain statute, even though its meaning involves several things rather than one.

Mr. W. E. Johnson, whose Logic is one of the most considerable of recent contributions to this much-discussed subject, has given us in his differentiation of determinables and determinates a valuable instrument for presenting the meaning of statutes. The situation described in a statute is generally a determinable; that is to say, it is a statement which involves a number of possible events or individualizations, any one of which would be correctly described by that determinable. A determinable of this sort can be made more nearly determinate by reducing the number of possible individualizations, and it becomes quite determinate when it is so expressed that there is only one.

A statute which ratifies a particular past act by a named person deals with a determinate event. So does a private bill, granting a pension to a named person or divorcing a named couple. Such statutes are therefore themselves determinates. But they are very few compared with the statutes in general, and a still smaller number of such statutes are ever discussed in law. If they are so discussed, it certainly can be said of them that they are plain and unambiguous. But they may still be plain, though perhaps no longer unambiguous, if, being determinables, they are so nearly determinate that we can indicate almost at once all the ways in which they can become determinate. If there were a statute which provided that “when the President dies, the Vice-President shall at once ipso facto become President,” it would be a determinable, because there might be an indefinite number of future presidents and vice-presidents, but it would be plain enough, because the number of cases is after all much smaller than in almost any other statutory determinable. It will hardly be necessary to say that most of our most specific statutes fall considerably short of this ready determinability, and consequently no great limitation is imposed by the self-denying ordinance which renounces “interpretation” when the statute is plain. As a matter of fact, in most cases when courts say that a statute is plain and therefore needs no interpretation, they do so in the inverted fashion which marks so much of the judicial process. They have already interpreted, and they then declare that so interpreted the statute needs no further interpretation.

The act of interpretation, however, is not that of rendering a determinable quite determinate. The determinate involved is the actual issue in litigation. As soon as it is made apparent that the statutory determinable does or does not cover this determinate event, the act of interpretation is finished. It consists therefore in making a determinable somewhat more nearly determinate. Our inquiry must then turn to the methods by which this is done. . . .

OLD HOMESTEAD BAKERY v. MARSH

District Court of Appeal, California, 1928. 75 Cal.App. 247, 242 P. 749.

HART, J. . . . The purpose of this proceeding is to obtain a judicial determination of the question whether the provision of the state Motor Vehicle Act authorizing the imposition of a registration fee of $50 for the registration of electric motor vehicles intended for use and used for the transportation of passengers for hire or the transportation of property is or is not, when measured by certain mandates of the state and federal Constitutions, a valid enactment. The position here of the petitioner is that it is in violation of the state Constitution, in that it imposes upon such motor vehicles a fee "in excess of that imposed upon any other automotive vehicles designed and used for the transportation of passengers for hire, or for the transportation of property," and is therefore discriminatory; that it is "based upon an unreasonable and arbitrary classification."

The provision to which the objections above stated are here interposed is in subdivision (b) of section 77 of the act of the Legislature of 1923, (Stats. 1923, p. 517 et seq.), the object of which, generally stated, is to regulate the use and operation of vehicles upon the public highways, and to provide for the registration and identification of motor vehicles, etc., and for the payment of registration fees therefor. Said subdivision reads:

"(b) A registration fee of ten dollars shall be paid for the registration of every electric passenger motor vehicle and a registration fee of fifty dollars shall be paid for the registration of every electric motor vehicle designed and used for the transportation of passengers for hire or for the transportation of property. Such fees shall be in addition to the fees specified in subdivision (a) of this section."

The preceding subdivision (a) provides for the payment of a registration fee of $3 for the registration of every motor vehicle, trailer or semitrailer, except for such as are by the act expressly exempted from the operation of said subdivision.

The act of 1923 was intended to supersede the statute of 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 639), which provided, in elaborate detail, rules and regulations governing the use and operation of motor vehicles over and upon the public highways of the state. Under said act registration fees for all motor vehicles, regardless of the kind of power by which they were operated, were rated upon the basis of the horsepower of the vehicle, and therefore, the amount of such fee which was required to be paid was according to the horsepower of the vehicle. That act, with some amendments thereto by subsequent Legislatures, remained the law until the passage of the act of 1923 above mentioned. Among the several changes made in the act of 1913 was that by the Legislature of 1915 (Stats. 1915, pp. 397, 401), whereby motor vehicles operated by electricity were, as to registration fees, removed from the general class of motor vehicles and set off in a class by themselves, or, in other words, the electric motor vehicles were taken from the horse power basis for the charging of registration fees and the owners thereof required to pay for each such vehicle a flat registration fee of $5. The gas vehicles were still retained by said act in their original class for registration fee rating purposes; that is to say, they were still subject to the horse power system of rating the registration fees. . . .

. . . . It may well be assumed that the plan adopted into the act of 1913 for the raising of revenue for highway purposes by prescribing graduated registration fees to be paid by owners of gas-propelled motor vehicles and a flat fee for electric motor vehicles was finally found to be entirely inadequate to the raising of such revenue in an amount each year which would satisfy the increased and the still growing financial exactions of highway improvement and upkeep, since it is true that the Legislature of 1923 passed an act establishing an entirely new system for the raising of revenue for said purpose, so far as gas and other fuel cars are concerned, by requiring, practically, the owners or operators of all such cars to pay to the state, in addition to nominal registration fees, 2 cents per gallon for all gas consumed in the operation thereof. Stats. 1923, p. 571. It is true that the license tax of 2 cents per gallon on all fuel gas sold and distributed by those engaged in the business of selling the same for motor vehicle purposes is not a direct license tax upon those owning or using such vehicles; yet that the act operates indirectly to impose upon the owners or operators of such vehicles a tax of 2 cents on every gallon of gas that they purchase for use in propelling motor vehicles is, from the very nature and logic of the situation, indisputably true. This proposition irresistibly follows from the fact that taxes assessed against the goods and wares of the vendor thereof and by him paid are always included in so-called "overhead expenses," and, of course, constitute an element in the fixing of the market value of the goods, or, at all events, is an element of the cost of the goods to the consumer, and that the tax upon such gas provided by the act was intended by the Legislature to be substituted for and in lieu of the license tax on motor vehicles propelled by means of gas, and graded according to the horse power standard, as provided by the act of 1913, is plainly shown by the provisions or the language thereof. . . .

The Attorney General, representing the respondent, insists that, to determine whether the Legislature, in providing for the raising of revenue for highway improvement purposes by imposing upon owners or other persons operating motor vehicles over and upon the highways of the state certain license fees or taxes, has or has not discriminated in favor of gas propelled as against electric-propelled motor vehicles, the two statutes of 1923—the one dealing with automotive highway traffic and other matters pertaining to the use of motor vehicles, and the other levying a fuel gas tax of 2 cents per gallon, to be paid by all persons operating such vehicles propelled by gas—must be read and considered together as being in pari materia. This position is vigorously assailed by counsel for the petitioner. They assert that the doctrine of in pari materia, being a mere rule of construction, may appropriately be invoked only where there are two or more statutes dealing with cognate or interrelated subjects, and one contains words of such dubious or doubtful meaning as to make it uncertain what the Legislature intended to say by the use of such words; that in such case such statute may be read and considered with such other statute or statutes to ascertain the true meaning of such words or the intent of the Legislature in so using them. In other words, and in brief, the position of petitioner's counsel is that the application of the rule referred to is limited to the ascertainment of the meaning of ambiguous words in a particular statute of several dealing with the same general subject, and is not to be resorted to for the purpose of obtaining light upon the question whether it was the legislative intent that the several statutes should together constitute a single plan or scheme for the accomplishment of a particular object. To the contention thus stated we are unable to agree. We can think of no good reason which may stand as in support of it. To the contrary, we accept as expounding the sounder interpretation of the doctrine the following statement thereof in 36 Cyc. p. 1147:

"Statutes in pari materia are those which relate to the same person or thing, or to the same class of persons or things. In the construction of a particular statute, or in the interpretation of any of its provisions, all acts relating to the same subject, or having the same general purpose, should be read in connection with it, as together constituting one law. The endeavor should be made, by tracing the history of legislation on the subject, to ascertain the uniform and consistent purpose of the Legislature (italics ours), or to discover how the policy of the Legislature with reference to the subject-matter has been changed or modified from time to time. With this purpose in view therefore it is proper to consider, not only acts passed at the same session of the Legislature, but also acts passed at prior and subsequent sessions, and even those which have been repealed."

See, also, State ex rel. American Piano Co. v. Superior Court, 105 Wash. 676, 679, 178 P. 827, 828; Paltro v. Aetna Casualty & Surety Co., 119 Wash. 101, 204 P. 1044, 1046; Ford v. Harbor Commissioners, 81 Cal. 19, 29, 22 P. 278; Irelan v. Colgan, 96 Cal. 413, 414, 415, 31 P. 294; German Sav. & Loan Society v. Ramish, 138 Cal. 120, 128, 69 P. 89, 70 P. 1067; 31 Corpus Juris, p. 358, and cases named in the footnotes.

Furthermore, "the rule that statutes in pari materia should be construed together applies with peculiar force to statutes passed at the same session of the Legislature; it is to be presumed that such acts are imbued with the same spirit and actuated by the same policy, and they are to be construed together as if parts of the same act. They should be so construed, if possible, as to harmonize, and force and effect should be given to the provisions of each." 36 Cyc. p. 1151.

And particularly in the construction of statutes relating to revenue and taxation is the rule applicable and invariably invoked upon the theory that all such statutes constitute one law. People v. Cleveland, C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co., 306 Ill. 459, 138 N.E. 196; Commonwealth v. P. Lorillard Co., 129 Va. 74, 105 S.E. 683; State v. Covington, 35 S.C. 245, 14 S.E. 499. . . .

. . . Where a legislative act contains no uncertain or misleading words, but, taken alone, although the subject-matter thereof be within legislative cognizance, it would, nevertheless, offend certain restrictions or inhibitions of the state or federal Constitution, then, in that case, if there be any other statute or statutes in pari materia with such act, the several acts or statutes should be construed together as if they constitute but one law, if in so doing they harmonize in the achievement of the central purpose of their enactment and at the same time remain within the commands or inhibitions of the state and federal Constitutions.

It is perfectly clear, as has been before stated, that the provisions themselves of the act of 1923 imposing a tax of 2 cents on every gallon of fuel gas to be used in gas-propelled motor vehicles, show that the Legislature, ex industria, intended that that plan of imposing a privilege tax on those operating or causing to be operated such motor vehicles upon the highways of the state should be in lieu of the registration fee such persons were theretofore required to pay. We therefore hold that the two acts of 1923 under consideration, in so far as they provide, respectively, for a registration fee for electric motor vehicles and the excise or privilege tax on gas for gas-propelled motor vehicles were intended to constitute a single plan or scheme for compelling persons operating, or causing to be operated, motor vehicles upon the public highways of the state to pay a fee or a tax, according to the character of such vehicles as to the method of their propulsion, and that the two acts in that particular are in pari materia; that, in effect, they constitute one law. So considering the two acts we can perceive no reason for holding that there is any discrimination in the matter of the privilege fee or tax which the operators of the two classes of motor vehicles are, respectively, required to pay. We cannot so declare from the face of the statutes. It may be that, in particular instances, the amount paid by the operators of gas-propelled motor vehicles used for the transportation of passengers or property in some years is and will be less than the flat fee required to be paid by operators of freight or passenger electric motor vehicles. On the other hand, it may be (and we doubt not that this is true) that in many instances the amount paid as the tax on fuel gas purchased and used by persons operating or causing to be operated gas-propelled passenger or freight motor vehicles is annually far in excess of the sum of $50 the amount of the registration fee exacted from those operating like electric motor vehicles. The problem is not one of easy solution. It is, however, a problem the solution of which is peculiarly and exclusively one of legislative cognizance, and an approximately fair and equitable adjustment of the whole matter is, perhaps, all that may or should reasonably be expected. The presumption is that the Legislature, in establishing the existing plan, fully investigated the facts upon which it acted in fixing a flat fee in the one case and a fuel gas tax in the other, and in placing the fee for electric motor vehicles used for freight or passenger transportation at $50, and the statutes themselves constitute a finding that the system established by those acts will bring, and has brought, about as near an equitable adjustment, as between the operators of the two classes of motor vehicles so used, of the amounts they should respectively pay for the privilege of using the highways as is practicable. Cooley's Const. Limitations, 187; Stevenson v. Colgan, 91 Cal. 649, 653, 27 P. 1089, 14 L.R.A. 459, 25 Am.St.Rep. 230. Of course, the courts cannot go behind legislative enactments which, upon their face, are in complete harmony with the Constitution, and, by a resort to evidence, attempt to ascertain whether the Legislature, in passing them, did or did not observe or remain within the restrictions which the Constitution has placed upon its power as a coordinate branch of the government, or has or has not properly performed the duty which is not only enjoined upon it by the Constitution but which its members by their oaths bound themselves properly to perform. Stevenson v. Colgan, supra. . . .

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

NOTES

1. The Supreme Court of the United States has consistently held that when two acts are in pari materia, the one passed later may be used as an aid in interpreting the earlier. See United States v. Freeman, 3 How. (U.S.) 556, 564 (1845), Tiger v. Western Investment Co., 221 U.S. 286, 309, 31 S.Ct. 578, 55 L.Ed. 738 (1911), Great Northern Ry. v. United States, 315 U.S. 262, 276, 62 S.Ct. 529, 86 L.Ed. 836 (1942).

In United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 148 F.2d 416, 429 (C.C.A.N.Y. 1945), the court said that "In United States v. Hutcheson, 312 U.S. 219, 61 S.Ct. 463, 85 L.Ed. 788 (1940), a later statute in pari materia was considered to throw a cross light upon the Anti-trust Acts, illuminating enough even to override an earlier ruling of the court."

2. See Ex parte Crow Dog, 109 U.S. 556 (1883) (statutes in pari materia may be referred to even though repealed).

3. Does the method of applying the doctrine of in pari materia resemble that of developing case law by analogy?

4. Crawford, The Construction of Statutes, (1940) at p. 435 states that the resort to statutes in pari materia can be justified on the ground that it may be assumed that all statutes which relate to the same subject matter were enacted in accord with the same general legislative policy, and that together they constitute a harmonious or uniform system of law.

E. The Common Law

Since a statute is a constituent part of the whole body of law of each jurisdiction in which it applies, the common law obviously forms part of its external context. As such the common law, particularly on the same subject, is similarly available with statutes in pari materia as an aid to interpretation.

F. Previous Judicial Interpretation

(i) BY THE SAME COURT

Review here the material in Chapter 1, Section 2(C), which appears supra, pp. 41–85.

(ii) OF STATUTES ADOPTED FROM OTHER JURISDICTIONS

CATHCART v. ROBINSON

Supreme Court of the United States, 1831. 5 Pet. 264, 8 L.Ed. 120.

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the Court.

This is a suit in chancery brought by the appellee in the Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, to enforce the specific performance of a contract entered into between him and James L. Cathcart, one of the appellants, for the sale and purchase of a tract of land, called Howard, lying in the county of Alexandria; and also to subject a claim of the said Cathcart on the United States, under the provisions of the eleventh article of the treaty with Spain, signed at Washington on the 22d of February, 1819, to the payment of the purchase money.

The agreement, which was executed on the 10th of September, 1822, stipulated that Robinson should convey to Cathcart the place called Howard, as soon as a proper deed could be made: that Cathcart should pay therefor the sum of eight thousand dollars by instalments; the first payment of five thousand dollars to be made on the 1st of January, 1825, and the residue in three equal annual payments, to commence from that time. To secure these payments, Cathcart agreed to execute four bonds, bearing interest from the first day of January, 1825; and, as a further security, to execute a deed of trust, with his wife's relinquishment of dower, upon Howard, and likewise on the total amount of his claim on the United States, under the provisions of the eleventh article of the treaty with Spain, signed at Washington on the 22d of February, 1819; and the contract concluded with the following words: "In further confirmation of the said agreement, the parties bind themselves, each to the other, in the penal sum of one thousand dollars."

At the date of this agreement Howard was in possession of a tenant, John T. O. Wilbar, who had a right to hold the premises till the end of the year. Under an arrangement with Cathcart he surrendered possession of the place soon after the purchase was made.

Previous to the contract of the 10th of September, 1822, on the 10th of November, 1818, James L. Cathcart executed a deed conveying to John Woodside, the father of Mrs. Cathcart, for her benefit, all his property, including his claim under the Spanish treaty. This deed conveying wills, is recorded in the proper office for the recording of deeds conveying lands, in the city of Washington.

. . . Mr. Cathcart, in the contract of the 10th of September, 1822, agreed to secure the payment of the purchase money for Howard by the execution of a deed of trust "on the total amount of his claim on the United States, under the provisions of the 11th article of the treaty with Spain." If the penalty be substituted for the purchase money, it should certainly retain the protection of the same security. But the plaintiff in error alleges that he had disabled himself from complying with this part of the contract, by his previous conveyance of this fund to John Woodside in trust for Mrs. Cathcart and her issue.

This being a voluntary conveyance is, at this day, held by the Courts of England to be absolutely void under the statute of 27 Elizabeth, against a subsequent purchaser, even although he purchased with notice, 1 Mad.Ch. 271, 18 Ves. 110. 2 Taunton, 523. Their decisions do not maintain that a transaction, valid at the time, is rendered invalid by the subsequent act of the party. They do not maintain that the character of the transaction is changed, but that testimony afterwards furnished may prove its real character. The subsequent sale of the property is carried back to the deed of settlement, and considered as proving that deed to have been executed with a fraudulent intent to deceive a subsequent purchaser.

The statute of Elizabeth is in force in this district. The rule, which has been uniformly observed by this Court in construing statutes, is to adopt the construction made by the Courts of the country by whose legislature the statute was enacted. This rule may be susceptible of some modification, when applied to British statutes which are adopted in any of these states. By adopting them they become our own as entirely as if they had been enacted by the legislature of the state. The received construction in England at the time they are admitted to operate in this country, indeed to the time of our separation from the British empire, may very properly be considered as accompanying the statutes themselves, and forming an integral part of them. But however we may respect subsequent decisions, and certainly they are entitled to great respect, we do not admit their absolute authority. If the English Courts vary their construction of a statute which is common to the two countries, we do not hold ourselves bound to fluctuate with them.

At the commencement of the American revolution, the construction of the statute of 27 Elizabeth seems not to have been settled. The leaning of the Courts towards the opinion that every voluntary settlement would be deemed void, as to a subsequent purchaser, was very strong; and few cases are to be found in which such conveyance has been sustained. But these decisions seem to have been made on the principle that such subsequent sale furnished a strong presumption of a fraudulent intent; which threw on the person claiming under the settlement the burthen of proving it from the settlement itself, or from extrinsic circumstances, to be made in good faith; rather than as furnishing conclusive evidence not to be repelled by any circumstances whatever.

There is some contrariety and some ambiguity in the old cases on the subject: but this Court conceives that the modern decisions establishing the absolute conclusiveness of a subsequent sale to fix fraud on a family settlement, made without valuable consideration, fraud not to be repelled by any circumstances whatever—go beyond the construction which prevailed at the American revolution; and ought not to be followed.

The universally received doctrine of that day unquestionably went as far as this. A subsequent sale, without notice, by a person who had made a settlement not on valuable consideration, was presumptive evidence of fraud; which threw on those claiming under such settlement the burthen of proving that it was made bona fide. This principle, therefore, according to the uniform course of this Court, must be adopted in construing the statute of 27 Elizabeth as it applies to this case.

The strong presumption of fraud arising from the subsequent conveyance to Mr. Robinson, is not repelled by a single circumstance. On the contrary, all the circumstances which can be collected from the record come in aid of it.

[Specific performance refused. Judgment for plaintiff in penal sum.]

STATE v. CHAPLAIN

Supreme Court of Kansas, 1917. 101 Kan. 413, 166 P. 238.

DAWSON, J. This action was a prosecution for the embezzlement of a piano. The defendant, a piano dealer in Concordia, sold the piano to the prosecuting witness for $325, taking her promissory note therefor. At the time of the sale the purchaser paid $50 in cash, which payment was indorsed on the note, and two days later the defendant discounted and sold the note to a stranger. The piano was purchased as a wedding present for the purchaser's daughter, and defendant agreed to keep the piano until after the daughter's marriage and then ship it to the daughter at Iola. Defendant defaulted in both these particulars. The state's evidence tended to prove that defendant employed a drayman to haul the piano to the railway depot and shipped it out of town. Plaintiff's evidence does not clearly show where or to whom the piano was shipped, but did show that it was effectually made away with. Defendant's evidence tended to show that he had formerly sold the piano on installments to one Shinn; that Shinn had defaulted on his payments, and that defendant had taken back the piano, and that he sold it to the prosecuting witness subject to the possibility of Shinn's resumption of payments and the reinstatement of his right to the piano; and it might be equivocally inferred from defendant's evidence that he intended to supply another piano in its stead, but whether to prosecutrix or to Shinn is mere conjecture so far as the record discloses. Other features of defendant's evidence were that the wholesale house in St. Joseph which supplied defendant with pianos sent a man to take charge of defendant's business in Concordia, and that the latter, and not the defendant, had caused the piano to be shipped out of town and disposed of. Much correspondence between the prosecuting witness and the defendant was introduced, but no purpose would be served by detailing it here. The jury found the defendant guilty as charged. . . .

It is first urged that the motion to quash the information should have been sustained. The information was drawn under section 136 of the Crimes Act, which provides that if any carrier or other bailee shall embezzle or convert to his own use, or make way with or secrete, any goods or property under his care, etc., he shall, upon conviction, be adjudged guilty of larceny, etc. Defendant contends that this statute, being copied from the Missouri Crimes Act (Rev.St.1909, § 4552) should be construed here as there, and that in Missouri the scope of this statute has been restricted by the doctrine of ejusdem generis to bailees of the nature and classification of carriers. The doctrine of ejusdem generis is all right in a limited way, and the same is true as to the rule that when a statute of another state is adopted the antecedent, authoritative interpretations of that state are likewise adopted; but the latter rule is not an invariable one, nor is it followed where the foreign interpretation is too severe a shock to the intelligence of the courts of the adopting state.

Moreover, when the adopting state has given the statute its own interpretation and applied that interpretation for a long stretch of years without amendment by its own Legislature, the presumption that the foreign interpretation at variance therewith was adopted with the act no longer obtains. In time, when many independent interpretations of the act have been made by the adopting state, it is no longer of any consequence what were the interpretations given to the act before its adoption from the foreign state. This section of the Crimes Act has never been interpreted—or perverted—in Kansas to mean that only a bailee like a carrier, or akin to a carrier, could be prosecuted or punished under its terms. It was held in this state nearly 40 years ago, to apply to a bailee who embezzled a gelding (State v. Small, 26 Kan. 209); it has been applied many times to bailees other than carriers and not of the classification of carriers, non ejusdem generis, who embezzled public funds (State v. Spaulding, 24 Kan. 1); also to embezzlers of private funds (State v. Combs, 47 Kan. 136, 27 Pac. 818); and to a warehouseman charged with the embezzlement of a quantity of wheat (State v. Wales, 98 Kan. 790, 160 P. 204). A multitude of such cases could be cited from our own reports sustaining prosecutions of embezzling bailees who were not like carriers except in the one respect in which all bailees are alike—persons intrusted with the possession of other people's personal property.

The judgment is affirmed.

COLVER v. McINTURFF

Supreme Court of Kansas, 1923. 112 Kan. 604, 212 P. 908.

MASON, J. In a motion for a rehearing the plaintiff, in support of his contention that the interpretation of a Kansas Statute (Gen.Stat. 1915, § 2055) adopted from Missouri in 1855, repealed in 1859, and re-enacted in 1868, is controlled by a Missouri decision rendered in 1857, invokes the rule that—

“A statute literally or substantially re-enacting a prior statute after its words have received a judicial interpretation must be regarded as adopted with knowledge of such construction and with the intention that it should thereafter be interpreted in the same way.” Black’s Law of Judicial Precedents, § 75.

The same principle has been thus expressed:

“It is a settled rule of statutory construction that when a statute or a clause or provision thereof has been construed by the court of last resort of a state, and the same is substantially re-enacted, the Legislature adopts such construction, unless the contrary is clearly shown by the language of the act, or the rules of statutory construction have been changed.” 25 R.C.L. 1075, 1076.

In each case the obvious meaning is that, where a court of last resort interprets a statute of its own state which is afterwards re-enacted, the re-enactment is deemed to adopt the construction as well as the language of the former act. If it has ever been held that the Legislature in re-enacting a statute of its own state is regarded as accepting an interpretation placed upon the same language by the court of the state in which it was first used, in the course of an opinion handed down after it had been copied by the other, such search as we have had opportunity to make has failed to discover it, and the logic of such a decision, if found, would not appeal to us strongly. The texts above quoted appear to recognize the rule we have already applied, that, where the Legislature in framing a law uses the language of an act it had formerly repealed, it is regarded as adopting its own earlier statute rather than as going back to that of another state where the language had been first used. In interpreting a re-enacted territorial statute in accordance with the construction previously given it by the body charged with its administration, the federal Supreme Court has said:

“The presumption that the codifiers of 1901 knew and approved the practice of the board certainly is as strong as the presumption that the original enactors of the statute knew a single decision in another state; and it is more important since it refers to a later time.” Copper Queen Mining Co. v. Arizona Board, 206 U.S. 474, 479, 27 Sup.Ct. 695, 696 (51 L.Ed. 1143).

The motion for a rehearing is overruled.

NOTE

Judicial interpretation of statutes made subsequent to their adoption by courts of the state from which they were adopted have been held highly persuasive in the adopting state in Febock v. Jefferson County, 219 Wis. 154, 262 N.W. 588 (1935), 101 A.L.R. 95; Harris v. Diamond Const. Co., 184 Va. 711, 36 S.E.2d 573 (1946).

CHRISTGAU v. WOODLAWN CEMETERY ASS'N

PETERSON, JUSTICE. This action is brought under the Minnesota unemployment compensation law, Mason Minn.St.1940 Supp. §§ 4337-21 to 4337-42, to recover unemployment compensation contributions from defendant as an employer of labor. There are 12 causes of action set forth covering the period from January 1, 1936 to September 30, 1939.

Defendant makes two claims of exemption from liability. One is of total exemption upon the ground that it is a corporation organized and operated exclusively for charitable purposes. . . .

Defendant was organized as a public cemetery in 1862 under Rev. Statutes, 1851, c. 37. It is governed now by Mason Minn.St.1927, §§ 7557-7624. The answer alleges that defendant was organized for the sole purpose of operating and maintaining a public cemetery; that it was authorized by law to engage in no other business, except such as is incident thereto; that it has no stock; that its members are the owners of the lots; that its members are not liable to assessment by it; that its trustees serve without compensation; and that no part of its earnings or any profit inure to the benefit of any individual or member.

Defendant has a permanent improvement fund for the perpetual care of burial lots, which was established pursuant to statute. This and the income therefrom it is alleged may not be used for any purpose other than that for which the fund was established. Certain trust funds are held by defendant upon trusts specified by the donors. Defendant has other funds, received and to be used exclusively for upkeep and maintenance of the cemetery.

Plaintiff demurred to the answer. The demurrer was sustained as to those parts in which defendant claimed a partial exemption on the ground of agricultural labor and was overruled as to the defense of exemption upon the ground that defendant was organized and operated exclusively for charitable purposes. . . .

The claim of exemption as a charitable corporation is based on Mason Minn.St.1940 Supp. § 4337-22, subd. H, which so far as here material defines employment as follows:

"(6) The term 'employment' shall not include:

. (a) (b) (c) (d)

* [The court's footnotes are omitted. Ed.]

"(i) Services performed in the employ of a corporation, community chest, fund, or foundation, organized and operated exclusively for religious, charitable, scientific, literary, or educational purposes, or for the prevention of cruelty to children or animals, no part of the net earnings of which inures to the benefit of any private shareholder or individual."

This provision is exactly the same as the corresponding provision of the federal social security act, 42 U.S.C.A. § 409(b) (8). The argument in support of the claim that defendant is a charitable corporation is that it is operated without profit and financial benefit to any member or individual in discharging the public function of providing burial for the dead. . . .

A corporation which owns and operates a public cemetery without profit is not organized exclusively for charitable purposes, within the meaning of clauses excluding corporations organized and operated exclusively for charitable purposes from state unemployment compensation acts which, like ours, copied the exclusion clause from the federal social security act. Proprietors of Cemetery of Mount Auburn v. Fuchs, Mass., 25 N.E.2d 759; Industrial Commission v. Woodlawn Cemetery Ass'n, 232 Wis. 527, 287 N.W. 750. There is no authority to the contrary. Defendant is precisely what it purports to be,—a public cemetery and not a public charity. . . .

Extrinsic aids of practically conclusive character in support of our views are found in the history and the purposes of the legislation.

The history of § 4337-22, subd. H, shows that it was copied verbatim from the exclusionary clause of the federal social security act, which in turn was copied from the federal income tax act. The meaning of the words "a corporation . . . organized and operated exclusively for . . . charitable . . . purposes" in the federal acts was that a public cemetery was not a charitable institution the same as if there had been explicit definition to that effect. The state statute adopted the language of the federal act with the same meaning.

The income tax provisions of the federal revenue act of 1918 (40 Stat. 1057) allowed the taxpayer a deduction for gifts or contributions to corporations organized and operated exclusively for religious, charitable, scientific or educational purposes, or for the prevention of cruelty to children and animals. Later posts of the American Legion and women's auxiliaries thereof were added. The act at first exempted all those corporations from paying the tax. Public cemeteries were not included, but were subsequently added by a separate section. These sections of the statutes have been re-enacted without change, except for some additions, in 1924, 1926, 1928, 1932, 1934, 1936 and 1938 (26 U.S.C.A.Int.Rev.Acts, p. 1 et seq.).

The federal income tax law received uniform administrative, judicial, and legislative interpretation that a public cemetery is not a charitable corporation. That interpretation was based upon the same reasoning as our decision in the Bishop Seabury Mission case, supra, that the enumeration of cemeteries, public charities and the other subjects enumerated, restricted the meaning of each so as to exclude the others enumerated, in consequence of which a public cemetery was not a public charity. . . .

There were three re-enactments of income tax provisions containing the language here involved without alteration after construction by the administrative regulation, viz.: in 1928, 1932 and 1934, prior to the enactment of the federal social security act in 1935. 42 U.S.C.A. § 301 et seq. Where a statute has received a known, settled construction we have said that upon re-enactment the legislature must be presumed to have adopted and that the re-enacted statute should receive the prior construction. Wenger v. Wenger, 200 Minn. 436, 274 N.W. 517. In Helvering v. Bliss, 293 U.S. 144, 55 S.Ct. 17, 79 L.Ed. 246, 95 A.L.R. 207, the sections containing the language involved here were held to have been approved by Congress by repeated re-enactment without change. . . .

Congress exercised its legislative power to manifest its intention by adopting the meaning given to its language by the prior administrative interpretation. Of course its action was prospective in operation. The law making branch declares its own intention "with a plausible aim; for it professes to furnish aid to a correct understanding of its intention, and thus to facilitate the primary judicial inquiry in the exposition of the law." 2 Lewis' Sutherland Statutory Construction (2d) § 358, pp. 683-684. See: 25 R.C.L. p. 1047, § 275.

This clause has been a pattern for similar provisions not only in the social security but in other federal revenue acts such as the estate tax and gift tax acts. The estate tax law was enacted in 1918, section 400 et seq., 40 Stat. 1096. In 1929 the board of tax appeals sustained the construction of the act by the commissioner of internal revenue that the language in question did not comprehend a cemetery of the kind involved here. Wilber Nat. Bank, etc., v. Com'r of Int. Rev., 17 B.T.A. 654. The act has been re-enacted since without change, thereby making such construction part thereof and giving it the force of law.

Congress used the words in the social security act with the same meaning as in the income tax provisions of the various revenue acts. The revenue acts of the United States are in pari materia. 25 R.C.L. p. 1068, § 292, note 10, citing many decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. Not only are statutes presumed to have been passed with deliberation and full knowledge of all existing legislation on the subject, but they are deemed to have been regarded by the law makers as being parts of a connected whole, where they are in pari materia, although considered by the legislature at different times and under distinct and varied aspects of the subject. "Such a principle is in harmony with the actual practice of legislative bodies and is essential to give unity to the laws, and connect them in a symmetrical system." 2 Lewis' Sutherland Statutory Construction, 2d Ed., p. 853, § 448. The several provisions are, therefore, to be construed as governed by the same spirit and policy. Where the same language is used in different sections it will be presumed that it is used with the same meaning until the contrary is shown. While the reasons which have just been stated are in themselves sufficiently persuasive to compel the conclusion that the language has the same meaning in both acts, it affirmatively appears from the deliberations of Congress that such was the intention, thus putting the matter beyond all dispute. When the bill for the social security act was before Congress, the language in question was identical with that of the income tax law. An amendment was proposed to add hospitals to the list of subjects excluded from the act's coverage. The amendment was withdrawn lest it interfere with the long continued construction given the language by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in interpreting the income tax law. Thus it appears that the Congress not only deliberately used the same language in the social security act as in the income tax law, but that it did so with the intention that the language in the social security act should have the same meaning as in the income tax law. . . .

The State of Minnesota adopted the Minnesota unemployment compensation act on December 24, 1936. The language in question is an exact copy of that in the federal social security act. The federal social security authorities furnished forms of bills to the state authorities, which were adopted with little, if any, change. Minnesota, like Massachusetts, Wisconsin, and other states, adopted the language in question without any change. The state act was adopted with a view to approval by the federal authorities, which has been given, in order to obtain federal contributions of funds and other benefits. Where the state government, acting independently in its own sphere, copies a federal statute, the state act will be construed to have the same meaning as the federal act. Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. v. Paine & Nixon Co., 182 Minn. 159, 234 N.W. 453. In Campbell v. Motion Picture Machine Operators' Union, etc., 151 Minn. 220, 186 N.W. 781, 27 A.L.R. 631, the question was whether the state anti-trust law should be construed the same as the Sherman federal anti-trust act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 1 et seq., from which it was copied. There were persuasive arguments against the construction of the Sherman act adopted by the federal courts. We held that the state statute was intended to have the same meaning as the federal act and followed the federal rule, pointing out that it would be anomalous to have the state and federal courts applying different rules to the same facts under identical provisions of law and quoted Mr. Justice Mitchell in National Bank of Commerce v. Chicago, B. & N. R. Co., 44 Minn. 224, 46 N.W. 342, 346, 9 L.R.A. 263, 20 Am.St.Rep. 566, speaking on a question of commercial law where no statute was involved: "The inconvenience and confusion that would follow from having two conflicting rules on the same question in the same state, one in the federal courts and another in the state courts, is of itself almost a sufficient reason why we should adopt the doctrine of the federal courts on this question."

The statutes involved in the Pittsburgh Glass and the Campbell cases as well as the principles of law involved in the National Bank of Commerce case related to the independent purposes and objects of the state of the same kind as those of the federal government. The statute involved here is not only the same in kind, but was enacted to accomplish the same purposes and objects as the federal act not through independent action by the state, but in conjunction and cooperation with the federal government. Our statute is in the form suggested by federal agencies and has their approval. That it was intended to have the same meaning is manifest. In speaking of the relation between the federal act and those of some 32 states, including Minnesota (these are referred to in the opinion and marginal note 9), Mr. Justice Cardozo in Steward Machine Co. v. Davis, 301 U.S. 548, 57 S.Ct. 883, 891, 81 L.Ed. 1279, 109 A.L.R. 1293, expressed the thought aptly as follows: "The Social Security Act is an attempt to find a method by which all these public agencies may work together to a common end." There can be no justification here for not construing our act as having the same meaning as the federal act—that a public cemetery is not a public charity. . . .

Our conclusion is that defendant is not a charitable corporation and is subject to the tax. It was error to hold otherwise.

(iii) OF RE-ENACTED STATUTES

GIROUARD v. UNITED STATES

Supreme Court of the United States, 1946.
328 U.S. 61, 66 S.Ct. 826, 90 L.Ed. 422.

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS delivered the opinion of the Court.

In 1943 petitioner, a native of Canada, filed his petition for naturalization in the District Court of Massachusetts. He stated in his application that he understood the principles of the government of the United States, believed in its form of government, and was willing to take the oath of allegiance (54 Stat. 1157, 8 U.S.C. § 735(b), 8 U.S.C.A. § 735(b), which reads as follows:

"I hereby declare, on oath, that I absolutely and entirely renounce and abjure all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty of whom or which I have heretofore been a subject or citizen; that I will support and defend the Constitution and laws of the United States of America against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; and that I take this obligation freely without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion: So help me God."

To the question in the application "If necessary, are you willing to take up arms in defense of this country?" he replied, "No (Non-combatant) Seventh Day Adventist." He explained that answer before the examiner by saying "it is a purely religious matter with me, I have no political or personal reasons other than that." He did not claim before his Selective Service board exemption from all military service, but only from combatant military duty. At the hearing in the District Court petitioner testified that he was a member of the Seventh Day Adventist denomination, of whom approximately 10,000 were then serving in the armed forces of the United States as non-combatants, especially in the medical corps; and that he was willing to serve in the army but would not bear arms. The District Court admitted him to citizenship. The Circuit Court of Appeals reversed, one judge dissenting. 1 Cir., 149 F.2d 760. It took that action on the authority of United States v. Schwimmer, 279 U.S. 644, 49 S.Ct. 448, 73 L.Ed. 889; United States v. Macintosh, 283 U.S. 605, 51 S.Ct. 570, 75 L.Ed. 1302, and United States v. Bland, 283 U.S. 636, 51 S.Ct. 569, 75 L.Ed. 1319, saying that the facts of the present case brought it squarely within the principles of those cases. The case is here on a petition for a writ of certiorari which we granted so that those authorities might be re-examined.

The Schwimmer, Macintosh and Bland cases involved, as does the present one, a question of statutory construction. At the time of those cases, Congress required an alien, before admission to citizenship, to declare on oath in open court that "he will support and defend the Constitution and laws of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic, and bear true faith and allegiance to the same."¹ It also required the court to be satisfied that the alien had during the five year period immediately preceding the date of his application "behaved as a man of good moral character, attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same."² Those provisions were reenacted into the present law in substantially the same form.³

While there are some factual distinctions between this case and the Schwimmer and Macintosh cases, the Bland case on its facts is indistinguishable. But the principle emerging from the three cases obliterates any factual distinction among them. As we recognized in Re Summers, 325 U.S. 561, 572, 577, 65 S.Ct. 1307, 1313, 1316, they stand for the same general rule—that an alien who refuses to bear arms will not be admitted to citizenship. As an original proposition, we could not agree with that rule. The fallacies underlying it were, we think demonstrated in the dissents of Mr. Justice Holmes in the Schwimmer case and of Mr. Chief Justice Hughes in the Macintosh case.

The oath required of aliens does not in terms require that they promise to bear arms. Nor has Congress expressly made any such finding a prerequisite to citizenship. To hold that it is required is to read it into the Act by implication. But we could not assume that Congress intended to make such an abrupt and radical departure from our traditions unless it spoke in unequivocal terms.

The bearing of arms, important as it is, is not the only way in which our institutions may be supported and defended, even in times of great peril. Total war in its modern form dramatizes as never before the great cooperative effort necessary for victory. The nuclear physicists who developed the atomic bomb, the worker at his lathe, the seaman on cargo vessels, construction battalions, nurses, engineers, litter bearers, doctors, chaplains—these, too, made essential contributions. And many of them made the supreme sacrifice. Mr. Justice Holmes stated in the Schwimmer case, 279 U.S. at page 655, 49 S.Ct. at page 451, 73 L.Ed. 889, that “the Quakers have done their share to make the country what it is.” And the annals of the recent war show that many whose religious scruples prevented them from bearing arms, nevertheless were unselfish participants in the war effort. Refusal to bear arms is not necessarily a sign of disloyalty or a lack of attachment to our institutions. One may serve his country faithfully and devotedly, though his religious scruples make it impossible for him to shoulder a rifle. Devotion to one's country can be as real and as enduring among non-combatants as among combatants. One may adhere to what he deems to be his obligation to God and yet assume all military risks to secure victory. The effort of war is indivisible; and those whose religious scruples prevent them from killing are no less patriots than those whose special traits or handicaps result in their assignment to duties far behind the fighting front. Each is making the utmost contribution according to his capacity. The fact that his rôle may be limited by religious convictions rather than by physical characteristics has no necessary bearing on his attachment to his country or on his willingness to support and defend it to his utmost.

Petitioner's religious scruples would not disqualify him from becoming a member of Congress or holding other public offices. While Article VI, Clause 3 of the Constitution provides that such officials, both of the United States and the several States, “shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support this Constitution,” it significantly adds that “no religious Test shall ever be required as a Qualification to any Office or public Trust under the United States.” The oath required is in no material respect different from that prescribed for aliens under the Naturalization Act. It has long contained the provision “that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion.” R.S. § 1757, 5 U.S.C. § 16, 5 U.S.C.A. § 16. As Mr. Chief Justice Hughes stated in his dissent in the Macintosh case, 283 U.S. at page 631, 51 S.Ct. at page 577, 75 L.Ed. 1302, “the history of the struggle for religious liberty, the large number of citizens of our country from the very beginning who have been unwilling to sacrifice their religious convictions, and, in particular, those who have been conscientiously opposed to war and who would not yield what they sincerely believed to be their allegiance to the will of God"—these considerations make it impossible to conclude "that such persons are to be deemed disqualified for public office in this country because of the requirement of the oath which must be taken before they enter upon their duties."

There is not the slightest suggestion that Congress set a stricter standard for aliens seeking admission to citizenship than it did for officials who make and enforce the laws of the nation and administer its affairs. It is hard to believe that one need forsake his religious scruples to become a citizen but not to sit in the high councils of state.

As Mr. Chief Justice Hughes pointed out (United States v. Macintosh, supra, 283 U.S. at page 633, 51 S.Ct. at page 578, 75 L.Ed. 1302), religious scruples against bearing arms have been recognized by Congress in the various draft laws. This is true of the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940, 54 Stat. 889, 50 U.S.C.App. § 305(g), 50 U.S.C.A.Appendix, § 305(g),⁴ as it was of earlier acts. He who is inducted into the armed services takes an oath which includes the provision "that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the United States of America; that I will serve them honestly and faithfully against all their enemies whomsoever."⁵ 41 Stat. 809, 10 U.S.C. § 1581, 10 U.S.C.A. § 1581. Congress has thus recognized that one may adequately discharge his obligations as a citizen by rendering non-combatant as well as combatant services. This respect by Congress over the years for the conscience of those having religious scruples against bearing arms is cogent evidence of the meaning of the oath. It is recognition by Congress that even in time of war one may truly support and defend our institutions though he stops short of using weapons of war.

That construction of the naturalization oath received new support in 1942. In the Second War Powers Act, 56 Stat. 176, 182, 8 U.S.C. Supp. IV, § 1001, 8 U.S.C.A. § 1001, Congress relaxed certain of the requirements for aliens who served honorably in the armed forces of the United States during World War II and provided machinery to expedite their naturalization.⁶ Residence requirements were relaxed,

⁴ Sec. 305(g) provides in part:

"Nothing contained in this Act shall be construed to require any person to be subject to combatant training and service in the land or naval forces of the United States who, by reason of religious training and belief, is conscientiously opposed to participation in war in any form. Any such person claiming such exemption from combatant training and service because of such conscientious objections whose claim is sustained by the local board shall, if he is inducted into the land or naval forces under this Act, be assigned to noncombatant service as defined by the President, or shall, if he is found to be conscientiously opposed to participation in such noncombatant service, in lieu of such induction, be assigned to work of national importance under civilian direction."

For earlier Acts see Act of February 24, 1864, 13 Stat. 6, 9; Act of January 21, 1903, 32 Stat. 775; Act of June 3, 1916, 39 Stat. 166, 197, 32 U.S.C.A. § 2; Act of May 18, 1917, 40 Stat. 76, 78, 50 U.S.C.A.Appendix, § 204.

educational tests were eliminated, and no fees were required. But no change in the oath was made; nor was any change made in the requirement that the alien be attached to the principles of the Constitution. Yet it is clear that these new provisions cover non-combatants as well as combatants.⁷ If petitioner had served as a non-combatant (as he was willing to do), he could have been admitted to citizenship by taking the identical oath which he is willing to take. Can it be that the oath means one thing to one who has served to the extent permitted by his religious scruples and another thing to one equally willing to serve but who has not had the opportunity? It is not enough to say that petitioner is not entitled to the benefits of the new Act since he did not serve in the armed forces. He is not seeking the benefits of the expedited procedure and the relaxed requirements. The oath which he must take is identical with the oath which both non-combatants and combatants must take. It would, indeed, be a strange construction to say that "support and defend the Constitution and laws of the United States of America against all enemies, foreign and domestic" demands something more from some than it does from others. That oath can hardly be adequate for one who is unwilling to bear arms because of religious scruples and yet exact from another a promise to bear arms despite religious scruples.

Mr. Justice Holmes stated in the Schwimmer case, 279 U.S. at pages 654, 655, 49 S.Ct. at page 451, 73 L.Ed. 889: "if there is any principle of the Constitution that more imperatively calls for attachment than any other it is the principle of free thought—not free thought for those who agree with us but freedom for the thought that we hate. I think that we should adhere to that principle with regard to admission into, as well as to life within this country." The struggle for religious liberty has through the centuries been an effort to accommodate the demands of the State to the conscience of the individual. The victory for freedom of thought recorded in our Bill of Rights recognizes that in the domain of conscience there is a moral power higher than the State. Throughout the ages men have suffered death rather than subordinate their allegiance to God to the authority of the State. Freedom of religion guaranteed by the First Amendment is the product of that struggle. As we recently stated in United States v. Ballard,

⁷ In re Kinloch, D.C., 53 F.Supp. 521, involved naturalization proceedings of aliens, one of whom, like petitioner in the present case, was a Seventh Day Adventist. He had been inducted into the army as a non-combatant. His naturalization was opposed by the Immigration Service on the ground that he could not promise to bear arms. The court overruled the objection, stating, page 523:

"If conscientious objectors, who are aliens, performing military duty, and wearing the uniform, are not granted the privileges of citizenship under this act, then the act would be meaningless. It would be so made if an applicant, being a conscientious objector, who has attained the status of a soldier, performs military duty, and honorably wears the uniform (as is admitted in the instant cases), is denied citizenship. If the oath of allegiance is to be construed as requiring such applicant to agree, without mental reservation, to bear arms, then the result would be a denial of citizenship, even though Congress has conferred such privilege upon him."

And see In re Sawyer, D.C., 59 F.Supp. 428.

322 U.S. 78, 86, 64 S.Ct. 882, 886, 88 L.Ed. 1148, "Freedom of thought, which includes freedom of religious belief, is basic in a society of free men. West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 63 S.Ct. 1178, 87 L.Ed. 1628, 147 A.L.R. 674." The test oath is abhorrent to our tradition. Over the years Congress has meticulously respected that tradition and even in time of war has sought to accommodate the military requirements to the religious scruples of the individual. We do not believe that Congress intended to reverse that policy when it came to draft the naturalization oath. Such an abrupt and radical departure from our traditions should not be implied. See Schneiderman v. United States, 320 U.S. 118, 132, 63 S.Ct. 1333, 1340, 87 L.Ed. 1796. Cogent evidence would be necessary to convince us that Congress took that course.

We conclude that the Schwimmer, Macintosh and Bland cases do not state the correct rule of law.

We are met, however, with the argument that even though those cases were wrongly decided, Congress has adopted the rule which they announced. The argument runs as follows: Many efforts were made to amend the law so as to change the rule announced by those cases; but in every instance the bill died in committee. Moreover, in 1940 when the New Naturalization Act was passed, Congress reenacted the oath in its pre-existing form, though at the same time it made extensive changes in the requirements and procedure for naturalization. From this it is argued that Congress adopted and reenacted the rule of the Schwimmer, Macintosh, and Bland cases. Cf. Apex Hosiery Co. v. Leader, 310 U.S. 469, 488, 489, 60 S.Ct. 982, 989, 990, 84 L.Ed. 1311, 128 A.L.R. 1044.

We stated in Helvering v. Hallock, 309 U.S. 106, 119, 60 S.Ct. 444, 451, 84 L.Ed. 604, 125 A.L.R. 1368, that "It would require very persuasive circumstances enveloping Congressional silence to debar this Court from re-examining its own doctrines." It is at best treacherous to find in Congressional silence alone the adoption of a controlling rule of law. We do not think under the circumstances of this legislative history that we can properly place on the shoulders of Congress the burden of the Court's own error. The history of the 1940 Act is at most equivocal. It contains no affirmative recognition of the rule of the Schwimmer, Macintosh and Bland cases. The silence of Congress and its inaction are as consistent with a desire to leave the problem fluid as they are with an adoption by silence of the rule of those cases. But for us, it is enough to say that since the date of those cases Congress never acted affirmatively on this question but once and that was in 1942. At that time, as we have noted, Congress specifically granted naturalization privileges to non-combatants who like petitioner were prevented from bearing arms by their religious scruples. That was affirmative recognition that one could be attached to the principles of our government and could support and defend it even though his religious convictions prevented him from bearing arms. And, as we have said, we cannot believe that the oath was designed to exact something more from one person than from another. Thus the affirmative action taken by Congress in 1942 negatives any inference that otherwise might be drawn from its silence when it reenacted the oath in 1940.

Reversed.

MR. JUSTICE JACKSON took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE STONE dissenting.

I think the judgment should be affirmed, for the reason that the court below, in applying the controlling provisions of the naturalization statutes, correctly applied them as earlier construed by this Court, whose construction Congress has adopted and confirmed.

In three cases decided more than fifteen years ago, this Court denied citizenship to applicants for naturalization who had announced that they proposed to take the prescribed oath of allegiance with the reservation or qualification that they would not, as naturalized citizens, assist in the defense of this country by force of arms or give their moral support to the government in any war which they did not believe to be morally justified or in the best interests of the country. See United States v. Schwimmer, 279 U.S. 644, 49 S.Ct. 448, 73 L.Ed. 889; United States v. McIntosh, 283 U.S. 605, 51 S.Ct. 570, 75 L.Ed. 1302; United States v. Bland, 283 U.S. 636, 51 S.Ct. 569, 75 L.Ed. 1319.

In each of these cases this Court held that the applicant had failed to meet the conditions which Congress had made prerequisite to naturalization by § 4 of the Naturalization Act of June 29, 1906, c. 3592, 34 Stat. 596, the provisions of which, here relevant, were enacted in the Nationality Act of October 14, 1940. See c. 876, 54 Stat. 1137, as amended by the Act of March 27, 1942, c. 199, 56 Stat. 176, 182, 183, and by the Act of December 7, 1942, c. 690, 56 Stat. 1041, 8 U.S.C. §§ 707, 723a, 735, 1001 et seq., 8 U.S.C.A. §§ 707, 723a, 735, 1001 et seq., Section 4 of the Naturalization Act of 1906, paragraph "Third", provided that before the admission to citizenship the applicant should declare on oath in open court that "he will support and defend the Constitution and laws of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic, and bear true faith and allegiance to the same." And paragraph "Fourth" required that before admission it be made to appear "to the satisfaction of the court admitting any alien to citizenship" that at least for a period of five years immediately preceding his application the applicant "has behaved as a man of good moral character, attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same." In applying these provisions in the cases mentioned, this Court held only that an applicant who is unable to take the oath of allegiance without the reservations or qualifications insisted upon by the applicants in those cases manifests his want of attachment to the principles of the Constitution and his unwillingness to meet the requirements of the oath, that he will support and defend the Constitution of the United States and bear true faith and allegiance to the same, and so does not comply with the statutory conditions of his naturalization. No question of the constitutional power of Congress to withhold citizenship on these grounds was involved. That power was not doubted. See Selective Draft Law Cases, (Arver v. United States), 245 U.S. 366, 38 S.Ct. 159, 62 L.Ed. 349, L.R.A.1918C, 361, Ann.Cas.1918B, 856; Hamilton v. Regents, 293 U.S. 245, 55 S.Ct. 197, 79 L.Ed. 343. The only question was of construction of the statute which Congress at all times has been free to amend if dissatisfied with the construction adopted by the Court.

With three other Justices of the Court I dissented in the Macintosh and Bland cases, for reasons which the Court now adopts as ground for overruling them.¹ Since this Court in three considered earlier opinions has rejected the construction of the statute for which the dissenting Justices contended, the question, which for me is decisive of the present case, is whether Congress has likewise rejected that construction by its subsequent legislative action, and has adopted and confirmed the Court's earlier construction of the statutes in question. A study of Congressional action taken with respect to proposals for amendment of the naturalization laws since the decision in the Schwimmer case, leads me to conclude that Congress has adopted and confirmed this Court's earlier construction of the naturalization laws. For that reason alone I think that the judgment should be affirmed.

The construction of the naturalization statutes, adopted by this Court in the three cases mentioned, immediately became the target of an active, publicized legislative attack in Congress which persisted for a period of eleven years, until the adoption of the Nationality Act in 1940. Two days after the Schwimmer case was decided, a bill was introduced in the House, R.R. 3547, 71st Cong., 1st Sess., to give the Naturalization Act a construction contrary to that which had been given to it by this Court and which, if adopted, would have made the applicants rejected by this Court in the Schwimmer, Macintosh and Bland cases eligible for citizenship. This effort to establish by Congressional action that the construction which this Court had placed on the Naturalization Act was not one which Congress had adopted or intended, was renewed without success after the decision in the Macintosh and Bland cases, and was continued for a period of about ten years.² All of these measures were of substantially the same pattern as H.R. 297, 72d Cong., 1st Sess., introduced December 8, 1931, at the first session of Congress, after the decision in the Macintosh case. It provided that no person otherwise qualified "shall be debarred from citizenship by reason of his or her religious views or philosophical opinions with respect to the lawfulness of war as a means of settling international disputes, but every alien admitted to citizenship shall be subject to the same obligation as the native-born citizen." H.R. 3547, 71st Cong., 1st Sess., introduced immediately after the decision in the Schwimmer case, had contained a like provision, but with the omission of the last clause beginning "but every alien." Hearings were had before the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization on both bills at which their proponents had stated clearly their purpose to set aside the interpretation placed on the oath of allegiance by the Schwimmer and Macintosh cases.³ There was opposition on each occasion.⁴ Bills identical with H.R. 297 were introduced in three later Congresses.⁵ None of these bills were reported out of Committee. The other proposals, all of which failed of passage (see footnote 2, ante), had the same purpose and differed only in phraseology.

Thus, for six successive Congresses, over a period of more than a decade, there were continuously pending before Congress in one form or another proposals to overturn the rulings in the three Supreme Court decisions in question. Congress declined to adopt these proposals after full hearings and after speeches on the floor advocating the change. 72 Cong.Rec. 6966-7; 75th Cong.Rec. 15354-7. In the meantime the decisions of this Court had been followed in Clarke's Case, 301 Pa. 321, 152 A. 92; Beale v. United States, 8 Cir., 71 F.2d 737; In re Warkentin, 7 Cir., 93 F.2d 42. In Beale v. United States, supra, [71 F.2d 739] the court pointed out that the proposed amendments affecting the provisions of the statutes relating to admission to citizenship had failed saying: "We must conclude, therefore, that these statutory requirements as construed by the Supreme Court have Congressional sanction and approval."

Any doubts that such were the purpose and will of Congress would seem to have been dissipated by the reenactment by Congress in 1940 of Paragraph "Third" and "Fourth" of § 4 of the Naturalization Act of 1906, and by the incorporation in the Act of 1940 of the very form of oath which had been administratively prescribed for the applicants in the Schwimmer, Macintosh and Bland cases. ⁶ Section 307(a) of the Nationality Act, 8 U.S.C. § 707(a), 8 U.S.C.A. § 707(a), provides that no person shall be naturalized unless for a period of five years preceding the filing of his petition for naturalization he "has been and still is a person . . . attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States, and well

The Nationality Act of 1940 was a comprehensive, slowly matured and carefully considered revision of the naturalization laws. The preparation of this measure was not only delegated to a Congressional Committee, but was considered by a committee of Cabinet members, one of whom was the Attorney General. Both were aware of our decisions in the Schwimmer and related cases and that no other question pertinent to the naturalization laws had been as persistently and continuously before Congress in the ten years following the decision in the Schwimmer case. The modifications in the provisions of Paragraphs "Third" and "Fourth" of § 4 of the 1906 Act show conclusively the careful attention which was given to them.

In the face of this legislative history the "failure of Congress to alter the Act after it had been judicially construed, and the enactment by Congress of legislation which implicitly recognizes the judicial construction as effective, is persuasive of legislative recognition that the judicial construction is the correct one. This is the more so where, as here, the application of the statute . . . has brought forth sharply conflicting views both on the Court and in Congress, and where after the matter has been fully brought to the attention of the public and the Congress, the latter has not seen fit to change the statute." Apex Hosiery Co. v. Leader, 310 U.S. 469, 488, 489, 60 S.Ct. 982, 989, 84 L.Ed. 1311, 128 A.L.R. 1044. And see to like effect United States v. Ryan, 284 U.S. 167-175, 52 S.Ct. 65-68, 76 L.Ed. 224; United States v. Elgin, J. & E. R. Co., 298 U.S. 492, 500, 56 S.Ct. 841, 843, 80 L.Ed. 1300; State of Missouri v. Ross, 299 U.S. 72, 75, 57 S.Ct. 60, 62, 81 L.Ed. 46; cf. Helvering v. Winnill, 305 U.S. 79, 82, 83, 59 S.Ct. 45, 46, 47, 83 L.Ed. 52. It is the responsibility of Congress, in reenacting a statute, to make known its purpose in a controversial matter of interpretation of its former language, at least when the matter has, for over a decade, been persistently brought to its attention. In the light of this legislative history, it is abundantly clear that Congress has performed that duty. In any case it is not lightly to be implied that Congress has failed to perform it and has delegated to this Court the responsibility of giving new content to language deliberately readopted after this Court has construed it. For us to make such an assumption is to discourage, if not to deny, legislative responsibility. By thus adopting and confirming this Court's construction of what Congress had enacted in the Naturalization Act of 1906 Congress gave that construction the same legal significance as though it had written the very words into the Act of 1940.

The only remaining question is whether Congress repealed this construction by enactment of the 1942 amendments of the Nationality Act. That Act extended special privileges to applicants for naturalization disposed to the good order and happiness of the United States." Section 335(a) of the Nationality Act, 8 U.S.C. § 735(a), 8 U.S.C.A. § 735(a), provides that before an applicant for naturalization shall be admitted to citizenship, he shall take an oath in open court that inter alia he will "support and defend the Constitution and laws of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic, and . . . bear true faith and allegiance to the same."

who were aliens and who have served in the armed forces of the United States in time of war, by dispensing with or modifying existing requirements, relating to declarations of intention, period of residence, education, and fees. It left unchanged the requirements that the applicant's behavior show his attachment to the principles of the Constitution and that he take the oath of allegiance. In adopting the 1942 amendments Congress did not have before it any question of the oath of allegiance with which it had been concerned when it adopted the 1940 Act. In 1942 it was concerned with the grant of special favors to those seeking naturalization who had worn the uniform and rendered military service in time of war and who could satisfy such naturalization requirements as had not been dispensed with by the amendments. In the case of those entitled to avail themselves of these privileges, Congress left it to the naturalization authorities, as in other cases, to determine whether, by their applications and their conduct in the military service they satisfy the requirements for naturalization which had not been waived.

It is pointed out that one of the 1942 amendments, 8 U.S.C.Supp. IV, § 1004, 8 U.S.C.A. § 1004, provided that the provisions of the amendment should not apply to "any conscientious objector who performed no military duty whatever or refused to wear the uniform." It is said that the implication of this provision is that conscientious objectors who rendered noncombatant service and wore the uniform were, under the 1942 amendments, to be admitted to citizenship. From this it is argued that since the 1942 amendments apply to those who have been in noncombatant, as well as combatant, military service, the amendment must be taken to include some who have rendered noncombatant service who are also conscientious objectors and who would be admitted to citizenship under the 1942 amendments, even though they made the same reservations as to the oath of allegiance as did the applicants in the Schwimmer, Macintosh and Bland cases. And it is said that although the 1942 amendments are not applicable to petitioner, who has not been in military service, the oath cannot mean one thing as to him and another as to those who have been in the noncombatant service.

To these suggestions there are two answers. One is that if the 1942 amendment be construed as including noncombatants who are also conscientious objectors, who are unwilling to take the oath without the reservations made by the applicants in the Schwimmer, Macintosh and Bland cases, the only effect would be to exempt noncombatant conscientious objectors from the requirements of the oath, which had clearly been made applicable to all objectors, including petitioner, by the Nationality Act of 1940, and from which petitioner was not exempted by the 1942 amendments. If such is the construction of the 1942 Act, there is no constitutional or statutory obstacle to Congress' taking such action. Congress if it saw fit could have admitted to citizenship those who had rendered noncombatant service, with a modified oath or without any oath at all. Petitioner has not been so exempted.

Since petitioner was never in the military or naval forces of the United States, we need not decide whether the 1942 amendments authorized any different oath for those who had been in noncombatant service than for others. The amendments have been construed as requiring the same oath, without reservations, from conscientious objectors, as from others. In re Nielsen, D.C., 60 F.Supp. 240. Not all of those who rendered noncombatant service were conscientious objectors. Few were. There were others in the noncombatant service who had announced their conscientious objections to combatant service, who may have waived or abandoned their objections. Such was the experience in the First World War. See "Statement Concerning the Treatment of Conscientious Objectors in the Army", prepared and published by direction of the Secretary of War, June 18, 1919. All such could have taken the oath without the reservations made by the applicants in the Schwimmer, Macintosh and Bland cases and would have been entitled to the benefits of the 1942 amendments provided they had performed military duty and had not refused to wear the uniform. The fact that Congress recognized by indirection, in 8 U.S.C. Supp. IV, § 1004, 8 U.S.C.A. § 1004, that those who had appeared in the role of conscientious objectors, might become citizens by taking the oath of allegiance and establishing their attachment to the principles of the Constitution, does not show that Congress dispensed with the requirements of the oath as construed by this Court and plainly confirmed by Congress in the Nationality Act of 1940. There is no necessary inconsistency in this respect between the 1940 Act and the 1942 amendments. Without it repeal by implication is not favored. United States v. Borden Co., 308 U.S. 188, 198, 199, 203-206, 60 S.Ct. 182, 188, 189, 190-192, 84 L.Ed. 181; State of Georgia v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 324 U.S. 439, 457, 65 S.Ct. 716, 726; United States Alkali Export Ass'n v. United States, 325 U.S. 196, 209, 65 S.Ct. 1120, 1128. The amendments and their legislative history give no hint of any purpose of Congress to relax, at least for persons who had rendered no military service, the requirements of the oath of allegiance and proof of attachment to the Constitution as this Court had interpreted them and as the Nationality Act of 1940 plainly required them to be interpreted. It is not the function of this Court to disregard the will of Congress in the exercise of its constitutional power.

The persuasion that lies behind that doctrine is merely one factor in the total effort to give fair meaning to language."

5. In "Legislative Adoption of Prior Judicial Construction: The Girouard Case and the Reenactment Rule," 59 Harv.L.Rev. 1277 (1946), the author of the Note says (p. 1278): "Analysis of the decisions in which reenactment has been invoked is complicated by the fact that in the vast majority of cases its weight can only be inferred."

"A preliminary outline would recognize three elements: the form of judicial construction, the type of statute construed, and the opportunity for legislative action to alter the construction. The ultimate questions of fact are: (1) What are the chances that the construction reached the attention of the legislature? (2) What are the possibilities that the legislature, if it approved the decision, would have acted as it did? In a few cases these questions may be answered by affirmative evidence that the legislature knew, or that it could not have known, of the construction, and on rare occasions the statute itself will afford internal evidence. In general, however, the problem is one of weighing the inferences from the three variable elements."

After considering in detail the "varying degrees of light and shade" to be derived from State and federal cases as to whether there has been a legislative adoption, he concludes (pp. 1285-1286): "An evaluation of the doctrine of legislative adoption must start from the premise that adoption, once established, should logically be decisive of any statutory construction issue. In the first interpretation of original enactments, the conventional extrinsic aids may be given relative weight, for there is no fixed meaning set before the court. Evidence of legislative adoption, on the contrary, cannot in theory be balanced with other factors. If the legislature has adopted the previous construction, then that construction is the legislative intent, and the court is not free to reconsider. If there has been no adoption, then the court is completely free, subject only to considerations of stare decisis. Use of legislative adoption as an added reason for a decision is both theoretically unsound and subject to practical abuse. Yet this is the status of the doctrine where every reenactment is treated uncritically as creating the presumption of adoption, for the courts are too familiar with its unreality to give it decisive weight in most cases."

"A possible approach might include three elements: (1) a high standard of proof of adoption with the burden on the party urging it; (2) consideration by the court of all relevant factors, with a willingness to give presumptive weight to circumstances suggested as significant in this Note; (3) rigid application of the doctrine as controlling if adoption is found, coupled with its complete rejection if the evidence falls short of the standard. A court will still have to take each case as one of fact, to be decided on circumstantial evidence, but such an approach would at least be explicit, and as realistic as legislative evidence permits."

"Finally, it may be noted that, while the courts can only struggle along with reenactment issues as best they may, it is open to legislatures to limit them, insofar as they arise from affirmative action, by avoiding superfluous reenactment, and by the careful drafting of revisions and reenactments."

W. H. D. WINDER, THE INTERPRETATION OF STATUTES SUBJECT TO CASE LAW

58 Jurid.Rev. 93 (1946).

The words of James, L.J., in Ex p. Campbell, In re Cathcart are often quoted: "Where once certain words in an Act of Parliament have received a judicial construction in one of the superior courts, and the Legislature has repeated them without any alteration in a subsequent statute, I conceive that the Legislature must be taken to have used them according to the meaning which a court of competent jurisdiction has given to them." Lord Macmillan expounded the rule put forward by James, L.J., in this way: "The principle of the rule is that where the language of a statute has received judicial interpretation, and Parliament again employs the same language in a subsequent statute dealing with the same subject-matter, there is a presumption that Parliament intended that the language so used by it in the subsequent statute should be given the meaning which meantime has been judicially attributed to it. Parliament, in short, is to be presumed to have given statutory effect to the judicial interpretation so as to render it as binding on the Courts as if it had been expressly enacted in an interpretation section."

If a judicial interpretation of a statute has been well settled for a considerable time even an appellate court will probably follow it, and the argument for following it will be greater if the terms of the statute have been repeated in a later Act. This results from the accepted principles of case law. For example, in Foskett v. Kaufman (1885) 16 Q.B. 279, 292, 293, C.A., Cotton, L.J., referring to a decision "given by a Court consisting of judges of great eminence," said: "In my opinion it would be wrong of us, although that was not a decision of a Court of Appeal, to interfere with and set it aside, even if we thought it wrong, after the length of time that has elapsed without its having been ever questioned or reversed, and after Parliament with a knowledge of that decision has passed subsequent Acts which have made no change in what was so decided. In my opinion we ought to follow that case." The courts always treat a decision of long standing with careful consideration even though it is not strictly binding. The ordinary rules of judicial precedent have in practice the same effect as has the relaxed form of the rule of statutory construction which Lord Macmillan supports.

It is submitted, however, that when a statute uses a word in its legal meaning Parliament normally can be presumed to intend that this meaning which it has adopted should continue to be expounded by the courts in the same manner as is the law in general. This view seems to be sound in principle and is supported by authorities, positive and negative, already quoted. All words of art are subject to development and interpretation. When the Legislature takes over a legal term it takes over something which has a developing meaning. Why must we presume that its development is intended to be stifled when the Legislature lays its hands on it? It seems more logical to say that Parliament wishes to approve its legal meaning both actual and potential. A strict reading of the rule of construction would lead to the conclusion that Parliament intends to give permanent sanction to the opinion of, perhaps, one judge of first instance. Yet legislators are not habitually so deferential to judge-made law as this, nor are courts of appeal. In the name of legislative intent, judicial precedents would come to have more binding authority than has ever been claimed for them at common law. It is submitted that the true principle is that judicial decisions on words which are incorporated in a later enactment have no more than the accustomed binding authority of decided cases.

CLEVELAND v. UNITED STATES

Supreme Court of the United States, 1946.

[The majority and dissenting opinions in this case appear supra, p. 823.]

MR. JUSTICE RUTLEDGE, concurring.

I concur in the result. . . .

There are vast differences between legislating by doing nothing and legislating by positive enactment, both in the processes by which the will of Congress is derived and stated¹ and in the clarity and certainty of the expression of its will. And there are many reasons, other than to indicate approval of what the courts have done, why Congress may fail to take affirmative action to repudiate their misconstruction of its duly adopted laws. Among them may be the sheer pressure of other and more important business. See Moore v. Cleveland R. Co., 6 Cir., 108 F.2d 656, 660. . . . In short, although recognizing that by silence Congress at times may be taken to acquiesce and thus approve, we should be very sure that, under all the circumstances of a given situation, it has done so before we so rule and thus at once relieve ourselves from and shift to it the burden of correcting what we have done wrongly. The matter is particular, not general, notwithstanding earlier exceptional treatment and more recent tendency. Just as dubious legislative history is at times much overridden, so also is silence or inaction often mistaken for legislation.

I doubt very much that the silence of Congress in respect to these cases, notwithstanding their multiplication and the length of time during which the silence has endured, can be taken to be the equivalent of bills approving them introduced in both houses, referred to and considered by committees, discussed in debates, enacted by majorities in both places, and approved by the executive. I doubt, in other words, that, in view of all the relevant circumstances including the unanticipated consequences of the legislation, such majorities could have been mustered in approval of the Caminetti decision at any time since it was rendered. Nor is the contrary conclusion demonstrated by Congress' refusal to take corrective action.²

The Caminetti case, however has not been overruled and has the force of law until a majority of this Court may concur in the view that this should be done and take action to that effect. This not having been done, I acquiesce in the Court's decision.

G. Previous Administrative Interpretation

HENNEPIN COUNTY v. RYBERG

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1926. 168 Minn. 385, 210 N.W. 105.

STONE, J. Action for an accounting, the purpose being to recover from the clerk of court of Hennepin county fees which he has received in naturalization proceedings over a long period of years. The plaintiff contends that such fees are required by law to be paid into the county treasury. Defendant clerk of court and the surety on his official bond, the Hartford Accident & Indemnity Company, claim on the other hand that the fees belong to the clerk personally. Judgment went for defendants on the pleadings, and plaintiff appeals.

The fees have been paid and received under the Act of Congress of June 29, 1906, entitled, "An act to provide for a uniform rule for the naturalization of aliens throughout the United States." 34 Statutes at Large, 596. After prescribing the fees in naturalization proceedings, the act, in the fourth paragraph of section 13 (U.S.Comp. St. § 4372) provides that the clerk collecting such fees "is hereby authorized to retain one-half . . . ; the remaining one-half . . . shall be accounted for in their quarterly accounts, which they are hereby required to render the Bureau of [Immigration and] Naturalization." On the point here involved, that law did not receive construction at the hands of the Supreme Court of the United States until 1913, when it was dealt with in Mulcrevy v. City and County of San Francisco, 231 U.S. 669, 34 S.Ct. 260, 58 L.Ed. 425. It was there held that the act did not touch "the relations of a state officer with the state." The court said:

² Since the Caminetti decision two bills have been introduced to limit the effect of that case. S.2438, 73d Cong., 2d Sess.; S.101, 75th Cong., 1st Sess. Neither was reported out of committee. In such circumstances the failure of Congress to amend the Act raises no presumption as to its intent. Order of Railway Conductors of America v. Swan, 7 Cir., 152 F.2d 325, 329.

"The act is entirely satisfied without putting the officers of a state in antagonism to the laws of the state—the laws which give them their official status. It is easily construed and its purpose entirely accomplished by requiring an accounting of one half of the fees to the United States, leaving the other half to whatever disposition may be provided by the state law."

In the meantime the question of the title to the fees retained by the clerk, with the express authority of the Naturalization Law, had given to a marked contrariety of judicial opinion. On the one hand, it was held that, inasmuch as in naturalization proceedings the clerks of state courts functioned as agencies of the federal government, the state laws dealing with their fees and referring to compensation for official services rendered the state and its citizens had nothing to say to the subject, and that the clerks properly retained as their own the half of the fees which the federal law said they might retain. State ex rel. v. Quill, 53 Ind.App. 495, 102 N.E. 106; Hampden County v. Morris, 207 Mass. 167, 93 N.E. 579, Ann.Cas.1912A, 815; Fields v. Multnomah County, 64 Or. 117, 128 P. 1045, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 322; Eldredge v. Salt Lake, 37 Utah, 188, 106 P. 939.

Other courts held that the clerks were still state officers and their courts state courts; that the state laws regulated all their functions and required them to accept their salaries as compensation for all services of whatsoever character and to account and pay over to the state their fees in naturalization proceedings. San Francisco v. Mulcrevy, 15 Cal.App. 11, 113 P. 339; Franklin County v. Barnes, 68 Wash. 488, 123 P. 779; Barron County v. Beckwith, 142 Wis. 159, 124 N.W. 1030, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 810, 135 Am.St.Rep. 1079. Considering the decision of the Supreme Court decisive of the whole question, the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts reversed County of Hampden v. Morris, supra, in County of Berkshire v. Cande, 222 Mass. 87, 109 N.E. 838. We are not required here to review these cases and choose between their opposed principles of decision, for there is another which must control this case.

The Naturalization Law had not been long in force when, on December 3, 1906, Hon. Edward T. Young, then Attorney General of Minnesota, was called upon for an opinion on the subject. It was addressed to Hon. P. M. Kerst, then public examiner. Section 2721, R.L. 1905 (section 7018, G.S. 1923), was in effect, and provided that every officer of the state receiving a fixed salary should be entitled to no other compensation. Mr. Young's opinion was in part as follows:

"I beg to advise you that, in my opinion, section 2721 of the Revised Laws was intended to apply only to duties performed under state laws. The duties in relation to naturalization are imposed by federal law, and any compensation derived therefrom is received under a federal law and is not, in my opinion, in any manner affected by any law of this state. It follows that such fees may be received and retained by the clerk of the district court in Hennepin county without violating any law of this state."

Succeeding Attorneys General have never departed from that view. Aside from the instant case, not more than one other county attorney, so far as we have been advised, has ever taken issue with it. There is no evidence that the executive department, from the Governor to county commissioners, has ever disagreed. Mr. Kerst, public examiner in 1906, and all of his successors in office, have governed themselves accordingly.

The question has been presented to the district court but once and never before to this court. Prior to 1912, in a mandamus proceeding, the right of the clerk of court of Otter Tail county to retain naturalization fees was challenged. The issue was decided for the clerk by Judge Taylor, then one of the judges of the Seventh judicial district. One of the grounds of his decision was stated thus:

"The services in question were not performed for the state of Minnesota nor pursuant to the laws of the state of Minnesota, but for the United States and under and pursuant to the laws of the United States. They were wholly outside the duties imposed upon the clerk by the state laws, and, in my opinion, the fees allowed for such services are not within the purview of the state laws above cited and the clerk is entitled to retain them."

The construction put upon the act of Congress by the Mulcrevy Case is of course binding upon us. But in the construction of our own statutes it helps only to the extent of saying that those statutes can do as they please with the half of naturalization fees not paid over by the clerk to federal authority. The question remains, what do our laws say on the subject? The county attorney claims the benefit of the general statutes, and cites chapter 373, G.L. 1891; chapter 365, G.L. 1903; chapter 372, G.L. 1907; chapter 440, G.L. 1913; chapter 18, G.L. 1919, and, finally chapter 133, G.L. 1921. He takes position finally on section 7018, G.S. 1923, which reads:

"Unless otherwise provided by law, every county official in the state of Minnesota receiving a stated salary shall receive the same in full compensation for all services and expenses whatsoever, and shall, on the first Monday of each month, file with the county auditor a correct statement of all fees received by him, and turn the same into the county treasury."

Defendant insists that the general laws have no application to the clerk of court of Hennepin county, and, referring to much special legislation and its history, proceeds with an argument, not necessary to be followed here, to the effect that there is no statute requiring the clerk of court of Hennepin county to account for naturalization fees.

The foregoing shows that to start with and at least until the decision of the Mulcrevy Case in 1913, there existed much uncertainty as to the proper solution of the question now before us. Clearly, in naturalization proceedings, the clerk of a state court functions as an agency of the federal government and the federal law says he may retain half of the fees. The services compensated by those fees are not rendered for the state, and there is ground for holding, as has frequently been held, that statutes such as section 7018, G.S. 1923, providing that official salaries shall be in "full compensation for all services and expenses whatsoever," refer only to services rendered and expenses incurred by the officer in his capacity as a state and county officer, and in the performance of his duties to the state or county, and not for services rendered under federal law. The existence originally of ambiguity and difficulty cannot be denied. Solution of the problem was helped by the decision in the Mulcrevy Case only to the extent of its declaration that state law may control the disposition of the fees retained by the clerk. That declaration does not go very far, however, in aiding the determination whether a given state law appropriates such fees for the state or leaves them to the clerk. That question remains notwithstanding the Mulcrevy decision, and that is the one now before us.

It would be difficult for fancy to state a more appropriate case for the application of the rule of practical construction. The practical interpretation of our state law was first formulated by Attorney General Young in 1906, immediately after the enactment of the Uniform Naturalization Law. The extent to which it has been acquiesced in by the executive department of state and county government has been stated. It remains to show that the acquiescence of the Legislature, during the period of 20 years which has lapsed, is just as marked. It may well be doubted whether one legislature has any power to place upon the acts of its predecessor a construction which will be binding. But the understanding of old laws by the lawmakers and their acquiescence in a given status assumed to have been created thereby is not only frequently for judicial consideration but also and occasionally of great if not controlling importance. It would have been easy for the Legislature at any time, since it was apparent in 1906 that the executive department was not disposed to question the retention of naturalization fees by clerks of court, to have made a very definite law on the subject, putting at rest the right of the counties to those fees. Not only has no such act been passed, but we find two statutes, since enacted, which indicate affirmatively, not only the acquiescence of the Legislature in the retention of the fees, but also an expression of legislative will that the practice should continue.

One of those laws is chapter 97, G.L. 1911, which provided for the return to clerks of court by county treasurers of naturalization fees paid into the county treasury "by mistake" between November 13, 1906, and March 22, 1909. Another such law is chapter 355, G.L. 1921. It has to do with the compensation of clerks of court in counties having more than sixty and less than eighty townships, there being also a restriction as to population. The act provides that the compensation of the clerks "shall remain as now fixed by law, except that no fees from any source except those received for naturalization papers and work on the board of audit shall be retained by such clerk as a part of his compensation, but all other fees collected by him shall be paid into the county treasury." These laws are not only a legislative declaration of what the law should be, but also an expression of legislative opinion as to what it was and had been with respect to the title of clerks of court of this state to fees collected in naturalization proceedings.

So if we were now to adopt the view that the law is, and, since 1906 has been, that the fees in question belong not to the clerks but to the counties, we would be overturning a settled conviction as to what the law is which has prevailed throughout the executive and legislative departments of the state government for twenty years and has been once concurred in by the judicial department. There was clear ambiguity to start with, a patent uncertainty under state law of the effect of the declaration by Congress that the clerks of state courts might retain the fees, which has been subjected to the practical construction and settled opinion just referred to. It would be utterly presumptuous for the courts at this day, even though they might have reached the contrary opinion to start with, to disagree with that conviction, settled and effective for twenty years. Such a judicial reversal of settled executive opinion and policy would be particularly objectionable in view of their clear approval by the legislative department, expressed not only by acquiescence but also by explicit recognition and confirmation. For judges to reverse or nullify such a clear executive and legislative decision of such long standing would be to destroy confidence not only in the certainty of law but in official action thereunder. That is one of the disastrous results frequently prevented by the doctrine of practical construction. It is a rule of such clear sanity and practical wisdom that it may control the construction of constitutions as well as statutes. City of Faribault v. Misener, 20 Minn. 396 (Gil. 347).

For subjecting this case to decision by the rule of practical construction we have exact precedent in United States v. Hill, 120 U.S. 169, 7 S.Ct. 510, 30 L.Ed. 627. It was a suit to recover of the clerk of the United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts a large sum in naturalization fees which he had collected but which he had not included in his returns of "fees and emoluments" to the government. Judgment in the circuit court went for defendant. 25 F. 375. It was affirmed by the Supreme Court.

The practice involved, of the retention of naturalization fees by clerks of the United States District Courts, had continued for more than 40 years. The Supreme Court, after referring to that circumstance, said, its language almost equally applicable to the instant case:

"A court seeking to administer justice would long hesitate before permitting the United States to go back, and not only as against the clerk, but as against the surety on his bond, reopen what had been settled with such abundant and formal sanction. This principle has been applied, as a wholesome one, for the establishment and enforcement of justice, in many cases in this court, not only between man and man, but between the government and those who deal with it, and put faith in the action of its constituted authorities, judicial, executive, and administrative."

The judgment appealed from is right and must be affirmed.

So ordered.

WILSON, C. J. I dissent because:

(1) Of Commissioners of Hennepin County v. Dickey, 86 Minn. 331, 90 N.W. 775. If there was a silent, unconscious acquiescence no one was misled. It was not like a case where property rights or titles are affected and practical construction is invoked to protect innocent acts. Here the official is merely keeping money not his.

(2) In my opinion the acts of the public officials from the passage of the act of Congress in 1906 to the decision in the Mulcrevy Case in 1913 are insufficient to invoke or support the application of the doctrine of practical construction. That decision eliminated the ambiguity in the congressional act which must always exist as a basis for the application of this doctrine. Ambiguity in our statute never existed. The decision in the Mulcrevy Case was controlling, and all of the official acts referred to in the opinion which occurred after that decision are inconsequential. Practical construction precedes but does not follow judicial interpretation.

1. How far does the effect given by the Courts to administrative interpretation permit the exercise of legislative, if not judicial, power in the executive department of government?

2. "Long continued practice and the approval of administrative authority may be persuasive in the interpretation of doubtful provisions of a statute, but cannot alter the provisions that are clear and explicit when related to the facts disclosed. A failure to enforce the law does not change it." Hughes, C. J., in Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company v. U. S., 282 U.S. 740, 741, 759, 51 S.Ct. 297, 75 L.Ed. 672 (1930).

4. In Walker v. United States, 83 F.2d 103 (C.C.A.Minn.1936), Stone, J., said:

The weight or force which the courts will in their construction of an act, give to . . . executive or legislative constructions, has been variously phrased by the Supreme Court. Similarly, there is a variety of expression as to such weight and force where the court conceives the executive construction to be also approved by Congress. In such latter situation, it has been said that the executive construction has the "force of law" (Hartley v. Commissioner, 295 U.S. 216, 220, 55 S.Ct. 756, 758, 79 L.Ed. 1399; Old Mission Portland Cement Co. v. Helvering, 293 U.S. 289, 294, 55 S.Ct. 158, 79 L.Ed. 367); that it "must be accepted" (Alaska Steamship Co. v. United States, 290 U.S. 256, 262, 54 S.Ct. 159, 161, 78 L.Ed. 302); that it "will not be overturned except for very cogent reasons" (Norwegian Nitrogen Products Co. v. United States, 288 U.S. 294, 315, 53 S.Ct. 350, 358, 77 L.Ed. 796); that it would be given "great weight, even if we doubted the correctness of the ruling" (Costanzo v. Tillinghast, 287 U.S. 341, 345, 53 S.Ct. 152, 154, 77 L.Ed. 350); that it will not be "disturbed except for reasons of weight" (McCaughn v. Hershey Chocolate Co., 283 U.S. 488, 492, 51 S.Ct. 510, 512, 75 L.Ed. 1183); that "were the matter less clear" the court "should be constrained" to follow it (Poe v. Seaborn, 282 U.S. 101, 116, 51 S.Ct. 58, 61, 75 L.Ed. 239); that it will be followed "when not plainly erroneous" (New York, New Haven & H. R. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 200 U.S. 361, 402, 26 S.Ct. 272, 281, 50 L.Ed. 515). When the quotations in the above sentence are considered in connection with the issues and situations in which they were severally used, it would seem that a safe statement of this rule of construction is that, where a statutory provision is ambiguous, and the executive department which must apply and enforce it declares a construction (not in itself ambiguous, Burnet v. Chicago Portrait Co., 285 U.S. 1, 16, 20, 52 S.Ct. 275, 76 L.Ed. 587) for administrative purposes, and thereafter Congress re-enacts the provision without substantial change, the courts will accept that construction unless it be "plainly erroneous."

FISHGOLD v. SULLIVAN DRYDOCK & REPAIR CORPORATION

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Second Circuit, 1946.
154 F.2d 785.

L. HAND, CIRCUIT JUDGE. Local 13 of the Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers of America appeals from a judgment awarding damages to the plaintiff for his loss of wages because of two lay-offs by his employer, the Sullivan Drydock and Repair Corporation, against which alone the action was brought. The union intervened, and charged itself with the defence; the United States, the Railway Labor Executives Association and the Congress of Industrial Organizations have filed briefs, as amici. The appeal raises only the proper interpretation of subdivision (b) and (c) of § 8 of the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940, as amended in 1944 (§ 308(b) and § 308(c), 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix, which we quote in the margin).¹

¹ "8(b) In the case of any such person who, in order to perform such training and service, has left or leaves a position, other than a temporary position, in the employ of any employer and who (1) receives such certificate, (2) is still qualified to perform the duties of such position, and (3) makes application for reemployment within ninety days after he is relieved from such training and service or from hospitalization continuing after discharge for a period of not more than one year—

"(A) if such position was in the employ of the United States Government, its Territories or possessions, or the District of Columbia, such person shall be restored to such position or to a position of like seniority, status, and pay;

"(B) if such position was in the employ of a private employer, such employer shall restore such person to such position or to a position of like seniority, status, and

The facts as found by the judge were as follows.

The plaintiff entered the employ of the Sullivan Drydock and Repair Corporation as a welder, on December 21, 1942, and was steadily employed as such until May 22, 1943, when he was inducted into the Army. He served until July 12, 1944, and was then honorably discharged, and received a certificate of the kind described in § 8(a), 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix § 308(a). At that time he concededly was, and he has since been, qualified as a first-class welder; and the company restored him to this former position on August 21, 1944, and has never dismissed him. The controversy here at bar arises because on three occasions: Viz., on April 9, April 11, and from May 17 to May 24, inclusive, it refused to give him any work, because there was not enough on those days to occupy all hands. In so refusing it preferred other welders, not veterans, who had a higher shop seniority than the plaintiff: this in accordance with the agreement between the company and the union. The plaintiff's position is that, as a veteran, § 8(b) and (c) gave him priority over all his fellows except other veterans; the union's position is that those sections merely restored him to the same place in the shop hierarchy which he would have had, if he had been on leave of absence during the period of his service. The judge held with the plaintiff and the union appealed.

Subsection B of § 8(b) is the operative source of the privilege on which the plaintiff relies; it reads as follows: "Such employer shall restore such person to such position or to a position of like seniority, status and pay unless the employer's circumstances have so changed as to make it impossible or unreasonable to do so." "Such position" is nowhere defined except as "a position other than a temporary position, in the employ of any employer." Taking this clause by itself, it seems to us beyond debate that it was not intended that the veteran should gain in seniority. It will be observed that the grant is in the alternative: he is to be "restored" to his original position, or to one of "like seniority, status and pay," whenever possible. The phrase, "like seniority" means the "same seniority" as before; and it necessarily precludes any gain in seniority. It follows that, if the original position is no longer open, the substitute shall be a position of no greater, though no less, seniority than the lost position. But if that be true, there can be no implication that, if the original position be not lost, but be still available, the veteran shall be restored to it with a gain in priority; for that would pre-suppose that Congress did not pay unless the employer's circumstances have so changed as to make it impossible or unreasonable to do so."

"8(c) Any person who is restored to a position in accordance with the provisions of paragraph (A) or (B) of subsection (b) shall be considered as having been on furlough or leave of absence during his period of training and service in the land or naval forces, shall be so restored without loss of seniority, shall be entitled to participate in insurance or other benefits offered by the employer pursuant to established rules and practices relating to employees on furlough or leave of absence in effect with the employer at the time such person was inducted into such forces, and shall not be discharged from such position without cause within one year after such restoration."

intend the substitute to be as nearly a complete substitute for the lost original as it was possible to make it, a hypothesis absurd on its face. Hence we must start with the proposition that subsection B of § 8(b) not only did not grant any step up in seniority, but positively denied any.

Subdivision (c) confirms the intention so disclosed. As subsection B reads, it would probably be understood to restore the veteran only to that same position which he held when he was inducted. That was, however, thought to be unfair; for while he was in the service, there were likely to be such changes in the personnel that when he came back, he might find himself junior to those over whom he had had priority when he left. To remedy this, by an amendment made while the bill was in Congress, he was given the same status that he would have had, if he had been "on furlough or leave of absence" while he was in the service. How that differed from his position, had he remained actively at work, does not appear; but clearly the amendment presupposed that a difference there might be. Having in this way declared how the veteran's interim position "shall be considered," Congress added that he should be "restored without loss of seniority." Had the purpose been, not only to insure the veteran that he should not lose any more steps upon the ladder than if he had been on leave, but also that he should go to the top, we cannot conceive that Congress would have expressed itself in the words, "without loss of seniority." They have no such express meaning, and their implications are directly the opposite; for they disclose a concern against his possible demotion inconsistent with any implied belief in his promotion. For these reasons we are satisfied that, except for the concluding phrase of subdivision (c) there can be no doubt that textually the union's construction is the right one. It remains to consider that phrase which, as we understand it, is the chief reliance of those who take the opposite view.

It declares that the veteran "shall not be discharged from such position within one year after such restoration"; and we should, so far as possible, interpret it so as not to conflict with the rest of the section; in particular, so as to leave untouched the privilege of seniority, as it is earlier defined. There is no difficulty in doing so, if "discharge" means a permanent end to the relation of employment, a separation, as dismissal; and that is indeed its ordinary meaning. For example, the Oxford Dictionary (Vol. II, p. 412, subtitle "Discharge" I, 3), reads: "To relieve of a charge or office; (more usually) to dismiss from office, service or employment; to cashier": this in distinction with "Lay-off," (Supplement, p. 8): "A period during which a workman is temporarily dismissed or allowed to leave his work; that part or season of the year during which activity in a particular business or game is partly or completely suspended; an off-season." It seems to us that Congress used "discharge" in this sense: i.e., that the veteran was to be assured of his job for the same period—a year—for which he was to be drafted; but that the job to which he was "restored"—as that very word implies—was to be subject to the same conditions to which the old job had been subject, with only the exception that it should be better in so far as a leave of absence for the year might improve it. The value of that assurance would indeed vary. In a closed shop it would presumably add little, for the union would not allow a member to be discharged without cause anyway. In an open shop the same would be true, if it were partly unionized, and the veteran were in the union; but, whenever for any reason he had not that protection it prevented his being turned out, so long as he behaved himself, and that was an advantage of no mean importance. We do not know what proportion of those in industry are not in unions; but their number is certainly very large, and, even though the clause was of value only to them, they are numerous enough to give it a purpose; to say nothing of the possibility that statutory protection may be an important supplement to union protection.

When we consider the situation at the time that the Act was passed—September, 1940—it is extremely improbable that Congress should have meant to grant any broader privilege than as we are measuring it. It is true that the nation had become deeply disturbed at its defenseless position, and had begun to make ready; but it was not at war, and the issue still hung in the balance whether it ever would be at war. If we carry ourselves back to that summer and autumn, we shall recall that the presidential campaigns of both parties avoided commitment upon that question, and that each candidate particularly insisted that no troops should be sent overseas. The original act limited service to one year, and it was most improbable that within that time we should be called upon to fight upon our own soil; as indeed the event proved, for we were still at peace in September, 1941. Congress was calling young men to the colors to give them an adequate preparation for our defence, but with no forecast of the appalling experiences which they were later to undergo. Against that background it is not likely that a proposal would then have been accepted which gave industrial priority, regardless of their length of employment, to unmarried men—for the most part under thirty—over men in the thirties, forties or fifties, who had wives and children dependent upon them. Today, in the light of what has happened, the privilege then granted may appear an altogether inadequate equivalent for their services; but we have not to decide what is now proper; we are to reconstruct, as best we may, what was the purpose of Congress when it used the words in which § 8(b) and § 8(c) were cast.

The plaintiff argues, however, that, regardless of their original scope, these sections have in any event by administrative interpretation and by later legislation, taken on the meaning which he claims. We shall consider first the administrative interpretations. Section 8(g) directs the Director of Selective Service to establish a "Personnel Division" which shall "render aid in the replacement in their former positions of, or in securing positions for . . . persons who have satisfactorily completed any period of their training and service under this Act," and on March 5, 1944, the Director issued a memorandum (No. 190-A, Part IV, § 4(b)), which read: "A veteran who has been reinstated to his former position cannot be displaced by another on the ground that the latter has greater seniority rights." Section 8(e) directs the proper district attorney, "if reasonably satisfied" that a veteran "is entitled" to the benefits of the Act, to "appear and act as attorney" for him to enforce his rights; and the Attorney General, as appears from his intervention as amicus in this action, has read the law like the Director of Selective Service. On the other hand, the National War Labor Board adopted the opposite view in In Re Scovill Manufacturing Co., 21 W.L.R. 200; as have several of its arbitrators; and the Solicitor of the Department of Labor did the same in an instruction for the guidance of federal conciliators in dealing with war veterans (16 L.R.R. 481).

So far as we can find, these are the only interpretative rulings that have as yet appeared by officials who can be said to have been charged with any duty in administering the Act; and it can hardly be said that they have had that consistency to which we should yield our judgment. We do not forget that the canon which the plaintiff invokes is not confined to decisions inter partes, like those of the Federal Trade Commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Labor Board, or the Tax Court; it extends also to the interpretations of officials, charged with the duty of enforcing statutes. Skidmore v. Swift & Co., 323 U.S. 134, 65 S.Ct. 161; Great Northern R. Co. v. United States, 315 U.S. 262, 62 S.Ct. 529, 86 L.Ed. 836. Whether the weight to be given to such rulings is less than to regulations for the conduct of, or decisions in, contested cases, has never been expressly decided, though was intimated in Skidmore v. Swift, supra, 323 U.S. at page 139, 65 S.Ct. at page 164; and see Judge Frank's dissent in Duquesne Warehouse v. Railroad Retirement Board, 2 Cir., 148 F.2d 473, 485-487. There is indeed a basis for making such a distinction because the position of a public officer, charged with the enforcement of a law, is different from one who must decide a dispute. If there is a fair doubt, his duty is to present the case for the side which he represents, and leave decision to the court, or the administrative tribunal, upon which lies the responsibility of decision. If he surrenders a plausible construction, it will, at least it may, be surrendered forever; and yet it may be right. Since such rulings need not have the detachment of a judicial, or semi-judicial decision, and may properly carry a bias, it would seem that they should not be as authoritative; and of this sort were the rulings of the Director and the Attorney General in the case at bar, unlike the decisions of the War Labor Board and the direction of the Solicitor of the Labor Department. Be that as it may, concededly all such considerations are only cautionary, and not authoritative; for in the end, after whatever reserve, upon the courts rests the ultimate responsibility of declaring what a statute means: as the Supreme Court recognized in its last word upon the subject. Jewell Ridge Coal Corp. v. Local, 325 U.S. 161, 65 S.Ct. 1063. We should have to be in much greater doubt than we are, if we were to yield, even to a more uniform administrative interpretation than exists here.

There remains the question whether the amendment of § 8 in December, 1944, 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix, § 308, and the extension of the whole act until May 15, 1946, is to be taken as embodying the Director's position. The amendment, taken alone, only extended the time within which a veteran might apply for reinstatement from forty days to ninety days, and made that period begin from the termination of "hospitalization continuing after discharge for a period of not more than one year," if he was in a hospital. Of itself this indicated no other change in intent; but the Director's ruling had been made for over six months in December, 1944. Moreover, Colonel Keesling, of the Director's office, in one part of his testimony before the subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs, stated the Director's position. His later remarks were, perhaps, somewhat ambiguous, and we are left in doubt as to the final impression which his testimony as a whole may have left on the subcommittee. After he had first mentioned the subject, the presiding chairman, Mr. Costello, wished to revert to it, and the Colonel thereupon read the Act as it stood, and a colloquy ensued which we quote in the margin.² He was then speaking of the fact that the veteran's absence from the shop should be counted as though he were on leave, or on furlough; and whether his hearers assumed that this was consistent with what he had said before, or supplanted it, is not entirely certain.

However, we cannot in any event assimilate the situation to that to which courts so frequently resort in aid of the interpretation of ambiguous language; i.e., reenactment without change after administrative interpretation. McCaughn v. Hershey Chocolate Co., 283 U.S. 488, 492, 51 S.Ct. 510, 75 L.Ed. 1183; National Lead Co. v. United States, 252 U.S. 140, 146, 40 S.Ct. 237, 64 L.Ed. 496; Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. United States, 288 U.S. 269, 273, 53 S.Ct. 337, 77 L.Ed. 739. The rationale of that canon must be, either that those in charge of the amendment are familiar with existing rulings, or that they mean to incorporate them, whatever they may be. The second would hardly be tenable; we should hesitate to say that Congress might enact as law regulatory provisions with which it con-

² "Mr. Johnson: And the time he serves in the armed forces does not affect his seniority?"

"Colonel Keesling: That is right. He shall be restored without loss of seniority.

"Mr. Harness: Does that mean he does not lose any of the seniority he has acquired up to the time of his induction, or that he gets that seniority that has accrued to him while he was working, plus the time he served in the Army?"

"Colonel Keesling: The latter is right.

"Mr. Harness: Whose construction is that?"

"Colonel Keesling: Ours. The language is clear. It says that a person so restored shall be restored without loss of seniority.

"Mr. Johnson: It is not clear that that means his former seniority.

"Colonel Keesling: Would it not be loss of seniority if a nonveteran increased his seniority by 2 years without crediting an employee with 2 years' seniority for the 2 years he spent in the armed forces?"

"Mr. Johnson: It might mean without loss of what he had before.

"Colonel Keesling: That is not the way we have construed it.

"There has not been any difference of opinion on that as far as the labor groups are concerned. The act says any person who is restored shall be restored without loss of seniority."

cededly had no acquaintance. On the other hand, if we are to suppose, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that Congress is familiar with all existing administrative interpretations, and is content to accept them when it makes no change, it would seem that the force of that assumption should vary with the circumstances. For example, successive recensions of the Internal Revenue Act are the result of detailed conferences between the Treasury and the committees of Congress; and there is good reason to assume that, in so far as the statute is not changed, existing regulations and even less formal interpretations are expressly affirmed. That may well be a proper inference in the case of all general recensions, accompanied as these ordinarily are by continuous and intimate consultation with administrative officers. But it would seem hazardous to carry such a conclusion to the situation here at bar. So far as concerns any actual information conveyed to Congress, it was at most confined to the occasion which we have discussed for it would be gratuitous to suppose that the same information ever reached the Senate Committee of Military Affairs. That aside, the same ambiguity arises here, if we were to impute to Congress a knowledge of all administrative rulings, as arises from the rulings themselves, for the decisions of the National Labor Relations Board and of the Solicitor of the Labor Department both preceded the amendment of § 8 (c). To suppose that Congress was familiar with one set of rulings and not with the other would be baseless in fact, and involve the canon in greater uncertainty than already attaches to its use, which—be it said with all deference—is by no means negligible. We should be clutching at straws and relying on phantoms, if we were to suppose that the re-enactment of this section with its very specific amendment was intended to effect so vital a change in industrial relations. Certainly we should be unwarranted in believing that Congress would have made so far reaching a change without notice to those who had an interest equal with the veterans themselves—the unions. Finally, as in the case of the effect of such rulings unaccompanied by any amendment of the statute, when all is said, the canon is only a help when the intent is otherwise in doubt; and, after every allowance for the differences which have actually arisen, we cannot bring ourselves to abandon the construction we have adopted. As for judicial interpretation, this is the first appeal; and the only decisions in the district courts are apparently equally divided. Whirls v. The Trailmobile Co., D.C.S.D.Ohio, 64 F.Supp. 713, is against the view we take; Olin Industries Inc. v. Barnett, D.C.S.D.Ill., 64 F.Supp. 722 is in accord. The fact that we are ourselves not agreed cautions us that we should not be too sure of our conclusion; and obviously the really important matter is that the question should reach the Supreme Court as soon as possible.

We cannot conclude without expressing the hope, though it may not be realized, that our decision may not be taken as indicating any indifference to the claims of those who stood by the nation in the hour of its need at the hazard, and so often with the loss, of all that life holds dear.

Judgment reversed; complaint dismissed.

NOTE

The distinction drawn by Judge Hand in the principal case, between interpretations made by administrative officials charged with the duty of enforcing statutes and those made in adversary administrative proceedings, was applied in Suwannee Fruit & Steamship Co. v. Fleming, 160 F.2d 897 (Em.App.1947). (This case appears supra, p. 808.)

FISHGOLD v. SULLIVAN DRYDOCK & REPAIR CORP.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1946.

328 U.S. 275, 66 S.Ct. 1105, 90 L.Ed. 1230, 167 A.L.R. 110.

. . . .
It is said . . . that when Congress amended Sec. 8 of the Act in 1944, 58 Stat. 798, and extended the Act in 1945 without any change in Sec. 8 (Pub.L. 54, 79th Cong., 1st Sess., 50 U.S.C.A.Appendix, Sec. 316 (b)), it was apprised of an administrative interpretation of Sec. 8(c) that a veteran was entitled to his former job regardless of seniority; and that therefore Congressional approval of or acquiescence in the administrative construction would be inferred. See Massachusetts Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. United States, 288 U.S. 269, 273, 53 S.Ct. 337, 339, 77 L.Ed. 739, and cases cited. An administrative interpretation was rendered by the Director of Selective Service who was authorized to administer the Act. He had ruled that the Act required reinstatement of a veteran to "his former position or one of like seniority, status, and pay even though such reinstatement necessitates the discharge of a non-veteran with a greater seniority." But a different construction was given to Sec. 8(c) by the National War Labor Board in its handling of disputes arising out of the negotiation of collective bargaining agreements. The Board read the Act as we read it. The ruling of the Director may be resorted to for guidance. See Skidmore v. Swift & Co., 323 U.S. 134, 140, 65 S.Ct. 161, 164, 89 L.Ed. 124; Mabee v. White Plains Pub. Co., 327 U.S. 178, 66 S.Ct. 511, 90 L.Ed. 607. But his rulings are not made in adversary proceedings and are not entitled to the weight which is accorded interpretations by administrative agencies entrusted with the responsibility of making inter partes decisions. Skidmore v. Swift & Co., supra, 323 U.S. page 139, 65 S.Ct. page 164, 89 L.Ed. 124. The history and language of the Act would be far less clear for us to give his rulings persuasive weight. Moreover, as the Circuit Court of Appeals pointed out, the contrariety of administrative rulings lends less credence to the contention that Congress by the amendment in 1944 and the extension in 1945 showed a preference for one over the other. In view of the language of the Act and the nature of the administrative findings we would want explicit indication by Congress that it chose the Director's interpretation before we concluded that Congress had adopted it.

Affirmed.

Administrative interpretations that are meant to be guides for the public are published in the Federal Register. In his dissenting opinion in *Federal Crop. Ins. Corporation v. SOCIAL SECURITY BOARD v. NIEROTKO

Supreme Court of the United States, 1946.

MR. JUSTICE REED delivered the opinion of the Court.

A problem as to whether "back pay," which is granted to an employee under the National Labor Relations Act, shall be treated as "wages" under the Social Security Act comes before us on this record. . . .

The respondent, Joseph Nierotko, was found by the National Labor Relations Board to have been wrongfully discharged for union activity by his employer, the Ford Motor Company, and was reinstated by that Board in his employment with directions for "back pay" for the period February 2, 1937, to September 25, 1939.¹ The "back pay" was paid by the employer on July 18, 1941. Thereafter Nierotko requested the

Social Security Board to credit him in the sum of the "back pay" on his Old Age and Survivor's Insurance account with the Board.² In conformity with its minute of formal general action of March 27, 1942, the Board refused to credit Nierotko's "back pay" as wages. On review of the Board's decision,³ the District Court upheld the Board. The Circuit Court of Appeals reversed. 149 F.2d 273. On account of the importance of the issues in the administration of the Social Security Act, we granted certiorari.⁴ 66 S.Ct. 55; Judicial Code § 240, 28 U.S.C.A. § 347.

During the period for which "back pay" was awarded respondent the Federal Old Age benefits were governed by Title II of the Social Security Act of 1935. 49 Stat. 622. As Title II of the Social Security Act Amendments of 1939 became effective January 1, 1940 (53 Stat. 1362, 42 U.S.C.A. § 401 et seq.), the actual payment of the "back wages" occurred thereafter. In our view the governing provisions which determine whether this "back pay" is wages are those of the earlier enactment.⁵

Wages are the basis for the administration of Federal Old Age Benefits. 49 Stat. 622. Only those who earn wages are eligible for benefits. The periods of time during which wages were earned are important and may be crucial on eligibility under either the original act or the Amendments of 1939. See sec. 210(c) and compare sec. 209(g), 53 Stat. 1376, 42 U.S.C.A. § 409(g).⁷ The benefits are financed by payments from employees and employers which are calculated on wages. The Act defines "wages" for Old Age benefits as follows:

³ Sec. 205(g).

⁵ By the foregoing statement it is not intended to imply that the variations in the definitions of wages between the two enactments are significant on the issues herein considered. Sec. 209(b) of the Amendment, 42 U.S.C.A. § 409(b), recognizes possible differences in the meaning of employment: "(b) The term 'employment' means any service performed after December 31, 1936, and prior to January 1, 1940, which was employment as defined in section 210(b) of the Social Security Act prior to January 1, 1940 (except service performed by an individual after he attained the age of sixty-five if performed prior to January 1, 1939), and any service, of whatever nature, performed after December 31, 1939, by an employee for the person employing him. . . ."

[Footnote 6 is omitted. Ed.]

⁷ Sec. 209. "(g) The term 'fully insured individual' means any individual with respect to whom it appears to the satisfaction of the Board that—

"(1) He had not less than one quarter of coverage for each two of the quarters elapsing after 1936, or after the quarter in which he attained the age of twenty-one, whichever quarter is later, and up to but excluding the quarter in which he attained the age of sixty-five, or died, whichever first occurred, and in no case less than six quarters of coverage; or

"(2) He had at least forty quarters of coverage."

[Footnote 8 is omitted. Ed.]

"Sec. 210. When used in this title—

"(a) The term 'wages' means all remuneration for employment, including the cash value of all remuneration paid in any medium other than cash,"

Employment is defined thus : "(b) The term 'employment' means by service, of whatever nature, performed within the United States by an employee for his employer, except—."

Since Nierotko remained an employee under the definition of the Labor Act, although his employer had attempted to terminate the relationship, he had "employment" under that Act and we need further only consider whether under the Social Security Act its definition of employment, as "any service performed by an employee for his employer," covers what Nierotko did for the Ford Motor Company. The petitioner urges that Nierotko did not perform any service. It points out that Congress in considering the Social Security Act thought of benefits as related to "wages earned" for "work done."¹⁶ We are unable, however, to follow the Social Security Board in such a limited circumscription of the word "service." The very words "any service performed for his employer," with the purpose of the Social Security Act in mind import breadth of coverage. They admonish us against holding that "service" can be only productive activity. We think that "service" as used by Congress in this definitive phrase means not only work actually done but the entire employer-employee relationship for which compensation is paid to the employee by the employer.¹⁷

¹⁶ H.Rep.No.615, 74th Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 6, 21, 32, and S.Rep.No.628, 74th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 7, 32.

Compare Armour & Co. v. Wantock, 323 U.S. 126, 133, 65 S.Ct. 165, 168.

Treasury Department Regulations No. 91 relating to the Employees' Tax and the Employer's Tax under Title VIII of the Social Security Act, 1936, Art. 16, classifies dismissal pay, vacation allowances or sick pay, as wages. Regulations 106 under the Federal Insurance Contributions Act, 1940, pp. 48, 51, continues to consider vacation allowances as wages. It differentiates voluntary dismissal pay.

I. R. B., 1940, 1-22-10271, S.S.T. 389, an Office Decision, holds that amounts paid employees during absence on jury service to make their pay equivalent to regular salary are wages.

Though formal action was taken by the Social Security Board on March 27, 1942, our attention has not been called to any regulation of any governmental agency excluding "back pay" from wages. The Treasury Department has authority to issue regulations for Social Security taxes. Secs. 808 and 908, 49 Stat. 633, et seq., 42 U.S.C.A. §§ 1008, 1108; Internal Revenue Code, Sec. 1429, 53 Stat. 178, 26 U.S.C.A. Int.Rev.Code § 1426. So has the Social Security Board, sec. 1102, 49 Stat. 647, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1302, and sec. 205(a), 53 Stat. 1368, 42 U.S.C.A. § 405(a). All authority for the promulgation of regulations limits the action to rules and regulations not inconsistent with the provisions of the various sections.

In regulations governing the collection of income taxes at source on or after January 1, 1945, 58 Stat. 247, the Bureau of Internal Revenue classified vacation allowances and dismissal pay as wages under the following statutory definition of wages:

"Sec. 1621. Definitions. As used in this subchapter—

"(a) Wages. The term 'wages' means all remuneration (other than fees paid to a public official) for services performed by an employee for his employer, including An argument against the interpretation which we give to "service performed" is the contrary ruling of the governmental agencies which are charged with the administration of the Social Security Act. . . .

. . . Their competence and experience in this field command us to reflect before we decide contrary to their conclusion. The first administrative determination was apparently made in 1939 by an Office Decision of the Bureau of Internal Revenue on the problem of whether "back pay" under a Labor Board order was wages subject to tax under Titles VIII and IX of the Social Security Act which the Bureau collects.¹⁸ The back pay was held not to be subject as wages to the tax because no service was performed, the employer had tried to terminate the employment relationship and the allowance of back pay was discretionary with the Labor Board. Reliance for the conclusions was placed upon Agwilines, Inc. v. National Labor Relations Board, 5 Cir., 87 F.2d 146, which had held "back pay" a public reparation order and therefore not triable by jury as a private right for wages would have been. This position is maintained by the Social Security Board by minute of March 27, 1942. It is followed by the National Labor Relations Board which at one time approved the retention by the employer of the tax on the employees' back pay for transmission to the Treasury Department as a tax on wages and later reversed its position on the authority of the Office Decision to which reference has just been made. Re Pennsylvania Furnace and Iron Co., 13 N.L.R.B. 49, 53(5), 54, 58.¹⁹

The Office Decision seems to us unsound. The portion of the Agwilines decision, which the Office Decision relied upon, was directed at the constitutional claim to a right of trial by jury. It stated that "back pay" was not a penalty or damages which a private individual might claim. But there is nothing in the opinion which supports the idea that the "back pay" award differs from other pay. Indeed the opinion said that "Congress has the right to eradicate them [unfair practices] from the beginning." 87 F.2d loc. cit. 151. . . .

But it is urged by petitioner that the administrative construction on the question of whether "back pay" is to be treated as wages should lead us to follow the agencies' determination. There is a suggestion that the administrative decision should be treated as conclusive, and reliance for that argument is placed upon National Labor Relations Board v. Hearst Publications, 322 U.S. 111, 130, 64 S.Ct. 851, 860, 88 L.Ed. 1170, and Gray v. Powell, 314 U.S. 402, 411, 62 S.Ct. 326, 332, the cash value of all remuneration paid in any medium other than cash; except that such term shall not include remuneration paid—". See 26 CFR, 1944 Supp., 405-101(d) and (e).

86 L.Ed. 301. In the acts which were construed in the cases just cited, as in the Social Security Act, the administrators of those acts were given power to reach preliminary conclusions as to coverage in the application of the respective acts. Each act contains a standardized phrase that Board findings supported by substantial evidence shall be conclusive.²¹ The validity of regulations is specifically reserved for judicial determination by the Social Security Act Amendments of 1939, sec. 205(g).

The Social Security Board and the Treasury were compelled to decide, administratively, whether or not to treat "back pay" as wages and their expert judgment is entitled, as we have said, to great weight.²² The very fact that judicial review has been accorded, however, makes evident that such decisions are only conclusive as to properly supported findings of fact. Both N.L.R.B. v. Hearst Publications, page 131, of 322 U.S., page 860 of 64 S.Ct., 88 L.Ed. 1170, and Gray v. Powell, page 411 of 314 U.S., page 332 of 62 S.Ct., 86 L.Ed. 301, advert to the limitations of administrative interpretations. Administrative determinations must have a basis in law and must be within the granted authority. Administration when it interprets a statute so as to make it apply to particular circumstances acts as a delegate to the legislative power. Congress might have declared that "back pay" awards under the Labor Act should or should not be treated as wages. Congress might have delegated to the Social Security Board to determine what compensation paid by employers to employees should be treated as wages. Except as such interpretive power may be included in the agencies' administrative functions, Congress did neither. An agency may not finally decide the limits of its statutory power. That is a judicial function.²³ Congress used a well-understood word—"wages"—to indicate the receipts which were to govern taxes and benefits under the Social Security Act. There may be borderline payments to employees on which courts would follow administrative determination as to whether such payments were or were not wages under the act. . . .

Humboldt Steamship Company*, 224 U.S. 474, 32 S.Ct. 556, 56 L.Ed. 849, the Commissioners refused to require certain Alaskan shippers to file rate schedules because, under their interpretation of the act, Alaskan commerce was not within their jurisdiction. They based this conclusion upon construction of the word "territory" in the Interstate Commerce Act (49 U.S.C.A. § 1 et seq.). The party aggrieved sought a writ of mandamus to compel the Commission to act. The Commission pleaded that, since it was the body principally charged with the enforcement of the Act, the preliminary question of its jurisdiction thereunder was as much within the scope of its authority as any other question of interpretation which would arise, and that its decision thereon was binding upon the courts. The Supreme Court of the United States holding that the Commission's interpretation of "territory" was erroneous and that mandamus was a proper remedy, said at p. 484, "The Interstate Commerce Commission is purely an administrative body . . . it may exercise judgment and discretion, and, it may be, cannot be controlled in either. But if it absolutely refused to act, deny its power, from a misunderstanding of the law, it cannot be said to exercise jurisdiction. Give it that latitude and yet give it the power to nullify its most essential duties, and how would its non-action be reviewed?"

STATE v. KELLY

Supreme Court of Kansas, 1905.
71 Kan. 811, 81 P. 450, 70 L.R.A. 450.

Mandamus by the state, on the relation of C. C. Coleman, Attorney General, against T. T. Kelly, State Treasurer, and E. B. Jewett, warden of the State Penitentiary. Writ denied.

This proceeding was instituted in this court by the state, on the relation of the Attorney General, for a peremptory writ of mandamus to compel Thomas T. Kelly, as State Treasurer, and E. B. Jewett, as warden of the State Penitentiary, to execute, negotiate, and sell certain bonds on behalf of the state of Kansas, and apply the proceeds as directed by Senate Bill No. 30 (Laws 1905, p. 783, c. 478). An alternative writ was allowed, to which the defendants separately answered that the state was proceeding under an act authorizing them, in their official capacities, to issue and sell the bonds in question, and apply the proceeds thereof to the construction, maintenance, and operation of a state oil refinery at Peru, all of which would be one of those "works of internal improvement" to the carrying on of which the state may never be a party without violating the provisions of section 8 of article 11 of the Constitution. In reply to the claim of defendants the state contends that the intention of the Legislature was to build a branch penitentiary in that part of the state where oil is found in large quantities, and, incidental thereto, and as a part of the branch penitentiary, for the purpose of furnishing proper employment for the inmates of the State Penitentiary, to build and operate an oil refinery. . . .

GREENE, J. (after stating the facts). The sole question in this proceeding is the constitutionality of the act of 1905 called the "Oil Refinery Bill." In its consideration the object of the statute—that is, the good which the Legislature intended to accomplish, or the evil which it intended to prevent or correct—must be determined. Whether this law is simply a provision for securing larger and better facilities for the maintenance, employment, and care of the inmates of the penitentiary, thus accomplishing a good work, or a provision for constructing, operating, and maintaining an oil refinery, thus attempting to correct a great evil, is of supreme importance. In construing a statute, resort should first be had to the language of its provisions. If it be found that a clear and definite meaning may be ascertained by giving the words their common signification, the court has no choice or discretion to exercise. Its only duty is to declare the result of its investigation. An observation of this rule requires the court to consider every part of the act, and, if possible, to discover from the whole the legislative intent. Another requisite rule of construction is that where it is doubtful which of two objects the Legislature had in view, one being within its authority, and the other not, the language must be given a broad and liberal interpretation, and an endeavor made to apply the act to the object within the legislative authority. All presumptions are resolved in favor of the constitutionality of a statute, and when doubt is entertained its language should be given that construction which will sustain it. People ex rel. Sinkler v. Terry, 108 N.Y. 1, 14 N.E. 815; Miller v. Dunn, 72 Cal. 462, 14 P. 27, 1 Am.St.Rep. 67; City of San Diego v. Granniss, 77 Cal. 511, 19 P. 875; Mauldin v. City Council, 42 S.C. 293, 20 S.E. 842, 27 L.R.A. 284, 46 Am.St.Rep. 723; Wenger v. Taylor, 39 Kan. 754, 18 P. 911.

We confess to great difficulty in determining the object of the act under consideration. The title expresses it in this way: "An act to provide for branch penitentiary and oil refinery in connection therewith, the issuance of bonds for said purpose, and making an appropriation therefor, and for the payment of principal and interest on said bonds." The title indicates that it was the intention to build and maintain a branch penitentiary, and also to build an oil refinery. Section 1 provides: "For the purpose of providing proper employment for convicts confined in the State Penitentiary, the warden of the Kansas State Penitentiary is hereby empowered, by and with the advice of the board of directors of said penitentiary, to secure, without expense to the state, a suitable site for the erection of a branch of the State Penitentiary and oil refinery at Peru." Here again appears the double purpose—a branch of the State Penitentiary and an oil refinery. The subsequent provisions of the section do not indicate an intention to build a branch of the State Penitentiary, but go into great detail for the construction, maintenance, and operation of an oil refinery for the manufacture of crude and refined oil and its by-products; and the warden of the State Penitentiary is required to keep such refinery in repair, and furnish the requisite machinery, equipments, and instrumentalities for receiving, manufacturing, and storing crude and refined oil, and marketing the same. No reference is made to the construction or maintenance of a branch of the State Penitentiary, its dimensions, the number of rooms, the material of which it shall be constructed, or that any shall be constructed. Section 2, however, makes some reference to a branch penitentiary, but closely connects it with the oil refinery. It provides that in "constructing, maintaining and operating such branch penitentiary and oil refinery, said warden and board of directors are hereby authorized to employ convicts in the State Penitentiary." The latter part of this section makes a specific provision with reference to a so-called branch of the State Penitentiary, authorizing the officials to provide "suitable and humane facilities for the housing, feeding, guarding and overseeing of said convicts and the work to be performed by them." The only other reference in the act to the construction of a branch penitentiary is in section 3, where an appropriation of $10,000 is made for the construction of suitable quarters and facilities for housing, feeding, guarding, and overseeing the convicts at the branch penitentiary. It also makes an appropriation of $200,000 for the construction of an oil refinery plant, and $200,000 more for operating and keeping the same in repair, the purchase of crude oil, and the expense of receiving, refining, storing, handling, and marketing its products.

From these provisions alone it is doubtful whether the primary object of the bill was to build a branch penitentiary at Peru, where oil is produced in great quantities, and incidentally thereto, and for the purpose of furnishing employment to the convicts confined therein, to build and operate an oil refinery, or whether it was to construct and operate an oil refinery plant in this oil field, and operate it, so far as possible, by convicts in the State Penitentiary, with such provisions, and only such, for the housing, guarding, and feeding such convicts, as would be necessary for their care while employed in the refinery. But for the rule previously stated—that all presumptions are in favor of the constitutionality of a statute, and that all doubts should be resolved in support of it—and but for other means of information than the language of the act, we would be strongly inclined to hold that the Legislature regarded the building and operating of the oil refinery as of paramount importance. Where, however, an act is so ambiguous, indefinite, and uncertain that it is doubtful which of two objects the Legislature had in mind, the court, for the purpose of determining the legislative intent, may resort to other means of interpretation than the language. The history and conditions of the people within the jurisdiction of a court at the time of the passage of an act which it is called upon to construe for the purpose of determining its validity are familiar to a court, and its knowledge of the same should aid it in assuming the proper viewpoint from which to discover the object of the law—particularly a law of the nature of the one under consideration. The history of a state, which should include the facts surrounding the enactments of its Legislature, and the questions therein raised upon the passage of every law of an economic nature, as well as the doings of its people and the public questions which have agitated their minds, is known by a court. If the act under consideration be one passed immediately before a court is called upon to construe it, it is as familiar with the conditions of the people as any well-informed citizen of the state. It knows that in certain portions of the state large areas are devoted to the growing of wheat, while in other portions the farming of that cereal is not practicable. It knows that the same is true of corn and other crops. It knows that certain parts of the state require irrigation to make farming profitable, while in other parts the precipitation is generally sufficient. It knows that in certain counties large deposits of coal are found, and in others large fields of oil and gas have been discovered. It knows the enterprises of the people of the state in a business way quite as well as it understands the agricultural conditions. It also knows those general facts concerning the public aims and interests of the state in social and economic ways which all well-informed people know, including the questions that agitated the public mind at the time this certain law was enacted, and knows the history of the Constitution, and the reason for the adoption of certain provisions and the rejection of others. A court cannot divest itself of the knowledge of all these things in construing a statute or constitutional provision, even if it were disposed so to do. The consideration of this knowledge, without proof of the facts, is generally termed "judicial notice," and, for the want of a better expression, it will suffice; but the term means no more than that courts, in construing the law, will bring to their aid all those facts which are known by all well-informed persons because they are matters of public concern.

Authority for taking into consideration the history of an enactment and the conditions of the people of the state at that particular time is abundant. . . .

"That the persons whose duty it may be to inspect the act with a view to the determination of that question are not required to divest themselves of all knowledge save that to be gleaned from the act alone. For, were it possible for them to divest themselves, the act would be unintelligible—a jumble of words without meaning. So, when we say that the question is to be determined by an inspection of the act itself, we imply that those under whose inspection it is brought will scan it in the light of that knowledge which they possess in common with other men. There is no presumption that courts are ignorant of all matters that transpire outside the courtroom. On the contrary, there are many matters outside the science of law of which they are required to take judicial notice." Redell v. Moores, 63 Neb. 219, 226, 88 N.W. 243, 245, 55 L.R.A. 740, 93 Am.St.Rep. 431.

The principle is stated thus in Bishop on Statutory Crimes (3d Ed.) § 77: "They [courts] do not close their eyes to what they know of the history of the country and of the law, of the condition of the law at the particular time, of the public necessities felt, and other like things."

"Courts are authorized to collect the intention of the Legislature from the occasion and necessity of the law—from the mischief felt, and the objects and remedy in view." Sibley v. Smith et al., 2 Mich. 486, 487.

"But courts, in construing a statute, may with propriety recur to the history of the times when it was passed, and this is frequently necessary in order to ascertain the reason as well as the meaning of particular provisions in it." United States v. Union Pacific R. Co., 91 U.S. 72, 79, 23 L.Ed. 224.

"Courts will take judicial notice, without proof, of all judicial events which are generally known within the limits of their jurisdiction." State v. Boyd, 34 Neb. 435, 51 N.W. 964.

"In construing a constitution or law, the history of its passage through the convention or Legislature is often of great assistance." Minnesota & Pacific Railroad Company v. H. H. Sibley, 2 Minn. 13, 19 (Gil. 1).

Statutes are but public sentiments enacted into laws, and frequently the policy of such legislation is the subject of much public discussion both before and at the time of its enactment. In construing it, courts may not shut their eyes to these public discussions. They are proper matters of consideration in determining the legislative intent, and should be considered for that purpose in the construction of an act growing out of such discussion.

In common with all other well-informed persons, this court knows of the great quantities of crude oil that were discovered in a part of the state; the rapid development of this field of industry; the general public complaint that a particular corporation was unjustly manipulating the market of this product so that the producer was being deprived of what rightfully belonged to him; that a public demand was made upon the Legislature of 1905 to enact some law which would protect the producer from the further encroachments of this corporation upon his rights. The Senate journal of that Legislature shows that on January 12, 1905, Senate Bill No. 30 was introduced by Senator Porter, with the following title: "An act to provide for the construction, maintenance and operation of a state oil refinery, and to provide the necessary funds for such construction, maintenance, operation and management, and to place the operation and management thereof under state control." January 16th Senate Bill No. 30 was read a second time, and referred to the committee on oil and gas. February 3, 1905, under the head of "Reports of Standing Committees," the committee on oil and gas made the following report: "Mr. President: Your committee on oil and gas to whom was referred substitute for Senate Bill No. 30, 'An act in relation to the employment of convicts in the State Penitentiary and in relation to the construction and operation of a state oil refinery in connection therewith,' have had the same under consideration and instruct me to report the bill back to the Senate with the recommendation that it be passed. S. S. Benedict, Chairman." This report refers to substitute for Senate Bill No. 30, but the journal does not show that a substitute was introduced in the Senate. On February 7th the committee of the whole made the following report: "Mr. President: The committee of the whole Senate have had under consideration bills on the calendar under the head of 'Special Orders,' and I am directed to report as follows: Recommend that substitute for Senate Bill No. 30, 'An act to provide for the construction, maintenance and operation of a state oil refinery, and to provide the necessary funds for such construction, maintenance, operation, and management, and to place the operation and management thereof under state control,' be passed as amended."

The Senate journal of February 8th, under the head of "Presentation of Petitions," contains the following petition offered by Senator Porter of Crawford:

"To The Honorable, the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Kansas, in Legislature Assembled: The undersigned petitioners, citizens of Cherokee, Kansas, and vicinity, respectfully call your attention to the fact that Kansas petroleum, one of the most staple articles that constitute the natural wealth of the state, is rapidly falling into the hands of the most arrogant and despotic trust in the world, which, by the ownership and monopoly of such product is not only stifling industry in this state but extorting millions of dollars every year from the people of Kansas by setting its own price on our state products. Therefore, your petitioners respectfully ask that some legislative enactment be granted by which the state may own and operate a number of plants throughout the oil fields for the refining, distribution and sale of oil. Your petitioners fully believe that such action on your part would not only be for the best interest of the state, but it would be in accord with the will of a large majority of the citizens."

On February 8th, under the head of "Third Reading of Bills," the journal shows that Senate Bill No. 30 passed under the following title: "An act to provide for the construction, maintenance and operation of a state oil refinery, and to provide the necessary funds for such construction, maintenance, operation and management, and to place the operation and management thereof under state control." On the motion of Senator Smith, of Edwards, the title was amended, and the present title substituted for the original one, which reads: "An act to provide for a branch penitentiary and oil refinery in connection therewith, the issuance of bonds for said purpose, and making an appropriation therefor and for the payment of interest on said bonds."

Senate journal of February 16th shows that the Governor transmitted to the Legislature his special message, approving Senate Bill No. 30, . . .

The executive sustains a more direct and intimate relation to the people than any other official. He knows and understands the conditions, desires, aspirations, and aims of each community. The bill in question having originated, as expressed in the message, in a popular demand for relief against a "powerful commercial combatant," against which the individual was unable to cope, it met the hearty and enthusiastic approval of the Governor, not as an appropriation to build a branch of the State Penitentiary, but as an appropriation for the construction and operation of an oil refinery; and, inasmuch as no reference is made to the branch penitentiary, it may be said that the Governor did not understand that there were any provisions in the bill which seriously contemplated the building of a branch of the State Penitentiary. The Governor discloses his apprehension of the constitutionality of this bill in his comparison of the feasibility of the many plans which had been suggested for the repression of the greed of this "rapacious corporation" with his own, which was to appropriate $50,000 for an experimental refinery at Lansing. He said: "I believe the expenditure of that sum for the establishment of an experimental refinery at Lansing would have eliminated the constitutional question, and subserved all the possible purposes to be subserved by the larger appropriations." This constitutional provision is a limitation placed by the people in their paramount law upon the power of the Legislature, preventing it from diverting the energies of the state from public and governmental functions into private and business enterprises. No circumstances can arise which will justify its violation by any governmental department. It is a protection against a particular class of ill-advised or rash legislation, resulting from a distempered public sentiment, which requires only cooling time for its proper adjustment.

If, as contended by the state, the object of the bill is to construct a branch penitentiary, it seems strange that the Governor, in approving it, should feel called upon to say that it "is such a radical departure from governmental precedent that it seems wise to put upon the records a clear statement of the provocation and purpose of this undertaking, . . . that our action be clearly defined and thoroughly understood at home and abroad." The construction of penal institutions is not a "radical departure from governmental precedent." The "provocation" for maintaining such institutions is known to all persons. Besides, what interest have the people abroad in the subject of our penal institutions, that for their benefit "our action be clearly defined." The indictment of the Standard Oil Company in the message is, no doubt, true, and the provocation was very great, but—

"We must not make a scarecrow of the law, Setting it up to fear the birds of prey."

The consideration of the bill in the light of the public conditions under which it was conceived, the title under which it was introduced in the Senate, the bill itself, and its reference by the Senate to its committee on oil and gas, instead of to its committee on penal institutions, the passage of the bill by the Senate under its original title, the purpose of the bill, and the reasons for its passage as expressed by the Governor in his special message of approval, leave no doubt in our minds that the object of the bill is to secure a site whereon the state should construct, operate, and maintain an oil refinery, and that, in so far as the warden and board of directors of the State Penitentiary might think advisable, they could employ in the construction of the building and maintaining and operating the refinery inmates of the State Penitentiary, and for this reason provisions were made for housing, feeding, guarding, and overseeing such convicts, and the work to be performed by them while thus engaged.

The bill, being an appropriation for the construction, operation, and maintenance of an oil refinery, which is a work of internal improvement, within the provisions of section 8, art. 11, of the state Constitution, which provides that "the state shall never be a party in carrying on any works of internal improvement," is void. . . .

The peremptory writ is denied. All the Justices concurring.

CHATWIN v. UNITED STATES

Supreme Court of the United States, 1945.
326 U.S. 455, 66 S.Ct. 233, 90 L.Ed. 198.

MR. JUSTICE MURPHY delivered the opinion of the Court.

The Federal Kidnapping Act¹ punishes any one who knowingly transports or aids in transporting in interstate or foreign commerce "any person who shall have been unlawfully seized, confined, inveigled, decoyed, kidnapped, abducted, or carried away by any means whatsoever and held for ransom or reward or otherwise, except, in the case of a minor, by a parent thereof." The sole issue confronting us in these cases is whether the stipulated facts support the convictions of the three petitioners under this Act, the indictment having charged that they unlawfully inveigled, decoyed and carried away a minor child of the age of 15, held her for a stated period, and transported her from Utah to Arizona with knowledge that she had been so inveigled and held. We are not called upon to determine or characterize the morality of their actions. Nor are we concerned here with their liability under any other statute, federal or state.

Petitioners are members of the Fundamentalist cult of the Mormon faith, a cult that sanctions plural or "celestial" marriages. In August, 1940, petitioner Chatwin, who was then a 68-year old widower, employed one Dorothy Wyler as a house keeper in his home in Santaquin, Utah. This girl was nearly 15 years old at this time although the stipulation indicates that she had only a mental age of 7.² Her employment by Chatwin was approved by her parents. While residing at Chatwin's home, the girl was continually taught by Chatwin and one Lulu Cook, who also resided there, that plural marriage was essential to her salvation. Chatwin also told her that it was her grandmother's desire that he should take her in celestial marriage and that such a marriage was in conformity with the true principles of the original Mormon Church. As a result of these teachings, the girl was converted to the principle of celestial marriage and entered into a cult marriage with Chatwin December 19, 1940. Thereafter she became pregnant, which fact was discovered by her parents on July 24, 1941. The parents then informed the juvenile authorities of the State of Utah of the situation and they took the girl into custody as a delinquent on August 4, 1941, making her a ward of the juvenile court.

² At the time of her employment by Chatwin, the girl's physical age was 14 years and 8 months; her mental age was 7 years and 2 months; her intelligence quotient was 67. At the time of the stipulation in March, 1944, she was a "high grade moron" with a mental age of 9 years and 8 months and an intelligence quotient of 64.

On August 10, 1941, the girl accompanied a juvenile probation officer to a motion picture show at Provo, Utah. The officer left the girl at the show and returned later to call for her. The girl asked to be allowed to stay on for a short time and the officer consented. Thereafter, and prior to the second return of the officer, the girl "left the picture show and went out onto the street in Provo." There she met two married daughters of Chatwin who gave her sufficient money to go from Provo to Salt Lake City. Shortly after arriving there she was taken to the home of petitioners Zitting and Christensen. They together with Chatwin, convinced her that she should abide, as they put it, "by the law of God rather than the law of man" and that she was perfectly justified in running away from the juvenile court in order to live with Chatwin. They further convinced her that she should go with them to Mexico to be married legally to Chatwin and then remain in hiding until she had reached her majority under Utah law. Thereafter, on October 6, 1941, the three petitioners transported the girl in Zitting's automobile from Salt Lake City to Juarez, Mexico, where she went through a civil marriage ceremony with Chatwin on October 14. She was then brought back to Utah and thence to Short Creek, Arizona. There she lived in hiding with Chatwin under assumed names until discovered by federal authorities over two years later, December 9, 1943. While in Short Creek she gave birth to two children by Chatwin. The transportation of the girl from Provo to Salt Lake City, thence to Juarez, Mexico, and finally to Short Creek was without the consent and against the wishes of her parents and without authority from the juvenile court officials.

Having waived jury trials, the three petitioners were found guilty as charged and were given jail sentences. United States v. Cleveland, D.C., 56 F.Supp. 890. The court below affirmed the convictions. 10 Cir., 146 F.2d 730. We granted certiorari, 324 U.S. 835, 65 S.Ct. 858, 859, 860, because of our doubts as to the correctness of the judgment that the petitioners were guilty under the Federal Kidnapping Act on the basis of the foregoing facts.

The Act by its own terms contemplates that the kidnapped victim shall have been (1) "unlawfully seized, confined, inveigled, decoyed, kidnapped, abducted, or carried away by any means whatsoever" and (2) "held for ransom or reward or otherwise." The Government contends that both elements appear from the stipulated facts in this case. . . .

The stipulated facts of this case reveal a situation quite different from the general problem to which the framers of the Federal Kidnapping Act addressed themselves. This statute was drawn in 1932 against a background of organized violence. 75 Cong. Rec. 13282-13304. Kidnaping by that time had become an epidemic in the United States. Ruthless criminal bands utilized every known legal and scientific means to achieve their aims and to protect themselves. Victims were selected from among the wealthy with great care and study. Details of the seizures and detentions were fully and meticulously worked out in advance. Ransom was the usual motive. "Law enforcement authorities, lacking coordination, with no uniform system of intercommunication and restricted in authority to activities in their own jurisdiction, found themselves laughed at by criminals bound by no such inhibitions or restrictions The procedure was simple—a man would be kidnapped in one State and whisked into another, and still another, his captors knowing full well that the police in the jurisdiction where the crime was committed had no authority as far as the State of confinement and concealment was concerned." Fisher and McGurie, "Kidnapping and the So-called Lindbergh Law," 12 New York U.L.Q.Rev. 646, 653. See also Hearing before the House Committee on the Judiciary (72d Cong., 1st Sess.) on H. R. 5657, Serial 4; Finley, "The Lindbergh Law," 28 Georgetown L. J. 908.

It was to assist the states in stamping out this growing and sinister menace of kidnaping that the Federal Kidnapping Act was designed. Its proponents recognized that where victims were transported across state lines only the federal government had the power to disregard such barriers in pursuing the captors. H. Rep. No. 1493 (72d Cong., 1st Sess.); S. Rep. No. 765 (72d Cong., 1st Sess.) Given added impetus by the emotion which gripped the nation due to the famous Lindbergh kidnaping case, the federal statute was speedily adopted. See 75 Cong. Rec. 5075-5076, 13282-13304. Comprehensive language was used to cover every possible variety of kidnaping followed by interstate transportation. Armed with this legislative mandate, federal officials have achieved a high and effective control of this type of crime.

But the broadness of the statutory language does not permit us to tear the words out of their context, using the magic of lexicography to apply them to unattractive or immoral situations lacking the involuntariness of seizure and detention which is the very essence of the crime of kidnaping. Thus, if this essential element is missing, the act of participating in illicit relations or contributing to the delinquency of a minor or entering into a celestial marriage, followed by interstate transportation, does not constitute a crime under the Federal Kidnapping Act. No unusual or notorious situation relating to the inability of state authorities to capture and punish participants in such activities evidenced itself at the time this Act was created; no authoritative spokesman indicated that the Act was to be used to assist the states in these matters, however unlawful and obnoxious the character of these activities might otherwise be. Nor is there any indication that Congress desired or contemplated that the punishment of death or long imprisonment, as authorized by the Act, might be applied to those guilty of immoralities lacking the characteristics of true kidnappings. In short, the purpose of the Act was to outlaw interstate kidnappings rather than general transgressions of morality involving the crossing of state lines. And the broad language of the statute must be interpreted and applied with that plain fact in mind. . . .

Were we to sanction a careless concept of the crime of kidnaping or were we to disregard the background and setting of the Act the boundaries of potential liability would be lost in infinity. A loose construction of the statutory language conceivably could lead to the punishment of any one who induced another to leave his surroundings and do some innocent or illegal act of benefit to the former, state lines subsequently being traversed. The absurdity of such a result, with its attendant likelihood of unfair punishment and blackmail, is sufficient by itself to foreclose that construction

The judgment of the court below affirming the convictions of the petitioners must therefore be reversed.

Reversed.

"It is not uncommon for judges to assume knowledge of extrinsic facts when interpreting statutes of peculiar public importance. To a certain extent such practice is warranted when it is necessary to consider the history of, and the circumstances connected with, the birth of a statute, in order to discover the intent with which it was adopted. But the courts should resort to such method of interpretation only when the enactment is so ambiguous that the intent of its makers must be sought beyond its own limits."

KELLY v. DEWEY

Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut, 1930. 111 Conn. 280, 149 A. 840.

HAINES, J. The facts of this proceeding are not in dispute. The plaintiff was convicted on June 18, 1928, by the city police court of Hartford, of operating a motor vehicle while under the influence of liquor. He was again convicted in the same court on October 12, 1929, of a second offense, and sentenced and committed to the Hartford county jail for a period of six months. On December 31, 1929, a judge of that court issued an order purporting to suspend the jail sentence so imposed, and issued an order purporting to place the plaintiff in the custody of the probation officer of that court for one year, and caused the facts to be made a part of the record in the case. The order was directed to the sheriff of Hartford county, who refused to recognize it. The plaintiff thereupon prayed out a writ of habeas corpus which was issued by the superior court for Hartford county. The return made by the defendant in obedience to this writ, set up the provisions of chapter 285 of the Public Acts of 1929, and alleged that the plaintiff was held by the respondent under a mittimus which directed the plaintiff's confinement for six months from and after October 12, 1929, following a conviction of the plaintiff for operating a motor vehicle while under the influence of liquor, second offense, and averring that the judge of the city police court of Hartford was without authority or jurisdiction to suspend the execution of that sentence and order the plaintiff to be placed upon probation for one year in the custody of a probation officer. To this return the plaintiff demurred on the ground that the provisions of the statute referred to, and especially section 2 thereof, showed that the judge did have power to suspend the execution of the sentence and make the order for probation, and that the return was therefore insufficient. The statute in question, chapter 285 of the Public Acts of 1929, appears in the footnote.¹

The plaintiff rests his claim that the action of the judge of the city police court of Hartford was legally authorized upon the second section of chapter 285, Pub. Acts of 1929, saying that sections 1 and 2 of the act "are entirely separate and distinct and have nothing whatsoever to do with each other. . . . It was not the intention to limit the power of the court in section two, to the extent that the court could not suspend the execution of the sentence and place on probation in a case similar to the present one."

Let us examine the position the plaintiff thus takes. Under section 1, literally construed, it is quite apparent that the sentence of this plaintiff could not be suspended; it is specifically forbidden. ". . . The court shall, in no case, suspend the execution of the sentence of an

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in General Assembly convened:

Section 1. Chapter 62 of the public acts of 1923 is amended to read as follows: Any criminal court in any case within its jurisdiction, except in cases of commitment to the State Prison, may impose sentence and suspend the execution thereof indefinitely, when the mitigating circumstances clearly justify such action, and, upon such suspension, the court shall forthwith cause to be spread upon its records the reasons upon which such action is based, provided the court shall, in no case, suspend the execution of the sentence of an accused convicted of operating a motor vehicle while under the influence of intoxicating liquor if such offense shall have been committed within a period of six years immediately following such final conviction of a like offense by a court of this state, or by a person convicted of a felony if it shall appear that he has twice been previously convicted of a felony.

Sec. 2. Chapter 71 of the public acts of 1919 as amended by chapter 175 of the public acts of 1921 is amended to read as follows: In cases within its jurisdiction, except in cases after commitment to the State Prison or to the Connecticut Reformatory, any criminal court or the judge holding such court may, during or after the adjournment of the session at which such commitment was issued, after hearing, continue the case or suspend the execution of the sentence and commit the accused to the custody of a probation officer or to the custody of a probation officer pro tempore, to be appointed by such judge, for such time not exceeding one year as the court may fix, and thereupon the court or judge shall cause the facts upon which such action is based to be made a part of the record of such case. Approved June 6, 1929.

accused convicted of operating a motor vehicle while under the influence of intoxicating liquor if such offense shall have been committed within a period of six years. . . ."

Under section 2, also literally construed, and if standing alone and independent of any other legislation on the same subject, the court was permitted, except in state prison and reformatory cases, "during or after the adjournment of the session at which such commitment was issued, after hearing, [to] continue the case or suspend the execution of the sentence and commit the accused to the custody of a probation officer."

The logic of the plaintiff's position then is this: That the two sections of this act should be read and construed literally, and that they stand separate and distinct from each other, but of equal legislative effect; that the Legislature intended by the first section to forbid the release of drunken drivers guilty of second offense; that it intended by the second section to permit the release of such drivers; that the second section leaves the law on this particular subject where it stood before; that, though the obvious intent shown in the first section was to adopt the change recommended by the judicial council, it was also the intent to defeat that result by the provisions of the second section of the same act.

The claim that the two sections of chapter 285 should be read and construed as separate and distinct cannot be sustained by any sound rule of statutory construction. The act is a substitute for, and a repeal of all prior legislation to which it specifically refers. We must look upon it as a single piece of new legislation enacted as a substitute for the prior provisions.

This conclusion results from another well-known rule of construction which is that all parts of an act are to be construed together, and it is not permissible to rest the construction upon any one part alone. The general intention is the key to the whole act, and the intention of the whole controls the interpretation of all its parts.

A legitimate and often helpful means of determining the legislative intent is to examine the history and derivation of the act, and consider the circumstances and conditions known to the Legislature at the time of its enactment. Mattoon's Appeal, 79 Conn. 86, 87, 63 A. 784; Quinebaug Bank v. Tarbox, 20 Conn. 518.

The first legislation in this state on the subject of suspended sentences and probation was chapter 126, Pub. Acts of 1903, which provided for the appointment of probation officers, and gave power to "any court" to pronounce sentence and suspend execution and commit the accused to the Probation Officer for not more than one year. An exception was made of state prison crimes. This was amended by chapter 142, Pub. Acts of 1905, leaving out the provision as to state prison crimes, and these provisions remained until 1907, when a judge was given the authority after the term of court had closed. This was again amended by chapter 106, Pub. Acts of 1911, but with no change pertinent to the present question. It was again amended by chapter 56, Pub. Acts of 1915, and the exception of state prison and reformatory cases was again made, the Act then taking substantially the same form in which it appears in section 6671, Rev.1918. This was again amended by chapter 71, Pub. Acts of 1919, making verbal changes regarding state prison and reformatory prisoners. Another amendment was made by chapter 175, Pub. Acts of 1921, without any change affecting this inquiry, and this was followed by the present section 2 of chapter 285, Pub. Acts of 1929 which we are considering.

In chapter 62, Pub. Acts of 1923, power was given to any criminal court to "impose sentence and suspend the execution thereof indefinitely, in any case within its jurisdiction." This was amended in 1929, and became section 1 of chapter 285, Pub. Acts of 1929.

The chronology of these sections shows that, at the time chapter 285, was enacted, there were two existing statutes which provided as follows:

"In cases within its jurisdiction, except in cases after commitment to the state prison, or state reformatory, any criminal court or the judge holding such court may, during or after the adjournment of the term, after hearing, continue the case or suspend the execution of the sentence and commit the accused to the custody of a probation officer or to the custody of a probation officer pro tempore, to be appointed by such judge, for such time not exceeding one year as the court may fix. . . ." Pub. Acts 1921, c. 175.

"Any criminal court may impose sentence and suspend the execution thereof indefinitely in any case within its jurisdiction. Such court may order brought before it any person upon whom such sentence has been imposed who shall be convicted, within one year from the date thereof, of any crime, and may revoke such suspension, whereupon such sentence shall be in force." Pub. Acts 1923, c. 62.

By chapter 190, Pub. Acts 1927, a "Judicial Council" was created by the Legislature "for the continuous study of the organization rules and methods of procedure and practice of the judicial system of the state, the work accomplished and the results produced by that system and its various parts." Section 1. In its first report to the Governor of this state, after discussing the selection of jurors and the appointment of the judges of the city, town, and borough courts, extended consideration is given to what is termed "the abuse of the suspension of sentence."

In opening that discussion, the report first makes specific reference to the two statutory provisions which we have quoted. Characterizing these as broad powers, and pointing out the serious consequences of their abuse, the report continues: "It is however, a matter of common knowledge that some city, town and borough courts are imposing fines, or fines with a suspended jail sentence, in many cases involving second, third and fourth offenses, rather than a jail sentence with a possibility of an appeal and loss of fine to city or town. We have particularly in mind the driving of an automobile under the influence of intoxicating liquor, transportation of liquor in violation of law, and the reckless accused convicted of operating a motor vehicle while under the influence of intoxicating liquor if such offense shall have been committed within a period of six years. . . ."

Under section 2, also literally construed, and if standing alone and independent of any other legislation on the same subject, the court was permitted, except in state prison and reformatory cases, "during or after the adjournment of the session at which such commitment was issued, after hearing, [to] continue the case or suspend the execution of the sentence and commit the accused to the custody of a probation officer."

The logic of the plaintiff's position then is this: That the two sections of this act should be read and construed literally, and that they stand separate and distinct from each other, but of equal legislative effect; that the Legislature intended by the first section to forbid the release of drunken drivers guilty of second offense; that it intended by the second section to permit the release of such drivers; that the second section leaves the law on this particular subject where it stood before; that, though the obvious intent shown in the first section was to adopt the change recommended by the judicial council, it was also the intent to defeat that result by the provisions of the second section of the same act.

The chronology of these sections shows that, at the time chapter 285, was enacted, there were two existing statutes which provided as follows:

"In cases within its jurisdiction, except in cases after commitment to the state prison, or state reformatory, any criminal court or the judge holding such court may, during or after the adjournment of the term, after hearing, continue the case or suspend the execution of the sentence and commit the accused to the custody of a probation officer or to the custody of a probation officer pro tempore, to be appointed by such judge, for such time not exceeding one year as the court may fix. . . ." Such court may order brought before it any person upon whom such sentence has been imposed who shall be convicted, within one year from the date thereof, of any crime, and may revoke such suspension, whereupon such sentence shall be in force." Pub. Acts 1923, c. 62.

By chapter 190, Pub. Acts 1927, a "Judicial Council" was created by the Legislature "for the continuous study of the organization rules and methods of procedure and practice of the judicial system of the state, the work accomplished and the results produced by that system and its various parts." Section 1. In its first report to the Governor of this state, after discussing the selection of jurors and the appointment of the judges of the city, town, and borough courts, extended consideration is given to what is termed "the abuse of the suspension of sentence."

In opening that discussion, the report first makes specific reference to the two statutory provisions which we have quoted. Characterizing these as broad powers, and pointing out the serious consequences of their abuse, the report continues: "It is however, a matter of common knowledge that some city, town and borough courts are imposing fines, or fines with a suspended jail sentence, in many cases involving second, third and fourth offenses, rather than a jail sentence with a possibility of an appeal and loss of fine to city or town. We have particularly in mind the driving of an automobile under the influence of intoxicating liquor, transportation of liquor in violation of law, and the reckless driving of motor vehicles. The second and third violation of these crimes ought not to be treated as lightly as our city, town and borough courts frequently treat them, penalizing the violation by a fine, or a fine with a suspended jail sentence. The driver of a motor vehicle who is under the influence of intoxicating liquor is a menace to every vehicle he may meet on the road. In every such case, unless the mitigating circumstances are very exceptional, such a driver when convicted of this offense, should be committed to jail and his license revoked, and the license not renewed until the commissioner of motor vehicles is fully satisfied that the driver is in no likelihood of again becoming under the influence of intoxicating liquor."

After the discussion of some other features of the situation, the following recommendation was made: "That said public acts of 1921 and 1923 be amended by providing that the provisions of said acts shall not permit the suspension of the execution of the sentence of a person convicted of operating a motor vehicle under the influence of intoxicating liquor if such offense was committed within a period of six years immediately following final conviction of a like offense by a court of this state, or by a person convicted of a felony if it shall appear that he has been previously convicted two times of any felony. These provisions, if enacted into law, will tend to stop, in large part, the abuse of the suspended sentence as now practiced, and tend to rid our highways of many drivers of motor vehicles who continually imperil all other users of the highway. The safety of society and the safety of the traveling public upon our highways, will be promoted by the passage of the proposed acts."

The Legislature thus had before it in the session of 1929 the law as it then existed, the serious public evil which was permitted by that law, and recommendation by an official body created by the Legislature itself, looking toward a remedy. A comparative reading of chapter 285 which the Legislature thereupon passed, particularly section 1, and the recommendation of the judicial council, makes it too clear for argument that the Legislature intended to adopt that recommendation. The general effect of the provisions of section 1, which follow the language of the recommendation almost verbatim, was to prevent the release of a driver twice convicted of driving under the influence of liquor. It thus aimed to, and did, accomplish the remedy suggested. Can it be thought that, in adding section 2, the Legislature intended to render the provisions of section 1 ineffective? The reasonable, and we think the only, explanation of the seemingly conflicting language of the two sections is that, in the endeavor to preserve the general authority of the courts to suspend sentences and give probation, the effect of the exception which had just been made was not sufficiently considered.

We are satisfied, therefore, from the history of this legislation to which we have called attention, that it was clearly intended by the Legislature to remedy the evil to which its attention had been called. "When changes have been introduced by amendment, it is not to be assumed that they are without design." Stamford v. Stamford, 107

Conn. 596, 606, 141 A. 891, 895. The literal reading of section 2 makes the clear intent of section 1 ineffective. How, then, are we to construe chapter 285 as a whole? "The literal construction has in general but a prima facie preference. To arrive at the real meaning, it is always necessary to take a broad general view of the Act so as to get an exact conception of its aim, scope and object. It is necessary, according to Lord Coke, to consider, (1) what was the law before the Act was passed, (2) what was the mischief or defect for which the law had not provided, (3) what remedy the legislature had appointed, and, (4) the reason for the remedy. . . . The true meaning of any passage is to be found not merely in the words of the law, ascertaining also what were the circumstances with reference to which the words were used, and what was the object appearing from those circumstances which the legislature had in view, and what were the causes and occasion for the passage of the Act and the purpose intended to be accomplished by it in the light of the circumstances at the time and the necessity for its enactment. . . . If possible, a statute must be so construed as to make it effect the purposes for which it was intended." Endlich, pp. 35-37; Stapleberg v. Stapleberg, 77 Conn. 31, 35, 58 A. 233; Mulcahy v. Mulcahy, 84 Conn. 659, 662, 81 A. 242; Wooley v. Williams, 105 Conn. 671, 673, 136 A. 583. Satisfied, therefore, that the legislative intent in enacting chapter 285 was to except cases like the present from the operation of the suspended sentence and the probation law, how are we to construe section 2 of this act?

This section is the final word of the Legislature which conferred upon our criminal courts the right of suspending sentence and giving probation. We have traced its progress from 1903 to the present time. It is a broad general grant of power. Throughout its history, the only restrictions aimed at are state prison and reformatory sentences. Coming to the session of 1929, it is apparent to us that the Legislature clearly sought to impose other restrictions in response to a suggestion and to curb an existing evil of magnitude. That was done by a specific and express provision which is section 1 of this act. The net result was a chapter containing both a restatement of the general powers and the restrictions aimed at by a specific exception. We have to deal, therefore, with one section which is general and at the same time one that is specific; the latter covering a matter which is within the general powers. The rule of statutory construction under such circumstances is well established.

"Where there are two provisions in a statute, one of which is general and designed to apply to cases generally, and the other is particular and relates to only one case or subject within the scope of a general provision, then the particular provision must prevail; and if both cannot apply, the particular provision will be treated as an exception to the general provision."

The application of this rule in the construction of the act before us furnishes the solution of our problem, and we accordingly hold that the second section is a grant of general powers and covers all cases within its terms, save and except such as are specially excepted by the specific provisions of section 1. It follows that it was error to sustain the order of the judge of the city court of Hartford.

There is error, and the case is remanded to the superior court, with direction to enter judgment for the defendant.

HINMAN, J. (dissenting). My inability to concur in the majority opinion, of course, is not due to disagreement with the desirability of the result attained by the construction which it accords to section 2 of chapter 285 of the Public Acts of 1929, but it springs from a conviction that such a construction is precluded by fundamental and controlling rules of law which should not be sacrificed or transgressed in order to effect a result deemed desirable in an individual case. In the construction of statutes, the intent is to be sought, first of all, in the words and language employed, and, if the words are free from ambiguity and doubt, there is no occasion to resort to other means of interpretation. . . . The provisions of the act under consideration are not ambiguous; the language of each section is so clear as to leave no room for question as to the meaning expressed thereby. Hence the above rules are applicable and controlling, and those by which resort may be had to inferences and extraneous aids where the intention is not clearly expressed by the language used are not available.

There is a further reason why the present case does not afford appropriate occasion for application of the rule, invoked and principally relied upon by the majority opinion, by which, in construing an act covering, in a single enactment, an entire subject, all its component parts are to be considered together "upon the assumption that the law was intended to be read as a whole with each provision in harmony with every other." New Haven Orphan Asylum v. Haggerty Co., 108 Conn. 232, 239, 142 A. 847, 849. Enactments to which this rule applies are illustrated by the Mechanics' Lien Law, involved in the case just cited and in Hartford Builders' Finish Co. v. Anderson, 99 Conn. 343, 122 A. 76, and the act of 1919 (Pub. Acts 1919, c. 336), providing for payment to discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines, involved in Bissell v. Butterworth, 97 Conn. 605, 118 A. 50—the Connecticut cases upon which the majority rely on this point. The act now under consideration (chapter 285 of the Public Acts of 1929) amended, by separate sections, statutes which are not only physically separate but are distinct in reason and purpose. Chapter 175 of the Public Acts of 1921, which was amended by section 2 of the 1929 act, originated as one section of the General Probation Act of 1903, and was so retained in the Revision of 1918. The act of 1923 (chapter 62), amended by section 1 of the 1929 act, obviously was passed to meet a different situation and serve a distinct purpose—to permit courts to suspend execution of sentence, without commitment to a probation officer (which was mandatory when sentence was suspended under the Probation Act) substituting for probation the revocation of the suspension upon another conviction within the year. Otherwise there would have been no occasion for passing the 1923 act.

The fact that the 1929 amendments of these two separate statutes were effected by including them in one chapter is without apparent significance other than convenience, and that they pertained to related subjects. Each of these sections is complete in itself, and, so far as appears, covers the entire subject-matter intended; each should be construed independently so far as concerns reading, by implication, provisions of one into the other. Plainly, the intent expressed in the amendment of the 1923 act was both to except the specified cases from those in which sentence could be suspended without probation under the act of 1923 and to require that in other cases suspension be justified by circumstances, made a matter of record. It is equally clear that the only addition to the Probation Act which section 2 manifests an intent to make is to require the facts upon which the continuance or suspension is based to be made a matter of record. A belief, on our part, that the same exceptions should have been embodied in the latter statute as in the former, or even an assumption that the General Assembly so desired and intended, does not enable us to insert it by implication. To do so transgresses the limits of a proper exercise of judicial powers, and constitutes an invasion of functions which are distinctively legislative.

H. C. GUTTERIDGE, A COMPARATIVE VIEW OF THE INTERPRETATION OF STATUTE LAW

. . . it may be of interest to refer to a question which has formed the subject matter of much controversy in continental legal circles. It has been argued that when reference is made to the intention of the legislator the word "intention" is itself capable of ambiguity. To put it quite shortly, are we to assume that the legislator has in view only the circumstances as they exist when the statute is put into force, or is he to be deemed to intend to lay down a rule for the future which is to be plastic and may thus vary from time to time in accordance with changed circumstances? An example of the difficulty which may arise in this way is furnished by a Scottish case, Marquis of Linlithgow v. North British Railway,¹ which turned on a dispute as to the meaning of the word "minerals" in an Act of Parliament. The Act in question, which was passed in 1817, authorized the construction of a canal across land belonging to the vendors, the predecessors in title of the Marquis, and reserved the "minerals" underlying the surface to the vendors of the land. Below the surface was a valuable deposit of oil shale, which the Marquis desired to exploit, but he was met by a claim on the part of the railway company, who were the owners of the canal, that the shale underneath the canal belonged to them because in 1817, when the Act in question was passed, the process of extracting oil from shale was unknown, and consequently shale could not be a mineral within the meaning of the Act. It was contended on behalf of the Marquis that the term "minerals" must not be regarded as having a meaning fixed once for all in 1817, but as including anything which from time to time would come to be generally regarded as a mineral substance. This argument failed to convince the House of Lords and the Marquis lost his case.

A continental jurist would describe the dispute which arose in this case as a clash between the subjective and objective theories of interpretation. According to the subjective theory it is the duty of the judge to discover the intentions of the lawgiver at the time when the statutory rule of law to be interpreted was first enacted, that is to say, regard must be had solely to the circumstances as they were when the statute was brought into being. The advocates of the objective theory contend, on the other hand, that the rule must be interpreted in accordance with the circumstances as they exist at the time when interpretation takes place. It will be observed that this objective theory involves a progressive or teleological system of interpretation which may give a different aspect to a rule at different epochs, although the text of the law will remain the same. . . .

J. Legislative History: Herein of Journals, Committee Reports and Debates

GOSSELIN v. THE KING

Supreme Court of Canada, 1903. 33 Can.S.C. 255.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE, (Sir E. Taschereau) . . . I deem it expedient to say a few words upon the question raised during the argument of the reference by counsel to the debates in Parliament for the purpose of construing any statute. Such a reference has always been refused by my predecessors in this court and, when counsel in this case began to read from the Canadian Hansard the remarks made in Parliament when the Canada Evidence Act in question was under discussion, I did not feel justified in departing from the rule so laid down, though, personally, I would not be unwilling, in cases of ambiguity in statutes, to concede that such a reference might sometimes be useful. The same rule is observed in England. Alderson B. says, In re Gorman, 5 Ex. 667:

"We do not construe Acts of Parliament by reference to history." And, in Barbat v. Allen, 7 Ex. 616, Pollock C. B. says:

"I must at the same time state that the history of a clause in a statute is certainly no ground for its interpretation in a court of law and I would guard myself against being considered as resorting to any such means."

In the case of The Queen v. The Bishop of Oxford, 4 Q.B.D. 525, it is true, a reference to a speech of the Lord Chancellor in the House of Lords, relating to a certain statute, was allowed by the Court of Appeal, but the remarks of the learned judges upon that point, if I read them correctly, are far from justifying the contention raised in some quarters that they intended to alter the general rule on that point.

Thesiger L.J. said:

"I would only say that, among the authorities upon which I rely I do not count the speech of the Lord Chancellor in the House of Lords. I was a party to the decision under which it was allowed to be quoted to us, and the ground upon which I thought it admissible was that it had, in the occasion upon which it was spoken and the position of the speaker, at least as great a sanction as the text-books of living judges which have upon many occasions been admitted as authorities.

"But, upon further consideration of the matter, I have been led to doubt very much whether the principle upon which such text-books have been treated as authorities is a sound one; and, even if it were a sound one, I cannot but think the extension of it to speeches in a House of Parliament, sitting in its legislative capacity, however eminent may be the speakers, however solemn the occasion on which they speak, inexpedient in a very high degree. It is true that in many instances, and perhaps this particular one is a conspicuous example, the speech, looking to the circumstances under which it was made, the previous consideration which the speaker has given to the subject, and the character in which he speaks, may be entitled to far more weight than the hasty utterances of a judge at nisi prius or even the obiter dicta of a judge in banco; but the judge, in the latter cases, has the safeguard of a judicial proceeding cast around him; his mind is not likely to be influenced by any considerations beyond those which the law enforces upon him; while, when the scene is removed to the area of Parliament, political considerations may enter, as they have before now entered, into the opinions of lawyers upon legal subjects, and may insensibly affect the judgments of even the greatest and wisest of our judges. The sanction and safeguard of judicial procedure are removed, and even the conditions which give the text-book its weight, the exclusive devotion to the legal subject of which it treats, and the calmness with which it is necessarily prepared may, in many instances, not exist."

That case is, however, no authority upon the question, for when in the House of Lords, sub nomine, Julius v. Oxford, 49 L.J.Q.B. 578,

"In the course of the arguments strong disapprobation was expressed by the Lord Chancellor, (Earl Cairns) and Lord Selborne of the course taken by the Court of Appeal in allowing to be cited a speech made by the Lord Chancellor in the House of Lords." . . .

In the United States the rule seems to be the same.

"But in truth, little reliance can or ought to be placed upon such sources of interpretation of a statute," says Story J. in 2 Story's Reports, 654.

Peckham J., in the United States Supreme Court, said:

"There is a general acquiescence in the doctrine that debates in Congress are not appropriate sources of information from which to discover the meaning of the language of a statute passed by that body. The reason is that it is impossible to determine with certainty what construction was put upon an Act by the members of a legislative body that passed it by resorting to the speeches of individual members thereof. Those who did not speak may not have agreed with those who did, and those who spoke might differ from each other; the result being that the only proper way to construe a legislative Act is from the language used in the Act and, upon occasion, by a resort to the history of the times when it was passed. United States v. Freight Association, 166 U.S.R. at pages 290 to 318 [1896]."

PELLETT v. INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION OF WISCONSIN

Supreme Court of Wisconsin, 1916.

162 Wis. 596, 156 N.W. 956, Ann.Cas.1917D, 881.

Action by Walter E. Pellett and others against the Industrial Commission of Wisconsin and James Suffern. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal.

VINJE, J. . . . Plaintiffs . . . seek to set aside the award because it was procured by fraud. The allegations as to fraud on claimant's part are substantially these: (a) That Suffern testified before the commission that he was totally disabled for 6 months, when in fact, he was not, and that he settled with a casualty company in which he was insured for only one month of total disability; (b) that he concealed from the commission that he was subsequently, and within 6 months of his injury, injured while in the employ of one Kennedy resulting in total disability for 10 days and partial disability for one week more. Plaintiffs also allege they first learned of Suffern's representations to the casualty company January 11, 1915, and that the commission refused to set aside the award because more than 10 days had elapsed since it was made. Section 2394—17, Stats. 1915.

It will be seen the fraud complained of consisted of false testimony on the part of the claimant, and of concealment by him of facts material to the issue before the commission. Section 2394—19, Stats. 1915, provides that an award may be set aside on the following grounds:

"(1) That the commission acted without or in excess of its powers. (2) That the order or award was procured by fraud. (3) That the findings of fact by the commission do not support the order or award."

The question therefore presented is whether the fraud alleged, assuming it to be sustained by proof, constitutes a ground for setting aside the award. It may be conceded that the language of the statute upon an original construction, regardless of principles guiding equity in granting relief from judgments obtained by fraud as announced in Boring v. Ott, 138 Wis. 260, 119 N.W. 865, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1080, Uecker v. Thiedt, 137 Wis. 634, 119 N.W. 878, and Laun v. Kipp, 155 Wis. 347, 145 N.W. 183, and regardless of the intent of the Legislature as expressed in the report of and discussions before the committee that drafted the Workmen's Compensation Act, is susceptible of the construction that the fraud meant by the act includes perjury or the concealment of material facts upon the hearing. It is also susceptible of the construction that it includes neither, and that it was not contemplated that trial after trial should be had upon the question of whether a witness testified falsely, for, if one award could be set aside upon that ground, a subsequent one could also, and so on indefinitely. Happily there is as to this statute no doubt upon the subject. The report of the committee referred to and the discussions had before it conclusively show that it was the legislative intent that perjured testimony or concealment of material facts were not such fraud as the statute contemplates. In their report the committee said:

"The fraud alluded to in the second ground will be only such as was perpetrated in securing the award, and will not include false testimony of any party, because such questions all will be decided by the board [commission]."

This view is reinforced by the discussions before the committee, too lengthy to be here inserted. Such being the express legislative construction given the language used, and such construction being repugnant neither to the language used nor to judicial principles, must control.

That reference may be had to the report for the purpose of ascertaining the correct construction of the language used was held in Minneapolis, St. P. & S. S. M. R. Co. v. Industrial Comm., 153 Wis. 552, 558, 141 N.W. 1119, Ann.Cas.1914D, 655; Hoenig v. Industrial Comm., 159 Wis. 646, 648, 150 N.W. 996. The court therefore properly refused to receive evidence of the fraud alleged, since, if established, it could not affect the validity of the award.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE

In United States v. St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Ry. Co., 247 U.S. 310, 38 S.Ct. 525, 62 L.Ed. 1130 (1917), in confirmation of its strict literal interpretation the court resorted to the legislative history of the act including an extract from the Congressional Record reporting the remarks of Representative Lacey, chairman of the House committee in charge of the bill for the act. Pitney J. said: "It is not our purpose to relax the rule that debates in Congress are not appropriate or even reliable guides to the meaning of the language of an enactment. . . . But the reports of a committee, including the bill as introduced, changes made in the frame of the bill in the course of its passage, and statements made by the committee chairman in charge of it, stand upon a different footing, and may be resorted to under proper qualifications. [Citing cases.] The remarks of Mr. Lacey, and the amendment offered by him, in response to an objection urged by another member during the debate, were in the nature of a supplementary report of the committee; and as they related to matters of common knowledge they may very properly be taken into consideration as throwing light upon the meaning of the proviso; not for the purpose of construing it contrary to its plain terms, but in order to remove any ambiguity by pointing out the subject matter of the amendment. This is but an application of the doctrine of the old law, the mischief, and the remedy."

Expressing the same distinction between committee reports and debates, see Imhoff-Berg Silk Co. v. United States, 43 F.2d 836 (D.C.N.J.1930).

COMMONWEALTH v. WEST PHILADELPHIA FIDELIO MANNERCHOR

Superior Court of Pennsylvania, 1934. 115 Pa.Super. 241, 175 A. 434.

PARKER, JUDGE. This is an appeal by the West Philadelphia Fidelio Mannerchor, an incorporated club, from an order of the court of common pleas revoking a liquor license under section 410 of the Pennsylvania Liquor Control Act of November 29, 1933, P.L. Special Session,

p. 15 (47 PS § 744—410). That section provides that, on petition of the Attorney General, the district attorney, or fifteen or more taxpayers, residents of the municipality where the hotel, restaurant, or club is located, the court of common pleas may, after hearing, suspend or revoke the license where it shall appear to the court that the licensee has violated any law of this commonwealth, and that "the action of the court in suspending or revoking a license shall be final."

The last clause does not affect our right to issue a writ of certiorari in order to determine, from an inspection of the record, whether or not the court below exceeded its jurisdiction and for the purpose of correcting errors apparent on the face of the record, and with this object in view it is proper to examine the opinion of the court in order to discover the reasons for its action. [Citing cases.]

An inspection of the record discloses the facts that the appellant had received a license under the Liquor Control Act, that it had made sales of liquor on Sunday, and that the lower court revoked the license for the sole reason that such sales so made on Sunday were a violation of section 411 of that act (47 PS § 744—411). It is conceded by both appellant and appellee that the only question for our determination is whether the section in question prohibits the sale of liquor by a club on Sunday. The portion of the section with which we are concerned is as follows: "Liquor may be sold by licensees, other than clubs, only after seven o'clock ante meridian of any week day and until two ante meridian of the following week day, and shall not be sold on Sunday or on any day on which a general, municipal, special or primary election is being held."

The contentions of the appellant are that the paragraph in question is ambiguous and capable of two meanings; that the clause is not so clear in its meaning that it would support an order which imposes a penalty on the respondent; that in aid of determining the meaning of the clause it is proper to have recourse to the debates among members of the Legislature at the time of the passing of the statute; and that such debates indicate an intention upon the part of the Legislature to exclude clubs from the provision prohibiting a sale upon Sunday.

Taking the plain words of the clause we have for consideration, we do not find the meaning ambiguous. Two subjects are dealt with, sales between 2 a.m. and 7 a.m. and sales on Sunday and election days. Liquor may be sold by licensees other than clubs only after 7 a.m. and before 2 a.m. of the following week day, and shall not be sold on Sunday or election days. There is not any exception contained in the provision proscribing sales on Sunday and election days. By a strict grammatical construction, the subject of the predicate in the last portion of the paragraph is the word "liquor." The appellant asks us to supply an exception which would change the plain meaning of the act; in other words, the ambiguity is not in the act, but only arises by reason of the suggestion that a clause be supplied.

We have so far considered only a literal interpretation of the paragraph. The literal construction has a prima facie preference. "To arrive at the real meaning, it is always necessary to take a broad general view of the Act, so as to get an exact conception of its aim, scope and object." Endlich on Interpretation of Statutes, p. 35. According to Lord Coke, it is necessary to consider the old law, the mischief and remedy. County of Cumberland v. Boyd, 113 Pa. 52, 4 A. 346. The Liquor Control Act, just as the Brooks Law, Act May 13, 1887, P.L. 108 (Raudenbusch's Petition, 120 Pa. 328, 340, 341, 14 A. 148), was enacted for the purpose of regulating and restraining the sale of liquor and not for the purpose of promoting it. Such is the expressed purpose as contained in the title and in section 3 dealing with the interpretation of the act (47 PS § 744—3). It is significant that in fixing the license fees to be paid by clubs it is provided that, where clubs "cater to groups of non-members, either privately or for functions" (section 407 [47 PS § 744—407]), they shall be required to pay the same license fee as is paid by hotels and restaurants situated in the same municipality. Not only clubs which cater to other than members, but even those which sell to their members, are made subject to the provision of the statute. In construing the law prohibiting sales on Sunday and on election days, we are asked to supply an exception which would remove clubs from the prohibition. These words are not in the clause, and we are not justified in reading them in, in the absence of any reason for so doing. The construction urged by the appellant would affect not only sales upon Sunday but those upon election days, and all the evils resulting from the free distribution of liquor upon election days would be promoted and not regulated if we adopted the contention of the appellant.

The argument which is urged most seriously by the appellant is based upon certain remarks made by members of the House when the act was being debated during its consideration. While we are of the opinion that the only safe guide in the instant case is the plain meaning of the act as expressed in the statute considered in the light to which we have heretofore referred, nevertheless those debates do not furnish a basis for a different construction even though we consider them.

"In giving construction to a statute we cannot be controlled by the views expressed by a few members of the legislature who expressed verbal opinions on its passage. Those opinions may or may not have been entertained by the more than 100 members who gave no such expression. The declarations of some, and the assumed acquiescence of others therein, cannot be adopted as a true interpretation of the statute." County of Cumberland v. Boyd, supra, page 57 of 113 Pa., 4 A. 346, 347. There is, however, authority for the consideration of reports of committees having a bill in charge or of a commission appointed to codify the law upon a given subject. In the late case of Tarlo's Estate, 315 Pa. 321, 324, 325, 172 A. 139, 140, the modern view is thus expressed: "While it is true that the views expressed by those who draft or enact laws are not a safe guide when the courts are called upon to determine the meaning of the words employed therein [Citing cases], yet, in order to get at the old law, the mischief and the remedy, and properly to understand and construe a statute embodying the latter, the history of the enactment in question may always be considered. [Citing cases.] In Duplex Printing Press Co. v. Deering, 254 U. S. 443, 41 S.Ct. 172, 179, 65 L.Ed. 349, 16 A.L.R. 196, . . . the Supreme Court said (page 474 of 254 U.S., 41 S.Ct. 172, 179): 'By repeated decisions of this court it has come to be well established that the debates in Congress expressive of the views and motives of individual members are not a safe guide, and hence may not be resorted to, in ascertaining the meaning and purpose of the law-making body. . . . But reports of committees of House or Senate stand upon a more solid footing, and may be regarded as an exposition of the legislative intent in a case where otherwise the meaning of a statute is obscure.' . . . The report of a commission appointed to codify the law upon a given subject is entitled to even greater weight than the report of a committee; especially is this so where the Legislature enacts the exact language of the commission's draft."

When the bill was presented to the House, the paragraph in question did not contain the phrase "other than clubs," but was passed on third reading with that phrase included (L.J. p. 195) and was presented to the Senate for concurrence. The Senate struck out the phrase and returned it to the House. On its return, Representative Sowers moved to amend the bill by reinstating the phrase. On debate a member of the House interrogated Mr. Sowers, who had offered the amendment, as to its effect, and Mr. Sowers replied as follows: "Mr. Speaker, as a lawyer I answer that clubs will not be permitted to sell liquor on Sunday. They will be permitted to distribute liquor among their members. Clubs never sold under the laws of Pennsylvania. When a club has liquor in its treasury, or in its possession, all of that liquor belongs to the entire membership, and a man cannot buy that of which he is a part owner, and there is a Supreme Court case to that effect." Mr. Wilson again interrogated Mr. Sowers, asking him for a more definite answer, and his final answer was that, if the amendment prevailed, the same condition would be restored as existed under the Brooks High License Law. Mr. Wilson then interrogated Mr. McClure, who presented the original bill to the House, as to the meaning of the clause as follows:

"Mr. Wilson: If this amendment of Mr. Sowers prevails, would clubs then be able to dispense liquor on Sunday.

"Mr. McClure: In my judgment they would be."

The Constitution vests the legislative power of the commonwealth in both the Senate and the House of Representatives, and gives to the Governor the power of veto. When the Governor approved the bill, he said: "Fortunately, efforts in the House to permit sales in clubs on Sunday did not succeed." This presents a situation which demonstrates not only the wisdom of the rule that individual opinions of members are not of assistance in interpreting a statute, but demonstrates an absence of any such positive indication of the intention of the Legislature as would justify us in departing from the interpretation which we have given the paragraph.

Prior to the adoption of the Eighteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution, a club "organized and conducted in good faith, with a limited and selected membership, really owning its property in common, and formed for social, literary, or other purposes, to which the furnishing of liquors to its members would be merely incidental, in the same way, to the same extent, that the supplying of dinners or daily papers might be, then it cannot be considered as within either the purpose or letter of the law [Brooks Law]." Klein v. Livingston Club, 177 Pa. 224, 232, 35 A. 606, 608, 34 L.R.A. 94, 55 Am.St.Rep. 717. By the Liquor Control Act of 1933, the Legislature provided for the licensing of all clubs and, as we have heretofore pointed out, provided one license fee where the sales are only to members and another and larger license fee, the same as that for hotels and restaurants, where the clubs cater to groups of nonmembers. In section 3 of the act (47 PS § 744—3), dealing with its interpretation, the Legislature said: "Except as otherwise expressly provided, the purpose of this act is to prohibit transactions in liquor which take place wholly within the Commonwealth, except by and under the control of the board." (Italics supplied.) The word "transactions" is much broader than "sale and importation." It is impossible, after a consideration of the reasons given by the Supreme Court in the Livingston Case for concluding that a dispensing of liquor for a price to members of a club of the kind indicated was not a sale, to come to any other conclusion than that the effect of the Livingston Case has been nullified by the Legislature, and that a dispensing of liquor by a club for a price to its members is now to be regarded as a sale and subject to the regulations of the Liquor Control Act. In that case the Supreme Court commented upon the fact that the Legislature had not indicated an intention to class such dispensing of liquors as a sale, and that this was a matter within the control of the Legislature. The lawmaking department of the commonwealth has now spoken upon the subject, and it is definitely settled that a club must take out a license before engaging in the sale of intoxicating liquor, even to its members.

It follows that such conclusions as were stated by the members of the Legislature were based on an incorrect interpretation of the law. In addition, it is of importance to note that the author of the amendment distinctly said that in his opinion a sale could not be made on Sunday, while the author of the bill only went so far as to say that liquor might be dispensed to members. It is most apparent that these opinions of members of the House furnish no basis for a different conclusion than that at which we have arrived. We are all of the opinion that the order should be affirmed.

The order of the court below is affirmed.

AH KOW v. NUNAN

Circuit Court of the United States, 1879. 5 Sawy. 552.

By the court, MR. JUSTICE FIELD. The plaintiff is a subject of the Emperor of China, and the present action is brought to recover damages for his alleged maltreatment by the defendant, a citizen of the state of California and the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco. The maltreatment consisted in having wantonly and maliciously cut off the queue of the plaintiff, a queue being worn by all Chinamen, and its deprivation being regarded by them as degrading and as entailing future suffering.

* It appears that in April, 1876, the legislature of California passed an act "concerning lodging-houses and sleeping apartments within the limits of incorporated cities," declaring, among other things, that any person found sleeping or lodging in a room or an apartment containing less than five hundred cubic feet of space in the clear for each person occupying it, should be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof be punished by a fine of not less than ten or more than fifty dollars, or imprisonment, in the county jail, or by both such fine and imprisonment, Session Laws of 1875-6, p. 759. Under this act the plaintiff, in April, 1878, was convicted and sentenced to pay a fine of ten dollars, or in default of such payment to be imprisoned five days in the county jail. Failing to pay the fine, he was imprisoned. The defendant, as sheriff of the city and county, had charge of the jail, and during the imprisonment of the plaintiff cut off his queue, as alleged. The complaint avers that it is the custom of Chinamen to shave the hair from the front of the head and to wear the remainder of it braided into a queue; that the deprivation of the queue is regarded by them as a mark of disgrace, and is attended, according to their religious faith, with misfortune and suffering after death; that the defendant knew of this custom and religious faith of the Chinese, and knew also that the plaintiff venerated the custom and held the faith; yet, in disregard of his rights, inflicted the injury complained of; and that the plaintiff has, in consequence of it, suffered great mental anguish, been disgraced in the eyes of his friends and relatives, and ostracised from association with his countrymen; and that hence he has been damaged to the amount of ten thousand dollars.

Two defenses to the action are set up by the defendant; the second one being a justification of his conduct under an ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco. It is upon the sufficiency of the latter defense that the case is before us. The ordinance referred to was passed on the fourteenth of June, 1876, and it declares that every male person imprisoned in the county jail, under the judgment of any court having jurisdiction in criminal cases in the city and county, shall immediately upon his arrival at the jail have the hair of his head "cut or clipped to an uniform length of one inch from the scalp thereof," and it is made the duty of the sheriff to have this provision enforced. Under this ordinance the defendant cut off the queue of the plaintiff.

The validity of this ordinance is denied by the plaintiff on two grounds: 1. That it exceeds the authority of the board of supervisors, the body in which the legislative power of the city and county is vested; and, 2. That it is special legislation imposing a degrading and cruel punishment upon a class of persons who are entitled, alike with all other person within the jurisdiction of the United States, to the equal protection of the laws. We are of opinion that both these positions are well taken. . . .

The second objection to the ordinance in question is equally conclusive. It is special legislation on the part of the supervisors against a class of persons who, under the constitution and laws of the United States, are entitled to the equal protection of the laws. The ordinance was intended only for the Chinese in San Francisco. This was avowed by the supervisors on its passage, and was so understood by every one. The ordinance is known in the community as the "queue ordinance," being so designated from its purpose to reach the queues of the Chinese, and it is not enforced against any other persons. The reason advanced for its adoption, and now urged for its continuance, is, that only the dread of the loss of his queue will induce a Chinaman to pay his fine. That is to say, in order to enforce the payment of a fine imposed upon him, it is necessary that torture should be superadded to imprisonment. Then, it is said, the Chinaman will not accept the alternative, which the law allows, of working out his fine by his imprisonment, and the state or county will be saved the expense of keeping him during the imprisonment. Probably the bastinado, or the knout, or the thumbscrew, or the rack, would accomplish the same end; and no doubt the Chinaman would prefer either of these modes of torture to that which entails upon him disgrace among his countrymen and carries with it the constant dread of misfortune and suffering after death. It is not creditable to the humanity and civilization of our people, much less to their Christianity, that an ordinance of this character was possible.

The class character of this legislation is none the less manifest because of the general terms in which it is expressed. The statements of supervisors in debate on the passage of the ordinance cannot, it is true, be resorted to for the purpose of explaining the meaning of the terms used; but they can be resorted to for the purpose of ascertaining the general object of the legislation proposed, and the mischiefs sought to remedied. Besides, we cannot shut our eyes to matters of public notoriety and general cognizance. When we take our seats on the bench we are not struck with blindness, and forbidden to know as judges what we see as men; and where an ordinance, though general in its terms, only operates upon a special race, sect or class, it being universally understood that it is to be enforced only against that race, sect or class, we may justly conclude that it was the intention of the body adopting it that it should only have such operation, and treat it accordingly. We may take notice of the limitation given to the general terms of an ordinance by its practical construction as a fact in its history, as we do in some cases that a law has practically become obsolete. If this were not so, the most important provisions of the constitution, intended for the security of personal rights, would, by the general terms of an enactment, often be evaded and practically annulled. Brown v. Piper, 1 Otto. 42; Ohio Life Ins. and Trust Co. v. Debolt, 16 How. 435; Scott v. Sandford, 19 Id. 407. The complaint in this case shows that the ordinance acts with special severity upon Chinese prisoners, inflicting upon them suffering altogether disproportionate to what would be endured by other prisoners if enforced against them. Upon the Chinese prisoners its enforcement operates as a "cruel and unusual punishment." . . .

The plaintiff must have judgment on the demurrer to the defendant's plea of justification; and it is so ordered.

In Federal Trade Comm. v. Baladarn Co., 283 U.S. 643, 51 S.Ct. 587, 75 L.Ed. 1324, 79 A.L.R. 1191 (1931), the principal case was relied upon as authority for using Congressional debates as evidence of legislative purpose.

HARRY WILLMER JONES, THE PLAIN MEANING RULE AND EXTRINSIC AIDS IN THE INTERPRETATION OF STATUTES

25 Wash.U.L.Q. 2, 10-11 (1939).

. . . The Supreme Court has frequently quoted from the opinion of Mr. Justice Brown in Hamilton v. Rathbone,¹ to the effect that "the province of construction lies wholly within the domain of ambiguity," and that extrinsic aids may be "resorted to to solve but not to create an ambiguity." Not even committee reports, generally regarded as the most reliable of the extrinsic aids, are admissible as evidence that the decision directed by the supposed "plain meaning" of the text of a statute is not the result which the members of the legislature actually intended.

Theoretically, the plain meaning rule raises a preliminary issue of admissibility in every case, and the acceptance or rejection of offered extrinsic aids should depend upon the disposition which the court makes of that preliminary issue. The evidence afforded by extrinsic aids, logically speaking, should be irrelevant unless the interpreting court has first come to the conclusion either that the statute is "ambiguous" with respect to the fact situation of the particular controversy, or that the application of the statute, according to its literal meaning, would lead to "absurd or wholly impracticable consequences." The frequently quoted formula that extrinsic aids may be resorted to "to solve but not to create an ambiguity" can only mean that the evidence provided by such aids should be considered solely for the light which it throws upon the proper resolution of a doubt or "ambiguity" apparent to the courts before it examines the extrinsic sources. In other words, the theory of the plain meaning doctrine is that the "ambiguity" or "absurdity" which will take a case outside the scope of its application must be discoverable upon a bare or literal reading of the text, wholly apart from the background or context which the committee reports and other extrinsic sources provide. . . .

BOSTON SAND & GRAVEL CO. v. UNITED STATES

Supreme Court of the United States, 1928.
278 U.S. 41, 49 S.Ct. 52, 73 L.Ed. 170.

MR. JUSTICE HOLMES delivered the opinion of the Court.

This is a libel in admiralty brought by the petitioner to recover for damages done to its steam lighter Cornelia by a collision with the United States destroyer Bell. It is brought against the United States by authority of a special Act of May 15, 1922, c. 192, 42 Stat., Part 2, 1590. There has been a trial in which both vessels ultimately were found to have been in fault and it was ordered that the damages should be divided. (C.C.A.) 7 F.2d 278. Thereafter the damages were ascertained (D.C.) 16 F.2d 643 and the petitioner sought to be allowed interest upon its share. (There was no cross-libel.) The Circuit Court of Appeals, going on to the words of the statute, parallel legislation, and the general understanding with regard to the United States, held that no interest could be allowed. 19 F.2d 744. As there was a conflict of opinion with the Second Circuit dealing with similar language in a special act, New York & Cuba Mail S. S. Co. v. United States (C.C.A.) 16 F.2d 945, a writ of certiorari was allowed by this Court, 275 U.S. 519, 48 S.Ct. 121, 72 L.Ed. 403.

The material words of the Act are that the District Court "shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the whole controversy and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of the legal damages sustained by reason of said collision, if any shall be found to be due either for or against the United States, upon the same principle and measure of liability with costs as in like cases in admiralty between private parties with the same rights of appeal." On a hasty reading one might be led to believe that Congress had put the United States on the footing of a private person in all respects. But we are of opinion that a scrutiny leads to a different result. It is at least possible that the words fixing the extent of the government's liability were carefully chosen, and we are of opinion that they were. We start with the rule that the United States is not liable to interest except where it assumes the liability by contract or by the express words of a statute, or must pay it as part of the just compensation required by the Constitution. Seaboard Air Line Ry. Co. v. United States, 261 U.S. 299, 304, 306, 43 S.Ct. 354 (67 L.Ed. 664). Next we notice that when this special act was passed there was a recent general statute on the books, the Act of March 9, 1920, c. 95, § 3, 41 Stat. 525, 526 [46 USCA § 743], allowing suits in admiralty to be brought in personam against the United States, in which it was set forth specifically that interest was to be allowed upon money judgments and the rate was four per centum not the six per centum that the petitioner expects to get. The later general statute passed as a substitute for special bills like the one before us, allows suits in admiralty for damages done by public vessels but excludes interest in terms. Act of March 3, 1925, c. 428, § 2, 43 Stat. 1112 (46 USCA § 782).

We are satisfied by the argument for the Government that the policy thus expressed in the Act of 1925 had been the policy of the United States for years before 1922 and that the many private acts like the present generally have been understood, before and since the act now in question not to carry interest by the often repeated words now before us. This was stated by the Attorney General in a letter to the Chairman of the Senate Committee on Claims when the Act of 1925 was under consideration (Sen. Report 941, p. 12, 68th Cong., 2d Sess.) and the bill was amended so as to remove all doubt. The Act of March 2, 1901, c. 824, 31 Stat. 1789, believed to be the first of the private acts in the present form, was passed after an amendment striking out an allowance of interest, thus showing that the words now relied upon then were understood not to allow it. The same thing has happened repeatedly with later acts, and when by exception interest has been allowed it has been allowed by express words. Before 1901, since 1871, such cases had been referred to the Court of Claims which was forbidden by statute to allow interest. Rev.Sts. § 1091; Code, title 28, § 284, (28 USCA § 284). It is said that when the meaning of language is plain we are not to resort to evidence in order to raise doubts. That is rather an axiom of experience than a rule of law and does not preclude consideration of persuasive evidence if it exists. If Congress has been accustomed to use a certain phrase with a more limited meaning than might be attributed to it by common practice it would be arbitrary to refuse to consider that fact when we come to interpret a statute. But as we have said the usage of Congress simply shows that it has spoken with careful precision, that its words mark the exact spot at which it stops, and that it distinguishes between the damages caused by the collision and the later loss caused by delay in paying for the first—between damages and “the allowance of interest on damages” as it is put by Mr. Justice Bradley in The Scotland, 118 U.S. 507, 6 S. Ct. 1174, 30 L.Ed. 153.

What the Act authorizes the Court to ascertain and allow is the “amount of the legal damages sustained by reason of said collision.”

Of these interest is no part. It might be in case of the detention of money. But this is not a claim for the detention of money, nor can any money be said to have been detained. When a jury finds a man guilty of a tort or a crime it may determine not only the facts but also a standard of conduct that he is presumed to have known and was bound at his peril to follow. Nash v. United States, 229 U.S. 373, 377, 33 S.Ct. 780, 57 L.Ed. 1232. But legal fiction never reached the height of holding a defendant bound to know the estimate that a jury would put upon the damage that he had caused. As the cause of action is the damage not the detention of the money to be paid for it, it could be argued in a respectable Court, as late as 1886, that at common law, even as a matter of discretion, interest could not be allowed. Frazer v. Bigelow Carpet Co., 141 Mass. 126, 4 N.E. 620. And although it commonly is allowed in admiralty still the element of discretion is not wholly absent there. As stated by Mr. Justice Bradley in The Scotland, 118 U.S. 507, 6 S.Ct. 1174, 30 L.Ed. 153, "the allowance of interest on damages is not an absolute right." When the Government is concerned there is no obligation until the statute is passed and the foregoing considerations gain new force.

It has been urged that the United States would claim interest and that as the statute speaks of "damages . . . due either for or against the United States" the claims on the two sides stand alike. But that is not true. The United States did not need the statute, and it has been held that, even in the adjustment of mutual claims between an individual and the Government, while the latter is entitled to interest on its credits it is not liable for interest on the charges against it. United States v. Verdier, 164 U.S. 213, 218, 219, 17 S.Ct. 42, 41 L. Ed. 407; United States v. North American Transportation & Trading Co., 253 U.S. 330, 336, 40 S.Ct. 518, 64 L.Ed. 935.

The mention of costs and the omission of interest again helps the conclusion to which we come. Compare Judicial Code, § 152, and the same, § 177; U.S.Code, title 28, §§ 258, 284 (28 USCA §§ 258, 284).

Decree affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE SUTHERLAND (dissenting). . . . The rule was tersely stated in United States v. Hartwell, 6 Wall. 385, 396 (18 L.Ed. 830):

"If the language be clear it is conclusive. There can be no construction where there is nothing to construe."

This is also the recognized rule of the English courts. In one of the English decisions Lord Denman said the court was bound to look to the language employed and construe it in its natural and obvious sense, even though that was to give the words of the act an effect probably never contemplated by those who obtained the act and very probably not intended by the Legislature which enacted it. The King v. The Commissioners, 5 A. & E. 804, 816. See, also, United States v. Lexington Mill Co., 232 U.S. 399, 34 S.Ct. 337, 58 L.Ed. 658, L.R.A. 1915B, 774; Caminetti v. United States, 242 U.S. 470, 485, 37 S.Ct. 192, 61 L.Ed. 442, L.R.A.1917F, 502, Ann.Cas.1917B, 1168; Russell Co. v. United States, 261 U.S. 514, 519, 43 S.Ct. 428, 67 L.Ed. 778.

The enforcement of the statute according to its plain terms results in no absurdity or injustice, for, as this court recently said, in holding the United States liable for damages including interest in a collision case where the government had come into court to assert a claim on its own behalf:

"The absence of legal liability in a case where but for its sovereignty it would be liable does not destroy the justice of the claim against it." United States v. The Thekla, 266 U.S. 328, 340, 45 S.Ct. 112, 113 (69 L.Ed. 313).

To refuse interest in this case, in my opinion, is completely to change the clear meaning of the words employed by Congress by invoking the aid of extrinsic circumstances to import into the statute an ambiguity which otherwise does not exist and thereby to set at naught the prior decisions of this court and long-established canons of statutory construction.

MR. JUSTICE BUTLER, MR. JUSTICE SANFORD, and MR. JUSTICE STONE concur in this opinion.

UNITED STATES v. AMERICAN TRUCKING ASS'NS

Supreme Court of the United States, 1940.
310 U.S. 534, 60 S.Ct. 1059, 84 L.Ed. 1345.

UNITED STATES v. DICKERSON

Supreme Court of the United States, 1940.
310 U.S. 554, 60 S.Ct. 1034, 84 L.Ed. 1356.

MR. JUSTICE MURPHY delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question is whether respondent, Dickerson, may recover a judgment against the United States upon a cause of action founded upon Section 9 of the Act of June 10, 1922, c. 212, 42 Stat. 625, 629, 630, 10 U.S.C.A. § 633.

Section 9 provides that after the 1st of July, 1922, an enlistment allowance shall be paid "to every honorably discharged enlisted man . . . who reenlists within a period of three months from the date of his discharge". Respondent, who was honorably discharged upon the termination of an enlisted period ending on the 21st of July, 1938, reenlisted on the following day, the 22nd, for a period of three years, but was not paid an enlistment allowance. He thereupon brought this action in the Court of Claims. It is conceded that Section 9, if not repealed or suspended at the date of his reenlistment, would entitle him to the sum of seventy-five dollars.

The Government opposed the action before the Court of Claims on the ground that Section 402 of Public Resolution No. 122, June 21, 1938, c. 554, 52 Stat. 809, 818, 819, suspended the allowance for reenlistment during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1939. Section 402 contains a proviso, appended to an appropriation for the Rural Electrification Administration, that "no part of any appropriation contained in this or any other Act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1939, shall be available for the payment" of any enlistment allowance for "reenlistments made during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1939, notwithstanding the applicable portions of sections 9 and 10" of the Act of June 10, 1922.

The Court of Claims entered judgment for respondent on the ground that Section 402, while it restricted the funds available for payment of the allowance, did not suspend or repeal Section 9. Because of the importance of the issue in the administration of the revenues, we granted certiorari. March 25, 1940, 309 U.S. 647, 60 S.Ct. 713, 84 L. Ed. 999.

There can be no doubt that Congress could suspend or repeal the authorization contained in Section 9; and it could accomplish its purpose by an amendment to an appropriation bill, or otherwise. United States v. Mitchell, 109 U.S. 146, 150, 3 S.Ct. 151, 153, 27 L.Ed. 887; Mathews v. United States, 123 U.S. 182, 8 S.Ct. 80, 31 L.Ed. 127; Dunwoody v. United States, 143 U.S. 578, 12 S.Ct. 465, 36 L.Ed. 269; Belknap v. United States, 150 U.S. 588, 593, 14 S.Ct. 183, 185, 37 L.Ed. 1191; United States v. Vulte, 233 U.S. 509, 515, 34 S.Ct. 664, 666, 58 L.Ed. 1071. See United States v. Langston, 118 U.S. 389, 6 S.Ct. 1185, 30 L.Ed. 164. The question remains whether it did so during the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June, 1939.

Section 9 remained in full force and effect during the eleven fiscal years ending on the 30th of June, 1923 to 1933, after which date it was suspended during the ensuing four fiscal years by a provision inserted in various appropriation acts. Section 18 of the Economy Act of March 3, 1933, c. 212, 47 Stat. 1489, 1519, 37 U.S.C.A. § 13 note, provided that: "So much of sections 9 and 10 of the Act . . . approved June 10, 1922 . . . as provides for the payment of enlistment allowance to enlisted men for reenlistment within a period of three months from date of discharge is hereby suspended as to reenlistments made during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934." This provision, which concededly suspended the authorization for the enlistment allowance, was continued in full force and effect for the fiscal years ending on the 30th of June, 1935, 1936 and 1937, by its insertion in the Economy Provisions of the Independent Office Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1935 and in the Treasury-Post Office Appropriation Acts for the fiscal years 1936 and 1937.¹

The Second Deficiency Appropriation Bill of May 28, 1937, c. 277, 50 Stat. 213, 232, also contained a provision affecting the enlistment allowance but the form of words used was changed. That Act as passed by Congress provided that "no part of any appropriation contained in this or any other Act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, shall be available for the payment of enlistment allowance to enlisted men for reenlistment within a period of three months from date of discharge as to reenlistments made during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, notwithstanding the applicable provisions of sections 9 and 10 of the Act" approved June 10, 1922. The identical provision, with the exception of the dates, was appended as a proviso to Section 402 of Public Resolution 122, copied above, and was made applicable during the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June, 1939.

The provision inserted in the Second Deficiency Appropriation Bill for 1937 was introduced on the floor of the Senate as an amendment by Senator Byrnes. In response to questions concerning the amendment, the Senator stated (81 Cong.Rec. 4426): ". . . the language of the amendment has been carried ordinarily in the Treasury and Post Office Appropriation Bill, but was not carried in that appropriation bill this year, and is therefore proposed to be included in the bill now before us. . . . The effect of it is simply to carry the same limitation that has been carried for years in the appropriation bills. . . . Its purpose is to continue the appropriation situation that has existed for years, so that no bounty shall be paid for reenlistment in the military and other uniformed services." The amendment was thereupon adopted in the Senate without recorded opposition, and was sent to conference. The House managers, in reporting the amendment to the House, described it as "Continuing during the fiscal year 1938 the suspension of the reenlistment gratuity for enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard." 81 Cong.Rec. 5084. The course of the debate amply discloses that the House regarded the amendment as continuing during the fiscal year 1938 the same restriction on the enlistment allowance as the provision inserted in earlier appropriation bills.² It was then adopted by the House. 81 Cong.Rec. 5091.

² Mr. Scott, one of the chief speakers against the amendment, stated (81 Cong. Rec. 5089):

"In 1933 an amendment went into the Treasury-Post Office appropriation bill taking away or suspending this reenlistment bonus. . . . The provision was continued by inserting it in the Treasury-Post Office appropriation bill each year from 1933 until this year. It was in the Treasury-Post Office appropriation bill that was brought into the House for consideration this year. I raised a point of order against the provision on the ground it was legislation on an appropriation bill, and that it did not come under the Holman rule. The Chairman of the Committee sustained the point of order.

"The bill went to the Senate and the suspension was not placed in the bill. The second deficiency appropriation bill passed the House and went over to the Senate. This amendment was placed in there. It was clearly subject to a point of order in the Senate, but the point was not made against it.

"It now comes back to the House for a separate vote as an amendment. If we vote for this amendment it means the further suspension of the reenlistment bonus to the enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Coast Guard."

Mr. Woodrum, who took charge of explaining the Conference Report to the House, stated (81 Cong.Rec. 5090):

The identical provision (except as to the dates), eventually appended to Section 402 of Public Resolution 122, was introduced as an amendment to the Second Deficiency Appropriation Bill for the fiscal year 1938 (H.R. 10851, 75th Cong., 3d Sess.), then pending in the House. 83 Cong.Rec. 8522-8569. A point of order was made against the amendment on the ground that it was legislation in an appropriation bill; Representative Woodrum, who had charge of the amendment, admitted that the point of order was good, and the Chair sustained it. 83 Cong.Rec. 8567. The amendment was then offered in the Senate, where the Presiding Officer also sustained a point of order that it was legislation in an appropriation bill.³ 83 Cong.Rec. 9189.

The provision was thereafter included by the conference committee as a proviso to Section 402 of H.J.Res. 679 (which later became Pub. Res. No. 122). See 83 Cong.Rec. 9512, 9677. It was passed by the

"In the first place, I wish to emphasize the fact that the language in the amendment only asks to continue this legislation for the fiscal year 1938. . . . We ask in this amendment that during the next fiscal year this reenlistment bonus be not allowed; and I may say, Mr. Speaker, this is not taking one solitary thing away from any enlisted man in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps. He is getting exactly the pay that was promised him, and every member of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps who enlisted during the last 3 years enlisted with the knowledge there was no reenlistment bonus going to be paid to him if he did reenlist. . . .

". . . they know now what they knew when they reenlisted, that the time has not yet come when the Congress can offer a bonus to people working for the Government."

³ Senator Byrnes, who had offered the amendment on behalf of the Appropriations Committee, then engaged in the following colloquy with Senator Walsh (83 Cong.Rec. 9189, 9190):

"Mr. Byrnes. . . . I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts, in the light of the ruling of the Chair, that before the Congress adjourns I shall certainly make an effort to do something to bring about a change, so that there will not be dissatisfaction among the various services. If the bounties were all restored, millions of dollars would be involved.

"Mr. Walsh. Is not the situation that under existing law there is now an authorization of funds to be paid to those who reenlist in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Public Health Service? Is not that the situation?

"Mr. Byrnes. There is authority to pay the bounty. It has not been paid for 6 years.

"Mr. Walsh. No funds are available.

"Mr. Byrnes. No funds are available.

"Mr. Walsh. The House Bill did seek to provide funds for reenlistment bounties in the Army. Of course, it would be highly discriminatory to have reenlistment bounties paid to those who reenlist in the Army, and none paid to those who reenlist in the other branches of the military service.

"Mr. Byrnes. It would certainly be discriminatory, and cause great dissatisfaction among the services.

"Mr. Walsh. Is the bill now in such shape that no funds are provided for reenlistment bounties for any branch of the military service?

"Mr. Byrnes. That is correct.

"Mr. Walsh. What the Senator sought to do was to have Congress declare as its policy that it did not intend in the future to pay such reenlistment bounties, so as to prevent possible claims; is not that true?

"Mr. Byrnes. Mr. President, the sole position of the Committee is that no funds being provided, we should not leave open the opportunity for numbers of persons to file claims in the Court of Claims in behalf of men who reenlist, with the result that a year from now, or 2 years from now, some men would receive the reenlistment bounty or some part of it, after the attorneys received their fees.

"Mr. Walsh. I think I understand."

Senate without much debate.⁴ In the House, the debate disclosed that the amendment had the same purpose and effect as the provision inserted in the various appropriation bills for the preceding years. Representative Woodrum, in presenting the amendment to the House, described it as follows (83 Cong.Rec. 9677):

" . . . we are providing a further inhibition for 1 year against payment of the reenlistment allowances in the military and naval services.

"No reenlistment allowances have been paid for the past 5 fiscal years in any of the services, and in the absence of permanent law stopping it, the inhibition has been shuttled about in economy bills and appropriation bills at one time or another. We have not paid them for 5 years, and the latter part of this amendment now before the House is a Senate amendment which discontinues for another year the payment of the reenlistment allowances." The opponents of the amendment, while questioning its wisdom, were in general agreement with its sponsors concerning its purpose and effect. 83 Cong.Rec. 9678-9679. The amendment was then adopted by the House. 83 Cong.Rec. 9679.

We are of opinion that Congress intended in Section 402 to suspend the enlistment allowance authorized by Section 9 during the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June, 1939. The legislative history, summarized above, discloses that Congress intended the legislation concerning the allowance during the fiscal years 1938 and 1939 as a continuation of the suspension enacted in each of the four preceding years. The adoption in the act of May 28, 1937, of different terminology might in other circumstances indicate an intent to change the object of the legislation. Compare Brewster v. Gage, 280 U.S. 327, 337, 50 S.Ct. 115, 117, 74 L.Ed. 457; Crawford v. Burke, 195 U.S. 176, 190, 25 S.Ct. 9, 12, 49 L.Ed. 147; Pirie v. Chicago Title & Trust Co., 182 U.S. 438, 448, 21 S.Ct. 906, 910, 45 L.Ed. 1171. But the drawing of such an inference is a workable rule of construction, not an infallible guide to legislative intent, and cannot overcome more persuasive evidence where, as here, it exists. Compare Boston Sand & Gravel Co. v. United States, 278 U.S. 41, 48, 49 S.Ct. 52, 53, 73 L.Ed. 170.

The respondent contends that the words of Section 402 are plain and unambiguous and that other aids to construction may not be utilized. It is sufficient answer to deny that such words when used

⁴ The debate in the Senate was as follows (83 Cong.Rec. 9512):

"Mr. Walsh. Mr. President, I understand that the bill as it passed the House contained a provision for the use of funds from this appropriation for reenlistments in the Army, and no provisions were made for the use of any of the appropriation for the payment of reenlistments in the Navy, the Marine Corps, or the Coast Guard.

"Mr. Adams. That is correct.

"Mr. Walsh. The purpose of the amendment is to eliminate the provision for payment in case of reenlistments in the Army because it is discriminatory against the other services and civil forces, which formerly received reenlistment pay and allowances.

"Mr. Adams. That is correct, and it is to open the way for statutory clearing of the whole situation.

in an appropriation bill are words of art or have a settled meaning. See United States v. Perry, 8 Cir., 50 F. 743, 748.⁵ The very legislative materials which respondent would exclude refute his assumption. It would be anomalous to close our minds to persuasive evidence of intention on the ground that reasonable men could not differ as to the meaning of the words. Legislative materials may be without probative value, or contradictory, or ambiguous, it is true, and in such cases will not be permitted to control the customary meaning of words or overcome rules of syntax or construction found by experience to be workable; they can scarcely be deemed to be incompetent or irrelevant. See Boston Sand & Gravel Co. v. United States, supra, 278 U.S. at page 48, 49 S.Ct. at page 53, 73 L.Ed. 170. The meaning to be ascribed to an Act of Congress can only be derived from a considered weighing of every relevant aid to construction.⁶ These lead to the conclusion that the judgment of the court below must be reversed.

Reversed.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE, MR. JUSTICE McREYNOLDS, MR. JUSTICE STONE, and MR. JUSTICE ROBERTS are of opinion that the judgment should be affirmed on the views expressed by the Court of Claims.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. v. LENROOT *

Supreme Court of the United States, 1945.
323 U.S. 490, 65 S.Ct. 335, 89 L.Ed. 414.

MR. JUSTICE JACKSON delivered the opinion of the Court.

. . . The major events of the recorded legislative history of this Act so far as relevant were as follows: After the President's labor message of May 24, 1937 (House Doc. No. 255, 75th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 2), reminded Congress that "A self-respecting and self-supporting democracy can plead no justification for the existence of child labor," bills carefully drawn to carry out his recommendations were introduced in the Senate by Senator Black and in the House by Representative Connery. These bills expressly and comprehensively prohibited the employment of child labor either in interstate commerce or in production of goods intended for shipment in interstate commerce, as well as prohibiting shipment of goods made by child labor.³ When the Black bill came to vote in the Senate, however, all of its child-labor provisions were stricken, and the provisions of another bill recommended by the Committee on Interstate Commerce were substituted.⁴ This prohibited the shipment in interstate commerce of goods made by child labor, but it did not prohibit the use of it in carrying on the commerce itself. Thus the Senate deleted a direct prohibition of the employment under question here. But the House, in turn, struck out all of the child labor provisions of the Senate bill and substituted those of the Connery bill,⁵ which was a counterpart of the Black bill. This was much amended, but as passed at length it contained a provision forbidding child labor in interstate commerce "in any industry affecting commerce" and a prohibition of shipment of child-labor-made goods.⁶ The Senate, however, did not agree to the House bill, but meanwhile

³ "Sec. 7. It shall be unlawful for any person, directly or indirectly—

"(1) to transport or cause to be transported in interstate commerce, or to aid or assist in transporting, or obtaining transportation in interstate commerce for, or to ship or deliver or sell in interstate commerce, or to ship or deliver or sell with knowledge that shipment or delivery or sale thereof in interstate commerce is intended, any unfair goods; or

"(2) to employ under any substandard labor conditions any employee engaged in interstate commerce or in the production of goods intended for transportation or sale in violation of clause (1) of this section." This was the provision in the bill S. 2475 as reported, respectively, by the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, July 6, 1937, and by the House Committee on Labor, August 6, 1937. "Unfair goods" was defined to mean goods produced by any substandard labor condition, and the latter was defined to include child labor. §§ 2(a) (11) and (15).

"(a) has produced goods, wares, or merchandise in any State or Territory, wholly or in part through the use of child labor, on or after January 1, 1938; or

"(b) has taken delivery of such goods, wares, or merchandise in any State or Territory with notice of their character whether by purchase or on consignment, as commission merchant, agent for forwarding or other purposes, or otherwise, to transport or cause to be transported, in any manner or by any means whatsoever, or aid or assist in obtaining transportation for or in transporting such goods, wares, or merchandise in interstate or foreign commerce or to sell such goods, wares, or merchandise for shipment in interstate or foreign commerce or with knowledge that shipment thereof in interstate or foreign commerce is intended." Other provisions subjected child-labor-made goods to the laws of the states into which they were shipped regardless of their interstate character, forbade transportation into states in violation of their laws, and forbade shipment in interstate commerce of goods not labelled as to their child-labor character. The bill represented the view that several methods of circumventing Hammer v. Dagenhart, infra, should be tried at the same time, in case any should be held invalid.

⁵ See S. 2475 as reported by House Committee on Labor, August 6, 1937, H.R.Rep. 1452, 75th Cong., 1st Sess.

⁶ "Sec. 10(a). No producer, manufacturer, or dealer shall ship or deliver for shipment in commerce any goods produced in an establishment situated in the United States in or about which within 30 days prior to the removal of such goods therefrom any oppressive child labor has been employed. . . .

"(b) No employer engaged in commerce in any industry affecting commerce shall employ any employee under any oppressive child-labor condition." 83 Cong.Rec. 7441; passed, id. at 7450 (75th Cong., 3d Sess.)

had passed as a separate measure its own child-labor bill as recommended by the Interstate Commerce Committee.⁷ This did not prohibit child labor in interstate commerce. In this posture the Fair Labor Standards bill went to conference. The Conference Report says that the Committee "adopts the child labor provisions of the House amendment, with one exception. In view of the omission from the conference agreement of the principle of section 6 of the House amendment, subsection (b) of section 10 of the House amendment has been omitted."⁸ The formula covering every employer "in commerce in an industry affecting commerce" had been employed in the wage and hour as well as the child-labor provisions of the House bill, and § 6 conferred on the Secretary of Labor the power to decide whether an industry was one "affecting commerce." With the elimination of this delegation to the Secretary, the formula was changed in the wage and hour provisions, making them apply to "every employee engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce." Instead of making a corresponding change in the child-labor section, the conference committee dropped the whole clause. No reason for this different treatment of the child-labor section was given.

No controversy appears to have arisen on the floor of Congress as to inclusion of a direct prohibition applicable to interstate commerce. On the contrary, the advocates of the different versions passed by the Senate and House seem to have overlooked the fact that one contained the prohibition and the other did not; controversy was chiefly over whether the Act should simply reenact the method of the 1916 Act, which had been held unconstitutional, or should hedge by including labelling and other remedies which might have a better chance of being upheld, whether state-issued age certificates should be utilized, how much discretion should be vested in the Department of Labor, and whether particular goods only or all goods from a particular establishment should be excluded from commerce.⁹ So far as coverage was concerned, all proponents were aware that any of the suggested versions of legislation would reach only a small fraction of existing child labor,¹⁰ and the chief concern seems to have been to eliminate child la-

The following exchange during the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee hearings is also of interest, in view of the Senate's rejection of the Black-Connelly child-labor provisions in favor of the Commerce Committee proposal:

"Miss Lenroot. . . . There has been a decided shift in the employment of children between the ages of 14 and 16 years from factories to miscellaneous occupations in trade and service industries, which would not be covered by any of the bills now pending before this committee, and which involve very often employment of children for long hours at very low wages.

"The Chairman. Let me ask you this question right there: Do you think newsboys should be prohibited from working? I propound that question to you because it has been put up to me.

bor in mining and manufacturing industries shipping goods in interstate commerce,¹¹ which was the most objectionable use of child labor.¹² This had been the only object of the earlier legislation which had been held unconstitutional; neither the Act of 1916,¹³ held unconstitutional in Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U.S. 251, 38 S.Ct. 529, 62 L. Ed. 1101, 3 A.L.R. 649, Ann.Cas.1918E, 724, nor the Act of 1919,¹⁴ held unconstitutional in Bailey v. Drexel Furniture Co., 259 U.S. 20, 42 S.Ct. 449, 66 L.Ed. 817, 21 A.L.R. 1432, had prohibited child labor in interstate commerce, but both applied only to child labor in mines, quarries, mills, canneries, workshops, factories, and manufacturing establishments.

Both parties contend on the basis of legislative history that the omission of a direct prohibition was deliberate; the Company arguing that it was unwanted, the Government that it was believed superfluous. We think that dispassionate reading will not disclose what either advocate sees in this history.

It is nowhere stated that Congress did, and no reason is stated or is obvious why Congress should, purposely leave untouched child labor

"Miss Lenroot. I think under any powers that I can see that Congress has or that it may be construed to have now, it would be very difficult if not impossible to bring newsboys in.

"The Chairman. But do you think they should be prohibited from such employment?

"Miss Lenroot. I think if Congress had broad power to legislate on the subject of child labor it would be desirable to work out some standard which would be somewhat different from factory employment.

"Senator Minton. In other words, you think it is improper to use newsboys on the streets to sell newspapers?

"Miss Lenroot. Under a certain age, and under certain conditions; yes. I would make the age somewhat lower than the age for factory employment, however."

Hearings, supra, p. 43.

¹¹ Thus Senator Wheeler, one of the authors of the measure adopted by the Senate, said, "We are trying to give you something of a practical nature that can be passed, that will perhaps not go as far as some of us would like to see it go, but something which we can uphold as constitutional, that will affect child labor, stop it, and prevent it effectively in the factories, particularly in the sweatshops and southern textile mills." "We want to keep them out of the factories where they are being exploited and are in competition with men and in competition with women who need work." Joint Hearings, supra note 10, pp. 33-34, 36. Representative Schneider, who was apparently in charge of the child-labor provisions of the Labor Committee's bill on the floor, reminded the members that although the bill went as far as it could, "the child labor that is used in the production of articles for interstate commerce constitutes only 25 percent of nonagricultural child labor that exists today," and hence ratification of the child-labor amendment was still essential. 82 Cong.Rec. 1823 (ital. supplied). And Senator Thomas, who was one of the Senate managers in the conference which produced the final bill, interpreted the result of the compromise as follows in his report to the Senate: "Neither House nor Senate yielded its convictions, but both Houses obtained their common objective, which was to abolish traffic in interstate commerce in the products of child labor and in the products of underpaid and overworked labor." 83 Cong.Rec. 9163.

¹² See generally the hearings preceding the enactment of the Child Labor Act of 1916. Hearings on H.R.8234, House Committee on Labor, 64th Cong., 1st Sess.; Hearings on H.R.8234, Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, 64th Cong., 1st Sess.

employed directly in interstate commerce. It is true that no opponent of child labor appeared to want to strike at all of it. Agriculture, which accounts for from one-half to two-thirds of it, was expressly exempted. Child actors, almost negligible in number, were exempted. Telegraph messengers, so far as the evidence reveals, although a familiar form of child labor, were in no one's mind in connection with this prohibition, although the peculiarities of that service were recognized in allowing them under certain conditions to be employed at lower than minimum wages under the Act.¹⁵ But whether a majority of Congress, had this question come to its attention, would have regarded messenger service as more like agriculture in being a relatively inoffensive type of child labor or as more like mining and manufacturing, considered more harmful, is a question on which we have no information whatever.

On the other hand, we find nothing to sustain the Government's position that "the omission resulted from the realization that the indirect sanction of forbidding interstate shipment, coupled with broad statutory definitions" would be construed to eliminate child labor from interstate commerce. No such realization appears in any committee report, in the speech of any sponsor of the bills, nor in debate either on the part of those supporting or of those opposing the bills. The only explanation advanced for the hypothesis that Congress deliberately chose indirection instead of forthright prohibition is an assumption that there were doubts of its constitutional power to enact direct legislation. It is true that in Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U.S. 251, 38 S.Ct. 529, 62 L.Ed. 1101, 3 A.L.R. 649, Ann.Cas.1918E, 724, this Court had held that an earlier attempt to exclude from interstate commerce products of mines and mills that employed child labor was an invalid attempt to reach employment matters within the control of the states. But even the prevailing opinion in that case expressly conceded that Congress had ample power to control the means by which interstate commerce is carried on. 247 U.S. at page 272, 38 S.Ct. at page 531, 62 L.Ed. 1101, 3 A.L.R. 649, Ann.Cas.1918E, 724. There was never a holding or an intimation in this or any other decision of this Court that a direct prohibition of child labor in interstate commerce would not be sustained. Restrictive interpretation in this field reached its maximum in Hammer v. Dagenhart. It was decided by a closely divided Court and at the time this bill was pending it was undermined by later decisions and was thought to be marked, even then, for consignment to the limbo of overruled cases, a prediction that was shortly fulfilled. United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100, 657, 61 S.Ct. 451, 85 L. Ed. 609, 132 A.L.R. 1430. Moreover, the purpose of the proponents of this Act to challenge the decision in Hammer v. Dagenhart and require this Court to re-examine its soundness is manifest in many ways. It can hardly be supposed that Congress, while reasserting a power once denied to it, feared to exercise directly a power often conceded and never denied.

Our search of legislative history yields nothing to support the Company's contention that Congress did not want to reach such child labor as we have here. And it yields no more to support the Government's contention that Congress wanted to forego direct prohibition in favor of indirect sanctions. Indeed, we are unable to say that elimination of the direct prohibitions from the final form of the bill was purposeful at all or that it did not happen from sheer inadvertence, due to concentration on more vital and controversial aspects of the legislation. The most that we can make of it is that no definite policy either way appears in reference to such an employment as we have in this case, no legislative intent is manifest as to the facts of this case which we should strain to effectuate by interpretation. Of course, if by fair construction the indirect sanctions of the Act apply to this employment, courts may not refuse to enforce them merely because we cannot understand why a simpler and more direct method was not used. But we take the Act as Congress gave it to us, without attempting to conform it to any notions of what Congress would have done if the circumstances of this case had been put before it. . . .

1. Cf. the treatment of legislative history by Jackson, J., in Boone v. Lightner, 319 U.S. 561, 63 S.Ct. 1223, 87 L.Ed. 1587 (1943).

2. In Federal Communications Comm. v. Columbia B. System, 311 U.S. 132, 61 S.Ct. 152, 85 L.Ed. 87 (1940), the court, after making a contextual interpretation, said: "What thus appears clear from a reading of the Communications Act itself is not modified by the collateral materials which have been pressed upon us. That both sides invoke the same extrinsic aids, one to fortify and the other to nullify the conclusion we have reached, in itself proves what dubious light they shed. What was said in Committee Reports and some remarks by the proponent of the measure in the Senate are sufficiently ambiguous, insofar as this narrow issue is concerned, to invite mutually destructive dialectic but not strong enough either to strengthen or weaken the force of what Congress has enacted."

. . . . Nowhere has the futility of attempting to determine what was in the minds of legislators by means of the "legislative history" been so incisively and effectively—I should like to say, so wittily—shown as in Justice Jackson's own opinion when he examined the legislative history of the statute. The successive stages of the bill, the deletions here, the striking out there, the failure to strike out somewhere else, prove precisely that the bill had several stages, that some things were stricken out and other things were not. So far as legislation is a human activity, they are instructive data for social psychology, but they tell us nothing about what we are to do in order to carry out purposes of the statute. We can make no sense of all these things, unless we treat the final result, the statute, as a sort of accord and satisfaction, an Aquilian stipulation, summing up and superseding a vast deal of negotiating hither and yon, and rendering it not only superfluous but improper to go back of it.

That we have taken "legislative history" to our bosom as a method of interpretation is an instance of following after strange gods when we had a better one at home. The common law had developed the rule that the debates in Parliament were not merely inconclusive about the "intention" of a statute, but were incompetent. Doubtless this goes too far, but it had enormous advantages over the cult of "materials," i. e., debates, drafts, reports, etc., which was the characteristic of the Continental approach to the understanding of statutes. This was found to be a great burden by progressive jurists and it is unfortunate that we chose just this excrescence in the systems of Continental law for invitation, when we were so notably and unreasonably supercilious about other elements in these foreign systems. The phrase, la loi parle par elle-même, ought to be received back into its former seat of honor. . . .

So far as legislative history is concerned, Justice Jackson examines it in detail for the majority and finds that it adds up to zero. Justice Murphy scarcely mentions it. I think we may properly say that Justice Jackson's brilliant presentation amply justifies the deliberate neglect by Justice Murphy.

ARCHIBALD COX, JUDGE LEARNED HAND AND THE INTERPRETATION OF STATUTES *

60 Harv.L.Rev. 370, 384-390 (1947).

Legislative materials, while still subordinated to implementation of the general statutory purpose, may also serve a broader function. In seeking to determine how persons actuated by such a purpose would have dealt with a particular situation if it had been presented to them at the time, a court labors under handicaps. It lacks much of the information which was before the Congress and cannot feel in the same degree the conflicting interests from which the statute resulted. The men in the legislative and executive branches who had special charge of a pending bill, however, were familiar with the factual background and responsive to such pressures. Since they were charged with determining in the light of those conditions how to fulfill in detail the general design, their conclusions are likely to correspond to the disposition Congress would have made if it could have foreseen the final impact of the purposes it had formulated. Since the duty of the courts is "to manifest such purposes in their completeness," it would seem proper for them to consider the specific applications projected by committees as evidence of what Congress would have done if it had faced the problem. This technique has the great merit that it takes account of the fundamental object of all interpretation and treats evidence of the specific intent drawn from committee reports, like textual considerations, as an aid in the search for the half-understood meaning embraced in the general purpose, rather than as the only means of ascertaining congressional intent. The difference in technique and its effect upon the ultimate decision is so strikingly revealed in the opinions in the Western Union case as to require some comment. . . .

It is hard to escape the conclusion that the arguments of the majority were based on textual trivialities on which so large an issue should not turn. In the Western Union case there stood out above all else the will of Congress to use its constitutional power to eliminate substandard labor conditions and oppressive child labor. It was from the point of view of this purpose, manifest in the history of the times and the legislative processes as well as in the declaration of policy in Section 2, that Judge Hand dealt with the issue. . . .

Whatever the merits of the ultimate decision, Judge Hand's approach seems clearly preferable. The weakness in the Supreme Court opinion lies in the implicit assumption that the only legislative intent which can be relevant in interpreting a statute is some specific, conscious determination "as to the facts of this case." "We take the Act as Congress gave it to us, without attempting to conform it to any notions of what Congress would have done if the circumstances of this case had been put before it." To attribute so much importance to evidence of a specific intent "as to the facts of this case," without looking to the general purpose, seems likely to lead to unwarranted reliance on stray bits of legislative history when they can be found and, when they cannot, as in the Western Union case, to a scholastic analysis of dictionary definitions. The legislature frequently cannot anticipate the specific questions which may arise under its enactments; in that event, as we have seen, it is the function of the courts to search out the fundamental and pervasive will and give it specific application. "We can best reach the meaning here, as always, by recourse to the underlying purpose, and with that as a guide, by trying to project upon the specific occasion how we think persons, actuated by such a purpose, would have dealt with it, if it had been presented to them at the time. To say that that is a hazardous process is indeed a truism, but we cannot escape it, once we abandon literal interpretation—a method far more unreliable."

NOTES

1. In Trailmobile Co. v. Whirls, 331 U.S. 40, 67 S.Ct. 982, 91 L.Ed. — (1947), Rutledge, J., rejecting an interpretation based on a presentation of legislative history in favor of "the literal construction of the statute and the policy clearly evident on its face," said at 331 U. S. p. 61: ". . . the most important committee changes relied on were made without explanation. The interpretation of statutes cannot safely be made to rest upon mute intermediate legislative maneuvers."

In Hust v. Moore-McCormack Lines, 328 U.S. 707, 66 S.Ct. 1218, 90 L.Ed. 1534 (1946), the same judge said at 328 U.S. p. 733: "Both parties have relied strongly on excerpted portions (of legislative history) thought to support their respective views. As is true with respect to all such materials, it is possible to extract particular segments from the immediate and total context and come out with road signs pointing in opposite directions."

2. "The Administrative Procedure Act (60 Stat. 237 (1946), 5 U.S.C.A. 1005 et seq.) contains the following provision": "Sec. 6 (c). Subpenas.—Agency subpoenas authorized by law shall be issued to any party upon request and, as may be required by rules of procedure, upon a statement or showing of general relevance and reasonable scope of the evidence sought. Upon contest the court shall sustain any such subpoena or similar process or demand to the extent that it is found to be in accordance with law and, in any proceeding for enforcement, shall issue an order requiring the appearance of the witness or the production of the evidence or data within a reasonable time under penalty of punishment for contempt in case of contumacious failure to comply."

In his speech in the House of Representatives explaining the bill for the Administrative Procedure Act, Mr. Walter, a co-author, said: "Subsection (c) of section 6 provides that . . . where administrative subpoenas are contested, the court is to inquire into the situation and issue an order of enforcement only so far as the subpoena is found to be in accordance with law. This is a definite statutory right and is applicable to subpoenas of every kind addressed to any person under authority of any law. The effect of the subsection is thus to do more than merely restate the existing constitutional safeguards which in some cases, such as those involving public contractors—see Endicott Johnson Corp. v. Perkins (317 U.S. 501, 63 S.Ct. 35, 87 L.Ed. 492 (1943), have been held inapplicable. Also, the term 'in accordance with law' does not mean that a subpoena is valid merely because issued with due formality. It means that the legal situation, including the necessary facts, demonstrates that the persons and subject matter to which the subpoena is directed are within the jurisdiction of the agency which has issued the subpoena." (Senate Document No. 248, 79th Congress, 2d Session at p. 363 (1946).)

On the following date Representative Hobbs had a memorandum from the Department of Justice inserted as an extension of his remarks in the Congressional Record which stated:

Under section 6(c) it is provided that "upon contest the court shall sustain any such subpoena or similar process or demand to the extent that is found it is in accordance with law." This provision is not intended to change the law as expounded in Endicott Johnson v. Perkins (317 U.S. 501, 63 S.Ct. 35, 87 L.Ed. 492, 1943), in which the Supreme Court held that subpoenas issued by an agency will be accorded due respect by the Court if they are within the agency's power and that there would be no independent inquiry as to whether the particular person subpoenaed comes within the coverage of the act enforced by the agency. The law as expounded in Endicott Johnson v. Perkins is still applicable. All that this section requires is that the court determine whether the subpoena issued comes within the general power of that agency. There need be no in limine inquiries as to whether the person subpoenaed is or is not covered by the act.

In the light of the foregoing legislative history should Section 6, subsection (c) of the Administrative Procedure Act be interpreted to overrule the Endicott John- son case? Cf. Harrison v. Northern Trust Co., 317 U.S. 476, 63 S.Ct. 361, 87 L.Ed. 407 (1943).

AMERICAN STEVEDORES v. PORELLO

Supreme Court of the United States, 1947.

330 U.S. 446, 67 S.Ct. 847, 91 L.Ed. —.

MR. JUSTICE REED delivered the opinion of the Court.

Porello, a longshoreman, was injured in 1942 while working in the hold of the U. S. S. Thomas Stone, a public vessel of the United States. His employer, American Stevedores, Inc. (called American hereinafter), was engaged in loading the vessel under a stevedoring contract with the United States. Within two weeks of the accident which caused the injuries American's insurance carrier, in compliance with § 14 of the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act,¹ 33 U.S.C. §§ 901-950, 33 U.S.C.A. §§ 901-950, and without the compulsion of an award of compensation by a deputy commissioner under § 19, began compensation payments to Porello, who negotiated the checks he received. In March of 1943 Porello gave notice in accordance with § 33(a) of election to sue the United States as a third party tortfeasor rather than to receive compensation. In the same month he filed a libel, amended in November, 1943, to recover damages from the United States under the Public Vessels Act of 1925,² 46 U.S.C. § 781 et seq., 46 U.S.C.A. § 781 et seq., for the injuries to his person sustained in the accident. Exceptions to the libel being overruled, the United States answered, denying fault on its part and claiming sovereign immunity from suit. Later, by a petition charging American with fault and setting forth an indemnity provision of the stevedoring contract, the United States impleaded American.³ American then answered the libel, denying fault and asserting as an affirmative defense that, by accepting compensation payments, Porello had lost his right to sue a third party tortfeasor.

The District Court held that Porello was not barred from maintaining the action. At trial it appeared that a beam lying athwart a hatch had fallen into the hold and struck Porello, causing the injuries complained of. The court held that the United States was negligent in not providing a locking device on the end of the beam, and held that American was negligent through its foreman, whose orders to the operator of a cargo boom caused the beam to be dislodged. Porello was awarded damages from the United States, the United States to receive contribution from American as a joint tortfeasor to the extent of half the damages less the compensation payments received by Porello. On cross appeals by the United States and American the Circuit Court of Appeals held that American was bound by the indemnity provision of the stevedoring contract to make the United States completely whole. With that modification it affirmed the decree below. 2 Cir., 153 F.2d 605. The important issue in this proceeding is whether the Public Vessels Act makes the United States liable for damages on account of personal injuries. The Circuit Court of Appeals thought that this question was decided by the Canadian Aviator case,⁴ but since the issue was not squarely posed in that case we granted certiorari in order to determine it at this time. 328 U.S. 827, 66 S.Ct. 1013, 90 L.Ed. 1605.

The Public Vessels Act provides that a "libel in personam in admiralty may be brought against the United States . . . for damages caused by a public vessel of the United States" ⁵ Petitioner argues that the Act only provides a remedy for damage to property. "Damages," however, have historically been awarded both for injury to property and injury to the person—a fact too well-known to have been overlooked by the Congress in enacting this statute.⁶ Nor is it easy to conceive any reason, absent intent to the contrary, not to have inserted the word "property" in the statute, an obvious method of imposing the limitation for which the petitioner here contends. Petitioner nonetheless argues that the legislative history of the statute conclusively shows that the congressional intent was to limit redress to property damage.

The history of the Act may be briefly detailed. Starting in 1920 various bills were introduced which provided for liability of the Government to suit for damages caused by its vessels.⁷ We need only consider, however, the bills that were pending in the 68th Congress by which the present act was passed: H.R. 6989, H.R. 9075 and H.R. 9535. The first provided for suits against the United States "for damages cause by collision by a public vessel." The second, designed as an amendment to the Suits in Admiralty Act, and supported by the Maritime Law Association of the United States,⁸ would have amended that act so that it would not be limited to vessels operated by the Government as merchant vessels, and would thus have made the United States unquestionably liable to suit for personal injuries caused by public vessels.⁹ This bill never reached the floor of Congress. The third bill, H.R. 9535, was enacted and became the present Public Vessels Act. Although "designed as a substitute for H.R. 6989,"¹⁰ it omitted the words "by collision" which would have limited the liability of the United States to damages resulting from collisions by public vessels. The only discussion of any significance to the present inquiry related to the last of these bills. It is true, as petitioner points out, that the proponent of the bill in the House, Mr. Underhill, said, when the bill was introduced, that the Act would allow "suits in admiralty to be brought by owners of vessels whose property has been damaged. . . ." ¹¹ Further, on inquiry as to whether suit could be brought only where blame was charged to the Government, he answered: "Not entirely; where a man's property is damaged, he can bring a suit." ¹² These statements were not, however, answers to questions whether the Act would provide a remedy for injury to the person as well as to property, nor does it appear that the speaker was at the time attentive to such possible distinctions. It is also true that the Committee report said that "the chief purpose of this bill is to grant private owners of vessels and of merchandise a right of action when their vessels or goods have been damaged as the result of a collision with any Government-owned vessel." ¹³ However, in the same report a letter from the Attorney General was incorporated, which, while it was addressed to the predecessor bill, H.R. 6989, serves, in the absence of contradiction by the report, as an indication of the Committee's opinion on the intended effect of the act. That letter explicitly stated that "The proposed bill intends to give the same relief against the Government for damages . . . caused by its public vessels . . . as is now given against the United States in the operation of its merchant vessels, as provided by the suits

"No vessel owned by the United States . . . shall, in view of the provision herein made for a libel in personam, be subject to arrest or seizure by judicial process in the United States or its possessions . . ."

"In cases where if such vessel were privately owned or operated, or if such cargo were privately owned and possessed, a proceeding in admiralty could be maintained at the time of the commencement of the action herein provided for, a libel in personam may be brought against the United States or against any corporation mentioned in section 741 of this title, as the case may be, provided that such vessel is employed as a merchant vessel or is a tugboat operated by such corporation. . . ."

¹³ S.Rep.No.941, 68th Cong., 2d Sess., p. 1. Of course the chief purpose of the bill was to provide a remedy for those who chiefly urged the bill—the vessel owners. But the committee, in so stating, cannot be taken to have made that purpose the only one. By that token the purpose would be to provide a remedy only for collision damages, a limitation clearly discarded by omitting the words "by collision" from the Act. Canadian Aviator, Ltd. v. United States, supra, n. 4.

in admiralty act of March 9, 1920." As the right to sue for personal injuries under the Suits in Admiralty Act was clear, it may be inferred, at least as strongly as the opposite is implied by Mr. Underhill's remarks, that the Committee understood that the Act would provide a remedy to persons suffering personal injuries as well as property damage.¹⁴ Moreover, when the bill reached the floor of the Senate there was not the least indication that the members of that body believed that the Act limited relief to owners of damaged property.¹⁵

The passage of the Suits in Admiralty Act, the Public Vessels Act, and the Federal Tort Claims Act¹⁶ attests to the growing feeling of Congress that the United States should put aside its sovereign armor in cases where federal employees have tortiously caused personal injury or property damage. To hold now that the Public Vessels Act does not provide a remedy against the United States for personal injuries would in the future only throw this form of maritime action under the Federal Tort Claims Act; for that Act excepts from its coverage "Any claim for which a remedy is provided by the Act . . . of March 3, 1925 [The Public Vessels Act] (U.S.C., title 46, secs. 781-790, inclusive) . . ."¹⁷ We cannot believe that the Public Vessels Act, read in the light of its legislative history evinces a Congressional intent only to provide a remedy to the owners of damaged property. . . .

Affirmed in part and reversed in part; question answered.

MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER, with whom THE CHIEF JUSTICE concurs, dissenting.

¹⁵ So the only pertinent comments follow, 66 Cong. Rec. 3580:

"Mr. Robinson. I think the Senator from Delaware should state briefly to the Senate the effect of the bill. It seems to be a measure of considerable importance.

"Mr. Bayard. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas is quite right; it is a measure of great importance. There are continuous applications being made to the Claims Committee of both Houses for the consideration of bills to reimburse people who have suffered damage from maritime accidents in which United States vessels are concerned, to enable them to present their suits in the various district courts. In this last Congress there were nearly 200 such claim bills introduced in the two Houses.

" . . . It would give a person aggrieved because of an accident by reason of the shortcomings of a United States ship the right to go into a district court and prosecute his action. It provides for the appearance of the Attorney General of the United States, and all maritime accidents of any kind resulting from collision, and so on, are taken care of. A great deal of money would be saved to the Government.

"Incidentally, the bill would accomplish something which should have been done in this country a long time ago. It would give an opportunity to do justice when Federal employees have committed an offense against an individual. . . .

"Mr. Robinson. If enacted, it would relieve Congress of the consideration of a great many measures in the nature of private claims.

"Mr. Bayard. All claims of this nature."

¹⁷ Id., § 421.

Without disregarding the significance which we have heretofore attached to legislative history, I cannot give the Public Vessels Act the scope given it by the Court.

It can hardly be maintained that, in the setting of legal history, the phrase "damages caused by a public vessel" must cover personal injuries due to failure to provide proper working conditions for a long-shoreman. The problem for construction is not whether the term "damages" may be applied to money compensation for hurt to person or property. What is to be construed is "damages caused by a public vessel". Standing by itself, that phrase, spontaneously read, may well mean damage inflicted by a public vessel rather than "damages" incurred in connection with its operation. All we held in Canadian Aviator, Ltd. v. United States, 324 U.S. 215, 65 S.Ct. 639, 89 L. Ed. 901, was that its personnel was part of the public vessel for purposes of "causing" damage to another vessel.

The words do not stand alone. They are illumined by the legislative history of the Public Vessels Act. This history has been so accurately summarized in the Government's brief that we shall avail ourselves of it:

"On May 29, 1924, Mr. Underhill introduced H.R. 9535, 68th Cong., 1st Sess., which became the Public Vessels Act without change so far as the present provision is concerned. At that time, there were already pending two other bills, H.R. 6989 and H.R. 9075, both of which would also have authorized suit in case of damage by a public vessel. H.R. 6989, likewise introduced by Mr. Underhill, was the successor of a series of bills introduced at each session of Congress since 1920. It provided for suit 'for damages caused by collision by a public vessel,' and had the approval of all interested Government departments. H.R. 9075, a new measure, was designed to revise the Suits in Admiralty Act and, at the same time, remove its existing limitation to only such vessels as are operated by the Government as merchant vessels. It would have resulted in making the United States liable for personal injuries by all public vessels exactly as it was already for those by its merchant vessels. H.R. 9075 had the powerful support of the Maritime Law Association of the United States and of Judge Hough, then the country's outstanding admiralty judge. It did not have the unqualified approval of the interested departments, which were insisting on important changes.

"The omission of H.R. 6989 and its predecessors to cover personal injuries had been the subject of criticisms, some of which are cited in the brief of respondent Porello. But protracted delays were apparent if an attempt were made to rewrite H.R. 9075 so as to meet the objections thereto. Instead of proceeding further with either H.R. 6989 or H.R. 9075, Mr. Underhill, for the Committee, introduced H.R. 9535, which, in place of limiting its grant of jurisdiction to suits 'for damages caused by collision by a public vessel,' covered all suits 'for damages caused by a public vessel.' The purpose of this change is nowhere discussed. Mr. Underhill, in explaining the intent of the proposed legislation, stated, however (66 Cong.Rec. 2087): 'The bill

I have introduced simply allows suits in admiralty to be brought by owners of vessels whose property has been damaged by collision or other fault of Government vessels and Government agents.' Never at any time in the course of the debates in the House or Senate was it expressly stated that the bill extended to suits for personal injuries. Many statements in the course of the debates, some of which are cited in petitioner's brief, seem to indicate that only relief for property damage was intended. We accordingly submit that, if decisive weight is to be given to the legislative history, it would appear that the Public Vessels Act was not intended to cover suits for personal injury."

In scores of cases in recent years this Court has given "decisive weight" to legislative history. It has done so even when the mere words of an enactment carried a clear meaning. An impressive course of decisions enjoins upon us not to disregard the legislative history of the Public Vessels Act unless it is so completely at war with the terms of the statute itself that we must deny one or the other. We can find such a conflict only by reading the Act itself with dogmatic inhospitality to the usual illuminations from without.

We cannot escape the conclusion that there was no jurisdiction for this libel in the District Court.¹

K. Methods of Presentation of Extrinsic Aids

Extrinsic aids may be presented to the court either by testimony at the trial or by inclusion in counsel's brief in the manner devised by Mr. Justice Brandeis in the brief presented by him while at the bar to the Supreme Court of the United States in Muller v. Oregon, 208 U.S. 412, 28 S.Ct. 324, 52 L.Ed. 551, 13 Ann.Cas. 957 (1908). This so-called "Brandeis Brief", while originally used to bring before the court the economic and social facts underlying a statute for the purpose of establishing constitutionality, is now also commonly used to present extrinsic aids. Illustrations of the former use are the Nebbia Case, and Appellee's Brief therein, supra, pp. 260-267; and the Leighton Case, supra, p. 445, where almost the entire finding of the state court was derived from the contents of a "Brandeis Brief". Reliance on that type of presentation is reflected in most of the recent United States Supreme Court opinions that appear in this Chapter. (See for example express reference in footnote 4 to Social Security Board v. Nierotko, supra, p. 1118.) The disadvantage of this sort of presentation is that the court is not compelled to consider it since it is not a part of the record, as demonstrated in Adkins v. Children's Hospital, 261 U.S. 525, 43 S.Ct. 394, 67 L.Ed. 785, 24 A.L.R. 1238 (1923). Proof of extrinsic aids at the trial, however, encounters the inhibitions of technical rules of evidence.

¹ This conclusion is reinforced by the Report of the Senate Committee that "The chief purpose of this bill is to grant private owners of vessels and of merchandise a right of action when their vessels or goods have been damaged as the result of a collision with any Government-owned vessel". S.Rep.No.941, 68th Cong., 2d Sess., p. 1. The Court's opinion finds overriding significance in a letter by the Attorney General commenting on the Bill, in which he stated that it "intends to give the same relief against the Government for damages caused . . . by its public vessels" as was given by the Suits in Admiralty Act. That Act did afford the right to sue for personal injuries. To prefer the Attorney General's view to that expressed by those in charge of a measure would in itself be not the normal choice. And this letter of the Attorney General antedated the Report of the Committee and the statement of Representative Underhill. Compare United States v. Durkee Famous Foods, 306 U.S. 68, 71, 59 S.Ct. 456, 457, 458, 83 L.Ed. 492, where the Committee Report "stated that the purpose of the bill was set out in a letter from the Attorney General which it quoted." To reject the subsequent authoritative statements of the Congressional proponents of the legislation and to accept the view of the Attorney General to which the Government now does not even refer, is to discard in favor of dim remote light what heretofore has been deemed controlling illumination.

2. Excerpt from Appellants' Brief in United States v. American Trucking Ass'n's (see opinion supra, p. 1051):

"1. The Legislative History of Section 204(a) (1) and (2).—As first introduced on February 4, 1935, the bill which later became the Motor Carrier Act (S.1620, 74th Cong., 1st Sess.) contained no provision authorizing the Interstate Commerce Commission to regulate qualifications or maximum hours of service of any employees, but merely empowered the Commission to investigate the need for establishing qualifications and maximum hours of service of employees of motor carriers (S. 1620, Section 325). On February 27, 1935, Mr. Frank McManamy, then Chairman of the Legislative Committee of the Interstate Commerce Commission, appeared before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce and urged that the bill be amended so as to include the provision for regulation of qualifications and maximum hours of service of employees of common and contract motor carriers now contained in Section 204(a) (1) and (2) of the Motor Carrier Act. Mr. McManamy's testimony shows plainly that he contemplated empowering the Commission to regulate the qualifications and maximum hours of service of only those employees whose duties affect safety of operation. His testimony follows:

"Mr. McManamy. The other amendment to which I refer I think is more important because it relates to safety. In Section 2(a) (1) and (2) of S.304 there are provisions authorizing the Commission to establish reasonable requirements with respect to certain matters including "qualifications of maximum hours of service of employees." Somewhat similar provisions appear in S.1620, but they omitted the words above quoted. Instead, Section 325 authorizes the Commission to investigate and report on the need for such regulation. Further investigation of the need for regulation of the hours of service of employees engaged in interstate transportation should hardly be necessary because the hours of service of railroad employees have been regulated by law for 27 years and it has proven to be one of the most important provisions of all the safety legislation.

"The regulation of the hours of service of bus and truck operators is far more important from a safety standpoint than the regulation of the hours of service of railroad employees because the danger is greater. . . .

"It is my view, therefore, that definite hours of service provisions should be included in the bill. This could be accomplished by inserting in Section 304(a) (1) and (2) lines 9 and 15, page 8, following the word "records" in both lines, the words which appear in S.394, as follows: "qualifications and maximum hours of service of employees" (Hearings on S.1629 before the Committee on Interstate Commerce, United States Senate, 74th Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 122-123). [Italics supplied.] . . .'

"Following Commissioner McManamy's testimony, the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce amended the bill to include the provision suggested by the Commissioner, which is now contained in Section 204(a) (1) and (2) of the Motor Carrier Act. That the Committee was granting to the Commission only the power for which it had asked through Commissioner McManamy, is shown by the statement of Senator Wheeler on the floor of the Senate. Senator Wheeler, the Chairman of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce and the sponsor of the bill, stated:

"'. . . the committee amended paragraphs (1) and (2) to confer power on the Commission to establish reasonable requirements with respect to the qualifications and maximum hours of service of employees of common and contract carriers, thus restoring provisions that were in the Rayburn bill, introduced in the 73rd Congress. This suggestion came to us, I think, from the chairman of the legislative committee of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Suggestions were made to us by some of the labor organizations that we ought to put in the bill at this time provisions specifically limiting the hours of labor; but by reason of the fact that the Commission felt that they would like first to make a study of the matter, and then come back and report to Congress, or be given permission to establish these requirements later, we left it as the Commission suggested, giving them power to make the investigation and, if and when they found it necessary, to put in effect such rules and regulations as they might deem necessary' (79 Cong. Rec. 5652). [Italics supplied.]

"That the purpose of Congress was to give the Commission power to regulate hours of service of only those employees whose duties affect safety of operation is likewise clear from the legislative history of the bill in the House of Representatives. The report of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce expressly stated that one of the 'basic principles of regulation of motor carriers as prescribed under this bill' was to:

"'(9) Establish reasonable requirements to promote safety of operation and to that end prescribe qualifications and maximum hours of service of employees and standards of equipment for all carriers (H. Rept. No. 1645, 74th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 3)'. . . ."

3. From your research in attempting to discover the pre-natal history of statutes and in preparation for drafting bills, you will have discovered the paucity of authentic data in most states, where, for example, legislative debates and committee proceedings are not recorded. Publication of the "New York State Legislative Annual, 1946", by the N. Y. Legislative Service, provides for that state an unofficial compilation of supporting memoranda filed by agencies that recommended bills enacted in that year.

SECTION 4. CURRENT POINTS OF VIEW ON BASIC THEORY

INTRODUCTORY NOTE

You should analyze the material in this Section critically in the light of your study of all of the cases and materials preceding it. Compare both generally and in detail the differences and similarities between: (a) the theories, (b) the techniques, and (c) the limitations on judicial action, expressly and impliedly advocated by each author.

ROSCOE POUND, ENFORCEMENT OF LAW

20 Green Bag 401, 404-406 (1908).

. . . After Germany, under the influence of the historical school, had held out her common law for nearly one hundred years, a period of enacted law has brought on a controversy among German jurists that is very instructive for us in America. Three schools may be distinguished in Germany today, differentiated according to the manner in which they apply code provisions and the point of view from which they approach the code. First, there is what we may call the literal school. The adherents of this school ask, "What do the several code provisions mean as they stand, applying the canons of genuine interpretation? They endeavor to find the proper code-pigeonhole for each concrete cause, to put the cause in hand into it by a pure logical process, and to formulate the result in a judgment. Their standpoint is essentially analytical; and it is significant that analytical theories of jurisprudence and analytical methods of legal science have arisen in Germany only within the last thirty years with the growth and development of legislation under the Empire. For the analytical theory has always been a concomitant of periods of legislation.¹ A recent German controversial writer has described the point of view of this school thus:

"A superior magistrate with academic training, sits in his cell armed only with a thinking-machine, although one of the finest type. His sole furniture is a green table upon which there lies before him the official statute-book. One may hand him any case you please, actual or moot, and, performing his duty, he is prepared by the aid of pure logical operations and a secret technique intelligible only to himself, to indicate with absolute exactness the decision already determined by the law-maker in the statute-book."²

In other words, the whole human element is excluded. The process and the result are conceived of as something purely logical and scientific. If the result chances to be just, so much the better. But justice in the cause in hand is not the chief end. The facts of concrete causes are to be thrown into the judicial sausage-mill and are to be ground into uniformity; and the resulting sausage is to be labeled justice. Absolute uniformity of decision of cases logically alike and entire certainty in advance as to the outcome on any given state of facts are the ends it seeks.

Secondly, there is an historical school. With the adherents of this school the code provisions are assumed to be in the main declaratory of the law as it previously existed; the code is regarded as a continuation and development of pre-existing law. With them, all exposition of the code and of any provision thereof must begin by an elaborate inquiry into the pre-existing law and the history and development of the competing juristic theories among which the framers of the code had to choose. Their method of application of the law, however, is substantially the same as that of the literal school. While they see in a code provision, not the command of the sovereign, to be regarded in and of itself in applying it, but a development out of the juristic theory of the past, they agree that when it is interpreted and its content is ascertained, the process of application is a purely logical one. Do the facts come within or fail to come within the rule? Such, according to this school also, is the sole question for the judge. Ethical questions are for the legislator. When the judge has, by historical investigation, found out what the rule is, he has simply to fit it to just and unjust alike.

A third school, which one might call the equitable school, has sprung up and waxed strong in Germany in the last ten years.³ The starting point of this school is philosophical or sociological. To this school the essential thing is a reasonable and just solution of the individual controversy. It conceives of the legislative rule as a general guide to the judge, leading him toward the just result; but it insists that within wide limits he should be free to deal with the individual case so as to meet the demands of justice between the parties and accord with the reason and moral sense of ordinary men. It insists that application of law is not a purely mechanical process. It contends that the process involves, not logic merely, but discretion; that the cause is not to be fitted to the rule but the rule to the cause. "Whoever deals with juristic questions," says a contributor to this controversy, "must always at the same time be a bit legislator"⁴ that is, to a certain extent he must make law for the case in hand. This theory and the school that contends for it are modern developments, under the influence of sociological thought, of the perennial notion of natural law, fruitful in so many epochs of legal history. It has always been the function of this notion to preserve or restore juristic ideals of reason and justice in times of matured or stable or rigid law.

Although we do not acknowledge it, we have the same problem in American law. Valuable as the historical method is in order to understand how a rule came into being and to judge how far it is now applicable, when the codifier or the legislator is at work, it may be doubted whether it has value for the immediate administration of justice. Whatever the original reason for rules, they are in force today for reasons of today, even if those reasons come to no more than vis inertiae. For the legislator it is all-important not to be deceived by specious modern "reasons" for ancient rules. But for the judge, who has to apply the rules, there is a great deal to be said for such ex post facto reasons. They fix his mind upon the vital point that the rule is applying here and now to men of this day. Hence we may leave the historical school out of account for the purpose in hand. Between the other two schools the line is as sharp and the conflict as acute under the surface with us as it is openly in Germany. The theory of our legal system is that the court finds the law in statute or in adjudicated cases and applies it hard and fast to the facts of the case in hand. Many courts carry out this theory conscientiously in practice. But to a large and apparently growing extent the practice of our application of the law is, after all, that jurors or courts, as the case may be, take the rules of law as a general guide, determine what the equities of the cause demand, and contrive to find a verdict or render a judgment accordingly, wrenching the law no more than is necessary. Many courts today are suspected of ascertaining what the equities of a controversy require, and then raking up adjudicated cases to justify the result desired. Occasionally we find a judge avowing frankly that he looks chiefly at the ethical situation inter partes and does not allow the law to interfere therewith beyond what is inevitable.⁵ This is essentially what the German equitable school contends for, and it is something of which complaint may be heard in this country today wherever a knot of lawyers is met with discussing recent decisions of the courts.

NOTE

JAMES M. MITCHELL, LEGISLATIVE AND JUDICIAL DESIDERATA

25 Rep. N. Y. S. B. A. 289, 300-301 (1902).

If every statute was applied literally wherever its application was possible in a civil or criminal action, the community at large would gain a far more intelligent appreciation of the work of its representatives in the halls of the Legislature than is now the case, where many laws are but dead-letters, and the palpable intention of others is ignored or ameliorated by a process of judicial refinement or the law itself is pronounced unconstitutional for an alleged transgression of the constitutional provision which safeguards the individual's "liberty." Aside from its so-called police power the Legislature has, undoubtedly an unclassified residuum of legislative power, which should sanction the enactment of any statute, no matter how unwise, inexpedient or inequitable its operation in a given instance, that did not clearly violate an express constitutional provision. If the judiciary, influenced doubtless by the sincerest motives for the public welfare, did not tend to assume a quasi-legislative attitude in the interpretation and application of enactments of this character, the popular demand would necessitate the repeal of the laws in question or their amendment in accordance with the dictates of reason and justice. It is at least certain that an unexceptional and strict enforcement of all statutory law by the judiciary would react to awaken the civic consciousness to the necessity of selecting legislators who would declare the law in strict accordance with the people's will. Where the law, as declared, is judicially conformed to accord with the people's will, as conceived by the court, the generality of people remain in ignorance of their representatives' actual declarations. There is a necessary fiction in the administration of justice that all men know the law. The citizen who gains an actual knowledge of a law through its application to his own case and is dissatisfied therewith, may vote to compass its repeal. Knowledge in this regard is power. There is no more certain manner in which this knowledge can be disseminated than by the literal application and enforcement of all statutes by the courts.

MAX RADIN, STATUTORY INTERPRETATION

43 Harv.L.Rev. 863, 870-884 (1930).

That the intention of the legislature is undiscoverable in any real sense is almost an immediate inference from a statement of the proposition. . . .

And if it were discoverable, it would be powerless to bind us. What gives the intention of the legislature obligating force? In theology or in literature, that question answers itself; but in law, the specific individuals who make up the legislature are men to whom a specialized function has been temporarily assigned. That function is not to impose their will even within limits on their fellow-citizens, but to "pass statutes," which is a fairly precise operation. That is, they make statements in general terms of undesirable and desirable situations, from which flow certain results. As a rule, the statements must be made in the words of a specified language. A statute made in Latin at the present time is no statute, although the intention of the legislature can be as well or as ill made out from Latin as from English. A statute which presented a photograph of two automobiles and printed the legend beneath it that drivers who get into the situation pictured above would be prosecuted would not be a statute, although intention would be no less easily, and perhaps more easily, discoverable in this way than in set words. When the legislature has uttered the words of a statute, it is functus officio, not because of the Montesquieuan separation of powers, but because that is what legislating means. The legislature might also be a court and an executive, but it can never be all three things simultaneously.

And once the words are out, recorded, engrossed, registered, proclaimed, inscribed in bronze, they in turn become instrumentalities which administrators and courts must use in performing their own specialized functions. The principal use is that of "interpretation." Interpretation is an act which requires an existing determinate event—the issue to be litigated—and obviously that determinate event can not exist until after the statute has come into force. To say that the intent of the legislature decides the interpretation is to say that the legislature interprets in advance by undertaking the impossibility of examining a determinable to see whether it can cover a situation which does not exist. . . .

Our search for a method of finding a meaning in the statute will readily bring us to two which have at various times been employed or suggested, consideration of its purpose and consideration of its results. These are very different things, and any effort to combine them may lead to what was called in the case of Heck, "methodological bigamy," in which the offspring of the one or the other union must necessarily be illegitimate.

If by the purpose of a statute we mean the actual purpose entertained by those who framed it or voted it, the purpose is indistinguishable from the intention, and we should have the same difficulty already noted, that this purpose is practically undiscoverable and would be irrelevant if discovered. But the purpose of many entities may be something far simpler and more apparent, something which is evident in the character of the thing itself, the end or final cause in the Aristotelian sense as distinguished from its efficient or its material cause. So, a razor is something to shave with, and we should know this without the least speculation as to the ideas which were in the manufacturer's mind when the razor was made. There are some objects the purpose or end of which we can not decide on so easily. Doubtless only a technical expert could tell from looking at one of many machine parts, what it was for, but in most concrete objects, the purpose is self-evident.

In the case of statutes also, it is rare indeed that we can not say positively what any particular statute is for, by reading it. A statute is quite generally a fairly specific statement. It asserts that something is to be done, and whatever uncertainty or vagueness or ambiguities may exist as to the conditions under which it should be done, as a rule there is none as to the situation which the conditions are to give rise to. A statute which declares gambling contracts to be void may need a deal of interpretation, but its obvious purpose is to discourage gambling.

But as a matter of fact, can we be quite sure about it? There are purposes and purposes. It is not so much that the same statute may be an obvious instrument to several ends simultaneously, which is, after all, unlikely, but that nearly every end is a means to another end. We distinguish in our conduct and our thinking between immediate and ulterior purposes. And in most cases we contemplate a final or ultimate purpose which is in all likelihood vague and remote enough but is certainly not to be disregarded.

If we then return to our gambling statute, can we say simply that its purpose is to discourage gambling? That is obviously a remoter purpose, but the immediate purpose is something less. It is to make it impossible to sue on gambling contracts, or at any rate to make their gambling character a defense. And it must be apparent that the immediate purpose will depend largely on the remoter purpose. Again, a statute making murder capital has as its immediate purpose the putting to death of murderers. But certainly a further purpose is to discourage murder. It may be said that its better and larger purpose is that its immediate one may never be effectuated.

When we recall that the avowed and ultimate purposes of all statutes, because of all law, are justice and security, we have an additional fact to keep in mind. Surely it is not open to us to say that these purposes are too remote to be regarded, and in some cases there are solemn constitutional declarations that they must be considered paramount. At all events, the long concatenation of means and ends leads to a final end or to a final group of ends, and if the immediately apparent or the "primary" purpose of a statute seems to point away from it, courts are quite properly and justly perturbed.

There could be no better example of all this than the Statute of Frauds. The original statute passed by Parliament in 1677 states its purpose in the very name. It is to prevent frauds and perjuries. The means whereby this was to be achieved make up the immediate purpose of the statute. It was to make invalid to some extent many groups of oral contracts. There has probably never been a statute in which the immediate purpose has so frequently defeated the ulterior purpose as has been the case in this statute, and there is scarcely a group of these oral contracts in which the court has not struggled vigorously to prevent such a result. As a consequence, the number of determinate situations to which each of the larger determinables described by the statute might be reduced, has been constantly lessened, and this has surely gone on without much attention to those which the framers of the statute might have imagined.

In fact, we must qualify the statement that the immediate purpose of the statute is generally apparent. It is commonly rather the ulterior purposes which are apparent. Only when we have made up our minds what the ulterior purpose really was shall we know, for example, the immediate purpose of a statute which makes gambling contracts "void."

A contradiction between the primary and the ulterior purposes of the statute or the ultimate purpose of all statutes, will become apparent, if at all, only when we actually carry out or attempt to carry out the primary purpose. The method of "interpreting" a statute by its results is therefore an almost inevitable consequence of the existence of a chain of purposes in every piece of legislation. If courts tell us, and they often do, that the result is never to be considered, they are announcing a psychological impossibility.

The immediate result of interpreting a statute is plain enough. The given determinate situation is or is not to be treated as one of the reductions of the larger determinable which the statute describes. But that can not be the result which will tell us how to interpret a statute, because we find this result only after we have interpreted. What we mean therefore when we use a result as a method of interpreting statutes, is that we ask ourselves what remoter results will follow if this immediate one is effected. Courts are fond of pointing to the dangers incident to the interpretation they reject. It is curious that an apprehensive glance at disastrous future consequences is likely to be the mark of a court which considers itself conservative and which would repudiate as a radical and intolerable innovation a method of interpretation consciously based on results.

The method of results involves prophecy, which is in itself not a damning indictment. A certain amount of forecasting of probabilities is an essential element of human conduct; and there is no reason in the world to command judges not to indulge in it. Our difficulty lies in the skill with which the forecasting is done. When a court declares that a certain interpretation will lead to undesirable consequences and is therefore to be avoided, the striking quality of this declaration is usually the grave doubt it elicits as to the accuracy of the forecast.

We may sum up by saying that to interpret a law by its purposes requires the court to select one of a concatenated sequence of purposes, and this choice is to be determined by motives which are usually suppressed. To interpret it by its results is to prophecy probable consequences for one or another of several interpretations, and the basis of the calculus is equally undisclosed. And yet these two types of interpretation are not merely the commonest in actual operation but are in most cases imperfectly concealed under so-called technical interpretations. . . .

There would then be two questions of importance in the interpretative process. The first would be: Can the statutory determinable in the widest range be taken to include the determinate before the court? The more nearly determinate the statute is, the easier that question will be to answer. It is far easier to make a statute which contains large determinables than limited ones, but if we wish to see clearly and with brief consideration what the maximum and minimum of extension is, in any determinable, we must avoid words like "just" and "reasonable" and "property" and similar almost indefinitely extensible terms. These words have so little color of their own that they can be made to take almost any hue we desire.

The second question would be: Will the inclusion of this particular determinate in the statutory determinable lead to a desirable result? What is desirable will be what is just, what is proper, what satisfies the social emotions of the judge, what fits into the ideal scheme of society which he entertains. The dangers, whatever they are, which are involved in a Gefühlsjurisprudenz can in no system be completely avoided. An attempt to avoid them by declaring that judges must be guided by broad principles and not by particular situations is inevitably futile, because the broader the principle, the wider the scope of the personal predilections of the judge. If there is a glaring contradiction between what the judge thinks desirable and what the great majority of the community so considers, the community must, in its legislative function, limit as carefully as it can by more easily determinable categories the range within which the judge shall select his desirables. But the legislature can not both have its cake and eat it. It can not indulge itself in using large, round, sonorous words and then complain that courts do not treat them as precise, definite, and unreverberant. . . .

JAMES M. LANDIS, A NOTE ON "STATUTORY INTER-PRETATION"

43 Harv.L.Rev. 886 (1930).

A passing acquaintance with the literature of statutory interpretation evokes sympathy with the eminent judge who remarked that books on spiritualism and statutory interpretation were two types of literary ebullitions that he had learned not to read. Mr. Radin's plea for realism in the science of interpreting statutes must thus fall on not unwilling ears. With such a slogan, volunteers for the fray should readily spring to his standard. But to learn, when the smoke of battle has cleared away, that the prize of victory is but Gefühlsjurisprudenz savors too much of the saddening process of making the world safe for democracy. Surely what Broom, Coke, Bacon, Austin and Lieber dignified with the conception of a science deserves a better fate than the surrender implicit in the resort to Gefühlsjurisprudenz.

The Anglo-American scheme of government conceives of lawgivers apart from and at times paramount over courts. Such a function, commonly vested in a legislature, presupposes an intelligible method of making known to the organs of administration, courts or otherwise, its desires and hopes. That method centuries ago crystallized into the formalism of passing statutes. It is from such a conception that one derives the rule of statutory interpretation emphasizing the intent of the passer of statutes.

The fact that in the name of such a rule fictitious intents of legislatures have been derived by courts to conceal the fact that they, rather than the legislature, were in this instance the lawgivers, does not impeach the validity of the rule, but merely demonstrates an inapposite case for its application. The more multitudinous such cases, the more necessary the insistence upon the limits of such a rule. A hundred years ago Austin sought to define its boundaries by distinguishing between genuine and spurious interpretation, always a nice and often an elusive distinction. Even the distinction fades in the face of Mr. Radin's attack that regards the intent of the legislature as undiscoverable, and if discoverable, irrelevant, and thus limits legislative power to the crypticism of "passing statutes."

That a discoverable intent—record evidence that a particular determinate underlay a general determinable—is irrelevant to the judge called upon to decide the same concrete case theretofore presented to the legislature in a hypothetical form, disregards not only theoretical but practical considerations of Anglo-American government. It is a commonplace of our political thought that it is the task of the legislature to express the state's changing conceptions of legal relationships and to make these conceptions effective. The tenure of the legislator, his parochial interests, his opportunities for extended investigation and debate, his unlimited powers of choice between competing devices, the numbers that he must convince, and the ephemerality of his conclusions, all make for emphasizing the importance of his intent. One further consideration, especially significant to those who advocate the principles of Gefühlsjurisprudenz, and pointing to the necessity of preferring from the sociological standpoint the Gefühl of the legislator to the Gefühl of the judge, is epigrammatically summed up by Dicey when he says: "If a statute . . . is apt to reproduce the public opinion not so much of today as of yesterday, judge-made law occasionally represents the opinion of the day before yesterday."

The real difficulty is not that the intent is irrelevant but that the intent is often undiscoverable, especially when the passer of statutes is, in most cases, a representative assembly. Intent is unfortunately a confusing word, carrying within it both the teleological concept of purpose and the more immediate concept of meaning—the assumption that one or more determinates are embraced within a given determinable. Purpose and meaning commonly react upon each other. Their exact differentiation would require an extended philosophical essay. But it may be noted that intent when used to mean purpose usually will be found to accompany the process of spurious interpretation, whereas intent when used as equivalent to meaning commonly accompanies the process of genuine interpretation, although, as I have said, the distinction between these processes is a nice one.

The assumption that the meaning of a representative assembly attached to the words used in a particular statute is rarely discoverable, has little foundation in fact. The records of legislative assemblies once opened and read with a knowledge of legislative procedure often reveal the richest kind of evidence. To insist that each individual legislator besides his aye vote must also have expressed the meaning he attaches to the bill as a condition precedent to predicating an intent on the part of the legislator, is to disregard the realities of legislative procedure. Through the committee report, the explanation of the committee chairman, and otherwise, a mere expression of assent becomes in reality a concurrence in the expressed views of another. A particular determinate thus becomes the common possession of the majority of the legislature, and as such a real discoverable intent.

Legislative history similarly affords in many instances accurate and compelling guides to legislative meaning. . . . The real difficulty is twofold: that strong judges prefer to override the intent of the legislature in order to make law according to their own views, and that barbaric rules of interpretation too often exclude the opportunity to get at legislative meaning in a realistic fashion. The latter, originating at a time when records of legislative assemblies were not in existence, deserve no adherence in these days of carefully kept journals, debates, and reports. Unfortunately they persist with that tenaciousness characteristic of outworn legal rules. Strong judges are always with us; no science of interpretation can ever hope to curb their propensities. But the effort should be to restrain their tendencies, not to give them free rein in the name of scientific jurisprudence.

When the intent or meaning of the legislature is discoverable, statutory interpretation posits no serious problem except the political one of insistence upon judicial humility. The real problems arise where the meaning of the legislature is not discoverable. Here the gravest sins are perpetrated in the name of the intent of the legislature. Judges are rarely willing to admit their role as actual lawgivers, and such admissions as are wrung from their unwilling lips lie in the field of common and not statute law. To condone in these instances the practice of talking in terms of the intent of the legislature, as if the legislature had attributed a particular meaning to certain words, when it is apparent that the intent is that of the judge, is to condone atavistic practices too reminiscent of the medicine man. No compromise can be had on this issue. But is the alternative Gefühlsjurisprudenz or, better, Freiegesetzfindung?

A statute rarely stands alone. Back of Minerva was the brain of Jove, and behind Venus the spume of the ocean. So of the statute, it is the culmination often of long legislative processes, too rarely understood by the mere lawyer, and too rarely studied to have been lifted from the contempt bred of ignorance. Such material frequently affords a guide to the intent of the legislature conceived of in terms of purpose. To deal, for example, with the Trade Disputes Act of 1906 without regard to the fact that it followed upon a Liberal-Labor victory, would be to thwart known legislative hopes and desires. It is done unquestionably. The mutilated Clayton Act bears ample testimony to the "day before yesterday" that judges insist is today. But this is simply the price we pay for judicial independence. To ignore legislative processes and legislative history in the processes of interpretation, is to turn one's back on whatever history may reveal as to the direction of the political and economic forces of our time.

It must be insisted that the legislative purposes and aims are the important guideposts for statutory interpretation, not the desiderata of the judge. And there is a world of difference between an attitude of mind that honestly seeks to grasp these and give them effect, and one that cavalierly throws them overboard and leaves us to the mercy of the judge's "day before yesterday." The so-called rules of interpretation are not rules that automatically reach results, but ways of attuning the mind to a vision comparable to that possessed by the legislature. The vision of itself rarely actually grasps the particular determinate, but the eye once aligned in the same direction will more probably place a particular determinate in its appropriate spot. The despised rules of expressio unius exclusio alterius, presumptions of strict and liberal interpretation, are of this character. They predicate attitudes of mind more likely to recreate the atmosphere surrounding the statute in its passage and thus more likely to give effect accurately to the real legislative purpose. Like most "rules of law," they solve only the obvious case, and give a direction for profitable thinking about the difficult ones. And it is true of them, as of most "rules of law," that occasions will arise when they must be broken.

The use of extrinsic aids to statutory interpretation thus has real and not illusory significance. Hopeful developments toward a science of statutory interpretation must be in the direction of devising means of properly evaluating the effectiveness to be given such extrinsic aids. Of course, guessing will not thereby be eliminated; but what science, natural or otherwise, has eliminated the necessity for guesswork? Nevertheless the emphasis must lie upon the honest effort of courts to give effect to the legislature's aims, even though their perception be perforce through a glass darkly. There will and must remain that group of cases—smaller than is generally supposed—where no meaning, aim, or purpose of the legislature is at all capable of apprehension. Here and here alone does talk of the intent of the legislature become meaningless and barbaric. And here society and the legislature both entrust themselves to the law-making powers of courts. No science of law has yet done away with the need for such occasional legislation; a science of statutory interpretation can hardly hope to fare better. But the insistence of both must be that judicial legislation shall concern itself only with the interstitial tissues of the body politic and not its gristle.

FRANK E. HORACK, IN THE NAME OF LEGISLATIVE INTENTION

38 W.Va.L.Q. 119, 126-127 (1932).

There always exists, however, the practical necessity of giving some effect to the legislative enactment. Upon occasion legislatures have seen fit to enact legislation without a definite enunciation of policy, have failed to express their policy adequately, or because of the elapse of time their intention has become uncertain. In these situations it seems commensurate with our ideals of efficiency and economy to allow the court to apply the legislation according to the rule which they believe the legislature would have provided. This is admittedly "judicial law-making" but the exercise of the power in this limited field of application in no way hinders the legislature from altering the rule or standard if they do not approve of the interpretation adopted by the court. The objection to this, of course, is that it permits the subjective determination of policy to rest with the courts and not with the legislatures. But it is not to be overlooked that in the determination of every case the policy involved and the result to be reached is not overlooked by the judge. It is a psychological impossibility. . . . This states the difficulty but it is no basis for concluding that the use of legislative intention as a guide to the interpretation of statutes should be abandoned. True, it is desirable that the discretionary power of the courts which tends to make them lawmakers should be limited; but it is also desirable that legislation be applied to cases which the legislature did not contemplate but would have regulated if they could have foreseen them. Some adjustment is necessary and apparently it is some device by which the courts can apply these "doubtful" statutes (which probably is a more sociologically desirable thing to do than to declare that in as much as the legislature has not clearly stated its will the court will not attempt to deal with the case at all) in as objective a manner as possible. The "intention of the legislature" rightly applied reaches this result with the least difficulty and with the greatest protection to those who fear oppression from judicial discretion.

FREDERICK J. DE SLOOVERE, THE EQUITY AND REASON OF A STATUTE

21 Cornell L.Q. 591, 608-609 (1936).

. . . To reach satisfactory results in view of the individual and social interests involved and yet remain within the realm of genuine interpretation, courts must (1) find the possible meanings upon the basis of definite techniques which will properly harmonize the textual and contextual processes, in view of extrinsic aids, other legislation, and the common law; (2) permit the statutory purpose to direct a choice from such meanings; and (3) exercise judicial discretion with good judgment, good faith, and common sense at points where such techniques and the reason (purpose) of the statute fail to direct a solution. Fortunately, however, courts often find and apply proper meanings without consciously employing established techniques of genuine interpretation. Techniques carefully worked out in detail in statutory interpretation would, it is submitted, greatly reduce guessing, would eliminate the taking of a priori attitudes toward legislation when choosing meanings for ambiguous texts, and would avoid recourse in the first instance in difficult cases to the spirit or equity of the statute,—all forms of spurious interpretation. . . .

ROBERT J. FARLEY, INTERPRETATION REINTERPRETED

11 Tulane L.Rev. 266, 276 (1937).

Theoretically the test of meaning for any and all statutes is legislative intent and the primary method of ascertaining the legislative intent is plain meaning. Actually, legislative intent means what a mythical, composite legislator would have meant (a) if he were not now in the court's position, or (b) if he were now in the court's position; plain meaning means what a casual reader of variable intelligence would understand from the statute (a) if he were not now in the court's position, and (b) if he were now in the court's position. Procedurally each of these two major attitudes has within its own terms an escape from itself, except that if (a) of either is chosen for the rationalization, the decision will most likely be couched in the matter of purpose, while if (b) of either is chosen the decision will most usually turn upon the result to be reached or the mischief to be remedied. Together they furnish an escape each from the other, depending upon the dramatic incidents involved as to which of the predominant ideals shall be exemplified at the expense of the other, immediately discernible subjectively to the court in the intrinsic merit of the specific application. As will be noted, the result is procedural further in the determination of what evidence is material and admissible, historical, lexicographical, or customary, and the like, whereupon all the remaining rules of interpretation or construction, as you will, become aids or subsidiary and are helpful or hurtful as emphasizing each litigant's particular theory, relatively dependent upon how closely the court is determined to examine the actual problem before it. The court probably is never concerned with true and false interpretation as such, but it is actually confronted with doctrinal functions for the expression of ideals that are as implicit a part of the organic law of the jurisdiction as the Constitution, and that can be reconciled only in terms of political, economic and social values which must be weighed by no other intelligence than its own.

MAX RADIN, A SHORT WAY WITH STATUTES

56 Harv.L.Rev. 388, 405-407 (1942).

The American legislature has no authority that is in any way higher than that of the administrative or judicial officials, or the wholly nonofficial members of the public who jointly with the states are specifically declared in the Constitution to be invested with all non-distributed governmental power. Its function is to issue directives to these officers, not because it is sovereign but because in our constitutional system that is the duty of the legislature. We are not required to stand in awe of, admire, or approve these directives, but, so far as we can understand these statutes, we must obey them.

If we can keep this relationship straight in our mind we can see that the problem is not what "interpretation" is often taken to be. It is not to determine exactly and precisely what the words of the statute "meant." This notion is based on the doctrine that words singly and in combination contain some secretion called a "meaning" and that this secretion can be removed from the words and applied either to acts directly, or to other words which can be more readily made into the sources for action or for refraining from action. It is in this second aspect that the process of "translation" is necessary, for the process of "construction" has left us with a sentence only half intelligible even after analysis. . . .

. . . . The main thing is to know what we are doing. If we persist in saying that the main and fundamental purpose is to carry out the will of a specific person, when we know that we are dealing with a person who can have no will, as we understand it, and who has no more right to impose his unexpressed will on the administrators and judges than the latter may impose their will as such on the legislature—if we persist in saying this, we shall continue to be driven to a disingenuousness that irks a great many lawyers and should be extremely unpleasant to all of them. . . .

Some time ago in an article in the Harvard Law Review, I gave reasons for disregarding materials which were strongly controverted by Dean James M. Landis, then Professor of Law at the Harvard Law School. My statements were undoubtedly somewhat too sweeping. They suggested approval of the English method of dealing with debates, reports and the like, a method that regards these matters as incompetent as well as irrelevant. I intended then—and I certainly should like to take the position now—that they are neither irrelevant nor incompetent, but that they are in no sense controlling. If they were, the implication of the suggestion of Judge John Clark that the Congressional Record be adequately indexed for use in courts is impossible to refute.

It would seem that all these materials are entitled to just the consideration their character justifies, and this character must be determined by whatever critical methods are applicable elsewhere. The statement of a sponsor of a bill in the legislature may be the basis of a judgment as to the manner of translating the purpose of a bill into action, not because he was a member of the legislature that enacted it, but by reason of the fact, if it is a fact, that his statement commends itself to the administrator and the court. The various changes made in the drafts of a bill are important for the history of legislative action, but they give less assistance than their constant use would seem to indicate. They are as rarely controlling as the technical rules of interpretation, and like these they form another instance of the rationalizing technique which is so important a part of legal exposition.

Undoubtedly, the entire report of a committee which has investigated a situation and then has proposed legislation is of first-rate value. But it need no more bind the court than does a legislative debate. It is likely that the study of the report, when the general purpose—the ground design—is not sufficiently indicated, will greatly aid in making the purpose apparent, as well as in discovering what other values are to be kept intact so far as possible. But there is no legislative force in the report. And if the statute as a whole can reasonably be taken to be directed to an outcome which is different from the one which seems to animate the report, the court has the power, and indeed it is part of its function, to direct the application of the statute to this reasonably determined goal.

That the court may take what is called a statesmanlike view of the statute is often denied. But the denial is again based on the imputation of sovereignty to the legislature. There is no reason why administrators and judges may not be called statesmen in the same manner as the members of the legislature are. The statesmanlike view is, it is true, more clearly and definitely a characteristic of the duty of the legislature. Indeed, except as an exercise of statesmanship, there is no reason for a statute at all. And the legislature may, if they can find apt words for it, foreclose any attempt by the administration and judiciary to displace what the legislature regards as the more important of the purposes to be achieved. But if they do not quite specifically foreclose it, a statesmanlike concept of the statute is definitely the normal and necessary basis of the court's judgment on the statute. . . .

If Heydon's Case were recast to serve a modern need, the steps in dealing with a statute might run somewhat as follows:

The first question the interpreter asks is: What is the purpose of the statute as a whole? It makes little difference whether it is called the "program" or the "policy" instead of the "purpose." If we wish to retain the traditional language, we can call it the mandate, or the intent of the legislature, provided we do not really mean intent. It is a little more dangerous to call it the legislative "will" or "wish," although if we know what these words mean, there is no harm in it.

Second: Is this statutory purpose one that the court feels is good? We need not trouble ourselves about the statement that the court must not legislate. Both the judicial and the executive branches participate in the legislative process. They cannot help doing so by the mere act of "enforcing" or "applying" laws or carrying out the legislative purpose. They may not rephrase the statute. They may not reject the purpose, even if they do not find it to be good. But they may—indeed, nothing can prevent their doing so—exercise a judgment on the value of the purpose, and make that judgment the basis of their enforcement of the law. There is, moreover, no reason to assume that their judgment will not be an honest one based on a real consideration of public needs.

Third: Is the implemental portion of the statute declared to be exclusive? If so, it is clear that those who framed the statute were uncertain about the value of its program and the court may not disregard that fact even if the court is quite certain. On the other hand, if no such exclusive use of statutory methods is prescribed, it is open to a disapproving court to find them exclusive.

I believe this is the way strong and self-confident courts—and we ought to have no other—do in fact deal with statutes. Since they are Anglo-American courts, they will not disregard precedent, but will use it as strong courts do, namely to avoid doing specific injustice, and not merely to satisfy the requirement of logical consistency. A statute interpreted “restrictively” for a period long enough to have induced men to adjust their affairs to this interpretation, ought not suddenly to be interpreted “liberally,” and vice versa. For precisely the same reason administrative interpretation, continued long enough to cause this adjustment, should only be changed if the “mischief” caused by the change would be less than the “mischief” of maintaining the practice. . . .

In all this what room is there for the standard “canons of interpretations,” for ejusdem generis, expressio unius, and the entire coterie or band of phrases and tags and shibboleths which are so wearisomely familiar? I should be tempted to deny that they have ever resolved an honest doubt, if a general negative were provable. Certainly it is hard to find an instance in which they did more than invest with the appropriate symbolic uniform a conclusion that should have been quite as respectable in the ordinary civilian clothes of sober common sense.

Evidently, “canons of interpretation” cannot always be rejected. There are statutes whose purpose is exhausted in the statute itself. These are for the most part procedural statutes, in which the word “procedural” is used in the broadest possible manner. The purpose of a statute limiting the time of appeal to sixty days is clearly that and nothing more. Its purpose is to apprise all parties concerned as to when an appeal will no longer lie. There is no question of strictness or liberality of interpretation. It may, however, be important to know the type of appeal or appealable determination involved, but ordinarily there is no reason why this would involve a large number of cases. All that is envisaged is clarity. And if ejusdem generis can make it clear, by all means let us use it.

Our short way with statutes will undoubtedly add to, rather than lighten, the burden of courts. But it will relieve them from one burden, that of feigning an inferiority complex that they really do not have. That would be something gained.

GUISEPPI v. WALLING

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, 1944.⁷
144 F.2d 608, 620-622.

FRANK, CIRCUIT JUDGE. . . . The power of courts in general to interpret statutes has been said by some persons to be, in practical effect, a sort of supplementary legislation which the legislature necessarily leaves to the courts.

Indeed, those who today criticize the transfer of “subsidiary legislation” to administrative officers forget that, inspired by somewhat similar motives, there has been and still is much criticism of the power exercised by judges in construing statutes, that Bentham, Livingston, and their disciples (some even in our time)¹ have insisted that all "law" must emanate solely from the legislature, and have tried, through codification, to destroy all "judicial legislation."² Repeated attempts on the European continent to exploit that notion have invariably proved disappointing.³ Legal certainty to be attained by eliminating, via codification, all judicial law making is a fatuous dream.⁴ Courts in their interpretation of statutes often cannot avoid some such legislation. The enactment of many a statute thus, by implication, calls on the courts to engage in supplemental law making. That activity should always, of course, be modest in scope.⁵ But the necessary generality in the wording of many statutes, and ineptness in the drafting of others, frequently compels the courts, as best they can, to fill in the gaps, an activity which, no matter how one may label it, is in part legislative.⁶ Sagacious legal scholars of high repute, such as, for instance, John Chipman Gray, Wigmore, Allen and Radin, have said that courts, in discharging their duty of carrying out the express will of the legislature as faithfully as they can, are fre-

⁶ The remark of Bishop Hoadly, usually quoted in discussions of judicial legislation—"Nay, whoever hath an absolute authority to interpret any written or spoken laws, it is he who is truly the Law Giver to all intents and purposes, and not the persons who first spoke and wrote them"—has been given a specific application to statutory interpretation. That judicial legislation is an inherent part of the work of the courts in the development of legal rules when no statutes are involved has been avowed by at least eight Supreme Court Justices—Holmes, Hughes, Brandeis, Stone, Cardozo, Frankfurter, Douglas and Jackson; see citations in New England Coal & Coke Co. v. Rutland R. Co., 2 Cir., 143 F.2d 179, note 31.

Many learned commentators have said the same; see, e. g., the citations in Commissioner v. Beck's Estate, 2 Cir., 129 F.2d 243, 245, note 3; Waite, Judge-Made Law And The Education of Lawyers, 30 Am.Bar. Ass'n J. (1944) 253.

There has, however, been greater reluctance to admit that, similarly, interpretation of statutes often requires such legislation. Yet it is difficult to justify a differentiation. Several students of continental legal systems have recognized that statutory construction often necessitates judge-made law. See Kiss, Equity and Law, in The Science of Legal Method (transl. 1917) 146; Lambert, Codified and Case Law, in the same volume, 251; Wurzel, Juridical Thinking (in the same volume), 286; Alvarez, Methods For Codes (in the same volume) 429. As Mr. Justice Jackson recently noted, the Swiss Code candidly calls for such law-making by the judges; State Tax Commission v. Aldrich, 316 U.S. 174, 202, note 23, 62 S.Ct. 1008, 86 L.Ed. 1358, 139 A.L.R. 1436.

Paul, Federal Estate and Gift Taxation (1924) I, 43-44, 62, 86-87, has observed that narrow or liberal construction of statutes often involves judicial legislation; cf. Jackson, The Struggle For Judicial Supremacy (1941) 58.

Seagle suggests that legislation actually leads to an increase of legislative activity by the courts. Seagle, The Quest For Law (1941) 298; cf. 196. See also Calhoun, Introduction to Greek Legal Science (1944) Ch. IV.

quently unable to escape the responsibility of engaging in supplemental legislation.⁷ As Chief Justice Hughes said in 1928, "a federal statute finally means what the [Supreme] Court says it means."⁸ Thus the courts in their way, as administrators in their way, perform the task of supplementing statutes. In the case of the courts, we call it "interpretation" or "filling in the gaps"; in the case of administrators we call it "delegation" of authority to "supply the details." In both instances, the task is unavoidable.

ARCHIBALD COX, JUDGE LEARNED HAND AND THE INTERPRETATION OF STATUTES *

60 Harv.L.Rev. 370-375 (1947).

I

In the beginning it may be appropriate to say a word about "the intent of Congress"—the phrase which dominates so much thinking on questions of construction. Here, as throughout the law, the various connotations of "intent" create unfortunate confusion. In one sense, it carries a concept of purpose and signifies the general aim or policy which pervades a statute but has yet to find specific application. Some such purpose lies behind all intelligible legislation, for while individual congressmen may occasionally disagree even as to the broad purposes to be accomplished by a bill they all support, nevertheless their conflicting views may be fairly said to blend in a resultant, just as their differences regarding the words to be enacted are merged by the legislative process into a final product. The resultant we metaphorically describe as the "intent of Congress." In a second sense the metaphor carries the more immediate concept of meaning and indicates the specific, particularized application which the statute was "intended" to be given.¹ In enacting the Fair Labor

⁷ In the Nature and Sources of Law (2d ed. 1921) § 370, Gray said "Interpretation is generally spoken of as if its function was to discover what the meaning of the legislature really was. But when the legislature has had a real intention, one way or another on a point, it is not once in a hundred times that any doubt arises as to what its intention was. If that were all that the judge had to do with the statute, interpretation of the statutes, instead of being one of the most difficult of a judge's duties, would be extremely easy. The fact is that the difficulties of so-called interpretation arise when the legislature has had no meaning at all; when the question which is raised on the statute never occurred to it; when what the judges have to do is, not to determine what the legislature did mean on a point which was present to its mind, but to guess what it would have intended on a point not present to its mind had the point been present." He also said that "when the judges are professing to declare what the legislature meant, they are in truth themselves legislating to fill up" the gaps.

See Wigmore, The Judicial Function, in The Science of Legal Method (1917) xxvi; Allen, Law in The Making (1927) 283, 286-287; Radin, The Law and Mr. Smith (1938) Chapter XIV.

Standards Act,² for example, it was the "purpose" of Congress to raise the standard of living of workers engaged in interstate commerce or in the production of goods for commerce. When it defined production to include "any process or occupation necessary to the production thereof,"³ Congress "intended" (in the second sense) to make the act applicable to maintenance workers in the executive offices of interstate producers.⁴ Precision requires, moreover, some bifurcation of the second definition. The phrase is used ambiguously to mean both a particularization which the legislature consciously intended but failed to state explicitly, and also, where that is lacking, the specific application of the general, more pervasive purpose which the interpreter believes the legislature would have made, had it foreseen and faced the controversy.

There can be little objection to using "the purpose of Congress" as a metaphor to describe its general aims. Nor is there much ground for objection to speaking of "intent" to denote meaning, provided that the intended application is tolerably clear and specific; in such a case one may fairly say that the individual legislators had a common intention which our system of government requires the courts to follow. It is when there is no conscious, specific intent that the phrase causes trouble. Few, if any, legislators think in terms of the specific controversies which courts must settle by giving a statute one or another meaning. Many such controversies cannot be foreseen because they spring from circumstances which no one can anticipate when enacting legislation. In consequence, the charge is easily and often made that the courts which purport to seek out the legislative intent in doubtful cases indulge themselves in a shameless fiction devised, consciously or in self-deception, to cloak the fact that they are not interpreting, but making law according to their own notions. But judges who have laid bare far better-established fictions, never shrinking from questions concerning their own role nor seeking to conceal the true nature of their function, have frequently described the duty of the courts as that of searching out the legislative intention.⁵ The charge misapprehends the lesson which the metaphor seeks to teach. The metaphor does not state an all-sufficient rule; it enjoins a point of view and sets a goal to which the judge aspires even while he knows it is beyond attainment.

There are, of course, numerous instances in which the "general purpose" of a statute and the "specific intent" are more or less coincident; the narrower the purpose the more likely this is to be true. Nevertheless, the distinction seems helpful for purposes of analysis.

⁵ This is implicit, of course, in the often quoted opinion of Mr. Justice Holmes, on circuit, in Johnson v. United States, 163 F. 30, 32 (C.C.A. 1st, 1908): "The Legislature has the power to decide what the policy of the law shall be, and if it has intimated its will, however indirectly, that will should be recognized and obeyed. The major premise of the conclusion expressed in a statute, the change of policy that induces the enactment, may not be set out in terms, but it is not an adequate discharge of duty for the courts to say: We see what you are driving at, but you have not said it, and therefore we shall go on as before."

Under our traditions the judge's role, while final, is still subordinate. To some extent at least, he must apply laws made by the people's chosen representatives regardless of his own opinions; the pinch comes when the legislators had no clearly discernible and particularized intention. In such a case the judge must choose between looking to his own heart for his decision and seeking to divine out of the confused, often conflicting and half-conscious aspirations which lie behind a statute some resultant of those forces in keeping with what was consciously contemplated. The former choice is not unthinkable. The adjudication of such cases might have been committed to the courts with no mandate save that they should not disregard whatever meaning is reasonably apparent. Such is the practice with administrative agencies and there are judges who seemingly suggest that this is the path the courts should follow.⁶ Thus far, however, our law has made the second choice, casting the judge as interpreter of the will of Congress.

To some extent the explanation of this choice may lie in the desire for consistent application of the tradition which binds the judge to follow the clear intent of Congress; for the clear and the doubtful cases shade into one another. But I think that Judge Hand found a more convincing reason in the need for judicial responsibility. Society will not long tolerate the wisest judge who, knowing no master, decides cases only according to his individual sense of justice. Either society will pull him down and choose from time to time the judge whose decisions please its strongest members—measuring the strength of each by force, or votes, or some other standard then prevailing—or else he must accept responsibility—in the Judge's phrase—"to these books about us." It is the acceptance of law as a force stronger than those who impose it that makes possible our society. "Of the contrivances which mankind has devised to lift itself from savagery there are few to compare with the habit of assent, not to a factitious common will, but to the law as it is. We need not go so far as Hobbes, though we should do well to remember the bitter experience which made him so docile. Yet we can say with him that the state of nature is 'short, brutish and nasty,' and that it chiefly differs from civilized society in that the will of each is by habit and training tuned to accept some public, fixed and ascertainable standard of reference by which conduct can be judged and to which in the end men will conform."⁷ Hence, to throw over our traditions and make the courts acknowledged instruments of those in power would be a serious retrogression.

⁷ L.Hand, Is There A Common Will (1929) 28 Mich.L.Rev. 46, 52.

In fields unoccupied by legislation, the courts, even while they must acknowledge loyalty to past decisions, must also shape the law in keeping with current needs and aspirations and so must serve two inconsistent principles.⁸ In dealing with statutes, they can escape this antinomy to some degree, for the competing interests have been evaluated and adjusted in the legislature established for that purpose, leaving less occasion for the courts to strike the balance. While legislators do not always deal with the specific controversies which the courts decide, behind the statutory words there lies the general purpose embodying specific meanings, half understood, half inarticulate; and by these the courts may judge specific cases. "Life overflows its molds and the will outstrips its own universals. Men cannot know their own meaning till the variety of its manifestations is disclosed in its final impacts, and the full content of no design is grasped till it has got beyond its general formulation and become differentiated in its last incidence. It should be, and it may be, the function of the profession to manifest such purposes in their completeness if it can achieve the genuine loyalty which comes not from obedience, but from the according will, for interpretation is a mode of the will and understanding is a choice."⁹

In stating thus the function of the courts in interpreting acts of Congress, Judge Hand did not imply that they do nothing more than voice the unconscious meaning of the legislature; to say that one must seek out the intent of Congress is, as I have said, to state a point of view, an aspiration. There are cases in which the limits of the broad design are so uncertain that it gives no guidance; there are others in which a decision one way or the other will not affect the general purpose. Moreover, to read an act with sympathy and imagination sufficient to discover and then particularize its half-framed purposes requires the court to know, not from outside society but as a member, the needs which gave the statute birth, and thus invites an adjustment of conflicting interests in which it is impossible wholly to separate the judge's sense of right and wrong from that which he attributes to the legislature. There is truth, in short, in the words of those who say that in applying a statute a court cannot interpret only but must make new law to supplement the legislation. Yet the courts, while making law, must somehow manage to interpret.¹⁰ The dilemma is insoluble. But there are ways of going about a solution, and the method chosen makes a difference. Here, I think, lies the lesson in Judge Hand's opinions. While those who say the court must recognize that it is making law have done the necessary work of teaching the profession the importance of this aspect of deciding cases, they sometimes come too quickly to a point at which they cease to search for the legislature's meaning and either restrict the statute, deciding the case according to judicial precedent, or else make their own adjustment of the interests, extending the enactment into fields the legislature did not enter. The metaphor asserts another point of view, requiring the court as best it can to submerge individual notions to that which was determined in another forum; commanding it to manifest the legislative purposes in their completeness and there to stop, remembering that the policy of a statute inheres as much in its limitations as in its affirmations.¹¹

. . . A problem in statutory construction can seriously bother courts only when there is a contest between probabilities of meaning.

Difficulties of Construction

Though it has its own preoccupations and its own mysteries, and above all its own jargon, judicial construction ought not to be torn from its wider, non-legal context. Anything that is written may present a problem of meaning, and that is the essence of the business of judges in construing legislation. The problem derives from the very nature of words. They are symbols of meaning. But unlike mathematical symbols, the phrasing of a document, especially a complicated enactment, seldom attains more than approximate precision. If individual words are inexact symbols, with shifting variables, their configuration can hardly achieve invariant meaning or assured definiteness. Apart from the ambiguity inherent in its symbols, a statute suffers from dubieties. It is not an equation or a formula representing a clearly marked process, nor is it an expression of individual thought to which is imparted the definiteness a single authorship can give. A statute is an instrument of government partaking of its practical purposes but also of its infirmities and limitations, of its awkward and groping efforts. With one of his flashes of insight, Mr. Justice Johnson called the science of government "the science of experiment."² The phrase, uttered a hundred and twenty-five years ago, has a very modern ring, for time has only served to emphasize its accuracy. To be sure, laws can measurably be improved with improvement in the mechanics of legislation, and the need for interpretation is usually in inverse ratio to the care and imagination of draftsmen. The area for judicial construction may be contracted. A large area is bound to remain.

Hand, supra note 10, at 5: "But the judge must always remember that he should go no further than the government would have gone had it been faced with the case before him. If he is in doubt, he must stop for he cannot tell that the conflicting interests in the society for which he speaks would have come to a just result, even though he is sure that he knows what the just result would be."

The difficulties are inherent not only in the nature of words, of composition, and of legislation generally. They are often intensified by the subject matter of an enactment. The imagination which can draw an income tax statute to cover the myriad transactions of a society like ours, capable of producing the necessary revenue without producing a flood of litigation, has not yet revealed itself.³ Moreover, government sometimes solves problems by shelving them temporarily. The legislative process reflects that attitude. Statutes as well as constitutional provisions at times embody purposeful ambiguity or are expressed with a generality for future unfolding. "The prohibition contained in the Fifth Amendment refers to infamous crimes—a term obviously inviting interpretation in harmony with conditions and opinions prevailing from time to time."⁴ And Mr. Justice Cardozo once remarked, "a great principle of constitutional law is not susceptible of comprehensive statement in an adjective."⁵

The intrinsic difficulties of language and the emergence after enactment of situations not anticipated by the most gifted legislative imagination, reveal doubts and ambiguities in statutes that compel judicial construction. The process of construction, therefore, is not an exercise in logic or dialectic: The aids of formal reasoning are not irrelevant; they may simply be inadequate. The purpose of construction being the ascertainment of meaning, every consideration brought to bear for the solution of that problem must be devoted to that end alone. To speak of it as a practical problem is not to indulge a fashion in words. It must be that, not something else. Not, for instance, an opportunity for a judge to use words as "empty vessels into which he can pour anything he will"—his caprices; fixed notions, even statesmanlike beliefs in a particular policy. Nor, on the other hand, is the process a ritual to be observed by unimaginative adherence to well-worn professional phrases. To be sure, it is inescapably a problem in the keeping of the legal profession and subject to all the limitations of our adversary system of adjudication. When the judge, selected by society to give meaning to what the legislature has done, examines the statute, he does so not in a laboratory or in a classroom. Damage has been done or exactions made, interests are divided, passions have been aroused, sides have been taken. But the judge, if he is worth his salt, must be above the battle. We must assume in him not only personal impartiality but intellectual disinterestedness. In matters of statutory construction also it makes a great deal of difference whether you start with an answer or with a problem.

The Judge's Task

Everyone has his own way of phrasing the task confronting judges when the meaning of a statute is in controversy. Judge Learned Hand speaks of the art of interpretation as "the proliferation of purpose." Who am I not to be satisfied with Learned Hand's felicities? And yet that phrase might mislead judges intellectually less disciplined than Judge Hand. It might justify interpretations by judicial libertines, not merely judicial libertarians. My own rephrasing of what we are driving at is probably no more helpful, and is much longer than Judge Hand's epigram. I should say that the troublesome phase of construction is the determination of the extent to which extraneous documentation and external circumstances may be allowed to infiltrate the text on the theory that they were part of it, written in ink discernible to the judicial eye. . . .

When one wants to understand or at least get the feeling of great painting, one does not go to books on the art of painting. One goes to the great masters. And so I have gone to great masters to get a sense of their practise of the art of interpretation. However, the art of painting and the art of interpretation are very different arts. Law, Holmes told us, becomes civilized to the extent that it is self-conscious of what it is doing. And so the avowals of great judges regarding their process of interpretation and the considerations that enter into it are of vital importance, though that ultimate something called the judgment upon the avowed factors escapes formulation and often, I suspect, even awareness. Nevertheless, an examination of some 2,000 cases, the bulk of which directly or indirectly involves matters of construction, ought to shed light on the encounter between the judicial and the legislative processes, whether that light be conveyed by hints, by explicit elucidation, or, to mix the metaphor, through the ancient test, by their fruits.

And so I have examined the opinions of Holmes, Brandeis and Cardozo and sought to derive from their treatment of legislation what conclusions I could fairly draw, freed as much as I could be from impressions I had formed in the course of the years. . . .

Scope of the Judicial Function

From the hundreds of cases in which our three Justices construed statutes one thing clearly emerges. The area of free judicial movement is considerable. These three remembered that laws are not abstract propositions. They are expressions of policy arising out of specific situations and addressed to the attainment of particular ends. The difficulty is that the legislative ideas which laws embody are both explicit and immanent. And so the bottom problem is: What is below the surface of the words and yet fairly a part of them? Words in statutes are not unlike words in a foreign language in that they too have "associations, echoes, and overtones."¹¹ Judges must retain the associations, hear the echoes, and capture the overtones. In one of his very last opinions, dealing with legislation taxing the husband on the basis of the combined income of husband and wife, Holmes wrote: "The statutes are the outcome of a thousand years of history. . . . They form a system with echoes of different moments, none of which is entitled to prevail over the other."¹²

What exactions such a duty of construction places upon judges, and with what freedom it entrusts them! John Chipman Gray was fond of quoting from a sermon by Bishop Hoadley that "Whoever hath an absolute authority to interpret any written or spoken laws, it is he who is truly the law-giver to all intents and purposes, and not the person who first wrote or spoke them."¹³ By admitting that there is some substance to the good Bishop's statement, one does not subscribe to the notion that they are law-givers in any but a very qualified sense.

Even within their area of choice the courts are not at large. They are confined by the nature and scope of the judicial function in its particular exercise in the field of interpretation. They are under the constraints imposed by the judicial function in our democratic society. As a matter of verbal recognition certainly, no one will gainsay that the function in construing a statute is to ascertain the meaning of words used by the legislature. To go beyond it is to usurp a power which our democracy has lodged in its elected legislature. The great judges have constantly admonished their brethren of the need for discipline in observing the limitations. A judge must not rewrite a statute, neither to enlarge nor to contract it. Whatever temptations the statesmanship of policy-making might wisely suggest, construction must eschew interpolation and evisceration. He must not read in by way of creation. He must not read out except to avoid patent nonsense or internal contradiction. "If there is no meaning in it," said Alice's King, "that saves a world of trouble, you know, as we needn't try to find any." Legislative words presumably have meaning and so we must try to find it.

This duty of restraint, this humility of function as merely the translator of another's command, is a constant theme of our Justices. It is on the lips of all judges, but seldom, I venture to believe, has the restraint which it expresses, or the duty which it enjoins, been observed with so consistent a realization that its observance depends on self-conscious discipline. Cardozo put it this way: "We do not pause to consider whether a statute differently conceived and framed would yield results more consonant with fairness and reason. We take this statute as we find it." ¹⁴ . . .

The vital difference between initiating policy, often involving a decided break with the past, and merely carrying out a formulated policy, indicates the relatively narrow limits within which choice is fairly open to courts and the extent to which interpreting law is inescapably making law. To say that, because of this restricted field of interpretive declaration, courts make law just as do legislatures is to deny essential features in the history of our democracy. It denies that legislation and adjudication have had different lines of growth, serve vitally different purposes, function under different conditions, and bear different responsibilities. The judicial process of dealing with words is not at all Alice in Wonderland's way of dealing with them. Even in matters legal some words and phrases, though very few, approach mathematical symbols and mean substantially the same to all who have occasion to use them. Other law terms like "police power" are not symbols at all but labels for the results of the whole process of adjudication. In between lies a gamut of words with different denotations as well as connotations. There are varying shades of compulsion for judges behind different words, differences that are due to the words themselves, their setting in a text, their setting in history. In short, judges are not unfettered glossators. They are under a special duty not to over-emphasize the episodic aspects of life and not to undervalue its organic processes—its continuities and relationships. For judges at least it is important to remember that continuity with the past is not only a necessity but even a duty.

There are not wanting those who deem naive the notion that judges are expected to refrain from legislating in construing statutes. They may point to cases where even our three Justices apparently supplied an omission or engrafted a limitation. Such an accusation cannot be rebutted or judged in the abstract. In some ways, as Holmes once remarked, every statute is unique. Whether a judge does violence to language in its total context is not always free from doubt. Statutes come out of the past and aim at the future. They may carry implicit residues or mere hints of purpose. Perhaps the most delicate aspect of statutory construction is not to find more residues than are implicit nor purposes beyond the bound of hints. Even for a judge most sensitive to the traditional limitation of his function, this is a matter for judgment not always easy of answer. But a line does exist between omission and what Holmes called "misprision or abbreviation that does not conceal the purpose." ¹⁶ Judges may differ as to the point at which the line should be drawn, but the only sure safeguard against crossing the line between adjudication and legislation is an alert recognition of the necessity not to cross it and instinctive, as well as trained, reluctance to do so.

In those realms where judges directly formulate law because the chosen lawmakers have not acted, judges have the duty of adaptation and adjustment of old principles to new conditions. But where policy is expressed by the primary law-making agency in a democracy, that is by the legislature, judges must respect such expressions by adding to or subtracting from the explicit terms which the lawmakers use no more than is called for by the shorthand nature of language. Admonitions like that of Justice Brandeis in the Iselin case that courts should leave even desirable enlargement to Congress will not by itself furnish the meaning appropriate for the next statute under scrutiny. But as is true of other important principles, the intensity with which it is believed may be decisive of the outcome. . . .

Proliferation of Purpose

You may have observed that I have not yet used the word "intention." All these years I have avoided speaking of the "legislative intent" and I shall continue to be on my guard against using it. The objection to "intention" was indicated in a letter by Mr. Justice Holmes which the recipient kindly put at my disposal:

"Only a day or two ago—when counsel talked of the intention of a legislature, I was indiscreet enough to say I don't care what their intention was. I only want to know what the words mean. Of course the phrase often is used to express a conviction not exactly thought out—that you construe a particular clause or expression by considering the whole instrument and any dominant purposes that it may express. In fact intention is a residuary clause intended to gather up whatever other aids there may be to interpretation beside the particular words and the dictionary."

If that is what the term means, it is better to use a less beclouding characterization. Legislation has an aim; it seeks to obviate some mischief, to supply an inadequacy, to effect a change of policy, to formulate a plan of government. That aim, that policy is not drawn, like nitrogen, out of the air; it is evinced in the language of the statute, as read in the light of other external manifestations of purpose. That is what the judge must seek and effectuate, and he ought not to be led off the trail by tests that have overtones of subjective design. We are not concerned with anything subjective. We do not delve into the mind of legislators or their draftsmen, or committee members. Against what he believed to be such an attempt Cardozo once protested:

"The judgment of the court, if I interpret the reasoning aright, does not rest upon a ruling that Congress would have gone beyond its power if the purpose that it professed was the purpose truly cherished. The judgment of the court rests upon the ruling that another purpose, not professed, may be read beneath the surface, and by the purpose so imputed the statute is destroyed. Thus the process of psychoanalysis has spread to unaccustomed fields. There is a wise and ancient doctrine that a court will not inquire into the motives of a legislative body. . . . " ²⁸

The difficulty in many instances where a problem of meaning arises is that the enactment was not directed towards the troubling question. The problem might then be stated, as once it was by Mr. Justice Cardozo, "which choice is it the more likely that Congress would have made?" ²⁹ While in its context the significance and limitations of this question are clear, thus to frame the question too often tempts inquiry into the subjective and might seem to warrant the court in giving answers based on an unmanifested legislative state of mind. But the purpose which a court must effectuate is not that which Congress should have enacted, or would have. It is that which it did enact, however inaptly, because it may fairly be said to be imbedded in the statute, even if a specific manifestation was not thought of, as is often the very reason for casting a statute in very general terms. . . .

Search for Purpose

How then does the purpose which a statute expresses reveal itself, particularly when the path of purpose is not straight and narrow? The English courts say: look at the statute and look at nothing else. . . .

The rigidity of English courts in interpreting language merely by reading it disregards the fact that enactments are, as it were, organisms which exist in their environment. One wonders whether English judges are confined psychologically as they purport to be legally. The judges deem themselves limited to reading the words of a statute. But can they really escape placing the words in the context of their minds, which after all are not automata applying legal logic but repositories of all sorts of assumptions and impressions? Such a modest if not mechanical view of the task of construction disregards legal history. In earlier centuries the judges recognized that the exercise of their judicial function to understand and apply legislative policy is not to be hindered by artificial canons and limitations. The well known resolutions in Heydon's Case,³³ have the flavor of Elizabethan English but they express the substance of a current volume of U. S. Reports as to the considerations relevant to statutory interpretation. To be sure, early English legislation helped ascertainment of purpose by explicit recitals; at least to the extent of defining the mischief against which the enactment was directed. . . .

When not so long ago the Parliamentary mechanism was under scrutiny of the Lord Chancellor's Committee, dissatisfaction was expressed with the prevailing practice of English courts not to go outside the statutes. It was urged that the old practise of preambles be restored or that a memorandum of explanation go with proposed legislation.³⁶

At the beginning, the Supreme Court reflected the early English attitude. With characteristic hardheadedness Chief Justice Marshall struck at the core of the matter with the observation "Where the mind labours to discover the design of the legislature, it seizes everything from which aid can be derived."³⁷ This commonsensical way of dealing with statutes fell into disuse, and more or less catchpenny canons of construction did service instead. To no small degree a more wooden treatment of legislation was due, I suspect, to the fact that the need for keeping vividly in mind the occasions for drawing on all aids in the process of distilling meaning from legislation was comparatively limited. As the area of regulation steadily widened, the impact of the legislative process upon the judicial brought into being, and compelled consideration of, all that convincingly illumines an enactment, instead of merely that which is called, with delusive simplicity, "the end result." Legislatures themselves provided illumination by general definitions, special definitions, explicit recitals of policy, and even directions of attitudes appropriate for judicial construction. Legislative reports were increasingly drawn upon, statements by those in charge of legislation, reports of investigating committees, recommendations of agencies entrusted with the enforcement of laws, etc. When Mr. Justice Holmes came to the Court, the U. S. Reports were practically barren of references to legislative materials. These swarm in current volumes. And let me say in passing that the importance that such materials play in Supreme Court litigation carry far-reaching implications for bench and bar. . . .

Unhappily, there is no table of logarithms for statutory construction. No item of evidence has a fixed or even average weight. One or another may be decisive in one set of circumstances, while of little value elsewhere. A painstaking, detailed report by a Senate Committee bearing directly on the immediate question may settle the matter. A loose statement even by a chairman of a committee, made impromptu in the heat of debate, less informing in cold type than when heard on the floor, will hardly be accorded the weight of an encyclical.

Spurious use of legislative history must not swallow the legislation so as to give point to the quip that only when legislative history is doubtful do you go to the statute. While courts are no longer confined to the language, they are still confined by it. Violence must not be done to the words chosen by the legislature. Unless indeed no doubt can be left that the legislature has in fact used a private code, so that what appears to be violence to language is merely respect to special usage. In the end, language and external aids, each accorded the authority deserved in the circumstances, must be weighed in the balance of judicial judgment. Only if its premises are emptied of their human variables, can the process of statutory construction have the precision of a syllogism. We cannot avoid what Mr. Justice Cardozo deemed inherent in the problem of construction, making "a choice between uncertainties. We must be content to choose the lesser." But to the careful and disinterested eye, the scales will hardly escape appearing to tip slightly on the side of a more probable meaning.

Canons of Construction

Nor can canons of construction save us from the anguish of judgment. Such canons give an air of abstract intellectual compulsion to what is in fact a delicate judgment, concluding a complicated process of balancing subtle and elusive elements. All our three Justices have at one time or another leaned on the crutch of a canon. But they have done so only rarely, and with a recognition that these rules of construction are not in any true sense rules of law. So far as valid, they are what Mr. Justice Holmes called them, axioms of experience. . . .

Insofar as canons of construction are generalizations of experience, they all have worth. In the abstract, they rarely arouse controversy. Difficulties emerge when canons compete in soliciting judgment, because they conflict rather than converge. For the demands of judgment underlying the art of interpretation, there is no vademecum. . . .

FITTING LEGISLATION INTO A UNIFIED LEGAL SYSTEM

SECTION 1. INTRODUCTORY

ROSCOE POUND, COMMON LAW AND LEGISLATION

21 HARV. L. REV. 383, 385-6, 406-7 (1908) *

Four ways may be conceived of in which courts in such a legal system as ours might deal with a legislative innovation. (1) They might receive it fully into the body of the law as affording not only a rule to be applied but a principle from which to reason, and hold it, as a later and more direct expression of the general will, of superior authority to judge-made rules on the same general subject; and so reason from it by analogy in preference to them. (2) They might receive it fully into the body of the law to be reasoned from by analogy the same as any other rule of law, regarding it, however, as of equal or co-ordinate authority in this respect with judge-made rules upon the same general subject. (3) They might refuse to receive it fully into the body of the law and give effect to it directly only; refusing to reason from it by analogy but giving it, nevertheless, a liberal interpretation to cover the whole field it was intended to cover. (4) They might not only refuse to reason from it by analogy and apply it directly only, but also give to it a strict and narrow interpretation, holding it down rigidly to those cases which it covers expressly. The fourth hypothesis represents the orthodox common law attitude towards legislative innovations. Probably the third hypothesis, however, represents more nearly the attitude toward which we are tending. The second and first hypotheses doubtless appeal to the common law lawyer as absurd. He can hardly conceive that a rule of statutory origin may be treated as a permanent part of the general body of the law. But it is submitted that the course of legal development upon which we have entered already must lead us to adopt the method of the second and eventually the method of the first hypothesis. . . .

Formerly it was argued that common law was superior to legislation because it was customary and rested upon the consent of the governed. Today we recognize that the so-called custom is a custom of judicial decision, not a custom of popular action. We recognize that legislation is the more truly democratic form of law-making. We see in legislation the more direct and accurate expression of the general will. We are told that law-making of the future will consist in putting the sanction of society on what has been worked out in the sociological laboratory. That courts cannot conduct such laboratories is self evident. Courts are fond of saying that they apply old principles to new situations. But at times they must apply new principles to situations both old and new. The new principles are in legislation. The old principles are in common law. The former are as much to be respected and made effective as the latter—probably more so as our legislation improves. The public cannot be relied upon permanently to tolerate judicial obstruction or nullification of the social policies to which more and more it is compelled to be committed.

HARLAN F. STONE, THE COMMON LAW IN THE UNITED STATES*

50 Harv.L.Rev. 4, 12-16 (1936); The Future of the Common Law, 1937 (Harvard Univ. Press), 130-135.¹

The reception which the courts have accorded to statutes presents a curiously illogical chapter in the history of the common law. Notwithstanding their genius for the generation of new law from that already established, the common-law courts have given little recognition to statutes as starting points for judicial law-making comparable to judicial decisions. They have long recognized the supremacy of statutes over judge-made law, but it has been the supremacy of a command to be obeyed according to its letter, to be treated as otherwise of little consequence. The fact that the command involves recognition of a policy by the supreme lawmaking body has seldom been regarded by courts as significant, either as a social datum or as a point of departure for the process of judicial reasoning by which the common law has been expanded.

The attitude of our courts toward statute law presents a contrast to that of the civilians who have been more ready to regard statutes in the light of the thesis of the civil law that its precepts are statements of general principles, to be used as guides to decision. Under that system a new statute may be viewed as an exemplification of a general principle which is to take its place beside other precepts, whether found in codes or accepted expositions of the jurists, as an integral part of the system, there to be extended to analogous situations not within its precise terms. With the modern practice of drawing a statute as a statement of a general rule, I can perceive no obstacle which need have precluded our adoption of a similar attitude except our unfamiliarity with the civilian habit of thought. The Scottish law, with its Roman law foundation, took this position, and the House of Lords, common-law learning and background notwithstanding, found no difficulty in approving it as applied to local statutes, in passing on appeals from the Scottish courts.

But quite apart from such a possibility, I can find in the history and principles of the common law no adequate reason for our failure to treat a statute much more as we treat a judicial precedent, as both a declaration and a source of law, and as a premise for legal reasoning. We have done practically that with our ancient statutes, such as the statutes of limitations, frauds and wills, readily molding them to fit new conditions within their spirit, though not their letter, possibly because their antiquity tends to make us forget or minimize their legislative origin. . . . Apart from its command, the social policy and judgment, expressed in legislation by the lawmaking agency which is supreme, would seem to merit that judicial recognition which is freely accorded to the like expression in judicial precedent. But only to a limited extent do modern courts feel free, by resort to standards of conduct set up by legislation, to impose liability or attach consequences for the failure to maintain those or similar standards in similar but not identical situations, or to make the statutory recognition of a new type of right the basis for the judicial creation of rights in circumstances not dissimilar. . . . The legislative function has been reduced to mere rule making by the process of narrow judicial interpretation of statutes, and in consequence of the renunciation by the courts, where statutes are concerned, of some of their own lawmaking powers.

That such has been the course of the common law in the United States seems to be attributable to the fact that, long before its important legislative expansion, the theories of Coke and Blackstone of the self-sufficiency and ideal perfection of the common law, and the notion of the separation of powers and of judicial independence, had come to dominate our juristic thinking. The statute was looked upon as in the law but not of it, a formal rule to be obeyed, it is true, since it is the command of the sovereign, but to be obeyed grudgingly, by construing it narrowly and treating it as though it did not exist for any purpose other than that embraced within the strict construction of its words. It is difficult to appraise the consequences of the perpetuation of incongruities and injustices in the law by this habit of narrow construction of statutes and by the failure to recognize that, as recognitions of social policy, they are as significant and rightly as much a part of the law, as the rules declared by judges. A generation ago no feature of our law administration tended quite so much to discredit law and lawyers in the lay mind. A narrow literalism too often defeated the purpose of remedial legislation, while a seeming contest went on with the apparent purpose of ascertaining whether the legislatures would ultimately secure a desired reform or the courts would succeed in resisting it.

Happily the abrasive effect of the never-ending judicial labor of making a workable system of our law, so largely composed of statutes, is bringing about a more liberal attitude on the part of the courts. Fortunately, too, law schools have begun to study and investigate the problem involved in an adequate union of judge-made with statute law. They are developing the underlying principles for its solution, which rest basically on a more adequate recognition that a statute is not an alien intruder in the house of the common law, but a guest to be welcomed and made at home there as a new and powerful aid in the accomplishment of its appointed task of accommodating the law to social needs. But there still remains much to be done. The better organization of judge-made and statute law into a coordinated system is one of the major problems of the common law in the United States. I would invite those who doubt to survey almost any new field of legislation and particularly to consider the published studies of the Law Revision Commission of the State of New York, disclosing the results of its five years' search of the laws of New York for inequitable and anachronistic rules.

Unfortunately we cannot revise ab initio our philosophy of interpretation of statutes, but we can still give them a more hospitable reception as an aid and not a detriment to the system of judge-made law, and we can turn to better account than we have our theory that statutes are commands, and the illusion that in interpreting them our only task is to discover the legislative will. We can at least let the statute reveal more fully the reasons for its enactment, and we can let its command prescribe the treatment which courts are to accord to it. I observe in recent statutes a revival of the ancient practice of stating in them the reasons for their enactment. The reasons were addressed, it is true, to the removal of constitutional doubts, but the practice can similarly be made an aid to construction. As the force of judicial decision is enhanced by the reasons given in support of it, so the union of statute with judge-made law may be aided by the statement of legislative reasons for its enactment, or by a more adequate preservation of the record of them in its legislative history. On occasion legislatures have made so bold as to direct that a statute shall be extended to cases plainly within its reason and spirit, though not within the strict letter, a practice which, if skillfully employed, may yet restore to courts a privilege which they renounced only because they have mistakenly regarded statutory enactments as in some degree less a part of the law than their own decisions.

NOTE

In Julius Stone, "The Province and Function of Law", (1946), the author states at p. 198: "The civilian variety of abuses of logic in statutory construction has been flavored in England by the deep rooted common law tradition of judicial hostility to legislation. It has indeed been suggested that this hostility itself derived from an aesthetic ideal of logical symmetry, elegantia, with which the court identifies the common law, and which it regards as disturbed when the legislature intervenes." (For citation of illustrative material see especially his footnotes 275-284.) The author continues: "It is submitted . . . that it is in professional thought-ways rather than in mere unconscious personal or even class prejudice that the main root of this phenomenon is to be sought, though the other causes cannot, as Scrutton, L. J., has observed, be lightly dismissed. . . ."

JOHN WILLIS, STATUTE INTERPRETATION IN A NUTSHELL

16 Can. Bar. Rev. 1, 17-18 (1938).*

Where the meaning of an expression is not clear, neither the literal rule nor the golden rule can have any application; for both of them do no more than assume a clear meaning and indicate what a court may do when the meaning is clear. Modern statutes, being for the use of laymen, are framed in wide and general language and consequently fall outside the ambit of these rules as to clear meaning: in dealing with them a court will, after it has exhausted the device of its ordinary technique, usually find itself faced with the necessity of choosing between the "mischief rule" and the presumptions. The presumptions are of particular importance in three classes of statutes, which together account for almost the whole of contemporary legislation: they are social reform Acts, Acts imposing penalties and taxing Acts. It becomes important, therefore, to say something about the origin of the presumptions, and the way in which they are used by the courts today.

In origin the presumptions were, as the name indicates, canons of legislative intent. When the courts leaned against construing a section so as to exclude the subject from the courts or so as to bring him within a taxing section, they did so because shutting up the courts or imposing new taxes was something legislatures were not in the habit of doing. The doctrine of stare decisis erected this leaning of the courts into rules of the common law relating to the interpretation of statutes. But times have changed and today finality of administrative decrees and a whole host of taxes are mere commonplaces. If, in 1937, a court resorts to these old presumptions, it is doing something very different from attempting to ascertain the probable intention of the legislature, it is flying in the face of the legislature. Only one conclusion can be drawn from the present judicial addiction to the ancient presumptions and that is that the presumptions have no longer anything to do with the intent of the legislature; they are a means of controlling that intent. Together they form a sort of common law "Bill of Rights." English and Canadian judges have no power to declare Acts unconstitutional merely because they depart from the good old ways of thought; they can, however, use the presumptions to mould legislative innovation into some accord with the old notions. The presumptions are in short "an ideal constitution" for England and Canada.

By origin devices for ascertaining the intent of the legislature, by present practice devices for controlling it, the presumptions are affected by all the uncertainty in application which is inherent in a device, and in addition by further uncertainties derived from their present dual position as canons of legislative intent and weapons of judicial control. Hence comes a variety of problems. First, the effect of a change in legislative practice on the status of a presumption—will a court meet the reversal of a legislative policy with a weakening of the relevant presumption, or with a more rigorous application of it, or with no change at all? What effect, for instance, will the recent increase in the number of taxing Acts have upon the traditional attitude of the courts towards them? Second, what will a court do in a case in which there is a conflict of presumptions: what, for instance, will it do when the leaning of the courts in favour of personal liberty is met by their desire to protect the existence of the state in wartime, or when the leaning in favour of the constitutionality of legislative Acts conflicts with their desire to protect the subject from taxation? Third, on what occasions, if ever, will a court disregard a conventional canon of legislative intent in favour of an attempt to effectuate the actual social purpose of the Act; when, that is, will it counter a presumption with the "mischievous rule"?

In guessing what your court will do with an ambiguous expression you should therefore always ask yourself three questions: (1) is the relevant presumption coming into increasing use, declining, or is it in a state of uncertainty: (2) are there any circumstances in your case which might make the judges desert the ordinarily relevant presumption in favour of another: (3) are the members of your court aware of the purpose for which the Act was passed, and if so are they in sympathy with it?

ROBINSON'S CASE

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1881.
131 Mass. 376, 41 Am.Rep. 239.

GRAY, C. J. The question presented by this petition, and by the report on which it has been reserved for our determination, is whether, under the laws of the Commonwealth, an unmarried woman is entitled to be examined for admission as an attorney and counsellor of this court.

This being the first application of the kind in Massachusetts, the court, desirous that it should be fully argued, informed the executive committee of the Bar Association of the city of Boston of the application, and has received elaborate briefs from the petitioner in support of her petition, and from two gentlemen of the bar as amici curiae in opposition thereto.

The statute under which the application is made is as follows: "A citizen of this State, or an alien who has made the primary declaration of his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and who is an inhabitant of this State, of the age of twenty-one years and of good moral character, may, on the recommendation of an attorney, petition the Supreme Judicial or Superior Court to be examined for admission as an attorney, whereupon the court shall assign a time and place for the examination, and if satisfied with his acquirements and qualifications he shall be admitted." St.1876, c. 197.

The word "citizen," when used in its most common and most comprehensive sense, doubtless includes women; but a woman is not, by virtue of her citizenship, vested by the Constitution of the United States, or by the Constitution of the Commonwealth, with any absolute right, independent of legislation, to take part in the government, either as a voter or as an officer, or to be admitted to practice as an attorney. . . .

The rule that "words importing the masculine gender may be applied to females," like all other general rules of construction of statutes, must yield when such construction would be either "repugnant to the context of the same statute," or "inconsistent with the manifest intent of the Legislature." Gen.Sts. c. 3, sec. 7.

The intention of the Legislature in enacting a particular statute is not to be ascertained by interpreting the statute by itself alone, and according to the mere literal meaning of its words. Every statute must be construed in connection with the whole system of which it forms part, and in the light of the common law and of previous statutes upon the same subject. And the Legislature is not to be lightly presumed to have intended to reverse the policy of its predecessors or to introduce a fundamental change in long-established principles of law.

By the law of England, which was our law from the first settlement of the country until the American Revolution, the Crown, with all its inherent rights and prerogatives, might indeed descend to a woman or to an infant; but, under the degree of a queen, no woman, married or unmarried, could take part in the government of the state. Women could not sit in the House of Commons or the House of Lords, nor vote for members of Parliament. 4 Inst. 5. Countess of Rutland's case, 6 Rep. 52 b. Chorlton v. Lings, L.R. 4 C.P. 374, 391, 392. They could not take part in the administration of justice, either as judges or as jurors, with the single exception of inquiries by a jury of matrons upon a suggestion of pregnancy. . . .

There is nothing in the action of the Legislature or of the Judiciary of the Commonwealth which has any tendency to prove such a change in the law and usage prevailing at the time of our separation from the mother country as to admit women to the exercise of any office that concerns the administration of justice.

In 1871 the Governor and Council required the opinion of the justices of this court, under c. 3, art. 2, of the Constitution of the Commonwealth, upon the following questions: "First. Under the Constitution of this Commonwealth, can a woman, if duly appointed and qualified as a justice of the peace, legally perform all acts pertaining to such office? Second. Under the laws of this Commonwealth, would oaths and acknowledgments of deeds, taken before a married or unmarried woman, duly appointed and qualified as a justice of the peace, be legal and valid?" Although the provisions of the Constitution and statutes of the Commonwealth regarding the office of justice of the peace, while they do not mention women, are not in terms limited to men, yet the justices answered both the questions proposed in the negative, for the following reasons: "By the Constitution of the Commonwealth, the office of justice of the peace is a judicial office, and must be exercised by the officer in person, and a woman, whether married or unmarried, cannot be appointed to such an office. The law of Massachusetts at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, the whole frame and purport of the instrument itself, and the universal understanding and unbroken practical construction for the greater part of a century afterwards, all support this conclusion, and are inconsistent with any other. It follows that, if a woman should be formally appointed and commissioned as a justice of the peace, she would have no constitutional or legal authority to exercise any of the functions appertaining to that office." Opinion of Justices, 107 Mass. 604.

Whenever the Legislature has intended to make a change in the legal rights or capacities of women, it has used words clearly manifesting its intent and the extent of the change intended. . . .

It is hardly necessary to add that our duty is limited to declaring the law as it is, and that whether any change in that law would be wise or expedient is a question for the legislative and not for the judicial department of the government.

Petition dismissed.

BENJAMIN N. CARDOZO, THE PARADOXES OF LEGAL SCIENCE

New York: 1928. Columbia University Press 9-10

The truth is that many of us, bred in common law traditions, view statutes with a distrust which we may deplore, but not deny. This has led . . . to the maxim of construction that statutes derogating from the common law are to be strictly construed, a maxim which recalls what has been said by Sir Frederick Pollock of rules of statutory construction generally: they cannot well be accounted for except on the theory that the legislature generally changes the law for the worse, and that the business of the judges is to keep the mischief of its interference within the narrowest possible bounds.

CORAL GABLES v. CHRISTOPHER

Supreme Court of Vermont, 1937. 108 Vt. 414, 189 A 147, 109 A.L.R. 474.

POWERS, CHIEF JUSTICE. The plaintiff seeks to recover on a promissory note executed in Florida on October 30, 1925, on which the last payment was made on September 3, 1926. The suit was brought on June 12, 1935. The complaint counts upon the note and contains a copy of it. The defendant's answer sets up our six-year statute of limitations (P.L. 1648) as a bar to the action. To this answer, the plaintiff demurs.

There appears on the face of the note, after the defendant's signature, the printed word "seal" in parentheses. The only question for our consideration is whether this is enough to make the note a specialty within the meaning of P.L. 1645. . . . That the instrument before us is not a common-law specialty seems plain enough. A "specialty" in a common-law sense is a writing sealed and delivered—a contract under seal. Brainard v. Stewart, 33 Vt. 402, 404. The common law required that a seal be of wax or a wafer or something which would take an impression. The word "seal" after a signature is not enough to make the instrument a specialty at common law. Beardsley v. Knight, 4 Vt. 471, 479. It is quite true that the ancient dignity and importance of a seal has been much affected by statutes and long usage in some of the states, and the seal has been wholly abolished in others. Our own Legislature has modified the law of seals since the case last cited was decided. P.L. 35 provides that when the private seal of a person or corporation is required on an instrument or writing to make such instrument or writing legal and valid, such seal shall consist of "an impression . . . or the word 'seal' or the letters 'L. S.' opposite the signature."

The question before us comes down to a proper construction of this statute.

The defendant contends that it means just what it says; that is, that the word "seal" added to the signature is a valid seal only when it appears on an instrument which the law requires to be executed under the seal of the signer, like a deed, for instance. The plaintiff maintains that the section means just what it would if it read, "when the private seal of a person . . . is required on an instrument or writing to make such instrument or writing legal and valid as a sealed instrument," etc.

That this statute is in derogation of the common law is plain enough, for it changes that law to a material extent at least. How far it changes it is the question we must decide. This depends upon the intention of the Legislature as expressed in the act creating the change. That "the intention of the law-maker constitutes the law," Atkins v. Fiber Disintegrating Co., 18 Wall. 272, 301, 21 L.Ed. 841, 844, is a terse and familiar statement of the rule governing the construction of statutory law. It is the pole-star in the construction of a statute. Simonds v. Powers' Estate, 28 Vt. 354, 355. To aid in ascertaining that intention, certain rules have been adopted, one of which, predicated upon what is regarded as a matter of wise policy, is that statutes in derogation of the common law are to be strictly construed. . . .

The rule of strict construction of such statutes is very generally adopted. A few of the cases now at hand may be here referred to. Thus it is said that a statute in derogation of the common law, or which affects a common-law right will be strictly construed, and will not change the common law or common-law rights, unless an intention to effect such change plainly appears from the express words of the statute or by necessary implication. [Citing cases.]

Such statutes "cannot be extended beyond the words used," says the United States Supreme Court. Brunswick Terminal Co. v. National Bank, 192 U.S. 386, 24 S.Ct. 314, 316, 48 L.Ed. 491, 493.

Since this case was argued, the November number of the Harvard Law Review has come to hand. It contains (page 4) an interesting and instructive article on the "Common Law in the United States," by Mr. Justice Stone of the Federal Supreme Court. Therein, he makes reference to what he evidently regards as the hostile attitude of the courts to acts of the Legislatures. He gives approval (page 15) to the idea that "a statute is not an alien intruder in the house of common law, but a guest to be welcomed and made at home there as a new and powerful aid in the accomplishment of its appointed task of accommodating the law to social needs." He appears to regret that we cannot revise ab initio our philosophy of interpretation of statutes, but suggests that we can give them a more hospitable reception as an aid to judge-made law, can turn to better account than we have our theory that statutes are commands, and "the illusion that in interpreting them our only task is to discover the legislative will." If this means, as it seems to, that the true function of the court is not only to ascertain the intent of the Legislature, but also to expand that intention, and, by construction, make it apply to and effect cognate and related cases not within the terms of the act in question, it would result in a complete overturn of the established theory of statutory construction, and very largely increase the output of judicial legislation. Whether such results would be desirable we need not now consider. We are satisfied that no court has yet given approval to such theories. Certainly, that is not the law of this court. It is not the law of the great court of which Mr. Justice Stone is a distinguished member. This appears from what we have already said and from the cases already cited, to which we may add Brown v. Barry, 3 Dall. 365, 1 L.Ed. 638; Ransom v. Williams, 2 Wall. 313, 17 L.Ed. 803; Ross v. Jones, 22 Wall. 576, 22 L.Ed. 730, 735; Nudd v. Burrows, 91 U.S. 426, 23 L.Ed. 286, 290.

We are unable to say that the Legislature intended that the provisions of P.L. 35 should apply to cases not within its terms. If it had, it would have been a very simple matter to have expressed it in the act. It is very plain that the note before us is not covered by the terms of the act, and under the rule herein discussed we cannot construe the act in a way to include it.

We hold, therefore, that the six-year limitation was well pleaded, and the judgment was correct. . . .

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE

In State v. M., St. P. & S. S. M. Ry. Co., 190 Minn. 162, 165, 251 N.W. 275 (1933), Stone, J., said: "That rule (that statutes in derogation of the common law are to be strictly construed), although an ancient working tool of adjudication, is not altogether obsolete. On occasion it is a convenient and appropriate instrument in adjusting a new rule of statute so that it will work smoothly in reciprocal operation with the old machinery of the common law. But the rule is misused, inexcusably and dangerously so, when it disguises extra-constitutional obstacles to, or hindrances of, legislative purpose. . . . Judges have neither higher function, nor more pressing duty, than to ascertain and give full scope to declared legislative policy when within the competency of the enacting body." See comment on this case in 14 Ore.L.Rev. 290 (1935).

TEDERS v. ROTHERMEL

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1939. 205 Minn. 470, 286 N.W. 353.

STONE, JUSTICE. Action for personal injuries. From an order sustaining a demurrer to one part of his answer, defendant appeals.

The complaint avers as follows. In July, 1937, plaintiff, defendant, and two others planned a motor trip. The common intent was to travel from Omaha, Nebraska, to Florida and return, in defendant's car. There was in advance an agreement that each would pay one-fourth of the cost of the needed gasoline and oil. Accordingly each of the four did contribute to a fund from which those expenses were paid. In Florida plaintiff was injured in a collision caused by defendant's negligence.

Defendant answered, admitting the common purpose of the parties and their agreement to share expense of gasoline and oil, but setting out the Florida "guest" statute as one defense. The demurrer to that defense was sustained.

I General Laws, Florida, 1937, c. 18033, § 1, provides: ". . . no person, transported by the owner or operator of a motor vehicle as his guest or passenger, without payment for such transportation, shall have a cause of action for damages against such owner or operator for injury . . . unless . . . caused by the gross negligence or wilful and wanton misconduct of the owner or operator. . . ."

The one question now is whether plaintiff was being carried as a "guest or passenger, without payment for such transportation." To our regret and embarrassment there is no Florida case to rule construction. But many similar statutes of other states have been judicially construed. Determination of the factors distinguishing between a mere gratuitous guest or passenger on the one hand, and, on the other, one who makes "payment" for his transportation, has not resulted in unanimity of judicial expression. The statutes present differences in phraseology which in some cases have been considered conclusive. Counsel have been unable to reduce the decisions to a rational classification so as to put them in reconcilable categories.

We refrain from any such attempt and simply do our best to determine the intention of the Florida statute. . . .

1. At the outset, we do not consider ourselves at liberty to apply any rule of "strict construction" to this or any other statute, simply because it happens to be in derogation of common law. Legislatures intend by such statutes to replace or change rules of the common law. Too much judicial indulgence in "strict construction" of statutes has heretofore disguised "extraconstitutional obstacles to, or hindrances of, legislative purpose." . . .

However radical the change, we do not permit ourselves, because it is an innovation, so to limit a statute by construction as to defeat or even hinder its purpose. Our effort is rather to give any statute "a fair construction, with the purpose of its enactment in view, not narrowed or restricted because it is a substitute for the discarded common law." Wells-Dickey Trust Co. v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 159 Minn. 417, 199 N.W. 101, 103. It is with that rule, rather than any notion either of duty or right to construe strictly, as a guide, that we attempt interpretation of the Florida statute.

2. To be within its reach the rider in the car of another must not only be "guest or passenger," but also riding "without payment for such transportation." It is significant that the thing determinative is not "hire" or "compensation," but "payment." "Compensation," accurately used, means payment in money, or other benefit, which will compensate in the strict sense, that is make even, or be measurably the equivalent of that for which it is given. Kerstetter v. Elfman, supra. "Hire" might apply only where both machine and driver are hired for the occasion.

The words of the Florida law can properly be given no such narrow scope. Payment is all that is required. The amount of money or other thing constituting the payment need not compensate or make even, nor need it be given, in the technical sense, as "hire" of driver and car. Any sum agreed upon as payment and paid, as under the facts presented by these pleadings, amounts to payment for transportation so as to prevent application of the statute.

That follows because the purpose of the agreement disclosed by the pleadings was on the one hand to assure plaintiff and the other passengers the right to travel as such in defendant's car on the southern jaunt which all were to enjoy. In return, the benefit to defendant was the substantial reduction of three-fourths of the amount which otherwise would have come out of his own pocket for fuel and lubricants. It is not persuasive for the opposite view that he got nothing for use of his car or his own services as chauffeur. The money he received was nonetheless "payment" because it was not compensatory payment for all the items of car use and driving which defendant furnished. Payment for plaintiff's transportation there was. That, in our view, was enough to take the case outside the operation of the Florida statute.

The demurrer was properly sustained, and the order is affirmed.

O'DAY v. PEOPLE

Supreme Court of Colorado, 1946. 114 Colo. 373, 166 P.2d 789.

ALTER, JUSTICE. An information containing three counts was filed in the district court charging William O'Day, alias George C. Lane, alias James J. Stewart, in the first count thereof with aggravated robbery, and in the second and third counts with having been convicted of violations of "the Burglary Statutes" of the states of California and Missouri, respectively, so as to bring him within the provisions of sections 551, 552 and 554, chapter 48, '35 C.S.A., if he was convicted of the offense charged in the first count of the information. The jury returned a verdict finding the defendant "guilty of aggravated robbery as charged in the information." A motion for a new trial was interposed and overruled and no error is assigned to such ruling. Defendant was sentenced to confinement in the state penitentiary "at hard labor, for the remainder of his natural life."

Defendant sued out a writ of error and his assignments may be comprehended in the brief statement, that, under the record, the trial court was without authority to impose a life sentence. . . .

The statute (section 84, supra) provides that one found guilty of aggravated robbery ". . . shall be confined in the penitentiary for a term of not less than two years, or for life. . . ." If the trial judge construed this statute as authorizing the imposition of a life sentence for aggravated robbery and acted accordingly in pronouncing the sentence herein, we believe his action is unprecedented and that error was committed.

Section 545, chapter 48, '35 C.S.A., provides: "When a convict is sentenced to the state penitentiary, otherwise than for life, for an offense or crime committed after the passage of this subdivision, the court imposing the sentence shall not fix a definite term of imprisonment, but shall establish a maximum and a minimum term for which said convict may be held in said prison. The maximum term shall not be longer than the longest term fixed by law for the punishment of the offense of which he was convicted, and the minimum term shall not be less than the shortest term fixed by law for the punishment of the offense of which he was convicted."

Section 545, supra, was enacted in 1899 and clearly indicates that it was the general policy of the legislature to favor the fixing of minimum and maximum sentences for the violation of state criminal statutes. Obviously, if the statute makes the imposition of a life sentence mandatory upon the conviction of some offense, there can be neither a minimum nor maximum term as section 545, supra, contemplates. It will be noted that the statute (section 84, supra) reads, “. . . not less than two years, or for life.” Historically it may be of interest to note that this penalty for aggravated robbery first came into our statutes by an amendment in 1907, since which time the penalty for the violation of the statute.

We are convinced that the phrase “not less than two years, or for life” has been consistently construed by the courts to mean a term of two years to life, and we are supported in this construction by the following decisions in our own courts where convictions were obtained for aggravated robbery. Funk v. People, 90 Colo. 167, 7 P.2d 823, ten to eleven years; Rowan v. People, 93 Colo. 473, 26 P.2d 1066, five to seven years; Dockerty v. People, 96 Colo. 338, 44 P.2d 1013, twenty-five to thirty years. These sentences indicate that courts heretofore construing section 84, supra, have consistently imposed sentences as if the statute had read, “a minimum of two years to a maximum of life.” The legislature, by the enactment of section 545, supra, has indicated a general policy, and we believe it should be so construed as to carry that general policy into effect. It is a general rule of construction that criminal statutes shall be strictly construed, and in accordance therewith we hold that the penalty authorized under section 84, supra, is for a term of two years to life. The section does not authorize the imposition of a specific life sentence, and if the trial court construed it as authorizing the imposition of such a sentence, it committed error. . . .

Of. Chatwin v. United States, supra, p. 1129.

UNITED STATES v. GASKIN

Supreme Court of the United States, 1944.
320 U.S. 527, 64 S.Ct. 318, 38 L.Ed. 287.

MR. JUSTICE ROBERTS delivered the opinion of the Court.

An indictment was returned against the appellee in the District Court for Northern Florida which charged that he arrested one Johnson “to a condition of peonage,” upon a claim that Johnson was indebted to him, and with intent to cause Johnson to perform labor in satisfaction of the debt, and that he forcibly arrested and detained Johnson against his will and transported him from one place to another within Florida. There was no allegation that Johnson rendered any labor or service in consequence of the arrest. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer, the United States appealed.

The charge is laid under § 269 of the Criminal Code, which is: “Whoever holds, arrests, returns, or causes to be held, arrested, or returned, or in any manner aids in the arrest or return of any person to a condition of peonage, shall be fined . . . or imprisoned”

The District Court held that the statute imposes no penalty for an arrest with intent the person arrested renders labor or service for a master following the arrest.

We think this was error. Section 269 derives from § 1 of the Act of March 2, 1867, which abolished and prohibited the system known as peonage in any territory or state, nullified any law, ordinance, regulation, or usage inconsistent with the prohibition, and added criminal sanctions in the language now constituting § 269. The Act was passed further to implement the Thirteenth Amendment and is directed at individuals whether or not acting under color of law or ordinance.

The section makes arrest of a person with intent to place him in a state of peonage a separate and independent offense. It penalizes "whoever holds, arrests, returns, or causes to be held, arrested, or returned . . . any person to a condition of peonage." The language is inartistic. The appropriate qualifying preposition for the word "holds" is "in." An accurate qualifying phrase for the verb "arrests" would be "to place in or return to" peonage. But the compactness of phrasing and the lack of strict grammatical construction does not obscure the intent of the Act. Years ago this Court indicated that the disjunctive phrasing imports that each of the acts,—holding, arresting, or returning,—may be the subject of indictment and punishment. We think that view is sound apart from any consideration of the legislative history of the enactment. But when viewed in its setting no doubt of the purpose of the statute remains.

The Act of 1867 was passed as the result of agitation in Congress for further legislation because of the use of federal troops to arrest persons who had escaped from a condition of peonage. The first section abolished and prohibited peonage and made certain practices in connection therewith criminal. The second section imposed a duty on all in the military and civil service to aid in the enforcement of the first, and provided that if any officer or other person in the military service should offend against the Act's provisions he should, upon conviction by a court martial, be dishonorably dismissed from the service. It is plain that arrest for the purpose of placing a person in or returning him to a condition of peonage was one of the evils to be suppressed.

The appellee invokes the rule that criminal laws are to be strictly construed and defendants are not to be convicted under statutes too vague to apprise the citizen of the nature of the offense. The principle, however, does not require distortion or nullification of the evident meaning and purpose of the legislation.

The judgment is reversed.

MR. JUSTICE MURPHY, dissenting. We are dealing here with a criminal statute, the penalties of which circumscribe personal freedom. Before we sanction the imposition of such penalties no doubts should exist as to the statutory prescription of the acts in question. Otherwise individuals are punished without having been adequately warned as to those actions which subjected them to liability.

It is doubtful whether an arrest not followed by actual peonage clearly and unmistakably falls within the prohibition of § 269 of the Criminal Code, 18 U.S.C.A. § 444. The court below, at least, felt that the statute did not cover such a situation. Other judges have expressed similar doubts. United States v. Eberhart, C.C., 127 F. 252; dissenting opinion in Taylor v. United States, 4 Cir., 244 F. 321, 332, 333. And in order to reach the opposite conclusion, this Court labels the statutory language as "inartistic" and as lacking in "strict grammatical construction." It then proceeds to rewrite the statute, in conformity with what it conceives to have been the original intention of Congress, so as to penalize "whoever . . . arrests . . . any person for the purpose of placing him in a condition of peonage." I cannot assent to this judicial revision of a criminal law. Congress alone has power to amend or clarify the criminal sanctions of a statute.

Apologia for inadequate legislative draftsmanship and reliance on the admitted evils of peonage cannot replace the right of each individual to a fair warning from Congress as to those actions for which penalties are inflicted. Punishment without clear legislative authority might conceivably contain more potential seeds of oppression than the arrest of a person "to a condition of peonage."

LIVINGSTON HALL, STRICT OR LIBERAL CONSTRUCTION OF PENAL STATUTES

48 Harv.L.Rev. 748, 756-768 (1935).

The common-law rule requires the strict construction of all penal statutes. The statutory rules, on the other hand, commonly require a liberalized construction of all penal statutes, or, at least, of all those found in the penal code. But the reasons given for the rules, while establishing that some penal statutes should be construed strictly, and some liberally, do not, and cannot, show that the same rule should be applied to all statutes. A brief analysis will make it clear that the result of either rule is a Procrustean bed, necessitating the undue extension, or decapitation, of those unlucky instances of legislative intent which do not naturally fit into the particular rule adopted.

For Strict Construction. Potentially the most serious argument is that the rule is founded "on the plain principle that the power of punishment is vested in the legislative, not in the judicial department."¹ For if this were true, a liberal construction statute would be an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power to the judiciary. But this objection is clearly unsound. Liberal construction does not involve going beyond the intention of the legislature. Want of power to depart from the legislative intent exists as clearly in remedial as in penal statutes; yet this objection has never been urged against a liberal construction of remedial statutes. Where liberal construction statutes have been passed, courts have never raised this objection to their enforcement, and only one court has doubted the power of the legislature to "direct the judiciary in the interpretation of existing statutes".

It has further been claimed that as the state makes the laws, they should be most strongly construed against it. But the contract analogy is weak, for the state is presumably acting in the public interest in enacting criminal statutes, and need not in every case be subjected to a rule of interpretation designed to secure justice between private parties. Nor can the rule be justly defended as a bulwark against tyranny in a country where both executive and legislature are elected by the people; the rule has never achieved the dignity of a constitutional amendment.

Obviously, the original reason for the growth of the rule, to mitigate the extension of capital felonies, no longer applies to all penal statutes, if indeed it was ever of such widespread application; this has often been recognized in states where the rule has been abrogated, and where this argument is still made, it has been limited to those few statutes carrying punishments believed by the courts to be disproportionately severe as compared with the acts sought to be punished.

There remains for consideration only Mr. Justice Holmes' statement in *McBoyle v. United States*² that it is "reasonable" for penal statutes to be construed to give "fair warning" of "what the law intends to do if a certain line is passed" in language "that the common world will understand". Why such warning should be needed in murder and theft, two crimes as to which Mr. Justice Holmes himself admits that "it is not likely that a criminal will carefully consider the text of the law before he murders or steals," or especially in transporting stolen property, as in the McBoyle case itself, where the offense was clearly a crime under the state laws, and the only question was as to federal prosecution, is far from self-evident.³ Even if "fair warning" had been called for in the particular case, as it undoubtedly is in many crimes, it was unnecessary to lay down a general rule. Simply because a liberal construction might work injustice in some cases is no proper reason for inflicting on the people the rule of strict construction in all cases.

For Liberal Construction. The argument for liberal construction of non-penal statutes has been put forcibly by Dean Pound nearly 20 years ago in an article concluding: "The public cannot be relied upon permanently to tolerate judicial obstruction or nullification of the social policies to which more and more it is compelled to be committed."⁴ This argument is equally applicable to penal statutes, except insofar as "political liberty requires clear and exact definition of the offense." The public is already impatient with the refined, and for practical purposes unnecessary, distinctions embodied in the penal codes. To make Hauptmann's conviction for murder in the first degree turn on whether the window in the nursery was open or shut, with the law until comparatively recently unsettled if the window were partially open, does not commend itself to the average man. Strict construction of such statutes has completed the degradation of the substantive criminal law in his mind,⁵ equaled in futility only by the disgraceful pyrotechnics with which the procedure is carried on in a cause celebre. An attitude of liberal construction goes far, on the other hand, to make the law appear rational.

Changing conditions of modern civilization, and the growth of scientific knowledge on criminology, render imperative a new approach to the problems of crime. New categories of crimes and criminals cannot always be accurately defined on the first attempt. Shall the

⁴ "Common Law and Legislation" (1908) 21 Harv.L.Rev. 383, 407.

⁵ See the biting criticism in Waite, Criminal Law in Action (1934) 16: "But for a century or more it has been the policy of the judiciary—a policy now gradually changing—to utilize casuistic plausibility or any dubiety of the situation for the benefit of the accused rather than for the immediate safety of society." This was apropos of the reversals of convictions in People v. Jaffe, 185 N.Y. 497, 78 N.E. 169 (1906), and People v. Rizzo, 246 N.Y. 334, 158 N.E. 888 (1927), upon a strict construction of the New York attempt statute; but it has general application new machinery be nullified from the start under the guise of "strict construction", or shall it be carried out liberally in the spirit in which it is conceived? Merely to state the issue is to answer it.

But this does not mean that all penal statutes should be liberally construed. Political liberty does require that people should be able to pursue certain types of conduct with definite assurance of the bounds of criminal liability.⁶ Carelessly drafted legislation may still require limitation to avoid unforeseen consequences. The doctrine of strict construction often returns like Banquo's ghost to trouble courts committed by legislation and decision to the principle that it has ceased to exist. Doubtless some courts have deliberately ignored their liberal construction statutes, preferring to hold to strict construction than to have to apply the new doctrine in all cases, with the inevitable occasional injustice which it would bring. Some compromise is necessary.

The conclusions which may be drawn from the foregoing are two-fold: first, that there is no sound reason for a general doctrine of strict construction of penal statutes, and prima facie all such should have as liberal a construction as statutes generally, and second, that certain penal statutes should be strictly construed to avoid injustice. These exceptions range themselves into a few fairly well defined categories.

⁶ Although there is usually a twilight zone between honest conduct and crime, in which the defendant should move at his peril, so that notice of the precise boundaries of the crime is not necessary to prevent injustice, this is by no means true of all penal statutes. For instance, Rehnecke v. People, 15 Ill.App. 241 (1884), where a mine owner paying his men by the day and using mining machinery was held not within a statute requiring mine owners to buy a track scale and weight their coal, the weight to be the basis on which wages of "persons mining coal" were to be computed; State v. Read, 102 Iowa 572, 144 N.W. 310 (1913), where an automobile driver with two lamps on the dashboard of his automobile was held not to violate a statute requiring "two lamps on the front" of the vehicle; State v. Prather, 79 Kan. 513, 100 P. 57 (1909), where a Sunday baseball game was held not within a statute prohibiting "horse racing, cock fighting, or playing at cards or games of any kind" on Sunday; State v. Hanchette, 88 Kan. 864, 129 P. 1184 (1913), where the selling of hydrogen pyroxide in a 5 and 10¢ store was held not within a statute prohibiting the sale of "medicine" in a store which had no registered pharmacist; Commonwealth v. Standard Oil Co., 129 Ky. 744, 112 S.W. 902 (1908), where filling customers' gasoline tanks weekly under standing orders was held not to be "peddling" under a statute requiring peddlers' licenses; State v. Sloan, 139 La. 881, 72 So. 428 (1916), where an additional flat service charge of 25¢ was held not within a statute imposing a penalty for charging "for more electricity" than the meter showed to have been used; Libby v. New York, N. H. & H. Ry., 273 Mass. 522, 174 N.E. 171 (1930), where use of a gasoline car with an air whistle by a railroad corporation was held not within a statute requiring "a steam whistle to be placed on each locomotive engine passing upon its railroad"; State v. Fisher, 53 Or. 38, 98 P. 713 (1908), where possession, during the closed season, of a deer killed during the open season was held not within a statute prohibiting possession of a deer "during the season when it is unlawful to take or handle such deer"; State v. Hoffman, 110 Wash. 82, 188 P. 24 (1920), where an owner of a gill net not catching any salmon was held not liable to a statutory penalty for not filing a "report . . . stating the number of salmon . . . caught"; State v. Herr, 151 Wash. 623, 276 P. 870 (1929), where a hunter killing an elk on October 20 was held not liable under a statute prohibiting killing elk except "between the 20th day of October and the first day of November".

Effect of a Disproportionate Penalty. A statute imposing a penalty which the court regards as disproportionately heavy for the acts committed can hardly escape a strict construction. It was with such statutes, taking away benefit of clergy, that the doctrine arose, and the history of the past four hundred years has amply proved that under such circumstances courts, juries, and even prosecutors will cooperate to defeat a clearly avowed "legislative will" by any available means. But a strict construction for this reason is often the fault of the courts, and not of needlessly severe legislation.

Courts are not always fully aware of the social interests at stake, or may lack the necessary "judicial humility" to bow to what may seem undue harshness on the part of the legislature, but a power of judicial limitation in these cases does exist, and is exercised. It would serve only to perpetuate an unnecessary conflict between principle and decision to ignore this tendency; hence, a cautious modification of the rule of liberal construction here seems proper.

Such a relaxation does not often involve real judicial interference with legislative policy. An extension of a statute by construction to cover acts as to which the penalty may reasonably be believed disproportionate would usually do violence to the intent of the legislature.

A careful distinction is necessary, however. It is not whether the penalty is light or heavy which should control, but whether it is disproportionately light or heavy as compared with the culpability of the conduct which is sought to be penalized.⁷ As a practical matter, the minimum penalty rather than the maximum should be important, at least where there is some protection against arbitrary action on the part of the trial judge by appeal on the ground that the sentence is excessive, as there is in England and a few states. If such appeal becomes common, or if some sentencing tribunal is provided in which the upper court has confidence, the widespread availability of probation and suspended sentence, and the low minimum penalty for most crimes even where these are not available, will largely do away with the necessity of this type of strict construction.

Where the existing penal sanctions seem to the courts to be grossly inadequate, great ingenuity is sometimes displayed in bringing about a conviction for some greater crime which only by analogy could cover the case. Here all that is necessary is to give those courts still controlled by the common-law rule the right to interpret the statutes liberally.

Effect of Honest Attempt at Compliance. Where an honest attempt is commonly made by those to whom the law applies to ascertain the precise limits of the legal sanction imposed, particularly in the regulation of business practices for the social welfare, indefiniteness is usually fatal to the enforcement of the law. It is unfair to those affected to inflict punishment, which is ex post facto by nature, for acts whose criminality was not readily apparent before the commission of the crime, where the honest motives of the defendant cannot be questioned, as is true in many crimes. And a mistake as to the proper interpretation of the statute itself is never a defense.⁸

Strict construction plays an important part in preventing this injustice. Grammar and deductive logic, narrowly applied, give a reasonably certain clue to the meaning of most statutes, but it is difficult to forecast with any approach to certainty the limits of liberal interpretation.

The New York Court of Appeals is almost the only court which has seen this problem and attempted to solve it. There have been two lines of decision: that ordinarily penal statutes are to be liberally construed, as required by the New York construction statute, and that certain statutes are to be strictly construed, since "The citizen is entitled to an unequivocal warning before conduct on his part, which is not malum in se, can be made the occasion of a deprivation of his liberty or property."⁹

The use of the phrase "malum in se" by the New York court is unfortunate; with so many different applications to different problems, it has long since lost any settled meaning, if indeed it ever had any. But the principle upon which the New York court is acting is clear. Where the conduct of the accused is not consciously directed against the interests of others, and is criminal only because deemed by the legislature to be contrary to general social policy, he should be given "fair warning" of the existence of those interests and the sanctions imposed to protect them. An analysis of the New York cases on this matter brings this out clearly.

⁸ State v. Foster, 22 R.I. 163, 46 A. 833 (1900); see Keedy, "Ignorance and Mistake in the Criminal Law" (1918) 22 Harv.L.Rev. 75.

⁹ People v. Phylfe, 136 N.Y. 554, 559, 32 N.E. 978, 979 (1893), quoted with approval in People v. Shakun, 251 N.Y. 107, 114, 167 N.E. 187, 189 (1929). Another statement of this distinction is found in People v. Stoll, 242 N.Y. 453, 152 N.E. 259 (1926): "It [the legislature] may impose penal liability upon a public officer who so conducts himself that the finger of suspicion, that his public acts are not governed exclusively by considerations of public benefit, may be pointed at him. The courts should give liberal construction to statutes which tend to accomplish that purpose but they may not give a strained construction to a statute which will result in the punishment of a public officer for acts performed in the public view without corrupt motive and which do not tend to introduce the influence of possible adverse private interest into the performance of acts which should be dictated only by considerations of public welfare." Id. at 466, 152 N.E. at 263-64. Cf. Commonwealth v. Standard Oil Co., 129 Ky. 744, 112 S.W. 902 (1908), where the court said: "Criminal statutes should never be construed as to catch those who have honestly conformed to the law as it has been expounded by the proper authorities". Id. at 749, 112 S.W. at 903-04.

It is difficult to lay down a practical guide defining this class of crime. Obviously, the construction of the statute cannot depend on whether the particular defendant has made a bona fide attempt to comply with its terms, and it is probably impossible to develop statistical data as to the habitual conduct in this respect of those affected by a particular statute. The gist of this exception is the tendency of a liberal construction to mislead persons acting in good faith and honestly attempting to comply with the law, and a general exception in these terms should prove sufficient.

Effect of Changed Conditions. The spasmodic attempt to enforce old legislation which is inapplicable to changed social or economic conditions presents another instance in which the doctrine of strict construction provides some measure of needed protection against administrative tyranny. The dead hand of the past, where it bars rather than leads social progress, must be narrowly limited in scope until outright repeal becomes possible.

Blue laws are but one example; they are commonly construed narrowly. The survival of private suits for penalties as a means of enforcing the criminal law is likewise an anachronism now that the enforcement of the law has been intrusted to public prosecutors, and here also strict construction is the rule. It is only in procedure that the courts often fail to take account of changed conditions.¹⁰

Strict construction of statutes inapplicable because of changed social or economic conditions does not do violence to the intent of the legislature in the true sense. Although usually perpetual in form, statutes are passed in the light of the conditions at the time, and there would seem no proper ground for inferring that the legislators of one generation ever intended to insist upon a broad interpretation of their statutes where they run clearly contrary to the social and economic policies of a subsequent generation.

ROSCOE POUND, COMMON LAW AND LEGISLATION

21 Harv.L.Rev. 383, 386-388 (1908).

We are told commonly that three classes of statutes are to be construed strictly: penal statutes; statutes in derogation of common right; and statutes in derogation of the common law. An eminent authority has objected to all of these categories and has pointed out that all classes of statutes ought to be construed with a sole view of ascertaining and giving effect to the will of the lawmaker.¹ But there

¹ "The idea that an act may be strictly or liberally construed, without reference is more justification for some of these categories than for others. For the rule that penal statutes are to be construed strictly something may be said. When acts are to be made penal and are to be visited with loss or impairment of life, liberty, or property, it may well be argued that political liberty requires clear and exact definition of the offense. So also the rule that statutes in derogation of common right are to be construed strictly has some excuse in England where there are no constitutional restrictions. There it is really another form of stating Blackstone's tenth rule, that interpretations which produce collaterally absurd or mischievous consequences are to be avoided.² In the United States it means that interpretations which would make an act unconstitutional are to be avoided, or else it is equivalent to Blackstone's tenth rule. Whenever it is applied beyond these limits, it is without excuse and is merely an incident of the general attitude of courts toward legislation. The proposition that statutes in derogation of the common law are to be construed strictly has no such justification. It assumes that legislation is something to be deprecated. As no statute of any consequence dealing with any relation of private law can be anything but in derogation of the common law, the social reformer and the legal reformer, under this doctrine, must always face the situation that the legislative act which represents the fruit of their labors will find no sympathy in those who apply it, will be construed strictly, and will be made to interfere with the status quo as little as possible. The New York Code of Civil Procedure of 1848 affords a conspicuous example of how completely this attitude on the part of courts may nullify legislative action.³ Some regard this attitude toward legislation as a basic principle of jurisprudence.⁴ Others are content to make of it an ancient and fundamental principle of the common law.⁵ In either event they agree in praising it as a wise and useful institution.⁶ It is not difficult to show, however, that it is not necessary to and into the legislative intent, according as it is viewed either as a penal or a remedial statute, either as in derogation of the common law or as a beneficial innovation, is in its very nature delusive and fallacious." Sedgwick, Construction of Const. and Stat. Law, c. viii, fn.

³ "You have the State of New York before you as a terrible example. I believe our practice today is infinitely more technical than that in New Jersey. Even the attempt to abolish forms of action and especially the attempt to abolish the distinction between law and equity practice have been dismal failures. The distinction between trover and assumpsit is today more rigidly observed than under the common law practice. It is impossible to amend upon a trial from trover to assumpsit or vice versa." W. B. Hornblower, quoted in 2 Andrews, Am.Law, 2 ed., sec. 635, n. 29. But the impossibility of amendment spoken of and the rigid distinction were introduced into code practice by the judges in the teeth of express code provisions upon common law considerations. De Graw v. Elmore, 50 N.Y. 1. See N.Y.Code Civ.Proc.1848, secs. 69, 173, 176.

⁴ Robinson, Am.Jurisp., sec. 301.

⁵ E.g., Carter, Law, Its Origin, Growth and Function, 308.

⁶ Dr. Robinson says of the proposition that statutes in derogation of the common law are to be construed strictly that it is "a positive but reasonable rule." Am.Jurisp., sec. 301. Mr. Carter says that judges "displayed their wisdom by adopting it."

herent in a legal system; that it is not an ancient and fundamental doctrine of the common law; that it had its origin in archaic notions of interpretation generally, now obsolete, and survived in its present form because of judicial jealousy of the reform movement; and that it is wholly inapplicable to and out of place in American law of today.

NOTE

The following clause in the bill for the Minnesota Interpretation act (An Act Relating to Statutory Laws, now 1945 Minn.Stat. c. 645) as introduced was struck in the Judiciary Committee of the Senate:

"Strict and Liberal Construction. The rule that penal provisions, retroactive provisions, provisions imposing taxes, provisions conferring the power of eminent domain, provisions exempting persons and property from taxation, provisions exempting property from the power of eminent domain, and laws in abrogation of the common law are to be strictly construed shall have no application to the laws of this state, but every such provision shall be construed according to the fair import of its terms, to promote justice and effect the purpose of the law.

"All other provisions of any law shall be liberally construed to effect their objects and to promote justice."

There are similar provisions in the interpretation statutes of California, Idaho, Pennsylvania, South Carolina and South Dakota.

D. Concerning Remedies

WIGINGTON v. MID-CONTINENT ROYALTY CO.

Supreme Court of Kansas, 1930. 130 Kan. 785, 288 P. 749.

JOCHEMS, J. Plaintiff brought this action to cancel a certain oil and gas royalty conveyance on 80 acres of land and to quiet her title to the land. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

The case was submitted to the court upon the petition of the plaintiff and the exhibits attached thereto, the answer of the defendants, reply of plaintiff, the trust agreement under which the defendant company was organized, and a statement showing a list of the royalties owned by the defendant company which have been acquired by giving in exchange therefor units of ownership in the royalty company. No evidence other than the foregoing was introduced.

The petition of the plaintiff, after alleging that the defendant company was a common-law trust, that defendants Graham and Cline were the president and secretary thereof, respectively, and the address of the defendants at Newkirk, Okl., alleged further that the defendant company had ever since August 17, 1925, been exercising, or purporting to exercise, corporate powers in the state of Kansas, and selling and disposing of units or shares of the defendant company; that the company never at any time had any authority to exercise corporate powers, and never had any authority from the Kansas Blue Sky Board to sell or dispose of units, interests, or shares; that the plaintiff is the owner of 80 acres of land (describing it), and that in February, 1926, the defendants Graham and Cline came to plaintiff's residence on the lands described in her petition, and proposed that she give to the company a royalty pooling agreement any royalty conveyance, conveying to the Mid-Continent Royalty Company, its successors and assigns, an undivided one-half interest in and to the oil and gas royalty, exclusive of oil and gas lease bonuses and rental moneys on the lands; that they represented to her that the contract and royalty conveyance would be for a term of 21 years and no longer; that the company owned other royalty contracts upon lands on which drilling operations were being conducted; and that within a few months she would be drawing large dividends from the units in the company. The plaintiff alleged that she was illiterate, and that defendants knew she could neither read nor write; that defendants further represented to her that the company was duly authorized to transact business in the state of Kansas, and that its method of doing business had been submitted to, and approved by, the Blue Sky Board of Kansas; that the company had been duly authorized to issue units or shares therein, and that in consideration of the foregoing the plaintiff entered into a royalty pooling agreement, and made a royalty conveyance in return for a certificate of 2,240 units in the defendant company; that thereafter, on about June 10, 1927, she learned that the royalty pooling agreement and conveyance covering her estate provided for a term of not only 21 years, but for as long as oil and gas were thereafter produced in paying quantities. She learned also that the company was not a corporation, and had no authority to do business in the state of Kansas; that the company is what is known as a common-law trust under which all unit holders are individually liable for the debts of the company, and learned further that the company had never obtained permission from the Blue Sky Board of Kansas to sell its units or interests.

She learned also that the company had no production on any acreage owned by it and no drilling wells on any of its acreage; that immediately upon learning such facts she demanded a reconveyance to her of the royalty and offered to return the units which she had received and in her petition tendered the units into court.

Does the Blue Sky Law of Kansas (Rev.St. 17—1201 to 17—1222, inclusive) apply to the transaction shown in this case?

Appellants urge that, inasmuch as they were engaged in forming a pool whereby they took the royalty conveyance from the plaintiff and gave her in exchange therefor the certificate for 2,240 units, this did not constitute a sale within the meaning of the Blue Sky Law. Appellants admit that the Blue Sky Law does apply to the sale of securities or shares of a common-law trust the same as to the stock of a corporation, and that this has been so decided by this court in Home Lumber Co. v. State Charter Board, 107 Kan. 153, 190 P. 601. The appellants, after setting forth the statute which relates to the sale of speculative securities in the state of Kansas (Rev.St. 17—1202), urge that the statute by its terms applies only to a "sale" or "offer for sale." Appellants further contend that the statute is penal in its nature; that it must be strictly construed; that the Legislature has the power to enlarge the scope of the criminal statutes, but the court has no power to do so. The appellants then cite some authorities on the definition of the word "sale."

The law in question was adopted by the Kansas Legislature in 1915, and is chapter 164, Laws of 1915, as subsequently amended in 1919. The title of the act reads: "An act to prevent unfairness, imposition or fraud in the sale or disposition of certain 'securities' herein defined by requiring an inspection thereof, providing for such inspection, supervision and regulation of the business of any person, association, partnership, or corporation, engaged or intending to engage, whether as principal, broker or agent, in the sale of any such securities in the state of Kansas, as may be necessary to prevent unfairness, imposition or fraud in the sale or disposition of said securities, and prescribing penalties for the violation thereof. . . ."

The legislative purpose is made clear by the title of the act. The object which the Legislature had in mind was to prevent unfairness or fraud in the sale or disposition of securities. No contention is here made that the securities of the defendant were not within the definitions of the term "securities" as defined in the act.

In the case of State v. Gopher Tire & Rubber Co., 146 Minn. 52, 177 N.W. 937, 938, the court discusses the question of the construction of the Blue Sky Law. In that case it was said: "The purpose of the statute is to protect the public against imposition. It is a new form of regulatory law which, in the course of a few years, has swept over 33 states. It has been said that its popular name indicates the evil at which it is aimed, that is, speculative schemes having no more basis than so many feet of blue sky (Hall v. Geiger-Jones Co., 242 U.S. 549, 37 S.Ct. 217, 61 L.Ed. 480, L.R.A.1917F, 514, Ann.Cas.1917C, 643; State v. Agey, 171 N.C. 831, 88 S.E. 726), and that it is intended to put a stop to the sale of shares in visionary oil wells, nonexistent gold mines, and other 'get-rich-quick' schemes calculated to despoil credulous individuals of their savings. It is a proper and needful exercise of the police power of the state and should not be given a narrow construction; for it was the evident purpose of the Legislature to bring within the statute the sale of all securities not specifically exempted To lay down a hard and fast rule by which to determine whether that which is offered to a prospective investor as such a security as may not be sold without a license would be to aid the unscrupulous in circumventing the law. It is better to determine in each instance whether a security is in fact of such a character as fairly to fall within the scope of the statute."

The action before us at the present time is civil and not criminal in its nature. It is one in which the operation of the statute applies to the offense and not to the offender. Since it is unnecessary to a decision of this case, we shall not at this time determine whether the statute shall be strictly or liberally construed in cases of criminal prosecution for violation of the law, but will determine the construction to be given the statute in all cases where it operates on the offense.

Realizing the difficulty courts have had in attempting to establish an exact definition of fraud, and the fact that the Legislatures in enacting laws for the purpose of preventing fraud are confronted with this same difficulty, the rule of liberal construction of statutes designed to prevent fraud is unquestionably a proper one where the statute acts upon the offense. The general rule contended for by appellants is subject to an exception where the statute is one designed to prevent fraud when the application of the statute acts upon the offense and not the offender. It is our conclusion that in civil actions such as the case at bar, where the statute acts upon the offense committed, the Blue Sky Law is entitled to a liberal construction in order to accomplish the purpose which the Legislature had in mind when it enacted the law. In view of this liberal construction, does the transaction shown by this record constitute a sale of securities of the defendant company and come within the provisions of the Blue Sky Law?

It is to be noted that the title of the act embraces "sale or disposition." Numerous authorities are cited by both the appellants and the appellee upon the definition of "sale." . . .

Applying the definition laid down in the authorities cited, it is readily seen that the plaintiff parted with her interest in the oil and gas rights for a consideration; namely, the units of the defendant company.

The appellee has called our attention to the case of Marney v. Home Royalty Ass'n, recently decided by the Supreme Court of New Mexico and reported in 286 P. 979. This was an action involving the construction of the Blue Sky Law of that state. In that case it was held:

"The Blue Sky Law . . . is penal and to be strictly construed; but not to exclude the ordinary meaning of the term employed in denouncing the act, in favor of its narrower meaning, where the latter meaning would tend to defeat the salutary purposes of the legislation. [Syl. 2.]

"The consideration for the 'speculative security' being a conveyance of minerals and mineral rights, the transaction is a 'sale' within the prohibition of the Blue Sky Law. [Syl. 3.]"

The facts in that case were almost identical with the case at bar. The defendant in that case was a common-law trust operating under the same plan as the defendant in this case. The action was brought to set aside a royalty conveyance made to the plaintiff in exchange for a certificate of participation issued by the defendant. As here, the defendant contended that the transaction was a mere exchange or barter, and was not prohibited by the word "sale." In that case the court further said:

"We are satisfied that the strict construction, to which we are enjoined in the case of a penal statute, does not require that we close our eyes to a reasonable and ordinary meaning of the word 'sell' and plant ourselves upon the narrowest meaning which it will bear; especially where such interpretation would in many cases defeat the salutary objects of the legislation and open the door to evasion. Ex parte De Vore, 18 N.M. 246, 136 P. 47. While the word 'sell' seems to be employed throughout in the body of the act, the title informs us of the purpose to prevent fraud in the 'sale or disposition' of securities. Every reason for prohibiting a sale of speculative securities exists for prohibiting a disposition of them by way of exchange. The narrow interpretation contended for, cannot, in our judgment, have been the intention of the Legislature."

The transaction involved in this case was a "sale of the securities of the defendant company within the meaning and intent of the Blue Sky Law."

Since such a transaction is prohibited by the statute, it is void. The statute being one clearly intended for the protection of plaintiff, she is entitled to a recovery of that which was illegally obtained from her.

. . . the judgment is affirmed.

JACKSON v. NORTHWEST AIRLINES

District Court of the United States, 1047. 70 F.Supp. 501.

NORDBYE, DISTRICT JUDGE. Plaintiffs are seeking overtime pay allegedly due them as employers of defendant under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, 29 U.S.C.A. § 201 et seq., hereinafter also called the Wage and Hour Act. For convenience all plaintiffs will be referred to as "plaintiffs", and the defendants will be referred to collectively as "defendant". Defendant contends that Section 13(a) (4) of the Act exempts defendant and all its employees, including plaintiffs, from the Act's protection. Because a great number of plaintiffs seek recovery, the Court, after stipulation by the parties, has agreed to try initially the general issue, Does the exemption set forth in Section 13(a) (4) prevent each plaintiff from recovering? For the purposes of these proceedings, defendant concedes that, but for Section 13(a) (4), plaintiffs would be covered by the Act.

Defendant was incorporated in 1934 as an air carrier, and from that time until about January, 1942, it was exclusively engaged in operating a commercial airline from Chicago and the Twin Cities to the northwestern United States and to part of Canada. It maintained its own buildings, planes, and equipment, and employed many persons to care exclusively for its airline operations and property. But with the advent of war, defendant was requested by the United States Government to perform various projects necessary to the war effort. In January or early February, 1942, defendant was requested to, and did, establish and operate a military air transport route from the United States to Alaska. During the war, defendant flew supplies, equipment, and personnel over this route for the Government and for the Military Department. The operation was known as the "Northern Region Operation".

In February, 1942, the defendant was requested to, and did, begin modifying in St. Paul, Minnesota, army planes which were manufactured on the production lines of various companies and which, together with military planes from storage and parking fields, or from combat zones, were flown to defendant for various structural or mechanical changes, alterations, or additions in the planes or the military equipment thereon. This project permitted changes which experience and added knowledge showed were desirable, but which could not be incorporated with maximum production efficiency into the quantity production line procedures. Defendant had modified some of its own commercial planes prior to the war, so it had some experience in this particular line of work.

In June, 1942, the defendant also was requested, and agreed to carry on modification work in connection with the installation of certain aircraft instruments which were made in Minneapolis, and in September, 1942, defendant also established, at the Government's request, an ice research project in connection with the de-icing of propellers and wings. The evidence indicates that the defendant had been experimenting privately upon this problem prior to the war. Defendant also performed other war services, including the operation of a training school and flying troops and supplies to foreign countries and between domestic airfields.

The plaintiffs in this proceeding were all employed upon the modification project. They were paid overtime under the Railway Labor Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq., at the rate of time and one-half for all hours worked in excess of 48 hours per week. In this proceeding, they are seeking overtime under the Wage and Hour Act for the eight hours worked over 40 hours per week and for which they were not paid under the Railway Labor Act. They also seek an equal amount in liquidated damages under Section 16(b) of the Wage and Hour Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 216(b).

Section 13 of the Wage and Hour Act provides: "Section 13(a). The provisions of sections 6 and 7 . . . shall not apply with respect to . . . (4) any employee of a carrier by air subject to the provisions of title II of the Railway Labor Act; . . ." 52 Stat. 1067, 29 U.S.C.A. § 213(a) (4).

Plaintiffs concede that this provision exempts defendant's commercial airline employees and activities from the Wage and Hour Act. But defendant argues (1) that Section 13(a) (4) exempts plaintiffs if defendant is subject to the Railway Labor Act with respect to any of its activities, including its airline activities, even if defendant is not subject to the Railway Act with respect to its modification activities, and (2) that the Railway Labor Act intends to subject a carrier to its jurisdiction for all purposes and all its activities if the carrier is subject to that Act for any activity at all. Defendant lastly urges that, in any event, the modification project actually was a part of, and so connected with, the airline activities that in fact the project was a carrier activity and therefore was covered by the Railway Labor Act. These three alternative contentions, which plaintiffs dispute, create the issues. The burden of proof is upon defendant, who urges the exemption. Walling v. De Soto Creamery & Produce Co., D.C.Minn.1943, 51 F.Supp. 938; Fleming v. Hawkeye Pearl Button Co., 8 Cir., 113 F.2d 52.

Whether plaintiffs are exempt from the Wage and Hour Act upon the basis of defendant's first two contentions obviously depends upon the meaning of Section 13(a) (4) of the Wage and Hour Act and Sections 181-188 of 45 U.S.C.A., the latter sections being the Railway Labor Act applicable to air carriers.

Although defendant contends that the literal wording of Section 13(a) (4) supports its first contention, the section does not cover the problem specifically. That is, it states only that an employee of a carrier "subject" to the Railway Labor Act is exempt from the Wage and Hour Act. It does not state specifically if the exemption exists only when the Railway Labor Act supplies to the specific activity or work in litigation, or if the exemption exists even when the Railway Labor Act is applicable only to other work or activities in which the employer is engaged as a carrier. Broadly and literally construed, the provision may sustain the latter meaning, as defendant contends. But it is well settled that the exemption provisions of the Wage and Hour Act must be construed strictly, not broadly, and that its remedial provisions must be construed liberally, so that the Act's words will accomplish the purpose at which the Act is aimed. Phillips Co. v. Walling, 1945, 324 U.S. 490, 65 S.Ct. 807, 89 L.Ed. 1095, 157 A.L.R. 876; Gemsco, Inc., v. Walling, 1944, 324 U.S. 244, 65 S.Ct. 605, 89 L.Ed. 921. See also Walling v. Consumer Co., 7 Cir., 1945, 149 F.2d 626; Fleming v. Hawkeye Pearl Button Co., 8 Cir., 1942, 113 F.2d 52.

The purpose of the Wage and Hour Act was to eliminate, not to perpetuate, substandard, undesirable labor conditions and their effect upon commerce. It sought to exclude from interstate commerce goods, produced for commerce under conditions detrimental to standards of living necessary to the health and general well-being, and to prevent the use of interstate commerce as the means of spreading and perpetuating substandard labor conditions among the workers of the several states. United States v. Darby Lumber Co., 1941, 312 U.S. 100, 657, 61 S.Ct. 451, 85 L.Ed. 609, 132 A.L.R. 1430. This was conceived by Congress to be a basic need of commerce, and it is the public policy which must be considered when interpreting the meaning of the Act's provisions.

To accomplish this purpose, and to give heed to the public policy, Congress could not have intended that the exemption applied merely because the Railway Labor Act applied to another activity in which the company was engaged. As hereinafter noted, the Railway Labor Act does not apply merely because the company's other activities are subject to the Railway Labor Act. The activity in litigation must be subject to that Act in order for it to apply. So if defendant's broad construction were adopted, many employees would be denied protection of the Wage and Hour Act as well as the Railway Labor Act, and the conditions which the Wage and Hour Act sought to prevent would flourish with its sanction. No reason why companies which perform air carrier activities which are subject to the Railway Labor Act should be favored with respect to their non-carrier activities has been pointed out or is apparent. The Railway Labor Act does not require it. Nor does the purpose of the Wage and Hour Act permit it. And no basis for assuming that this proposed favoritism was the purpose for including Section 13(a) (4) in the Wage and Hour Act is apparent. On the contrary, the opposite is the fact. . . .

Congress undoubtedly determined that public interest required that the benefits of the Railway Labor Act should be accorded the air transportation industry. The apparent success of the Act in bringing labor peace in rail transportation was at least one of the motivating reasons for the extension of the Act to the growing and vital national industry of air transportation. In passing Section 13(a) (4) of the Wage and Hour Act, Congress evidently intended to avoid any duplication or conflict of authority over the hours of employment of employees in the air transportation industry. For this reason, such employees were to be exempt from the Wage and Hour Act and jurisdiction over them was exclusively relegated to the Railway Labor Board. However, if any employee of an air carrier was not subject to the jurisdiction of the Railway Labor Act and its intent and purposes, then it must follow that there would be no conflict of Federal authority which Congress sought to avoid and the reasons for the exemption would be nonexistent. No cogent reason is advanced why the exemption could be extended beyond its aims and objects and beyond the apparent intent of Congress in its passage. . . .

Section 13(a) (4) does not prevent plaintiffs from recovering. Plaintiffs are entitled to the protection of the Wage and Hour Act in so far as this exemption is concerned.

E. Concerning Territorial Application

IN RE ROBINSON'S ESTATE

Supreme Court of Nebraska, 1940. 138 Neb. 101, 202 N.W. 48.

EBERLY, JUSTICE. In this case, Yale University, a Connecticut corporation, appeals from the decision of the district court for Scotts Bluff county, which denied the appellant's claim for exemption from the payment of inheritance taxes on its interests in certain Nebraska lands devised to it by the terms of the last will of Edward S. Robinson, deceased. These lands, by the terms of the will of the deceased, upon the termination of the life estate created thereby, were given, devised, and bequeathed "to Yale University, of New Haven, Connecticut, to be its absolutely." The intestate died on February 27, 1937, and his will was duly admitted to probate on July 17, 1937. Upon the probate of the will an appraiser for inheritance tax purposes was appointed by the county judge of Scotts Bluff county, who determined that the share of the devised lands taxable to Yale University was $73,786, and that the inheritance tax, if levied, would amount to $7,154.32 with interest at 7 per cent. per annum from February 27, 1937. On February 6, 1939, the county court denied appellant's claim for exemption as an educational institution under section 77-2201, Comp.St.1929, as revised in 1931 (Laws 1931, ch. 132) and on that basis levied the inheritance tax complained of. On appeal to the district court, that court affirmed the levy of the inheritance tax against Yale University, and denied its claim of exemption as an educational institution under such section 77-2201, Comp.St.1929, as amended.

Appellant's appeal to this court challenges the correctness of the order thus made on the sole ground that it is a corporation organized and operated exclusively for educational purposes without pecuniary gain, and thus is within the protection of the proviso which was added as an amendment to section 77-2201, Comp.St.1929, by chapter 132 of the session laws of 1931. This proviso is in the following terms, viz.: "Provided further, that all bequests, legacies, devises, or gifts, to or for the use of any corporation, organization, association or foundation organized and operated exclusively for religious, charitable or educational purposes, no part of which is owned or used for financial gain or profit to either the owner or user or inures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual, or to a trustee or trustees exclusively for such religious, charitable or educational purposes, shall not be subject to any duty or tax, and no such duty or tax shall be assessed or collected after the taking effect of this act irrespective of the time of the death of the decedent or the fact of the pendency of his or her estate."

Appellant insists on the general rule repeatedly announced by this court, that, where the words of a statute are plain, direct and unambiguous, no interpretation is needed to ascertain their meaning; a mere reading will suffice. [Citing cases.]

And further insists that it is the duty of the court to discover, if possible, the legislative intent from the language of the act (State v. City of Lincoln, 101 Neb. 57, 162 N.W. 138); and that the statute under consideration is so clear and unambiguous on its face as to preclude any construction whatever by the trial court. [Citing cases.] As applied to the instant case, no account is taken of the inherent limitation to which legislative power is properly subjected.

There is, however, another principle by which general words of a statute are limited in order that the law may conform to legislative intent.

The underlying doctrine . . . was well expressed by the supreme court of Missouri in the case of In re Estate of Quirk, in the following language, viz. [257 Mo. 422, 165 S.W. 1065, 51 L.R.A.,N.S., 817]:

"The general doctrine seems to be that prima facie the law should be held to have reference to persons and things within the territorial jurisdiction of the body enacting it, unless it clearly appears that another and different purpose should be gathered from the act itself. Presumptively the lawmaking power is acting in the interest of persons and things within the state. Presumptively the lawmakers in this case were looking after the interests of Missouri, and not legislating for charities in other states, and especially is this so when they were unloosing our own purse strings by this exemption clause. It means, if given the construction urged by the respondent, that a Missouri lawmaking body was releasing its hold upon a source of revenue for charities outside of the state. To give it that construction would, in effect, be to say that the lawmaking body was taking Missouri money to support foreign charities."

It is the view of a majority of the adjudicated cases that the reason or basis for conferring exemption from taxation on educational corporations by legislative provision is the fact that such institutions render service to the state in consideration of which they are relieved of certain tax burdens. Davis v. Treasurer & Receiver General, 208 Mass. 343, 94 N.E. 556; . . .

It is quite obvious that this reason usually assigned as the basis for this legislation is, in Nebraska, wholly inapplicable to foreign corporations, not only because of their nonresidence in the state, but being incompatible with the clearly announced policy of this state. In principle, the question presented in the instant case is one of first impression. However, the conclusions announced by Good, J., in the case of In re Estate of Rudge, 114 Neb. 335, 207 N.W. 520, 521, seem to be applicable and controlling in the present controversy, viz.: "It is a familiar rule that statutes exempting property from taxation should be strictly construed, and one contending that his property is exempt from such tax must show clearly that he is within the exceptions provided by statute. [Citing cases.]

"The same rule should be applied to a statute exempting certain legacies from an inheritance tax. To be exempt from an inheritance tax, a legacy must come within the strict letter of the statute. A careful examination of the statute under consideration does not disclose that a legacy to a religious or charitable society is exempt from an inheritance tax." . . .

On this basis, we find that the tax exemption claimed is one to which appellant, as a nonresident corporation, is not entitled.

It follows that the judgment of the district court is correct, and it is affirmed.

NOTE

In Baker, "Judicial Interpretation of Tax Exemption Statutes," 7 Texas L.Rev. 385 at p. 395, the author states: "In spite of the use of the term 'strict construction' we find that the courts have a tendency to construe tax exemption statutes in favor of the state only when a well founded doubt exists as to the meaning of the statute. 'The rule of strict construction does not relieve the court of the duty of interpreting the exemption by the ordinary rules of construction in order to carry out the intention of the legislature.' The statement often is made in the opinions that the purpose or intent of the legislature is to guide. After examining a large number of tax-exemption cases the impression is created that there is no such thing as a rule of 'strict construction' in many fields of tax exemption. In fact, there seems to be a liberal attitude on the part of the courts where religious, charitable, or educational property is sought to be taxed, where public property is in issue, where special taxes are involved, and where the statute itself seems to require liberal construction."

F. Concerning Taxing Statutes

STATE v. GLANDER

Court of Appeals of Ohio, 1946. 69 N.E.2d 226.

MILLER, JUDGE. This is an original action in mandamus brought by the State of Ohio on the relation of William A. Williams, a citizen, resident and taxpayer of the State of Ohio.

The respondent is C. Emory Glander, a duly appointed, qualified and acting tax commissioner of the State of Ohio.

The relator prays that a writ of mandamus be issued commanding the respondent to levy and assess personal property taxes on the inventory of merchandise and other personal property owned and held by the Department of Liquor Control of the State of Ohio, which personal property is within the State of Ohio, and for such other and further relief as the relator may be entitled to. . . .

The relator seeks to have the respondent compelled to make personal property tax assessment against the Department of Liquor Control of the State of Ohio. He is seeking to have the State tax itself.

Taxpayers are defined in Section 5366, G.C. They include, so far as might possibly be favorable to the relator, "every person . . . doing business in this state." The term "person" is defined in Section 5320, G.C., as follows:

"The word 'person' as used in this title, includes firms, companies, associations and corporations; words in the singular number include the plural number, and words in the plural number include the singular number; and words in the masculine gender include the feminine and neuter genders."

The State of Ohio is not a firm, a company, an association or a corporation. It is a sovereignty. The doctrine seems to be that a sovereign state, which can make and unmake laws, in prescribing general laws, generally intends thereby to regulate, not its own conduct, but that of its subjects.

In 37 O. Jur., Par. 479, we find the following:

"Accordingly, the state is not bound by the terms of a general statute unless it is so expressly enacted, particularly where it is attempted to enforce a direct liability against the state, or where any of the prerogatives, rights, titles, or interests of the state are sought to be divested. This exemption, however, has been declared not to include municipal corporations or other parties of a public character other than the state. Moreover, the state may, by express provision, be brought within the terms of a statute."

The statute provides nowhere that the state of Ohio is expressly included as being subject to assessment. It is well settled that statutes imposing taxes are to be strictly construed in favor of the party upon whom the tax is sought to be imposed and are not to be extended by implication beyond their clear import. . . .

For the foregoing reasons we are of the opinion that the petition of the relator fails to state cause of action.

G. Concerning the Sovereign

UNITED STATES v. UNITED MINE WORKERS OF AMERICA

District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, 1946.
70 F.Supp. 42.

Action by the United States of America against United Mine Workers of America and another for declaratory judgment as to rights under coal mine operating agreement, for temporary injunction and for other relief. A temporary restraining order was issued, restraining defendants from continuing in effect a notice terminating the agreement, and the court issued a rule to show cause why defendants should not be held in contempt for violation of such temporary restraining order, and defendants moved to discharge and vacate such rule to show cause.

The Court delivered the following opinion orally in overruling the motion of the defendants to discharge and vacate the Rule to Show Cause why the defendants should not be held in contempt:

The Court. Gentlemen, the Court is ready to rule.

It happens that the Court was a Member of Congress at the time the Norris-LaGuardia Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 101 et seq., became law and during the debates in the consideration of it. Mr. LaGuardia and I were legislatively always very close. I think I am correct in saying that I supported every measure that he was interested in—I mean primarily interested in—and that he supported every measure that I was primarily interested in. He directed his activities principally toward the labor movement, in what he considered the public interest; and mine were directed toward the currency.

As I said before, I am sure he always supported me; and, as far as I remember, I always supported him. So I am sure I am thoroughly familiar with the Norris-LaGuardia Act and its purposes and the reasons for it.

It is notorious that around, I guess, from 1890 on, the Federal courts were used by powerful interests for the purpose of defeating attempts on the part of labor to improve their welfare, increase their wages, improve their living conditions, and to help themselves in various ways.

Now, it takes a long time to arouse the public, sometimes, but the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 12 et seq., was the first affirmative expression of their resentment of the action of the courts, and the Norris-LaGuardia Act was the culminating expression of their feeling that the courts were entirely in the wrong in the way they issued injunctions in labor disputes.

The Court remembers very distinctly the amendments that were offered by Mr. Beck, I think, of Pennsylvania—and I forget who offered the others—which endeavored expressly to exclude the United States in practically all cases, under all circumstances, from the operation of the Norris-LaGuardia Act. But those in favor of the Act felt that an inclusion—an express inclusion—might defeat the purposes of the Act in a great many cases, and that the Government was amply protected by the general principle where the Government was not specifically mentioned or included by necessary implication in a given case—that the language of the Act did not apply to the Government.

The leading case on that subject in this country—and it is still in force and effect—is the case of the Dollar Savings Bank v. United States, found in 19 Wall. 227, 22 L.Ed. 80. In that case the Federal Government brought an action of debt in Pennsylvania to collect a tax. The statutes provided that an ordinary common-law action of debt was not applicable in cases for the collection of taxes. There is a special statute that would ordinarily cover a case of that kind, a special statute for the collection of taxes.

The Federal Government brought an ordinary action for the collection of debt at common law, which the Savings Bank contended was not legal. Here is what the Court said. The Court did not take that view. The Court held that an ordinary action of debt if brought by the United States would lie. This is what the Court said:

“It is a familiar principle that the King is not bound by any Act of Parliament unless he be named therein by special and particular words. The most general words that can be devised (for example, any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate) affect not him in the least, if they may tend to restrain or diminish any of his rights and interests.”

Certain cases are cited.

“He may even take the benefit of any particular Act, though not named. The rule thus settled respecting the British Crown is equally applicable to this Government, and it has been applied frequently in the different States and practically in the Federal courts. It may be considered as settled that so much of the royal prerogative as belonged to the King in his capacity of parens patriae, or universal trustee, enters as much into our political state as it does into the principles of the British Constitution.”

As I said before, that is the leading case.

But the Court feels that the doctrine is stated with more and greater clearness than anywhere else that the Court has found it in Black on Interpretation of Laws, Second Edition. I am reading from pages 94 and 95:

"General words in a statute do not include nor bind the Government by whose authority the statute was enacted, where its sovereignty, rights, prerogatives, or interests are involved. It is bound only by being expressly named or by necessary implication from the terms and purposes of the Act.

"This is a very ancient rule of the English law and is equally applicable to the national and state governments in this country. It is said that laws are supposed to be made for the subjects or citizens of the State, not for the sovereign power. Hence, if the Government is not expressly referred to in a given statute, it is presumed that it was not intended to be affected thereby, and this presumption, in any case where the rights or interests of the State would be involved, can be overcome only by clear and irresistible implications from the statute itself. Generally speaking, therefore, the State is not bound by the provisions of any statute, however generally it may be expressed by which its sovereignty would be derogated from, or any of its prerogatives, rights, titles, or interests would be divested, save where the Act is specifically made to extend to the State or where the legislative intention in that regard is too plain to be mistaken."

In this case, what society, what the sovereign power, was endeavoring to do was to hold a matter involving the public interest, a matter involving a potential public calamity, by an entity which had been given power by the sovereignty itself, the labor union, from taking the contemplated action, which, as I said before, would amount to a public calamity, until there could be a judicial determination of whether it had the right to take such action.

The Court thinks that undoubtedly under the general rules which the Court has spoken of, the Norris-LaGuardia Act did not and does not apply; and following that opinion on the part of the Court, the Court had the same rights that the Court would have had prior to the passage of the Norris-LaGuardia Act and the Clayton Act.

So it is perfectly clear that prior to the Norris-LaGuardia Act and the Clayton Act, a court of equity had the right to enjoin a labor union which, in the opinion of the Court, was about to do something which was against the public interest, including the ultimate interest of the union itself.

The Court thinks that that opinion substantially disposes of this motion to discharge and vacate the rule to show cause, because under Section 385 of the United States Code Annotated, Vol. 15, the statement is made:

"The . . . courts shall have power to impose and administer all necessary oaths, and to punish, by fine or imprisonment, at the discretion of the court, contempts of their authority. Such power to punish contempts shall not be construed to extend to any cases except the misbehavior of any person in their presence, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, the misbehavior of any of the officers of said courts in their official transactions, and the disobedience or resistance by any such officer, or by any party, juror, witness, or other person to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the said courts." . . .

UNITED STATES v. UNITED MINE WORKERS OF AMERICA

Supreme Court of the United States, 1947.
330 U.S. 258, 67 S.Ct. 677, 91 L.Ed. —.

[On certiorari to the District Court, MR. CHIEF JUSTICE VINSON delivered the opinion of the Court.]

I.

. . . Defendants' first and principal contention is that the restraining order and preliminary injunction were issued in violation of the Clayton and Norris-LaGuardia Acts. We have come to a contrary decision.

It is true that Congress decreed in § 20 of the Clayton Act that "no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons . . . from recommending, advising, or persuading others . . ." to strike. But by the Act itself this provision was made applicable only to cases "between an employer and employees, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment . . ." For reasons which will be explained at greater length in discussing the applicability of the Norris-LaGuardia Act, we cannot construe the general term "employer" to include the United States, where there is no express reference to the United States and no evident affirmative grounds for believing that Congress intended to withhold an otherwise available remedy from the Government as well as from a specified class of private persons.

Moreover, it seems never to have been suggested that the proscription on injunctions found in the Clayton Act is in any respect broader than that in the Norris-LaGuardia Act. Defendants do not suggest in their argument that it is. This Court, on the contrary, has stated that the Norris-LaGuardia Act "still further . . . [narrowed] the circumstances under which the federal courts could grant injunctions in labor disputes." Consequently, we would feel justified in this case to consider the application of the Norris-LaGuardia Act alone. If it does not apply, neither does the less comprehensive proscription of the Clayton Act; if it does, defendant's reliance on the Clayton Act is unnecessary.

By the Norris-LaGuardia Act, Congress divested the federal courts of jurisdiction to issue injunctions in a specified class of cases. It would probably be conceded that the characteristics of the present case would be such as to bring it within that class if the basic dispute had remained one between defendants and a private employer, and the latter had been the plaintiff below. So much seems to be found in the express terms of §§ 4 and 13 of the Act, set out in the margin.¹⁹ The ¹⁹ "Sec. 4. No court of the United States shall have jurisdiction to issue any restraining order or temporary or permanent injunction in any case involving or growing out of any labor dispute to prohibit any person or persons participating or interested in such dispute (as these terms are herein defined) from doing, whether singly or in concert, any of the following acts:

"(a) Ceasing or refusing to perform any work or to remain in any relation of employment;

"(b) Becoming or remaining a member of any labor organization or of any employer organization, regardless of any such undertaking or promise as is described in section 3 of this Act;

"(c) Paying or giving to, or withholding from, any person participating or interested in such labor dispute, any strike or unemployment benefits or insurance, or other moneys or things of value;

"(d) By all lawful means aiding any person participating or interested in any labor dispute who is being proceeded against in, or is prosecuting, any action or suit in any court of the United States or of any State;

"(e) Giving publicity to the existence of, or the facts involved in, any labor dispute, whether by advertising, speaking, patrolling, or by any other method not involving fraud or violence;

"(f) Assembling peaceably to act or to organize to act in promotion of their interests in a labor dispute;

"(g) Advising or notifying any person of an intention to do any of the acts heretofore specified;

"(h) Agreeing with other persons to do or not to do any of the acts heretofore specified; and

"(i) Advising, urging, or otherwise causing or inducing without fraud or violence the acts heretofore specified, regardless of any such undertaking or promise as is described in section 3 of this Act."

"Sec. 13. When used in this Act, and for the purposes of this Act—

"(a) A case shall be held to involve or to grow out of a labor dispute when the case involves persons who are engaged in the same industry, trade, craft, or occupation; or have direct or indirect interests therein; or who are employees of the same employer; or who are members of the same or an affiliated organization of employers or employees; whether such dispute is (1) between one or more employers or associations of employers and one or more employees or associations of employees; (2) between one or more employers or associations of employers and one or more employees or associations of employees; or (3) between one or more employees or associations of employees and one or more employees or associations of employees; or when the case involves any conflicting or competing interests in a 'labor dispute' (as hereinafter defined) of 'persons participating or interested' therein (as hereinafter defined).

"(b) A person or association shall be held to be a person participating or interested in a labor dispute if relief is sought against him or it, and if he or it is engaged in the same industry, trade, craft, or occupation in which such dispute occurs, or has a direct or indirect interest therein, or is a member, officer, or agent specifications in § 13 are in general terms and make no express exception for the United States. From these premises, defendants argue that the restraining order and injunction were forbidden by the Act and were wrongfully issued.

Even if our examination of the Act stopped here, we could hardly assent to this conclusion. There is an old and well-known rule that statutes which in general terms divest pre-existing rights or privileges will not be applied to the sovereign without express words to that effect.²⁰ It has been stated, in cases in which there were extraneous and affirmative reasons for believing that the sovereign should also be deemed subject to a restrictive statute, that this rule was a rule of construction only.²¹ Though that may be true, the rule has been invoked successfully in cases so closely similar to the present one,²² and the statement of the rule in those cases has been so explicit,²³ that we are inclined to give it much weight here. Congress was not ignorant of the rule which those cases reiterated; and with knowledge of that rule, Congress would not, in writing the Norris-LaGuardia Act, omit to use "clear and specific [language] to that effect" if it actually intended to reach the Government in all cases.

But we need not place entire reliance in this exclusionary rule. Section 2,²⁴ which declared the public policy of the United States as a of any association composed in whole or in part of employers or employees engaged in such industry, trade, craft, or occupation.

"(c) The term 'labor dispute' includes any controversy concerning terms or conditions of employment, or concerning the association or representation of persons in negotiating, fixing, maintaining, changing, or seeking to arrange terms or conditions of employment, regardless of whether or not the disputants stand in the proximate relation of employer and employee.

"(d) The term 'court of the United States' means any court of the United States whose jurisdiction has been or may be conferred or defined or limited by Act of Congress, including the courts of the District of Columbia."

²³ "The most general words that can be devised (for example, any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate) affect not him [the sovereign] in the least, if they may tend to restrain or diminish any of his rights or interests." Dollar Savings Bank v. United States, 1873, 19 Wall. 227, 239, 22 L.Ed. 80. "If such prohibition is intended to reach the government in the use of known rights and remedies, the language must be clear and specific to that effect." United States v. Stevenson, 1909, 215 U.S. 190, 197, 30 S.Ct. 35, 36, 54 L.Ed. 153.

In both these cases the question, as in the present case, was whether the United States was divested of a certain remedy by a statute or a rule of law which, without express reference to the United States, made that remedy generally unavailable.

²⁴ "Sec. 2. In the interpretation of this Act and in determining the jurisdiction and authority of the courts of the United States, as such jurisdiction and authority are herein defined and limited, the public policy of the United States is hereby declared as follows:

guide to the Act's interpretation, carries indications as to the scope of the Act. It predicates the purpose of the Act on the contrast between the position of the "individual unorganized worker" and that of the "owners of property" who have been permitted to "organize in the corporate and other forms of ownership association", and on the consequent helplessness of the worker "to exercise actual liberty of contract . . . and thereby to obtain acceptable terms and conditions of employment." The purpose of the Act is said to be to contribute to the worker's "full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of his own choosing, to negotiate the terms and conditions of his employment, and that he shall be free from the interference, restraint, or coercion of employers of labor, or their agents, in the designation of such representatives . . . for the purpose of collective bargaining . . ." These considerations, on their face, obviously do not apply to the Government as an employer or to relations between the Government and its employees. . . .

Affirmed in part and modified and affirmed in part.

MR. JUSTICE JACKSON joins in this opinion except as to the Norris-LaGuardia Act which he thinks relieved the courts of jurisdiction to issue injunctions in this class of case.

MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER, concurring in the judgment.

The historic phrase "a government of laws and not of men" epitomizes the distinguishment character of our political society. When John Adams put that phrase into the Massachusetts Declaration of Rights, pt. 1, art. 30, he was not indulging in a rhetorical flourish. He was expressing the aim of those who, with him, framed the Declaration of Independence and founded the Republic. "A government of laws and not of men" was the rejection in positive terms of rule by fiat, whether by the fiat of governmental or private power. Every act of government may be challenged by an appeal to law, as finally pronounced by this Court. Even this Court has the last say only for a time. Being composed of fallible men, it may err. But revision of its errors must be by orderly process of law. The Court may be asked to reconsider its decisions, and this has been done successfully again and again throughout our history. Or, what this Court has deemed

"Whereas under prevailing economic conditions, developed with the aid of governmental authority for owners of property to organize in the corporate and other forms of ownership association, the individual unorganized worker is commonly helpless to exercise actual liberty of contract and to protect his freedom of labor, and thereby to obtain acceptable terms and conditions of employment, wherefore, though he should be free to decline to associate with his fellows, it is necessary that he have full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of his own choosing, to negotiate the terms and conditions of his employment, and that he shall be free from the interference, restraint, or coercion of employers of labor, or their agents, in the designation of such representatives or in self-organization or in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection; therefore, the following definitions of, and limitations upon, the jurisdiction and authority of the courts of the United States are hereby enacted."

its duty to decide may be changed by legislation, as it often has been, and, on occasion, by constitutional amendment.

But from their own experience and their deep reading in history, the Founders knew that Law alone saves a society from being rent by internecine strife or ruled by mere brute power however disguised. "Civilization involves subjection of force to reason, and the agency of this subjection is law."¹ The conception of a government by laws dominated the thoughts of those who founded this Nation and designed its Constitution, although they knew as well as the belittlers of the conception that laws have to be made, interpreted and enforced by men. To that end, they set apart a body of men, who were to be the depositories of law, who by their disciplined training and character and by withdrawal from the usual temptations of private interest may reasonably be expected to be "as free, impartial, and independent as the lot of humanity will admit". So strongly were the framers of the Constitution bent on securing a reign of law that they endowed the judicial office with extraordinary safeguards and prestige. No one, no matter how exalted his public office or how righteous his private motive, can be judge in his own case. That is what courts are for. And no type of controversy is more peculiarly fit for judicial determination than a controversy that calls into question the power of a court to decide. Controversies over "jurisdiction" are apt to raise difficult technical problems. They usually involve judicial presuppositions, textual doubts, confused legislative history, and like factors hardly fit for final determination by the self-interest of a party. . . .

And so I join the opinion of the Court insofar as it sustains the judgment for criminal contempt upon the broad ground of vindicating the process of law.² The records of this Court are full of cases, both civil and criminal, involving life or land or small sums of money, in which the Court proceeded to consider a federal claim that was not obviously frivolous. It retained such cases under its power until final judgment, though the claim eventually turned out to be unfounded and the judgment was one denying the jurisdiction either of this Court or of the court from which the case came. In the case before us, the District Court had power "to preserve the existing conditions" in the discharge of "its duty to permit argument, and to take the time required for such consideration as it might need" to decide whether the controversy involved a labor dispute to which the Norris-LaGuardia Act applied. United States v. Shipp, 203 U.S. 563, 573, 27 S.Ct. 165, 166, 51 L.Ed. 319, 8 Ann.Cas. 265 and Howat v. State of Kansas, 258 U.S. 181, 42 S.Ct. 277, 66 L.Ed. 550.

In our country law is not a body of technicalities in the keeping of specialists or in the service of any special interest. There can be no free society without law administered through an independent judiciary. If one man can be allowed to determine for himself what is law, every man can. That means first chaos, then tyranny. Legal process is an essential part of the democratic process. For legal process is subject to democratic control by defined, orderly ways which themselves are part of law. In a democracy, power implies responsibility. The greater the power that defies law the less tolerant can this Court be of defiance. As the Nation's ultimate judicial tribunal, this Court, beyond any other organ of society, is the trustee of law and charged with the duty of securing obedience to it.

² Since, in my view, this was not a conviction for contempt in a case "arising under this Act" the jury provisions of § 11 of the Norris-LaGuardia Act do not apply. For obvious reasons, the petitioners do not claim that the Constitution of the United States affords them a right to trial by jury.

It only remains to state the basis of my disagreement with the Court's views on the bearing of the Norris-LaGuardia Act, 47 Stat. 70, 29 U.S.C. § 101, 29 U.S.C.A. § 101, and the War Labor Disputes Act, 57 Stat. 163, 50 U.S.C.App. § 1501, 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix, § 1501. As to the former, the Court relies essentially on a general doctrine excluding the Government from the operation of a statute in which it is not named, and on the legislative history of the Act. I find the countervailing considerations weightier. The Norris-LaGuardia Act deprived the federal courts of jurisdiction to issue injunctions in labor disputes except under conditions not here relevant. The question before a court of equity therefore is whether a case presents a labor dispute as defined by the Act. Section 13(c) defines "labor disputes":

"The term 'labor dispute' includes any controversy concerning terms or conditions of employment . . . regardless of whether or not the disputants stand in the proximate relation of employer and employee."

That the controversy before the district court comes within this definition does not need to be labored. The controversy arising under the Lewis-Krug contract concerned "terms or conditions of employment" and was therefore a "labor dispute", whatever further radiations the dispute may have had. The Court deems it appropriate to interpolate an exception regarding labor disputes to which the Government is a party. It invokes a canon of construction according to which the Government is excluded from the operation of general statutes unless it is included by explicit language.

The Norris-LaGuardia Act has specific origins and definite purposes and should not be confined by an artificial canon of construction. The title of the Act gives its scope and purpose, and the terms of the Act justify its title. It is an Act "to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity". It does not deal with the rights of parties but with the power of the courts. Again and again the statute says "no court . . . shall have jurisdiction", or an equivalent phrase. Congress was concerned with the withdrawal of power from the federal courts to issue injunctions in a defined class of cases. Nothing in the Act remotely hints that the withdrawal of this power turns on the character of the parties. The only reference to parties underscores their irrelevance to the issue of jurisdiction, for the power of the courts is withdrawn in a labor dispute "regardless of whether or not the disputants stand in the proximate relation of employer and employee".

READ & MACDONALD U.C.B.LEG.

The limitation on the jurisdiction of the court depends entirely on the subject matter of the controversy. Section 13(a) defines it:

"A case shall be held to involve or to grow out of a labor dispute when the case involves persons who are engaged in the same industry, trade, craft, or occupation; or have direct or indirect interests therein; or who are employees of the same employer; or who are members of the same or an affiliated organization of employers or employees;"

Neither the context nor the content of the Act qualifies the terms of that section. Did not the suit brought by the Government against Lewis and the United Mine Workers "grow out of a labor dispute" within the terms of § 13(a) ?

As already indicated, the Court now finds an exception to the limitation which the Norris-LaGuardia Act placed upon the equity jurisdiction of the district court, not in the Act but outside it. It invokes a canon of construction that a sovereign is presumptively not intended to be bound by its own statute unless named in it. At best, his canon, like other generalities about statutory construction, is not a rule of law. Whatever persuasiveness it may have in construing a particular statute derives from the subject matter and the terms of the enactment in its total environment. "This rule has its historical basis in the English Doctrine that the Crown is unaffected by acts of Parliament not specifically directed against it. . . . The presumption is an aid to consistent construction of statutes of the enacting sovereign when their purpose is in doubt, but it does not require that the aim of a statute fairly to be inferred be disregarded because not explicitly stated." So wrote the late Chief Justice for the whole Court in United States v. State of California, 297 U.S. 175, 186, 56 S.Ct. 421, 425, 80 L.Ed. 567, and this point of view was very recently applied in United States v. Rice, 327 U.S. 742, 749, 66 S.Ct. 835, 837. It is one thing to read a statute so as not to bind the sovereign by restrictions, or to impose upon it duties which are applicable to ordinary citizens. It is quite another to interpolate into a statute limiting the jurisdiction of a court, the qualification that such limitation does not apply when the Government invokes the jurisdiction. No decision of this Court gives countenance to such a doctrine of interpolation. The text, context, content and historical setting of the Norris-LaGuardia Act all converge to indicate the unrestricted withdrawal by Congress from the federal district courts of the power to issue injunctions in labor disputes, excepting only under circumstances explicitly defined and not here present. The meaning which a reading of the text conveys and which is confirmed by the history which led Congress to free the federal courts from entanglements in these industrial controversies through use of the injunction, ought not to be subordinated to an abstract canon of construction that carries the residual flavor of the days when a personal sovereign was the law-maker.

Moreover, the rule proves too much. If the United States must explicitly be named to be affected, the limitations imposed by the Norris-LaGuardia Act upon the district court's jurisdiction could not deprive the United States of the remedies it therefore had. Accordingly, the courts would not be limited in their jurisdiction when the United States is a party and the Act would not apply in any proceeding in which the United States is complainant. It would mean that, in order to protect the public interest, which may be jeopardized just as much whether an essential industry continued under private control or has been temporarily seized by the Government, a court could, at the behest of the Attorney General of the United States, issue an injunction as courts did when they issued the Debs, the Hayes and the Railway Shopmen's injunctions. But it was these very injunctions, secured by the Attorney General of the United States under claim of compelling public emergency, that gave the most powerful momentum to the enactment of the Norris-LaGuardia Act. This history is too familiar to be rehearsed. It is surely surprising to conclude that when a long and persistent effort to take the federal courts out of the industrial conflict, insofar as the labor injunction put them into it, found its way to the statute books, the Act failed to meet the grievances that were most dramatic and deepest in the memory of those most concerned with the legislation. . . .

MR. JUSTICE BLACK and MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

For the reasons given in the Court's opinion, we agree that neither the Norris-LaGuardia Act nor the War Labor Disputes Act barred the Government from obtaining the injunction it sought in these proceedings. The "labor disputes" with which Congress was concerned in the Norris-LaGuardia Act were those between private employers and their employees. As to all such "labor disputes," the Act drastically limited the jurisdiction of federal courts; it barred relief by injunction except under very narrow circumstances, whether injunction be sought by private employers, the Government, or anyone else. But the attention of Congress was neither focused upon, nor did it purport to affect, "labor disputes", if such they can be called, between the Government and its own employees. . . .

SECTION 3. COMMON LAW STATUTES

MOSS POINT LUMBER CO. v. BOARD OF SUPERVISORS

Supreme Court of Mississippi, 1906. 89 Miss. 448, 42 So. 290.

On Rehearing.

MAYES, J. This cause was decided at the least term of court by a majority court; WHITFIELD, C. J., dissenting. Subsequently a suggestion of error was filed, and the case is now before the court on this suggestion of error.

The board of supervisors of Harrison county filed a bill in the chancery court against the Moss Point Lumber Company, seeking to enjoin it from cutting down and using the timber on a sixteenth section of school land. The substantial allegations of the bill are that on the 7th day of August, 1882, the board of supervisors of Harrison county, acting on a petition of a majority of the inhabitants of township 2, range 12, of said county, wherein is located the particular section in controversy, leased the sixteenth section, for a period of 99 years, to one Margaret C. Thomas. The bill further alleges that appraisers were appointed, as was provided by law, to appraise and value the leasehold of the sixteenth section for the term. The appraisers, pursuant to their appointment as aforesaid, viewed and appraised the value of the term for said section, and fixed same at $835, which said sum was paid or secured by the said Margaret C. Thomas in the manner required by law. The bill further alleges that the valuation made by the appraisers was based and calculated on the quantity and quality of the merchantable timber standing and growing on the section, and that the land leased, by reason of the character of its soil, is unfit for cultivation, and the only value it possesses is given it by the merchantable pine timber growing thereon. The bill further alleges that Mrs. Margaret C. Thomas has conveyed to some other person or persons, who have conveyed same to defendant company, so that, on and since the 1st day of April, 1905, the defendant has become, and is now, the owner of the unexpired term of whatever estate or interest was created thereby and vested in the original lessee. The bill then alleges that the Moss Point Lumber Company has, since the 1st day of April, 1905, entered on the said sixteenth section by virtue of this lease, and has cut down and carried away a large number of pine trees growing thereon, and is now engaged in illegally and wrongfully cutting and removing the merchantable pine timber therefrom, and, though notified by the complainant to desist, has declared it to be its purpose to cut and remove and manufacture into lumber all the merchantable pine timber on said section; that defendant is not cutting and removing the timber with the intent and purpose of clearing the land for cultivation, but the timber is being cut for commercial purposes solely and to be used in its lumber business, and that said cutting is waste, and injurious to the reversionary estate of the public therein; that, if the defendant company is allowed to continue, the estate or interest of the trustees in the township, at the end of the term, will be of no value, and the injury and damage which will be done to the land by the removal of the timber is irreparable and impossible of ascertainment; that defendant company is of doubtful solvency, and a judgment at law would be valueless to the trustees as custodians of said land. The bill concludes with a prayer for an injunction to restrain the defendant company, or its agents or servants, from cutting and removing any of the pine timber from said section for commercial purposes, and for an accounting, under the direction of the court, of the timber and value of trees cut from the section, and for a decree in favor of the complainants against defendant for said sum and for perpetual injunction. . . . A demurrer was filed to the bill, stating the following grounds of demurrer: First, under the facts alleged, the right to cut and remove the timber from the land was contemplated by the lessors and lessee, and defendant, as lessee, was entitled to cut and remove the same; second, that the title to said timber was, under the lease, vested in the original lessee, and in the defendant, as holder and owner thereof; third, it appears from the bill that the unexpired term was of no value other than the timber thereon, and the appraisal of said leasehold interest was based upon the timber alone, and therefore the complainants were estopped to deny said lessee the right to cut and remove the same; fourth, there is no equity in the face of the bill as against the defendant.

In the consideration of this case, the first question to be settled is the classification of the estate conveyed to appellants; that is to say, is it a freehold, a leasehold, or a life estate? It would seem that the mere examination of the conveyance under which appellants claim would conclusively show that the class of their estate is a leasehold for the term of 99 years. . . .

We desire to call attention to the fact that the statutes of Marlbridge and Gloucester were passed nearly 600 years ago, for the purpose of relieving what was then considered a hardship on the lessors of land. It will also be observed that the statute of Marlbridge provided that a tenant should forfeit single damages for waste, and the statute of Gloucester, passed afterwards, provided that the tenant should forfeit treble damages and forfeit the estate. . . .

We now turn our attention to the question as to whether or not a tenant for years is liable for waste. Independently of the statutes of Marlbridge and Gloucester, and independently of whether or not they form a part of our common law, we think this question is as firmly settled and buried in our jurisprudence as any principle of natural right can sink itself in the jurisprudence of any state. Whenever this question has arisen in this state, it has been decided in the affirmative. . . .

Any tenant for years, it matters not how many years his tenancy may run, is liable for waste when he does those acts which are defined as waste, determined by the conditions and circumstances which exist at the time when the acts are committed. Any contrary holding would shock common understanding of the law. It may be stated that it is a universal rule in this country that, unless exempted by the terms of the lease from responsibility for waste, a tenant is responsible for voluntary waste, whenever committed. This statement of the law is laid down in Ency. of Law, vol. 30 (2d Ed.) p. 259, and it is there stated that such is the law in Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Maryland, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, Oregon, Rhode Island, Virginia; and we might add that the result of our investigation shows many other states not named in the Encyclopædia of Law. United States v. Bostwick, 94 U.S. 53, 24 L.Ed. 65; Bulitt v. Musgrave (Md.) 3 Gill, 31; Belt v. Simkins, 113 Ga. 894, 39 S.E. 430. We do not hold that the statutes of Marlbridge and Gloucester have any intrinsic force as statutes in this state, but we do hold that the principle announced by them over 600 years ago, making a tenant for years liable for waste, is a part of our law at this time. . . . Over 600 years ago the rule exempting the tenant from waste was considered harsh and unjust towards the lessor, and the very purpose of these statutes was to relieve the law from this species of wrong. To say that this principle has not been adopted as a part of our jurisprudence would be to say that our courts and laws have not kept pace with the development of the law in extracting from it just rules of right. This principle of holding the tenant liable is not only one of natural right and justice, but it is thoroughly in keeping with our institutions, enlightenment, and circumstances, and has been held to be the law every time the courts have been called upon to pass on the subject.

It is held in many of our decisions that the common law is the law of this state, as far as it is adapted to our institutions and circumstances, when not repealed by statute, or varied by usage which long custom has superseded. Vicksburg & Jackson R. R. Co. v. Patton, 31 Miss. 156, 66 Am.Dec. 552; Green v. Weller, 32 Miss. 650. It is stated in the original opinion that "it is immovably fixed in the law of Mississippi that no statute ever enacted in Great Britain has any force here, unless re-enacted by our Legislature." In support of this proposition the court cites Jordan v. Roach, 32 Miss. 481; Boarman v. Catlett, 13 Smedes & M. 149; Ingram et al. v. Regan, 23 Miss. 213. We do not take issue with this announcement of the law as an abstract proposition, but we do say that a principle of law, passed by an English statute over 600 years ago, announcing a wise and just rule of conduct, is not to be renounced simply because it made its appearance first in an English statute, when it is suited to our circumstances and conditions, and adjustable to the policy of our law, and when it has been recognized as the common law by such universality of authority. . . .

Let the suggestion of error be sustained, and the former judgment of this court vacated, and the decree of the chancellor affirmed, and the cause remanded, with leave to answer in 60 days after mandate filed.

NOTES

1. In Bogardus v. Trinity Church, 4 Paige (N.Y.) 178, 198 (1833), the issue was whether an English Statute of limitations was applicable, and if it was, then whether it must be pleaded. The court said: "The common law of the mother country as modified by positive enactments, together with the statute laws which are in force at the time of the emigration of the colonists, becomes in fact the common law rather than the common and statute law of the colony. The statute law of the mother country, therefore, when introduced into the colony of New York, by common consent, because it was applicable to the colonists in their new situation, and not by legislative enactment, became a part of the common law of this province . . . It was sufficient, therefore, for the defendant to plead the facts which were necessary to bring their case within the common law of this state, without any reference to the statute. . . ."

2. In Dutcher v. Culver, 24 Minn. 584, 618-619 (1877), the court said: "At the time when the region of country, subsequently known as the Northwest territory, came into the possession and control of the United States, it was, in general, a vast wilderness, inhabited by savages, who had certain manners and customs, but no form of government nor any system of law. A like state of facts existed in almost all of the region known as the Louisiana purchase, and certainly in the whole northern portion of it. There was, in fact, no operative system of law there, since with exceptions too trifling to be entitled to any weight or consideration, there were no people there upon whom laws could operate. Nevertheless, there was a general law of the land, sometimes, and with great propriety, denominated the American common law. . . ."

"While colonization continued—that is to say, until the war of the revolution actually commenced, . . . the changes made in the common law were operative in America also, if suited to the condition of things here. . . . When, therefore, the colonists emerged from the colonial condition into that of independence, the laws which governed them consisted, first, of the common law of England, so far as they had tacitly adopted it as suited to their condition; second, of the statutes of England or of Great Britain, amendatory of the common law, which they had, in like manner, adopted; and third, the colonial statutes. The first and second constituted the American common law.' Cooley's Const.Lim. 22-25."

3. "The American doctrine of common-law statutes is in itself testimony to this concept of the statute as a nursing mother of the law." See Kent, Commentaries (Holmes' 12th ed. 1873) 473.

PERRY v. STRAWBRIDGE

In determining whether such descendants were the descendants of "brothers" within the meaning of the statutes on intestate succession, the court looked to the common law meaning of the words used in the statute, found that "brother" and "sister" meant legitimates only, and refused to draw any analogy from the statute which gave illegitimates the right to inherit from or through their mother); Adamson v. City of New York, 188 N.Y. 255, 80 N.E. 937 (1907) (the court said, "In interpreting this [riot] statute which defines an offense well known at common law, we are entitled to seek aid from common law definitions of such offenses. . . . Interpreting the statute . . . in the light of the provision quoted from the Penal Code and assisted as we may be by . . . common law definitions, we think that the evidence fails to disclose the existence of a mob or riot. . . ."); United Copper Securities Co. v. Amalgamated Copper Co., 232 F. 574 (C.C.A.N.Y.1916) (in interpreting a federal statute the court said, "There being no federal common law distinct from the common law of the states, . . . a federal court, in construing a federal statute such as that before us, where there is no statutory provision to guide it, must refer to the common law existing at the time of the Declaration of Independence. . . .").

3. In McGinnis v. State, 9 Humph.(Tenn.) 43 (1848), in a prosecution for assault in which the defendant set up as a bar a judgment and fine in justice court, the state asserted that the statute giving the justice court jurisdiction was unconstitutional on the ground that it violated the constitutional requirement that "no freeman shall be put to answer any criminal charge, but by presentment, indictment or impeachment," and "that the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate." The court said: "Let us inquire how the law of England stood . . . at the time of the American Revolution in order to ascertain what law, in relation to the prosecution of offenses our ancestors brought with them to this country, as part of their 'birthright and inheritance.' For we apprehend, the rule, that statutes are to be construed in reference to the principles of the common law, is alike applicable to a provision of the constitution, or fundamental law, and for the same reason, that the framers of the law in either case, are not to be presumed to have intended to make any change, or innovation upon the common law further than is expressly declared. . . ." The court found that at common law indictment was not required in minor cases, and held the statute constitutional.

In Waters & Co. v. Gerard, 189 N.Y. 302, 82 N.E. 143, in upholding the constitutionality of a lien act on the ground that it did not go beyond the common law, the court said at p. 145:

"The principles and rules of organized society found in the English common law, so far as applicable to our conditions, became and continue in force, unless abrogated or modified by express constitutional or statutory enactments. Constitutions and statutes should be construed with reference to the doctrines of the common law. . . .

"In construing the constitutional and statutory provisions which provide that a person shall not be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, it should not be held that there was an intention by convention or Legislature to forbid or in any way affect the right to any lien upon property which had been recognized and sustained by the common law, and thus by the law of the land."

SECTION 5. STATUTE COVERING ENTIRE SUBJECT

COMMONWEALTH v. ALLEN

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1922. 240 Mass. 244, 133 N.E. 625.

RUGG, C. J. The defendant in these cases is in possession of the property and business of the several trust companies by virtue of the power exercised by him as Commissioner of Banks under St.1910, c. 399, § 2 (G.L. c. 167, § 22). The commonwealth, through the action of the Treasurer and Receiver General, was at the time such possession was taken a general depositor to large amounts in each of the trust companies. The object of these suits by the commonwealth is to secure for itself as a preferred claimant a priority over other general creditors in the payment of the amounts of its deposits.

It is not contended that any such preference is established by the express terms of any statute. The argument in behalf of the commonwealth rests upon two main propositions: First, that by the common law here prevailing the commonwealth is entitled to preference (Giles v. Grover, 1 Cl. & Fin. 72; Central Bank v. State, 139 Ga. 54, 76 S.E. 587; Ætna Accident & Life Ins. Co. v. Miller, 54 Mont. 377, 170 P. 760, L.R.A.1918C, 954; Matter of Carnegie Trust Co., 206 N.Y. 390, 99 N.E. 1096; Marshall v. New York, 254 U.S. 380, 41 S.Ct. 143, 65 L.Ed. 315); and, second, that the court will adopt and follow in proceedings of this nature the preferences established for the benefit of the commonwealth in receivership proceedings by R.L. c. 150, § 29 (G.L. c. 216, § 118), under the doctrine declared and applied in Jones v. Arena Publishing Co., 171 Mass. 22, 50 N.E. 15, and Old Colony Trust Co. v. Medfield & Medway Street Railway, 215 Mass. 156, 162, 102 N.E. 484, to the effect that equity will follow the law in respect of statutory preferences.

It is not necessary to examine critically these propositions, because, assuming, without deciding, that they are both sound and applicable in appropriate cases, they are not operative upon the facts and statutes here disclosed. The contention of the commonwealth cannot be sustained for other reasons.

The statute which establishes and regulates the powers of the Commissioner of Banks makes no provision for preference of debts or other obligations due to the commonwealth. The Commissioner is an executive or administrative officer. He exercises visitatorial powers, is charged with duties of rigid inspection, and, when circumstances exist enumerated in St.1910, c. 399, § 2 (G.L. c. 167, § 22), may take and retain possession of the property and business of the bank for the purpose of liquidation of its affairs in accordance with the statute. He acts in all these particulars as a public officer, and not as a receiver appointed by the court. While he possesses some powers commonly conferred upon a receiver, and in many respects is subject to the direction of the court, he nevertheless carries out directly and in his own official capacity a legislative policy. His chart is the legislative mandate as declared in the statute. Greenfield Savings Bank v. Commonwealth, 211 Mass. 207, 209, 97 N.E. 927.

The Supreme Judicial Court is given jurisdiction in equity "to enforce the provisions" of the statute and "to act upon all applications and in all proceedings thereunder." G.L. c. 167, § 36. Thus the power of the court, while not strictly circumscribed, is to a greater or less extent within limits which need not here be defined, bounded by the terms of the statute.

The statute by which the legislative policy is declared contains no preference for debts or obligations due to the commonwealth. Where it has been the purpose of the general court to give a preference to claims of the commonwealth, that commonly has been stated in express words. The earliest preference declared by statute since the Constitution related to insolvent estates of deceased persons. St.1784, c. 2. While in its original enactment preference was given to debts due to the commonwealth, as well as to taxes and excises, that was narrowed by the omission of debts in Rev.St. c. 68, § 1, and now by G.L. c. 198, § 1, preference is given only to "public rates, taxes and excise duties."

Under the insolvent laws of the commonwealth (of course, suspended in operation by the federal Bankruptcy Law [U.S.Comp.St. §§ 9585-9656]), "debts due to and taxes assessed by the commonwealth, or a county, city or town therein," are given a preference. G.L. c. 216, § 118. The same preferences are established as to settlements of estates by receivers. G.L. c. 206, § 31.

In view of these express preferences established by statute, which are not uniform or coextensive, but place estates of deceased persons upon a different footing from estates settled by receivers or under the insolvency laws, the omission of any such preference in the banking law is significant.

The insolvency law does not apply to banks. G.L. c. 216, § 143. It never has included them. They have been the subject of special statutes. A bank was closed under St.1838, c. 14, which, like G.L. c. 167, contained no preference for debts due to the commonwealth. When liquidation arose it was not suggested in argument by distinguished counsel or in the opinion by Chief Justice Shaw that the debt due to the commonwealth from the bank was entitled to priority for full payment over other creditors. Commonwealth v. Phoenix Bank, 11 Metc. 129.

The powers of the trust companies here in liquidation are set forth in G.L. c. 172, § 31, embodying the substance of R.L. c. 116, § 12, as amended by St.1912, c. 54 (St.1914, c. 537, § 3), in these words:

"Such corporation may receive on deposit, storage or otherwise, money, government securities, stocks, bonds, coin, jewelry, plate, valuable papers and documents, evidences of debt, and other property of any kind, upon terms or conditions to be agreed upon, and at the request of the depositor may collect and disburse the interest or income, if any, upon said property received on deposit and collect and disburse the principal of such of said property as produces interest or income when it becomes due, upon terms to be prescribed by the corporation. Such deposits shall be general deposits, and may be made by corporations and persons acting individually or in any fiduciary capacity. Such corporation shall not give collateral or other security for a deposit of money received under this section, except that the corporation may make such a deposit of securities as may be required by the laws of the United States or the rules and regulations of the trustees of the postal savings system as security for deposits of postal savings funds made with such corporation and may give such collateral or other security for deposits of public or other funds as may be required by any public authority making such deposits or controlling the terms upon which they may be made."

The deposits of money which these trust companies were authorized to receive were "general deposits," with the exception that they might give collateral or other security for deposits required by a "public authority." Manifestly the Treasurer and Receiver General was a "public authority" within the meaning of those words in the statute. He might have insisted upon "collateral or other security" as a condition to making a deposit. If the commonwealth were entitled to an absolute preference in the payment of its deposits, it is unlikely that trust companies would be authorized to give him additional collateral or other security. The requirement of the statute that moneys received on deposit shall be "general deposits" (with the specified exceptions) implies that they shall all be commingled on the same footing of relation of debtor by the bank and creditor by the depositor without special preference of one creditor over another. See National Mahaiwe Bank v. Peck, 127 Mass. 298, 34 Am.Rep. 368.

The correlative to G.L. c. 172, § 31, is found in G.L. c. 167, § 32, whereby are defined the duties of the Commissioner in possession of the property and business of a bank. In said section 32 the rights of special depositors of jewelry, plate, money, and other valuables for safe-keeping with the bank are set forth in detail, and the method to be followed by the Commissioner in returning such special deposits to their owners is outlined. The distinction between general depositors and special depositors thus is emphasized. That no other special preferences are established in the statute is an indication that none were intended by the general court.

An important part of the law concerning trust companies relates to savings departments. St.1908, c. 520, §§ 1 to 7; G.L. c. 172, §§ 60 to 72. It there is provided (section 4, c. 520; section 63, c. 172) that the depositors in the savings department shall have as security for payment of their claims the capital stock of the company and the liability of stockholders, but also that they shall have in addition to other security "an equal claim with other creditors upon the capital and other property of the corporation." This implies that "other creditors" includes depositors in the commercial department and imports that such other creditors are all on the same footing. If there were preferences or priorities among such "other creditors," it would be difficult to give to depositors in the savings department an "equal claim with other creditors." The main reason for this provision is that the security otherwise provided under the law may be insufficient to pay in full the claims of the depositors in the savings department. The terms of the statute and the general favor therein manifested for depositors in the savings department would seem to require that, if there are preferences, the savings department depositors ought to be equal to the most favored class. If they share equally with the most favored class, and the commonwealth is held entitled to an absolute preference for the full payment of its claims, grave difficulties in liquidation well might arise.

If it had been the design of the Legislature that the commonwealth as a depositor in a trust company in liquidation should be entitled to an absolute priority for the payment in full of its claims in preference to all other creditors, it is likely, in view of other provisions of the statute, that there would have been some expression to that effect in the words of the statute. An omission of all reference to the subject is significant of a purpose to place the commonwealth on the same basis as other general creditors.

These considerations lead to the conclusion that the general court has dealt comprehensively with the subject of liquidation of banks and trust companies and has established by its mandate all the preferences intended to exist. It is a general principle that, when legislation covers the entire field, previous provisions of either the common or statutory law in conflict therewith become no longer operative.

In each case the entity may be: Petition dismissed, with costs.

NOTE

See State v. Wilson, 43 N.H. 415 (1862), a case which raised the issue whether the common law of nuisance had been impliedly repealed. The court said, that "the whole of a former law is revised by a new statute, and the latter appears to be intended to prescribe the only rules which should govern that subject, the particulars of the old law in which they differ will be regarded as repealed by implication,"—that if a statute revises a whole subject which was formerly governed by the common law, that may effect a repeal of the common law. However the court concluded that the common law of nuisance had not been repealed by the statute there in question. In State v. Morgan, 59 N.H. 322 (1879), however, statutes had been passed in affirmance and amendment of the common law rule of forcible entry and detainer, after which the whole chapter had been repealed, and another statute amended to include the offense of brawl and tumult. The court held that the common law rule of forcible entry and unlawful detainer, and the English statutes relating thereto which had formed a part of that common law were thereby repealed, and that thereafter there was no common law offense of forcible entry or unlawful detainer.

For other cases holding that where legislation covers an entire field it supercedes the common law wherever it is not declaratory of it, see Penn Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Hunt, 237 Mass. 243, 129 N.E. 391 (1921); Jurney Heater Mfg. Co. v. New York, N. H. and H. R. Co., 264 Mass. 427, 162 N.E. 897 (1928); *City of Boston v. REEVES & CO. v. RUSSELL

Supreme Court of North Dakota, 1914.

Goss, J. Plaintiff corporation brings this action to foreclose its chattel mortgage upon a threshing engine, and to determine priority of liens thereon, and particularly as against a blacksmith's lien filed against the engine by Boyle Bros., defendants. Plaintiff sold the engine to one Russell in 1906, taking a mortgage back, which was duly filed and has been renewed, and admittedly is, and always has been, a valid lien upon the property. On April 11, 1911, Russell wrote plaintiff for its written consent to a sale of the mortgaged engine, receiving a reply dated April 15, 1911, in effect withholding consent until it could investigate and until certain conditions were complied with. Russell, however, took no further steps to obtain such written consent, and sold it to Arbogast, for valuable consideration, who bought with notice of the incumbrance. Arbogast thereafter consulted Boyle Bros., machinists, at Jamestown, as to repairing the engine, and one of them went to Russell's place, where the machine still remained, and inspected the same as to the probable cost of overhauling, rebuilding, and putting it in suitable condition, and made an estimate that to do so would cost in the neighborhood of $800. Defendants Boyle Bros., were then engaged by Arbogast, with the knowledge and acquiescence of Russell, to move the engine to the machine shop of Boyle Bros. for repairs and rebuilding the engine, which was thereafter completed at an expense for labor, material, and repairs and incidental expenses, totalling $882.11, and incurred between April 27 and May 26, 1911, and for which amount a blacksmith's lien was soon filed by Boyle Bros. against Arbogast, Russell, and the Reeves Company, by the filing of an affidavit of lien, accompanied with an itemized and verified statement of all labor and items of material and charge entering into the account. Written notice of this was at once given. Plaintiff thereupon demanded possession from Boyle Bros., who had at all times since the completion of the work retained possession of the engine, and upon their refusal thereof the property was taken under warrant of foreclosure. Boyle Bros., in defense pleaded their artisan's lien and possession for the purpose of foreclosure thereof, and asked that their lien, claimed both under section 6925, R.C.1905, and chapter 168, Laws of 1907, be adjudged to be a prior lien to the mortgage of the plaintiffs. With this question of priority of liens, plaintiff seeks to raise the following questions: (1) Whether an artisan's lien takes priority over a mortgage of record on the property liened; . . .

Section 6925, R.C.1905, which does not declare priority of an artisan's lien over recorded mortgages or incumbrances, was the only statute on the subject in 1906 at the time plaintiff's lien became effective. Chapter 168, Laws of 1907, became effective a year after this mortgage was given, and in express terms granted artisans' liens priority over mortgages. Whether this priority is granted as to mortgages taken and in force before its passage is one question arising, but for the purposes of this suit we shall assume the statute to be retrospective in this instance, and as in terms making the artisan's lien superior to the mortgage lien. Whether the statute is thus retrospective or not is immaterial, under the law controlling this decision. In construing statutes on liens, the first consideration is whether the lien is one given at common law, or is instead dependent for its existence solely upon the terms of the statute. Where the statute is merely declaratory of the common law, it is construed together with, and in the light of, the common law; the Legislature being presumed to know the common law on the subject and to enact the statute as merely declaratory thereof, and to be so interpreted in the light of its origin and common-law definition, where the statute does not depart from the governing common-law principles. And this here applies, as artisans' liens are a creation of the common law and not a special lien originating under, and dependent upon, statute for its creation and existence. So, without any reference to chapter 168, Laws of 1907, plaintiff's mortgage must be held to be subordinate to the lien of defendants, as such was the law at the time the mortgage was taken, where the party entitled to the lien has retained possession, as have defendants, at all times after the completion of the work. And this is decisive of the rights of appellant, as chapter 168 of the Laws of 1907, if applicable, is but declaratory of the equivalent of section 6925, R.C. 1905, as supplemented by the common law concerning priority, which by express terms it purports to amend. . . .

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

Appellants filed a petition for rehearing, challenging, as judicial legislation, consideration by the court of the common-law priority of this common-law artisan's lien, and maintaining that because of section 6925, R.C.1905, in terms recognizing an artisan's lien but silent on its priority, the court must find that no priority of such lien can exist, and that any priority must be given by statute under section 6138, R.C.1905; the general statute concerning priority of liens providing that:

"Other things being equal, different liens upon the same property have priority according to the time of their creation except in cases of bottomry and respondentia."

In other words, appellant asserts that, in the determination of this question, we are limited to a construction of statutes, and cannot resort to the common-law rights of the parties to determine the question of priority, where the statute is silent thereon, and counsel cite in support of that contention section 4006, R.C.1905, a provision of the Civil Code, reading:

"In this state there is no common law in any case where the law is declared by the Codes."

And also cite section 10509, R.C.1905, next to the last provision of the Code of Criminal Procedure, providing that:

"The provisions of this Code so far as they are the same as existing statutes, must be construed as continuations thereof and not as new enactments."

From these statutes appellant reasons that there can be no common law on artisan's liens, the Code having spoken on the subject by the declaration therein providing for such a lien, and that, treating section 10509 as a general provision applicable to all the Codes and all Code provisions, the statutes are to be considered as continuations of statutes but not as continuations of the common law in all instances, civil and criminal. To emphasize this claim, appellant has cited section 5 of the Civil Code of California, reading:

"The provisions of this Code, so far as they are substantially the same as existing statutes of the common law, must be construed as continuations thereof and not as new enactments."

Under this California Code provision, and its construction by the courts of that state (Quist v. Hill, 154 Cal. 748, 99 P. 204, at pages 207, 208; Michaelson v. Fish, 1 Cal.App. 116, 81 P. 662; Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, at page 384, 4 P. 919, 10 P. 674; and Sharon v. Sharon, 75 Cal. 1, at page 13, 16 P. 345), statutes are but continuations of the basic common law, a determination of rights under which necessitates consideration of both the common law and the statute where the statute is either silent or ambiguous. But appellant parallels this provision of the Civil Code of California with section 10509, R.C.1905, a portion of our Code of Criminal Procedure, nearly identical, but omitting the phrase of the California Civil Code provision of "or the common law," and therefore contends that in this state in no instance are the statutes to be considered as continuations of the common law. It is urged that the common law is excluded by our Code provision 4006, reading:

"In this state there is no common law in any case where the law is declared by the Codes."

This decision then narrows to the question of whether the common-law priority still exists, notwithstanding section 6925, declaring a lien in the possessor of the property with the right of possession until the charges for repairs are paid, but silent on the question of priority of such lien, unless governed by section 6138, declaring priority of liens according to time of creation, "other things being equal," and section 6724, R.C.1905, that:

"The rule of common law that statutes in derogation thereof are to be strictly construed has no application to this Code. This Code establishes the law of the state respecting the subjects to which it relates; and its provisions are to be liberally construed with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice."

In its last analysis the decision resolves to whether the provisions of our Civil Code are to be considered as continuations of the common law as well as continuations of statute, or whether, on the contrary, the fact that a common-law lien has been declared by statute makes all rights thereunder dependent solely on the statute, without regard to common-law incidents, or history, in which case a priority that would here exist under the same circumstances at common law as an incident to the same lien given by common law as here declared, also by statute, would be negatived and defeated by the mere silence of the statute on priority. If the statute is to be considered as but a continuation of the common-law lien without regard to common-law priority, the priority still exists; the statute then declaring the lien and the common law defining priority. If the statute is not a continuation of the common law but works an abolition of all common law on the subject, inclusive of the incident of priority, then some general statute must be found conferring priority, the particular statute giving none, otherwise there is no priority of artisan's liens over earlier liens.

The conclusions in the main opinion are sustained by all authority, and appellant's attack thereon loses all force in the face of the fact that common law is by statute (sections 4003, 4004, 4005, R.C.1905) declared to be the basic law, thereby requiring statutory enactment, to be considered as but a continuation of the common law as to civil rights and liabilities. Section 4003 reads:

"The will of the sovereign power is expressed: . . . (4) By the decisions of the tribunals enforcing those rules, which, though not enacted, form what is known as customary or common law."

And section 4005 declares what shall be evidence of such common law. By statute the provisions of the Civil Code are to be considered as but continuations of the common law, as well as other statutes, and no distinction exists in this respect between this state and California, notwithstanding section 10509, R.C.1905. Plainly this provision of the Code of Criminal Procedure can have no relation to or bearing upon the question of whether the provisions of the Civil Code and civil statutes are to be considered as continuations of the common law. Each of the seven Codes was passed as a separate bill in the Revision of 1895 and as an entirety. The term "Code," as used in many places in each of the seven Codes, must refer solely to the Code of which it was a part at the time of its enactment, and this provision has reference to Criminal Procedure and is not a general provision applicable to all of the seven Codes as separately enacted. The Code provisions relative to crimes and criminal procedure, as sections 8531-8538, and 10509, prescribe a different rule as to such than generally applies to civil rights and remedies. Our Penal Statutes undertake to and do define all our crimes, and our Code of Criminal Procedure in the main declares the process of administration of our Penal Statutes. But it is vastly different, as to civil rights and liabilities, to completely codify, which would be an absolute impossibility. Manifestly civil statutes must be regarded as they have always been construed to be, but continuations, affirmances, modifications, or repeals of basic common law governing principles, and to be interpreted in the light of the common law as has been done for generations. . . .

But counsel, in support of his contention, would emphasize the fact that the territorial statute declared no priority of this lien, and that by the Laws of 1890 priority was granted, which provision was repealed in the Revision of 1895, which priority provision has been again expressly re-enacted by chapter 168 of the Laws of 1907; and counsel inquires how the double repeal and enactment on priority can be considered other than as evidencing a successive legislative expression of denial and reaffirmance of priority, and that the lien by mortgage of the appellant having attached at a time when priority of artisan's liens was thus refused recognition and by inference denied, upon what basis can it be found that a lien at common law could exist during such interval? In territorial times, and until the enactment of the statute of 1890 granting it, priority existed at common law, as is held in Garr, Scott & Co. v. Clements, 4 N.D. 559, 62 N.W. 640. Upon repeal of the statute of 1890, no mention of priority being made in the repealing statute, and there being nothing to positively evidence a legislative intention to the contrary, the common-law rule as to priority was revived; "the repeal of the statute which abrogated a common-law rule revives that rule." Beavan v. Went, 155 Ill. 592, 41 N.E. 91, 31 L.R.A. 85; Baum v. Thoms, 150 Ind. 398, 50 N.E. 357, 65 Am.St.Rep. 368; Burleigh County v. Rhud, 23 N.D. 362, 136 N.W. 1082; Lewis' Sutherland, Stat.Const. § 294, quoting above rule and declaring same applicable, "even though there is a statute that a repeal of the repealing act shall not revive the act repealed," similar to section 6739, R.C. 1905, identical with section 20 of Civil Code of California, in force since 1872.

"Where a statute repeals the common law and is then itself repealed, the common law is revived, and the authorities say that, if a statute that is declaratory of the common law is repealed, the common law more clearly remains in force for the reason that the statute is an affirmance of it." Harper v. Loan Co., 55 W.Va. 149, 46 S.E. 817, 2 Ann.Cas. 42, at page 45; Endlich on Interpretation of Statutes, § 475.

Under this rule and the presumption that the common law is abrogated by statute only so far as is necessary to give force to the statute and the legislative intent thereby and no farther. State ex rel. v. Sullivan, 81 Ohio, 79, 90 N.E. 146, 26 L.R.A., N.S., 514, 18 Ann.Cas. 139; Chicago & E. Ry. Co. v. Luddington, 175 Ind. 35, 93 N.E. 273, citing much authority, the territorial statute (subdivision 2, § 1814, of Civil Code of 1877) did not efface the common-law priority of artisans' liens. Chapter 88, Laws of 1890, by declaring that priority was but declaratory of the prevailing common law and repeal of the Laws of 1890, instead of leaving no law on the subject, revived or made applicable the common law, and such was the situation when this appellant's mortgage was taken. That the Legislature has by chapter 168, Laws of 1907, again re-enacted the common-law provision of priority is of no consequence as a legislative construction on the question or otherwise. If it be assumed to be a legislative construction as contended, it is not binding on the courts, as it is beyond legislative power or province to interpret retrospectively by legislative act prior statute or common law. The duty and power of interpretation of past legislative enactment lies in the courts alone. But against revival of the common law it is contended that the Legislature cannot be presumed to have needlessly declared a statutory priority when a common-law priority existed, and on that assumption it is urged that no priority existed before 1890 or during the interval from January 1, 1896 to 1907. If appellant's basis of exclusion from common law by the statute of every subject touched upon by statute is accepted, this rule would be applicable. But, the civil statutes being but continuations of the prior common law to be construed therewith, the fact that a statute declares one incident of the common law on the subject does not of itself and alone signify an exclusion of all other common law touching rights on which the statute is silent. Nearly all the substantive law as contained in our Civil Code is but declaratory of established and prior existing common law, a fact which of itself establishes such legislation to be needless, except to render the same accessible and easy of reference, the principal benefit of our codification of a small portion of common-law principles. Appellant insists that the general statute as to priority of liens (section 6138, R.C.1905, first found as section 1711, Civil Code of 1877), declaring that, "other things being equal, different liens upon the same property have priority according to the time of their creation," here controls to exclude any common-law priority. This statute is but another principle of the common law codified. By its terms only when "other things being equal" is it applicable. The exception made is to exempt from its application instances, as here, where other things are not equal in that the lien recognized by statute has a common-law origin. . . .

The petition for rehearing is denied.

NOTE

"The repeal of an act repealing or modifying the common law rule revives the common law rule ab initio, and it exists the same as if it had never been repealed. The time during which statutes repealing the common law rule remain in force is regarded only as a suspension of such rule of the common law." Baum v. Thoms, 150 Ind. 378 (1898). Moreover, a statute which provides that no act repealed by the legislature shall be deemed to be revived by the repeal of the repealing act will not affect the rule that the repeal of a statute which supersedes a common law rule will have the effect of reviving the common law. Beavan v. Went, 155 Ill. 592 (1895). See also Levy v. McCartee, 6 Peters (U.S.) 102 (1832).

However, the repeal of a statute declaratory of the common law has no effect upon the common law rule other than to work a revival of it. In re Sloan's Estate, 7 Cal.App.2d 319, 46 P.2d (1935); Gray v. Obear, 54 Ga. 231 (1875); but cf. Sedgwick v. Stanton, 14 N.Y. 289 (1856), holding that the repeal of a statute declaratory of the common law of champerty and maintenance abolished the common law rule. (The court was somewhat influenced by the present low regard for the doctrine of maintenance in England, and by some indications in the code and the revisors' notes that they intended to abolish the whole concept.)

SECTION 6. UNIFORM LAWS

Review here attitude of courts toward uniform laws as reflected in material in Chapter 3, Section 7, supra, pp. 459-468.

SECTION 7. ANALOGICAL REASONING FROM LEGISLATION

JAMES M. LANDIS, STATUTES AND THE SOURCES OF LAW

Harvard Legal Essays, 213, 221: 1934, Harv.Univ.Press.

When the highest tribunal of England in 1868 decided that the landowner who artificially accumulates water upon his premises is absolutely liable for damage caused by its escape, that judgment had an enormous influence throughout Anglo-American law. True, the rule evolved was supposed to possess a rational basis in the earlier common-law treatment accorded wild animals. But we are sufficiently mature to recognize that there are differences between rattlesnakes and reservoirs, and to realize that the ultimate wisdom of such a judgment must rest upon the question of how well it distributes the unavoidable losses incident to the pursuit of a particular industrial occupation. Had Parliament in 1868 adopted a similar rule, no such permeating results to the general body of Anglo-American law would have ensued. And this would be true, though the act had been preceded by a thorough and patient inquiry by a Royal Commission into the business of storing large volumes of water, and its concomitant risks, and even though the same Lords who approved Mr. Fletcher's claim had in voting "aye" upon the measure given reasons identical with those contained in their judgments. Such a statute would have caused no ripple in the processes of adjudication either in England or on the other side of the Atlantic, and the judicial mind would have failed to discern the essential similarity between water stored in reservoirs, crude petroleum stored in tanks, and gas and electricity confined and maintained upon the premises—surely an easier leap than that from wild animals to reservoirs.

SCHUSTER, THE PRINCIPLES OF GERMAN CIVIL LAW,
10-11 (1906)

17. . . . A somewhat dangerous method of interpretation derived from Roman law, and not unfrequently carried out by the German Courts, is the interpretation by analogy. Where a gap has been left by any statutory rule it is filled up, according to this method, by reference to another rule contained in the same statute, in connexion with which a point corresponding to the point left open in the first-mentioned rule is expressly provided for, and the ratio juris of the last-mentioned expression is taken to be a general rule of law applicable to all cases. This method which assumes that the omission in the first case was accidental, while it may have been deliberate, and also that a judge may fill in a gap left by the legislator's want of care, is not in accordance with the English methods of interpretation.

NOTE

In Freund, "Interpretation of Statutes", 65 U.Pa.L.Rev. 207, 226, the author says: "The true problem of analogy may be stated this way: a statute has altered common law principles with reference to one relation; another relation not covered by the terms of the statute involves the same or similar principles: can the new relation be said to be within the spirit though not within the letter of the statute? The principle of liberalness stands in the way, or, to put it in another way, most statutes deal with principles only in the form of rules, and a principle is flexible while a rule is not. The law of prescription is in America common law and expresses a principle with regard to easements analogous to the principle involved in the statute of limitations which applies to corporeal hereditaments; the traditional period of the statute of limitations having been twenty years, such is also the common law period of prescription. If the period of limitation is by statute reduced to fifteen years, the courts correspondingly reduce the time for prescription. But if the period of prescription is fixed by statute, as it is in England (1832), it does not alter automatically by a reduction of the period of the statute of limitations from twenty to twelve.

"It would probably be accepted as an undisputed proposition of English and American law that statutes are not extended by analogy. . . ."

AMORY v. MEREDITH

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1863. 7 Allen 397.

HOAR, J. The testatrix, Miss Elizabeth Amory, being in feeble health, conveyed all her real and personal estate to trustees, upon the trust to manage the property and pay the income of it to her during her life; to reconvey the whole to her whenever she and the trustees should think it expedient to terminate the trust; or, upon her decease before its termination, to convey it to such persons as she should by her last will designate; or, upon her death intestate, to her heirs at law. She afterward inherited a small amount of real and personal estate which was not included in the trust, and the trust was not terminated during her life. By her last will she gave and devised one half of all the estate, real, personal and mixed, of which she should die seised or possessed, to trustees, for the benefit of the family of a brother; one tenth in trust for a sister and her children; and the residue of her said estate to four brothers and sisters named in the will. This suit is brought by her executors and trustees to obtain the direction of the court in the execution of their trusts, on account of the conflicting claims of the heirs at law and the devisees under the will. And the question is, whether the real and personal estate embraced in the deed of trust will pass under the will?

The answer to this question is to be sought by ascertaining the intent of the testatrix as manifested by the will; and this intention being once ascertained, effect is to be given to it accordingly.

We are therefore to decide whether the language of Miss Amory's will, construed in reference to all the property in which she had a legal or equitable interest at the time it was made, and at the time of her death, shall be held to include in its disposition the property of which she had a power of appointment.

Without reviewing in detail the numerous English cases, it is perhaps sufficient to say that, according to the doctrine of the English courts of chancery, the will would certainly not be a good execution of the power. The cases are summed up and reviewed in Doe v. Roake, 2 Bing. 497, and in Blagge v. Miles, 1 Story R. 426. The distinction between "power" and "property" is carefully preserved through all of them; and the refinements and subtleties to which this distinction leads are great and perplexing. The general rule is thus stated by Chancellor Kent, in his Commentaries: "In the case of wills, it has been repeatedly declared, and is now the settled rule, that in respect to the execution of a power, there must be a reference to the subject of it, or to the power itself; unless it be in a case in which the will would be inoperative without the aid of the power, and the intention to execute the power became clear and manifest." "The intent must be so clear that no other reasonable intent can be imputed to the will; and if the will does not refer to a power, or the subject of it, and if the words of the will may be satisfied without supposing an intention to execute the power, then, unless the intent to execute the power be clearly expressed, it is no execution of it." 4 Kent. Com. (6th ed.) 335. . . .

. . . Lord St. Leonards, the highest authority on any question relating to this branch of the law, says that, "in reviewing the cases, it is impossible not to be struck with the number of instances where the intention has been defeated by the rule distinguishing power from property." Sugden on Powers, (8th ed.) 338.

It is not surprising that a course of decisions obnoxious to such criticisms should be at length controlled by legislation. By St. 7 Will. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 26, § 27, it was declared that a general devise of real or personal estate, in wills thereafter made, should operate as an execution of a power of the testator over the same, unless a contrary intention should appear on the will. Upon this English statute Judge Story observes, in a note to Blagge v. Miles: "The doctrine, therefore, has at last settled down in that country to what would seem to be the dictate of common sense, unaffected by technical niceties." 1 Story R. 458, note.

We are aware of no decisions in this commonwealth, binding on us as an authority, which should compel us to adopt a rule of construction likely, in a majority of cases, to defeat the intention it is designed to ascertain and effectuate. Seeking for the intention of the testator, the rule of the English statute appears to us the wiser and safer rule; certainly when applied to cases like the one now under consideration, where the testatrix is dealing with property which had been her own, and of which she had the beneficial use, as well as the power of disposal.

The point to be determined is simply this: Did Miss Amory mean to dispose of the property held under the deed of trust, by the terms of her will, in devising all the estate of which she should be possessed at her death? We can have no doubt that she did. It was originally her property by inheritance. She received the income of it during her life. She had the complete power of disposal over it by will; and it constituted the great bulk of the property over which she had testamentary control. If she died intestate, like the rest of her property, it was to go to her heirs. The trust had been created merely with a view to relieve her, when in feeble health, from the trouble of managing and investing her estate, and with a provision that the trust should be terminated whenever, in her opinion and that of the trustees, it might be expedient. The rest of her property had been transferred, though not to the legal ownership, yet to the care and custody of the same trustees; had been treated in precisely the same manner with that included in the trust; and we can see no reason to believe that it was regarded by her in any different light.

The decree will therefore direct the trustees to convey the property held by them in accordance with the devises and bequests of the will. . . .

See also McGibbon v. Abbot (1885) 10 App.Cas. 653, where English legislation concerning the law of wills was used as a precedent for the Canadian common law rule. The court said that it was "not bound by a course of English decisions which have been swept away by the legislature as fraught with inconvenience and mischief".

EBERS v. MacEACHERN

Supreme Court of Prince Edward Island, 1932 4 M.P.R. 333.

SAUNDERS, J.: This action was brought to recover the value of a silver black fox shot and killed by the defendant on his farm premises. The plaintiff owned a pair of silver black foxes and had them ranched with one Frank McKay of East Royalty. Frank McKay, like many other farmers in this Province, was engaged in the breeding and raising of silver black foxes for nine years in his ranch. The fox in question was a ranch-bred fox. I have no doubt that this fox was the progeny of foxes bred in captivity for a great many years. It escaped from its pen and was at large for several days. The defendant about this time had lost some of his poultry. He saw every evidence of these having been killed by some animal as feathers and blood were strewn over the snow. He believed it was the plaintiff's fox that did the killing, although as a fact he did not see the fox kill any. The fox came to the defendant's a little after dark and went right straight for the hen-house and the defendant shot him. The plaintiff claims the value of the fox as a live animal.

The action was tried at the last January sitting of this Court before the learned Chief Justice and he charged the jury as follows:

"The whole question for you to decide is narrowed down to one. You are to fix the value of the fox. The rest of the questions involved in determining whether it will have to be ultimately paid or not are questions of law which will be considered later.

It is only in the event of the decision of the Court being that according to law the defendant is bound to pay a price for this fox that your verdict will come into effect."

The jury returned a verdict of no value for the fox.

The plaintiff on the 26th day of January, 1932, gave the defendant a notice of motion to have the verdict given herein set aside and a new trial had between the parties. . . .

In Kent's Commentaries on American Law, Blackstone series, vol. 2, p. 348, it is said:

"Animals feræ naturæ, so long as they are reclaimed by the art and power of man, are also the subject of a qualified property; but when they return to their natural liberty and ferocity, without the animus revertendi, the property in them ceases. . . . If an animal belongs to the class of tame animals, . . . he is then clearly a subject of absolute property; but if he belongs to the class of animals which are wild by nature and owe all their temporary docility to the discipline of man, such as deer and several kinds of fowl, then the animal is a subject of qualified property, and which continues so long as the tameness and dominion remain."

And he sums up by saying (p. 349):

"The common law has wisely avoided all perplexing questions and refinements . . . and has adopted the test laid down by Pufendorf, by referring the question, whether the animal be wild or tame, to our knowledge of his habits, derived from fact and experience." . . .

The question now is, are foxes domestic or tame animals?

I am convinced beyond doubt that foxes in this Province owing to the fact that they have been bred in captivity for many years and have received exceptional care and attention, have greatly changed in their habits and disposition. I am far from saying that when released they have the animus revertendi or that they would have no disposition to escape the owner's dominion. I am equally convinced however that the legislators of our Province believed their habits and disposition have so completely changed and altered as to be now regarded as domestic or tame animals.

We have in this Province an Act known as "The Domestic Animals Act" passed in the year 1888. This Act is intended to regulate the running at large of tame animals within the Province. It has no relation whatever to wild animals or what are generally known and described as animals feræ naturæ; it might very well have been called "The Tame Animals Act."

When this Act was passed no such industry was known in this Province as the fox industry. It is true that a few pioneer fox men were then engaged in raising and breeding foxes. The year 1910 was the beginning of the breeding and raising of foxes in captivity on a large scale. . . .

After many years of confinement and breeding their habits and disposition became so completely changed that in the year 1919 they were regarded by the fox breeders as tame or domestic animals and the legislators of our Province in 1919 included them in "The Domestic Animals Act." The Act of 1888 is as follows:

"1. This Act may be cited as 'The Domestic Animals Act.'

"2. In this Act unless the context otherwise requires: (a) The expression 'animal,' except in the second part of this Act, means and includes horses, neat cattle, sheep, swine, turkeys, geese and all other domestic fowl. (b) The expression 'animal' in the second part of this Act means and includes a stallion, bull, ram or boar pig."

In the year 1919 the Act of 1888 was amended so as to include foxes. The Act now reads as follows:

"2. In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, (as amended by 9 Geo. V, ch. 6, sec. 4): (a) The expression 'animal,' except in the second part of this Act, means and includes horses, neat cattle, sheep, silver black foxes and cross or patch foxes, but not including those named in sub-section (b) turkeys, geese and all other domestic fowl. (3 Edward VII, ch. 2.) (b) The expression 'animal' in the second part of this Act means and includes a stallion, bull, ram or boar pig. (3 Edward VII, ch. 2.)"

As already stated, at the time of passing the 1888 Act foxes were not regarded as tame or domestic animals and the provisions of the Act were framed to meet only such animals as were then regarded as tame or domestic. The provisions of the Act have been changed only in minor detail, and are certainly not as applicable to foxes as to the other tame or domestic animals; yet I see no great difficulty in bringing foxes within the provisions of Part V of the Act. Certain it is that the legislators intended that foxes should be regarded as tame or domestic animals as they were specifically included in the 1919 amendment in "The Domestic Animals Act." I would hesitate to nullify the clear and unequivocal intention of the legislators.

I know of no other province or place where foxes have been declared by statute to be tame or domestic animals and, as I see it, all the cases cited by counsel for the defendant have no application in this case. I think it goes without saying that no person would be justified in shooting his neighbour's horse or cow should it stray on his premises and now, since a fox is placed in the same category as a horse or cow and regarded as a tame or domestic animal, the same principle applies.

The evidence discloses the fox in question was an animal of some value and was the property of the plaintiff.

I am of opinion that the verdict of the jury was wrong and should be set aside.

NOTE

In numerous other cases courts have reasoned by analogy from statutes which were not necessarily determinative of their decisions. In Johnson v. United States, 163 F. 30 (1908), where a bankrupt was being prosecuted for concealing assets from the trustee in bankruptcy, the issue was whether a schedule of assets and liabilities filed by the bankrupt in district court in an involuntary bankruptcy proceeding was entitled to the immunity accorded pleadings under a statute which provided that "No pleading of a party, nor any discovery or evidence obtained from a party or witness by means of a judicial proceeding . . . shall be given in evidence, or in any manner used against him . . . in any criminal proceeding. . . ." The court, speaking through Mr. Justice Holmes, held that the schedules were protected, saying: "We quite agree that vague arguments as to the spirit of a constitution or statute have little worth. We recognize that courts have been disinclined to extend statutes modifying the common law beyond the direct operation of the words used, and that at times this disinclination has been carried very far. But it seems to us that there may be statutes that need a different treatment. A statute may indicate or require as its justification a change in the policy of the law, although it expresses that change only in the specific cases most likely to occur to the mind. The Legislature has the power to decide what the policy of the law shall be, and if it has intimated its will, however, indirectly, that will should be recognized and obeyed. The major premise of the conclusion expressed in a statute, the change of policy that induces the enactment, may not be set out in terms, but it is not an adequate discharge of duty for courts to say: We see what you are driving at, but you have not said it, and therefore we shall go on as before."

In Queen v. Jackson, [1891] 1 Q.B. 671, defendant, in order to compel restitution of his conjugal rights, seized his wife and detained her in his house, leaving her free to move about the house but not to leave. He claimed that under the English law he had the right to act as he did. The court held that no such right existed under the English law. In an opinion which typified the attitude of the other members of the court, Lord Esher said: "I think that the passing of the Act of Parliament which took away the power of attachment in such cases [power of the court to enforce a decree for restitution of conjugal rights by attachment] is the strongest possible evidence to show that the legislature had no idea that a power would remain in the husband to imprison the wife for himself; and this tends to show that it is not and never was the law of England that the husband has such a right of seizing and imprisoning the wife as contended for in this case. . . ."

KEIFER & KEIFER v. RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORP.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1939.
306 U.S. 381, 59 S.Ct. 516, 83 L.Ed. 784.

MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER delivered the opinion of the Court.

The Court took this case for review because an important question of federal law called for settlement, particularly in view of a conflict between the court below and the Supreme Court of Minnesota. Casper v. Regional Agricultural Credit Corporation, 202 Minn. 433, 278 N.W. 896. The question is whether a Regional Agricultural Credit Corporation, in the circumstances presently to be stated, is immune from suit.

On July 21, 1932, Congress enlarged the powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation (hereafter called "Reconstruction") established early that year, Act of January 22, 1932, c. 8, 47 Stat. 5, 15 U.S.C.A. § 601 et seq., by authorizing it, among other things, to create regional agricultural credit corporations "in any of the twelve Federal land-bank districts." Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932, § 201(e), c. 520, 47 Stat. 709, 713, 12 U.S.C.A. § 1148. Each corporation was to have a paid-up capital of not less than $3,000,000 to be subscribed for by Reconstruction, was to be managed by appointees of Reconstruction, and was empowered to make loans to farmers and stockmen for agricultural purposes or for raising and marketing livestock. Accordingly, on September 10, 1932, Reconstruction chartered the Regional Agricultural Credit Corporation of Sioux City, Iowa (hereafter called "Regional"). Regional, in due exercise of its powers, entered into so-called cattle-feeding contracts, whereby it undertook to provide sufficient feed and water for livestock with appropriate security for rendering these services. Failure through negligence to provide proper care for cattle delivered under this arrangement, with resulting damage to the livestock, is the basis of this suit brought by petitioner, plaintiff below, against Reconstruction and Regional. Both defendants demurred on several grounds, of which challenge to the jurisdiction of the court is alone pertinent here. The District Court sustained the demurrers and dismissed the suit. 22 F.Supp. 918. The Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed, holding for Reconstruction because its control of Regional had been transferred by Executive Order (No. 6084, dated March 27, 1933, effective May 27, 1933, 12 U.S.C.A. c. 7 note) to the Farm Credit Administration prior to the alleged cause of action, and for Regional because it was found immune from suit. 8 Cir., 97 F.2d 812. Certiorari was granted, directed solely to the latter issue. 305 U.S. 588, 59 S.Ct. 106, 83 L.Ed. 372.

The starting point of inquiry is the immunity from unconsented suit of the government itself. As to the states, legal irresponsibility was written into the Eleventh Amendment, Const.U.S.C.A.; as to the United States, it is derived by implication. Principality of Monaco v. Mississippi, 292 U.S. 313, 321, 54 S.Ct. 745, 747, 78 L.Ed. 1282.

For present purposes it is academic to consider whether this exceptional freedom from legal responsibility rests on the theory that the United States is deemed the institutional descendant of the Crown, enjoying its immunity but not its historic prerogatives, cf. Langford v. United States, 101 U.S. 341, 343, 25 L.Ed. 1010, or on a metaphysical doctrine "that there can be no legal right as against the authority that makes the law on which the right depends." Kawananakoa v. Polyblank, 205 U.S. 349, 353, 27 S.Ct. 526, 527, 51 L.Ed. 834. But because the doctrine gives the government a privileged position, it has been appropriately confined.

Therefore, the government does not become the conduit of its immunity in suits against its agents or instrumentalities merely because they do its work. United States v. Lee, 106 U.S. 196, 213, 221, 1 S.Ct. 240, 254, 261, 27 L.Ed. 171; Sloan Shipyards Corp. v. U. S. Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corp., 258 U.S. 549, 567, 42 S.Ct. 386, 388, 66 L.Ed. 762. For more than a hundred years corporations have been used as agencies for doing work of the government. Congress may create them "as appropriate means of executing the powers of government, as, for instance, . . . a railroad corporation for the purpose of promoting commerce among the states." Luxton v. North River Bridge Co., 153 U.S. 525, 529, 14 S.Ct. 891, 892, 38 L.Ed. 808. But this would not confer on such corporations legal immunity even if the conventional to-sue-and-be-sued clause were omitted. In the context of modern thought and practice regarding the use of corporate facilities, such a clause is not a ritualistic formula which alone can engender liability like unto indispensable words of early common law, such as "warrantizo" or "to A and his heirs", for which there were no substitutes and without which desired legal consequences could not be wrought. Littleton, Tenures (Wambaugh ed.) §§ 1, 733.

Congress may, of course, endow a governmental corporation with the government's immunity. But always the question is: has it done so? Federal Land Bank v. Priddy, 295 U.S. 229, 231, 55 S.Ct. 705, 706, 79 L.Ed. 1408. Cf. Helvering v. Gerhardt, 304 U.S. 405, 411, 412, notes, 58 S.Ct. 969, 971, 972, 82 L.Ed. 1427. This is our present problem. Has Congress endowed Regional with immunity in the circumstances which enveloped its creation? It is not a textual problem; for Congress has not expressed its will in words. Congress may not even have had any consciousness of intention. The Congressional will must be divined, and by a process of interpretation which, in effect, is the ascertainment of policy immanent not merely in the single statute from which flow the rights and responsibilities of Regional, but in a series of statutes utilizing corporations for governmental purposes and drawing significance from dominant contemporaneous opinion regarding the immunity of governmental agencies from suit.

Because of the advantages enjoyed by the corporate device compared with conventional executive agencies, the exigencies of war and the enlarged scope of government in economic affairs have greatly extended the use of independent corporate facilities for governmental ends. In spawning these corporations during the past two decades, Congress has uniformly included amenability to law. Congress has provided for not less than forty of such corporations discharging governmental functions, and without exception the authority to-sue-and-be-sued was included. Such a firm practice is partly an indication of the present climate of opinion which has brought governmental immunity from suit into disfavor, partly it reveals a definite attitude on the part of Congress which should be given hospitable scope. It is noteworthy that the oldest surviving government corporation—the Smithsonian Institution—has several times been in the law courts, even in the absence of explicit authority and although the general feeling regarding governmental immunity was very different in 1846 from what it has become in our own day. 9 Stat. 102, 20 U.S.C.A. § 41 et seq. Smithsonian Institution v. Meech, 169 U.S. 398, 18 S. Ct. 396, 42 L.Ed. 793; Smithsonian Institution v. St. John, 214 U.S. 19, 29 S.Ct. 601, 53 L.Ed. 892.

Only two instances have been brought to the Court's attention in which Congress has not explicitly rendered its recent corporate creations amenable to suit. These are the Regionals and the Federal Savings and Loan Associations. 48 Stat. 128, 132-134, 12 U.S.C.A. § 1464. It is significant that neither of these classes of corporations was the direct emanation of Congress or the offspring of a general incorporation law under Congressional authority. Sloan Shipyards Corp. v. U. S. Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corp., supra. Each was to come into being through an organ that had theretofore been created by Congress. We put the Federal Savings and Loan Associations to one side, because they are not now before the Court. But the circumstances attending the origination of Regional make it manifest that it was within the considerations that have uniformly led Congress to make its immediate corporate creatures subject to suit. The genesis, functions, and affiliations of Regional all negative the assumption that in its operations it was to be without the law.

Reconstruction is the parent of Regional. When creating it, Congress gave Reconstruction various general corporate powers including authority "to sue and be sued, to complain and to defend, in any court of competent jurisdiction, State or Federal." 47 Stat. 5, 6, 15 U.S.C.A. § 604. When later Congress authorized Reconstruction to create these Regional Agricultural Credit Corporations, it did so by outlining in a single section of a comprehensive statute the broad scope of this added power for Reconstruction. 47 Stat. 709, 713. Congress naturally assumed that the general corporate powers to which it had given particularity in the original statute establishing Reconstruction would flow automatically to the Regionals from the source of their being. Such, certainly, has been the practical construction of the Regional Agricultural Credit Corporations in the instinctive pursuit of their enterprise. See, e. g., Hallenbeck v. Regional Agricultural Credit Corporation, 47 Ariz. 477, 56 P.2d 1041; Regional Agricultural Credit Corporation v. Elston, Prince & McDade, La.App., 183 So. 91. Cf. Lewis v. Regional Agricultural Credit Corporation 10

Cir., 92 F.2d 1008. To imply for Regionals a unique legal position compared with those corporations to whose purposes Regional is so closely allied, is to infer Congressional idiosyncrasy. There is a much more sensible explanation for the failure of Congress to bring Regional by express terms within its emphatic practice not to confer sovereign immunity upon these government corporations. Congress had a right to assume that the characteristic energies for corporate enterprise with which a few months previously it had endowed Reconstruction would now radiate through Reconstruction to Regional.

To give Regional an immunity denied to more than two score corporations, each designed for a purpose of government not relevantly different from that which occasioned the creation of Regional, is to impute to Congress a desire for incoherence in a body of affiliated enactments and for drastic legal differentiation where policy justifies none. A fair judgment of the statute in its entire setting relieves us from making such an imputation of caprice.

The legal position of Regional is, therefore, the same as though Congress had expressly empowered it "to sue and be sued." . . .

Reversed.

NOTES

1. None of the law review commentaries on the principal case is particularly helpful concerning its legislation aspects.

2. In Taff Vale Ry. v. Amalgamated Society of Ry. Servants, [1909] A.C. 426, the issue was whether a union is suable in its group name. Farwell, J., said: "The questions that I have to consider are what, according to the true construction of the Trade Union Acts, has the Legislature enabled the trade unions to do, and what, if any, liability does a trade union incur for wrongs done to others in the exercise of its authorized powers?" He discussed at length the statutory recognition that has been accorded unions and their activities, and concluded: "The proper rule of construction of statutes such as these is that in the absence of express contrary intention the legislature intends that the creature of the statute shall have the same duties, and that its funds shall be subject to the same liabilities as the general law would impose on a private individual doing the same thing. . . . If, therefore, I am right in concluding that the society are liable in tort, the action must be against them in their registered name. . . ."

See also United Mine Workers of America v. Coronado Coal Co., 259 U.S. 344, 42 S.Ct. 570, 66 L.Ed. 975 (1922), which was a suit against the union under the anti-trust laws. In holding that the unincorporated association was suable in the group name, the court described in detail the organization of the union, its purposes, and the great powers and funds given over to the central organization for the purpose of carrying out those ends, saying, "No organized corporation has greater unity of action, and in none is more power centered in the governing executive bodies. Undoubtedly at common law, an unincorporated association of persons was not recognized as having any other character than a partnership in whatever was done, and it could only sue or be sued in the names of its members, and their liability had to be enforced against each member. . . . But the growth and necessities of these great labor organizations have brought affirmative legal recognition of their existence and usefulness and provisions for their protection, which their members have found necessary. . . ."

"It would be unfortunate if an organization with as great power as this International Union has in the raising of large funds and in directing the conduct of four hundred thousand members in carrying on, in a wide territory, industrial controversies and strikes, out of which so much unlawful injury to private rights is possible, could assemble its assets to be used therein free from liability for injuries by torts committed in course of such strikes. To remand persons injured to a suit against each of the 400,000 members to recover damages and to levy on his share of the strike fund, would be to leave them remediless."

Some state courts have refused to follow the Taff Vale Ry. and Coronado Coal Co. Cases, relying at least in part upon differences in their own legislative background. For example see District No. 21, U. M. W. A. v. Bourland, (Ark.) 277 S.W. 547 (1925); Tucker v. Eatough, 186 N.C. 505, 120 S.E. 57 (1923).

SECTION 8. VIOLATION OF STATUTES AS NEGLIGENCE PER SE

JAMES M. LANDIS, STATUTES AND THE SOURCES OF LAW

Harvard Legal Essays, 213, 220: 1934, Harv. Univ. Press.

One well recognized field exists where statutes have been commonly relied upon by courts to determine whether certain types of conduct are to be regarded as tortious. Legislatures in striking at action deemed by them to be undesirable often fail to think beyond the imposition of a criminal penalty for pursuing forbidden acts. The very prohibition, however, carries with it a judgment of culpability. Courts have generally recognized this fact, and have enlarged the area of tort liability by giving the statute the effect of attaching culpability to action in disregard of the statute.

EVERS v. DAVIS

Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey, 1914.
86 N.J.L. 196, 90 A. 677.

GARRISON, J. Upon the trial of this cause, which was an action of negligence brought by an administrator to recover damages for a death that was attributable to the absence of fire escapes upon a tenement house owned by the defendant, the trial court conceived the idea that the proper action was not an action of negligence, but "an action based on a violation of the statute," the statute in question being the Tenement House Act of 1904 (P.L. 1904, c. 61). Under this conception of the plaintiff's statutory rights the trial court permitted an amendment of the complaint by which its allegations of negligence were stricken out, and in their place the nonperformance of a statutory duty was charged. The effect of this amendment and of the trial theory that induced it was the overruling of a line of testimony offered by the defendant and the denial of requests to charge, which rulings were admittedly erroneous if the action of negligence originally brought by the plaintiff was the proper remedy.

A little more in detail the facts of the case were as follows: On November 11, 1912, the defendant became the owner of "a three-story and basement tenement," which was unprovided with fire escapes. On December 28, 1912, the building took fire, and plaintiff's intestate died of injuries attributable to the absence of fire escapes. The Tenement House Act of 1904, by its thirty-sixth section, provides that every nonfireproof tenement house "more than three stories in height" shall be provided with fire escapes from each apartment. By the 189th section it is provided that every person who shall violate any provision of the act shall be subject to certain penalties, to be recovered by the State Board of Tenement House Supervision under a proceeding prescribed by the 193d section. No other remedy or right of action is given by the statute. . . .

At the close of the testimony the court granted a motion to amend the complaint so that it should not charge any element of negligence nor be susceptible to any defense based upon that style of action.

The defendant's motion for a direction was met by the declaration that:

"With respect to the point that there is no negligence established the answer to that is this: That the action is not for negligence now."

Finally the court refused to charge the following request:

"If you find that the building was of such character as, under the law, required fire escapes, you must further find that the negligence of the defendant in failing to provide fire escapes was the cause of the death of the decedent, or the plaintiff cannot recover."

And in connection therewith made this statement for the record:

"My conception of an action of this kind is—I want to get it on the record—my conception is the conception that is voiced by the dictum of the Court of Errors and Appeals in Fielders v. North Jersey Street Railway Co., to the effect that, assuming the party injured in a given case to be one of a class for whose benefit a duty has been by statute or ordinance imposed upon the opposite party, and assuming that the evidence shows an actual breach of that duty, it would seem the sole remaining inquiries should be whether the violation of the imposed duty was the proximate cause of the injury, and, if so, whether any faulty conduct of the injured party was the contributing cause."

"That is my conception of the action, and that is the conception upon which the plaintiff in the case proceeds, upon which his complaint rests, and if I am wrong about that, why there is nothing for the court to do but to reverse me; that is all; and I want to have it squarely brought up, and I therefore write it right in the record in response to your request."

These quotations from the printed case leave no room for doubt that an admitted defense to the action of negligence was shut out by the trial court: First, because that was not the proper form of action; and, second, because the proper action was one based directly upon a violation of the Tenement House Act.

In each of these respects we think that the trial court was in error, and that, to the contrary, no civil action could be brought directly upon the statute, and that whatever benefit the plaintiff in a civil action derives from the statute must be through the common-law action of negligence.

1. The reason why no civil action can be based upon the statute is because no such action or right of action is given by the statute. The language of the statute is entirely free from ambiguity; it seeks to eliminate a source of danger by the imposition of a penalty. The Legislature could, if such were its intention, have provided also that any one injured by a breach of the statute should have a remedy by civil action. It has not seen fit to do so, and the court has no right to supply such omission, especially when, as in the present case, it is a deliberate omission. For the Tenement House Act of 1904 is an evolution from the act of March 24, 1899 (P.L. p. 359), the first section of which provides, inter alia, that tenements shall be furnished with fire escapes, and by the third of which a penalty for the breach of the statute is provided—

“and, in case of fire occurring in any of said buildings, the owners thereof shall also be liable in an action for damages in case of death or personal injury sustained in consequence of such fire breaking out in said buildings in the absence of such fire escapes.”

The retention in the later act of the remedy by penalty contained in the earlier one, while omitting its companion remedy by civil action, is, as a matter of construction, conclusive of the legislative intent, for what circumstance could more strongly evince a deliberate intention to omit the civil remedy short of a superfluous declaration by the Legislature that what it omitted from a statute was not intended to be included in it? The mere application of the ordinary rules of construction to the act of 1904, therefore, so completely demonstrates the fundamental character of the error into which the court below fell that the matter might well be allowed to rest here, were it not for the danger of a misconception that would be equally erroneous, viz., that the omission to give a private action evinced a legislative intention that the statute should be without effect upon private rights. That this is not the case, and the reason why it is not is so well stated in a recent article by Ezra Ripley Thayer in the Harvard Law Review for February, 1914, that I cannot do better than quote what he says:

“The Legislature must be assumed to know the law, and if upon common-law principles such a statute would affect private rights, it must have been passed in anticipation of that result. The Legislature is to be credited with meaning just what it said—that the conduct forbidden is an offense against the public, and that the offender shall suffer certain specified penalties for his offense. Whether his offense shall have any other legal consequence has not been passed on one way or the other as a question of legislative intent, but is left to be determined by the rules of law. If the effect of such a statute is to change the relations of individuals to one another, this must come about, not through the intent of those who enacted the statute, but by the operation of common-law principles. It thus becomes a question of applying to the situation the principles of the law of negligence, in the light of which the statute was passed."

The question then is, What is, upon common-law principles, the effect of statutes such as the one we are considering upon the action of negligence? The familiar expressions that the breach of such a statute is "negligence per se," or is "prima facie evidence of negligence," seem to me to postpone elucidation rather than to contribute to it, while the implication that proof of a breach of a public statute will support a private recovery is positively misleading.

A fact constantly to be borne in mind in tracing the legal effect of such statutes is that the negligence that is essential to the action of negligence is not solely in the overt act that produced the injury complained of, but may lie in the failure to foresee the danger likely to result from the doing of such act. . . .

Now, it is precisely upon this element of discoverable danger that public statutes or ordinances act, and they do this, not by giving to the plaintiff a right of action he did not have before, but by their operation upon what we may call the common-law conscience of the defendant, better known to us in its personified form of "the ordinary prudent man," the familiar fiction designed by the common law to aid juries, when deciding what was the proper thing for a man to do, to lose sight of the personal point of view of that particular man and to base their judgment upon a general standard which in the final assize is what the jury itself thinks was the proper thing to do.

Now this ordinary prudent man of common-law creation must, in the nature of things, be regarded as a law-abiding citizen to whom, as is pointed out in Dean Thayer in the article referred to, it would be an unjust reproach to suppose that, knowing the statute—for upon familiar principles he can claim no benefit from his ignorance of it—he would break it reasonably believing that it was a prudent thing for him to do, and that in all probabilities no harm would come of it.

In other words, it is inconsistent with ordinary prudence for an individual to set up his private judgment against that of the lawfully constituted public authority. We must assume, therefore, that the ordinary prudent man would not do such a thing, since to do so would be to change his entire nature and to forego the very traits that brought him into existence. He would, in fine, cease to be the pattern man he must continue to be in order to be at all.

Upon common-law principles, therefore, when the Legislature has by public statute established a certain standard of conduct in order to prevent a danger that it foresaw, it has in this regard forewarned the "ordinary prudent man," and through him the defendant in a civil action, whose conduct must always coincide with this common-law criterion. . . . The point to be observed, and it is the only matter with which we are now concerned, is that whatever benefit the plaintiff in a civil action derives from such penal statutes is through the medium of the action of negligence, from which it follows that if such action be abandoned, as was done in the present case, the plaintiff thereby cuts himself off from the very benefits of the statute that he is seeking to derive from it.

It is the necessary corollary of these views that the defendant in such action of negligence retains all of the defenses appropriate to such action that are not affected by such penal statute, which, as we have seen, operates conclusively upon the basis of the defendant's liability, but not at all upon the factum of such liability. The operation of such a statute, in fine, is that the defendant's duty toward the plaintiff as affected by such statute takes the place of what would have been his common-law duty if such statute had not been enacted, leaving the action of negligence in other respects unaffected by such statute. Thus a defendant, although he cannot be heard to say that it was not his duty to obey the statute, may show what he did in his effort to obey it, leaving it to the jury to say whether such effort was what a reasonably prudent person would have done in view of the statute.

1. See also Osborne v. McMasters, 40 Minn. 103 (1889), where a druggist was held liable for selling a deadly poison to plaintiff's intestate without labelling it "poison" as required by the statute. The court said, "Negligence is the breach of legal duty. It is immaterial whether the duty is one imposed by the rule of common law . . . or is imposed by a statute designed for the protection of others. In either case the failure to perform the duty constitutes negligence. . . . The only difference is that in the one case the measure of legal duty is to be determined upon common law principles, while in the other the statute fixes it, so that the violation of the statute constitutes conclusive evidence of negligence, or, in other words, negligence per se. . . . All that the statute does is to establish a fixed standard by which the fact of negligence may be determined."

CHARLES L. B. LOWNDES, CIVIL LIABILITY CREATED BY CRIMINAL LEGISLATION

16 Minn.L.Rev. 361 (1932).

Professional pride, coupled with an instinctive antagonism toward legislation, leads the common law lawyer to visualize a tort as the special creation of the common law. But a tort may originate in an act of the legislature or subordinate legislative body.¹ If the statute or ordinance is explicit about civil liability, there is no great difficulty apart from the ever-present problem in its application to a border-line

¹ Familiar examples are statutes providing for workmen's compensation, also at a ing the fellow servant rule, recognizing a right of privacy, creating various torts, and imposing extraordinary liabilities upon the owners of automobiles, nothing

case.² But a perplexing situation is created by those enactments which, while expressly providing only for a criminal action, are found to entail certain civil consequences as well. Specifically, there is great confusion in connection with penal statutes or ordinances whose violation is held to create a civil liability directly, or to do so indirectly on the subtler theory that their violation is negligence per se or evidence of negligence.³

There are two problems which are not always clearly distinguished: the statute must be construed; and the construed statute must be fitted into the framework of the common law. . . .

The court which holds that a criminal statute creates a civil liability does not, of course, come out flatly and say that the legislature has been silent upon the subject and therefore it will decide the matter as it sees fit. This may be what the court does, but it is not what it says. Verbally, the court justifies its action by "finding" that the legislature intended to create a civil duty although it did not explicitly state this intention. Such an intention is usually imputed to the legislature where the court decides that the statute was passed for the protection of a class of which the plaintiff is a member. The obvious difficulty with this theory, however, is that even conceding a legislative intention to protect this class it has not evidenced any intention of achieving this protection by the imposition of a civil liability, since the only remedy provided by the statute is a criminal or penal proceeding. A right is simply the ex post facto aspect of a remedy, and it savors of absurdity to impute to the legislature an intention to create a civil liability, where it has manifested no intention of creating a civil remedy.

A pious cant which adds little to clear thinking about the law of torts is the trite jingle that the law will suffer no wrong without a remedy. If this means that the law will suffer no moral wrong without giving a remedy, it is obviously untrue. If it means that the law will suffer no legal wrong without a remedy this is mere tautology, since the existence of a legal wrong presupposes a legal remedy. In these cases the court is verbally carrying out the repressed desires of the legislature, but actually giving vent to its own inhibitions. Under the pretense of construing the act of the legislature, the court is writing the statute which it thinks the legislature should have enacted.

But even though a court refuses to construe a statute to create a civil liability, this does not preclude the possibility of the statute having an important bearing upon the liability of a defendant in a civil suit. The court may reach this result in a perfectly legitimate fashion by holding that the violation of the statute is an element of a tort resting upon negligence. The difference between these approaches in a given case may be one of technique rather than result, but there is a good deal to be said in favor of using the proper means to reach a given end.⁸

Here we are faced with the common law creation of negligence. The liability of the defendant is based on common law principles, and the statute has only an indirect bearing. The proposition is that the defendant is liable for his negligent torts, and the violation of the statute becomes an element of negligence. . . .

SECTION 9. JUDICIAL ADAPTATION OF COMMON LAW TO BASIC LEGISLATIVE CHANGES

MATHEWSON v. MATHEWSON

Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut, 1906.

79 Conn. 23, 63 A. 285, 5 L.R.A.,N.S., 611, 6 Ann.Cas. 1027.

HAMERSLEY, J. The plaintiff alleges that the defendant, for a valuable consideration, promised to pay her upon her demand a certain sum of money. The defendant, by his demurrer to the plaintiff's answer to the defendant's plea in abatement, in effect admits, for the purpose of determining the question of law in issue, that he did promise as alleged in the complaint, and claims that the plaintiff cannot maintain this action against him for the enforcement of that promise. It goes without saying that, if the parties had the right to make this contract, the plaintiff can sue the defendant for its breach, unless such suit is clearly forbidden by some positive statute. "Wherever there is a valuable right and injury to it with consequent damage, the obligation is upon the law to devise and enforce such form and mode of redress as will make the most complete reparation." Foot v. Card, 58 Conn. 1, 9, 18 A. 1027, 6 L.R.A. 829, 18 Am.St.Rep. 258. The right to contract involves the right to sue for breach of contract, and, when the law creates a new right to contract, the mere creation of the right includes an appropriate remedy by suit for its violation. The defendant's claim, therefore, is manifestly wrong, unless he can maintain the proposition upon which he founds it, namely, the parties had no power to make the contract alleged. It is not claimed that any disability attaches to the person of either of the parties. Each is of age and of sound mind. Each is capable of acquiring, owning, and managing property. Each is capable of making lawful contracts with all persons and with each other, unless there is some law which prohibits any contract, or at least the contract alleged in the complaint, between this plaintiff and defendant. It is admitted that the parties intermarried since April 20, 1877, and the defendant contends that a law prohibiting any contract between the plaintiff and defendant is to be found in the law (including the married woman's act of April 20, 1877) defining the civil status of husband and wife. For the purpose of avoiding confusion, we will first consider our law as it affects the status of married persons, without reference to the exceptions to the rule which have obtained in courts of equity in respect to those wives who have a separate estate.

[Footnotes 4 to 7 are omitted. Ed.]

The relation of husband and wife, although necessarily regulated by positive law, is not, like the relation of guardian and ward, created by that law. Like the relation of parent and child, it is the offspring of the law of nature, and these two relations constitute the family. The family and the obligations and privileges pertaining to it reach back of all state regulations. Payne's Appeal, 65 Conn. 402, 32 A. 948, 33 L.R.A. 418, 48 Am.St.Rep. 215. The essential character of the relation of husband and wife, as determined by the law of nature and the correlative rights and duties pertaining to it, may be developed, perverted, or confused, but cannot be destroyed, by the positive law which defines their legal status. The prevalent conception of the true nature of this relation may be affected by, and may affect, the changing conditions of society, and may be affected by, and may affect, legislation defining the legal status. While legislation is ordinarily in accord with the notion of the true relation presumed to prevail at the time, it does not purport to create that relation. The rights and duties growing out of the natural relation are of a kind that must vary with changing circumstances, and of a nature in the main impracticable of enforcement through legislation. In defining the legal status of married persons, the law determines the change in the civil rights of each wrought by the fact of marriage. The legal status thus established necessarily involves certain incidental rights which may or may not be expressed, and which may be established or altered by law without necessarily altering the status resulting from marriage. The primary and controlling change in legal status wrought by force of the marriage relates to the freedom of the person, but mainly to the capacity of owning property, and the incidents of the latter are the power of making contracts and of suing and being sued. In most English speaking communities, by the law as first established, the wife by force of the marriage lost her legal identity and the capacity of owning property, and as incident to this she lost the power of making contracts and of suing and being sued. But, by the law as now generally established, she does not by force of the marriage lose her legal identity, nor the capacity of owning property, and does not lose the civil rights incident to this capacity. This change in status has been accomplished in different ways and more or less gradually. In Connecticut, perhaps more fully than elsewhere, it has been accomplished by a single radical act of legislation, directly reversing the former primary and controlling change in legal status, affected by force of the marriage, and such radical change more clearly involves a consequent change in the civil rights purely incidental to the status. This consequent effect upon incidental rights plainly comes within the rule that, where the reason of the law fails, the law ceases to operate.

By our first legislation it was enacted that justice should be administered according to the laws of this jurisdiction, "and for want thereof according to the rule of the Word of God." 1 Col.Rec. pp. 21, 509; Revision 1672, Preface; Fitch v. Brainerd, 2 Day, 163, 190, 193, 194. By this law, first enacted in 1637-38, the wife's legal identity by force of the marriage became merged in that of her husband, and her legal capacity to own or acquire property, real as well as personal, was lost. By force of the marriage her personal freedom was subjected to the will or control of the husband. Until the reign of Charles II, the right of a husband to correct his wife was recognized (1 Bl.Comm. 444), and until comparatively recent times the right of the husband to restrain the person of his wife by confinement for the purpose of securing her obedience was recognized. The law which attached such subjection to the legal status of a married woman has been abolished, but not by direct legislation. It has disappeared under the continuous pressure of judicial interpretation or indirect legislation. The law, however, which attached to the status of a married woman an incapacity to own property, with the consequent inability to make contracts and to sue or be sued, remained unchanged in theory until 1877.

The foundation of the legal status, namely, the unity in the husband of his own and his wife's legal identity and capacity to own property, was removed, and a new foundation, namely, equality of husband and wife in legal identity and capacity of owning property, was laid by the act which took effect April 20, 1877 (Pub. Acts 1877, p. 211, c. 114; Revision 1902, §§ 4545, 4546, 391, 392). This legislation is remedial, not as ameliorating an existing evil, but as eradicating that evil. It is in the nature of fundamental legislation involving all the results necessarily flowing from the principle established. . . .

The completeness of this change cannot be questioned. The act, in the clearest terms, declares that equality in personal identity and in the ownership of property shall replace the unity of all rights in the husband as the legal status effected by intermarriage.

We think that in enacting this law the state adopted a fundamental change of public policy; that the new legal status established for married persons by the act was based upon, and must be administered in accordance with, this policy; that in every marriage contracted since April 20, 1877, husband and wife alike retain the capacity of owning, acquiring and disposing of property belonging to unmarried persons; that the power of contracting incident to such capacity necessarily follows; and that the legal status of husband and wife involves the capacity to contract with each other and with others. . . .

It is doubtless true that, by reason of the marriage relation, some events which, as between unmarried persons, would give rise to a cause of action, would not, as between man and wife, have the same effect. The nature of such events, should the question arise, must be determined in view of the public policy upon which our legislation of 1877 was based, and not in view of the policy recognized in our legislation of nearly three centuries ago. It is sufficient, for the disposition of this case, to say that such possible events do not include a contract upon valuable consideration to pay a certain sum of money and a breach of that contract. It may be that the action of the trial court, in overruling the plaintiff's demurrer to the defendant's plea alleging a marriage, is sustainable under existing rules of practice in pleading, but that question is now immaterial. The plaintiff has answered alleging that the marriage mentioned in the plea took place since April 20, 1877, and this allegation, if true, is a sufficient answer to the plea. The defendant's demurrer to the answer should therefore have been overruled.

SCHULER v. HENRY

Supreme Court of Colorado, 1908. 42 Colo. 367, 94 P. 360.

. STEELE, C. J. The record presented requires us to determine this question: Is a husband liable for the tort of his wife, committed during coverture, and without his presence, and in which he in no manner participated? The rule of the common law which makes the husband liable for the torts of his wife has not been expressly repealed, and unless it has been repealed by implication the question must be answered in the affirmative. In determining whether the rule of the common law has been abrogated by the enactments concerning married women or is still in force, it will be necessary to briefly consider the status of a married woman at common law and her status under the statutes of this state. At common law the husband and wife were considered as one person, as having but one will between them—that seated in the husband, as the head and governor of the family. . . .

As compensation for depriving her of a legal existence, and depriving her of the enjoyment of her property, and of being under the dominion of her husband, the wife had the benefit of her legal nonentity, and she was presumed to have acted under the direction of her husband, . . .

. . . The wife in Colorado has been wholly emancipated "from the condition of thralldom in which she was placed at common law." And, as stated by Chief Justice Thatcher in Wells v. Caywood, 3 Colo. 494: "The wife in Colorado is the wife under our statute and not the wife at common law, and by our statutes must her rights be determined; the common law affecting her rights, as we shall presently see, having been swept away."

. . . We can find no just reason for holding the husband liable for the torts committed by his wife unless committed by his direction. He cannot be held upon the common-law theory of unity of husband and wife. The unity has been severed, and we have grafted into our system of jurisprudence the benign principle of the civil law, whereunder "husband and wife are considered as two distinct persons, and may have separate estates, contracts, debts, and injuries." Wells v. Caywood, 3 Colo. 487. He cannot be held upon the ground that she cannot be held without him, for she can be sued in all matters as if she were sole. He cannot be held upon the ground that he has control of her property and should respond in damages with it, because he has no control of her property, and she may do with it as she pleases. He cannot be held upon the theory that he has the power to restrain her, because he has no such legal power. As he has no legal control over her person or her property, he should not be held for her wrongs. In fact, not one of the reasons assigned by courts and text writers for holding the husband liable exists in this state; and as the reason for holding the husband no longer prevails, he should not be required to respond in damages for the torts of his wife. . . .

Reversed, action dismissed.

MAXWELL, J. (dissenting). . . . It has been repeatedly held by this court that statutes in derogation of the common law shall be strictly construed, and in considering repeals of the common law by implication the same rules should be applied as are applied to statutes, for the reason that the common law is made a part of our jurisprudence by statutory enactment. We believe that many if not all of the arguments of the learned Chief Justice are subject to the criticism contained in the following excerpt from the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Campbell in Insurance Co. v. Ross-Lewin, 24 Colo. 43, 56, 51 P. 488, 493, 65 Am.St.Rep. 215: "But these and similar arguments are more properly addressed to the legislative department as reasons for changing a long recognized common-law rule, and should not be potential with courts as a reason why they should encroach upon legislative functions." . . .

Chapman*, 125 Mo. 101, 28 S.W. 328, 26 L.R.A. 412, 46 Am.St.Rep. 408 (1894), the court, pointing out that under the statutes the status of married women is entirely different from what it was at common law, held that a married woman can maintain an action against a third person for alienation of her husband's affections.

NOTE

Of. Edwards v. Porter, [1925] A.C. 1, discussed in 38 Harv.L.Rev. 1114 (1925), where the court took the position that, notwithstanding the Married Women's Property Acts, a husband is still liable for his wife's torts.

JOHNSON v. UNITED STATES

United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, 1946.
157 F.2d 209.

EDGERTON, ASSOCIATE JUSTICE. Appellant was convicted of forgery, under D.C.Code 1940, § 22—1401, and also of conspiracy under 18 U.S.C.A. § 88. His co-conspirator was his wife, who was convicted but is not a party to this appeal.

Appellant urges that it is legally impossible for a husband and wife to conspire with each other. The old common-law rule to that effect has been followed in Dawson v. United States, 9 Cir., 10 F.2d 106, 107, Gros v. United States, 9 Cir., 138 F.2d 261 (one judge dissenting), United States v. Shaddix, D.C., S.D.Miss. 43 F.Supp. 330, and a number of State cases. There are some State cases to the contrary. Dalton v. People, 68 Colo. 44, 189 P. 37; Marks v. State, 144 Tex.Cr.R. 509, 164 S.W.2d 690. The old rule was based on the common-law fiction that husband and wife were one person. Acts of Congress have established the separation of husband and wife as to property, contracts, and torts in the District of Columbia. We agree with the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, which ruled upon the question in denying the motion of the present appellant's wife for a new trial, that this legislation has made the fiction obsolete. No reason remains why the law should not recognize the obvious fact that the relation of husband and wife does not prevent two persons from conspiring to commit an offense. The interest of society in repressing crime requires that the fact be recognized, and our common-law system does not require that its recognition await express legislative action. . . .

Affirmed.

THOMPSON v. DELAWARE, LACKAWANNA &
WESTERN RAILROAD CO.

Superior Court of Pennsylvania, 1910. 41 Pa.Super. 617.

Opinion by ORLADY, J.

The plaintiff recovered a verdict of $779, as damages for the alleged negligent killing of her son, aged seven years. The questions involved are first, the right of a mother of an illegitimate child to recover for injuries sustained by the child resulting in his death, and, second, the question of contributory negligence, which may be first considered and dismissed as without having any merit. . . .

The other question is of a more serious character and we are without direct authority in this state in regard to it. Prior to the act of July 10, 1901, the mother of an illegitimate child could not recover in such a case.

The Act of April 26, 1855, P.L. 309, provides that the persons entitled to recover damages for any injury causing death, shall be the husband, widow, child or parent of the deceased and no other relative. By the Act of May 14, 1857, P.L. 507, it is provided that in any and every case where the father and mother of an illegitimate child or children shall enter into the bonds of lawful wedlock, and cohabit, such child or children shall thereby become legitimated and enjoy all the rights and privileges as if they had been born during the wedlock of their parents. The next step in this remedial legislation is in the Act of April 6, 1868, P.L. 67, which provides, that all marriages theretofore contracted between parties within the degree of affinity as prescribed by act of 1860, of which issue is born, are thereby legalized, and the child or children of such marriages shall have all the rights and privileges of children born in lawful wedlock. This was followed by the Act of June 5, 1883, P.L. 88, which declares that illegitimate children born of the same mother, and leaving as survivors neither mother nor issue capable of inheriting, shall have capacity to take and inherit from each other personal property as next of kin and real estate as heirs in fee simple, in the same manner as children born in lawful wedlock. This was evidently enacted to remedy the effect of Woltemate's App., 86 Pa. 219, in which it was held that the act of 1855 did not enable illegitimate children to inherit from each other. The act of June 14, 1897, amending the third section of the act of 1855, provides, that illegitimate children shall take and be known by the name of their mother, and they and their issue and their mother and grandmother shall respectively have capacity to take or inherit from each other personal estate as next of kin, and real estate as heirs in fee simple; and as respects said real or personal estate, so taken or inherited, to transmit the same according to the intestate laws of this state.

Prior to 1874, a great number of private or special acts of assembly were passed, providing that certain named illegitimate children of certain named parties, "shall be legitimated, and shall have and enjoy all the rights and privileges of children born in lawful wedlock, with the right to inherit and transmit any estate whatsoever."

The next act on the subject is the one which is vital to this case, that of July 10, 1901. It is entitled an act, "to regulate and define the legal relation of an illegitimate child or children, its or their heirs, with each other, and the mother and her heirs." The first section is as follows: "That illegitimate children shall take and be known by the name of their mother, and the common-law doctrine of nullius filius, shall not apply as between the mother and her illegitimate child or children, but the mother and her heirs and her illegitimate child and its heirs, shall be mutually liable one to the other, and shall enjoy all the rights and privileges one to the other, in the same manner, and to the same extent, as if the said child or children had been born in lawful wedlock." The second section provides, "The mother of an illegitimate child, her heirs and legal representatives, and said illegitimate child or children, its or their heirs and legal representatives, shall have capacity to take or inherit from or through each other, personal estate, as next of kin, and real estate as heirs in fee simple or otherwise, under the intestate laws of this commonwealth, in the same manner and to the same extent, subject to the distinction of half-bloods, as if said child or children had been born in lawful wedlock." Section 4 is as follows: "The intent of this act is to legitimate an illegitimate child and its heirs, as to its mother and her heirs; but it is not intended to change the existing laws with regard to the father of such children, or their respective heirs or legal representatives."

The plaintiff was originally married to a man named Ward, who died more than a year prior to the birth of her son, Willie, and after his birth she was married to her present husband. While the action was originally brought in the name of George Thompson and Mary Thompson, the record was subsequently amended by striking therefrom the name of George Thompson, it being conceded that he was improperly joined with the mother as a plaintiff.

In construing the act of 1901 we are aided by many decisions in arriving at a proper interpretation of the legislative will; all of its parts are to be taken together, and the legislative intention so ascertained will prevail over its literal import, or its strict letter; the title may be considered, and the construction most agreeable to reason and justice shall be adopted as embodying the intention of the lawmakers, for it will not be presumed that the legislature contemplated unreason or injustice. While this is a statute in derogation of the common law, and as such it is to be strictly construed, yet it is not to be extended by implication beyond the legal import of the words used, so as to embrace cases or acts not clearly described by such words, or to bring them within a prohibition or penalty of such a statute. A strict construction does not mean that words will be so restricted as not to have their full meaning, and that the rule of strict construction will not be applied with such technicality as to defeat the purpose and the true intent or meaning of the statute. Statutes which give a right to the personal representative of a deceased for tortious acts, should be construed strictly, but on the other hand, it is just as positively held, that such statutes are remedial inasmuch as they provide a remedy for an obvious wrong, and that in this sense they should be construed liberally. They are made to supply defects or abridge superfluities in the law, and in construing any statute we are to keep in mind the old law, the mischief and the remedy intended; that which is within the mischief intended to be remedied is considered within the statute although not within the letter, and that which is not within the mischief is not within the statute, though within the letter.

In Moritz v. Garnhart, 7 Watts, 302, the Supreme Court held that the grandfather of an illegitimate child might maintain an action on the case for the abduction of the illegitimate child of his daughter, Judge Gibson saying, "Though a bastard be not looked upon as a child for any civil purpose, the ties of nature are respected in regard to its maintenance, and can it be said, having bestowed his affection on this child and reared it by his bounty, he shall not be permitted to exercise the rights of a father to it, as against an intermeddler. It would be a reproach to the law if he should not. The stern simplicity of feudal principles is gradually bending to the more complicated relations of a milder civilization." Prior to 1901, the rights even of the mother of an illegitimate child were very circumscribed. . . .

In interpreting this statute, the question is not, Could the right of the mother of an illegitimate child to maintain the action have been more clearly expressed? but, Do the words used clearly convey the legislative intention of her right to maintain such an action? There is no ambiguity in its provisions, it is the last step taken in a long series of enactments and adjudications, involving the same subject-matter, and each enactment is a step forward in the direction of relief and protection for the unfortunate mother of an illegitimate child, and of an increase of the rights of her offspring. By its very terms the old common-law doctrine of nullius filius no longer applies; the mother and her heirs, and the child and its heirs shall be mutually liable one to the other, and shall enjoy all the rights and privileges one to the other, in the same manner, and to the same extent as if the child had been born in lawful wedlock, and the special declaration of intent is stated in unequivocal words to be, to legitimate an illegitimate child as to its mother. With this declaration of intention, can it be questioned that the object and effect of this statute was to change the status and capacity of an illegitimate child to the status and capacity of a legitimate child, and create the relation of parent and child for all purposes as if the latter had been born in lawful wedlock. These are the words used, and to our mind they can be interpreted in but one way. We held in Com. v. Gilkeson, 18 Pa. Superior Ct. 516, that children born prior to marriage, who have been legitimated by the subsequent marriage of their parents, are not liable to pay a collateral inheritance tax upon the estate passing from their father to them.

The last consideration of the question by the Supreme Court is in Com. v. Mackey, 222 Pa. 613, 72 A. 250, 128 Am.St.Rep. 825, and it is there held in referring to this act of 1901, by Judge Brown that, not only are all the rights and privileges of a child born in lawful wedlock conferred upon any illegitimate child, as between it and its mother, but these rights and privileges are to be enjoyed in the same manner and to the same extent as if the child had been born in lawful wedlock . . . the expressed purpose of the act is to legitimate an illegitimate child as to its mother, and, as a proper, logical and humane incident to such legitimation to confer upon such child every right and privilege enjoyed by a child born to wedded parents. This act was intended to apply alike to the unfortunate mother and the helpless child and to remove all legal obstructions, as between them, that had theretofore existed by reason of the illegitimacy of the child.

As said by Judge Woodward in Killam v. Killam, 39 Pa. 120, the words used by the legislature were large enough to confer all the civil rights of legitimacy, and as it was a remedial and humane law, it ought not to be cramped in the construction.

The opinion of the learned trial judge in denying the motion for judgment for the defendant, fully justifies his disposition of all the matters raised by the questions involved.

The assignments of error are overruled and the judgment is affirmed.

NOTES

1. See Rhode Island Hospital Trust Co. v. Hodgkin, 48 R.I. 459, 137 A. 381 (1927), holding that where a testator devised property "to the children or other descendants" of testator's daughter, an illegitimate child of the daughter was entitled to receive the property. The court said, "It is plain . . . that under the Rhode Island statute a child born out of wedlock is the legal child of its mother and is to be so regarded with reference to the provisions of other statutes dealing generally with the legal rights of 'children or descendants'. . . . The legitimating or enabling act by making the illegitimate child the legal child and heir of his mother has also without specific legislative declaration given him that standing with reference to other statutory provisions. . . . At the time the testator made his will the remedial statute (permitting inheritance) and the construction placed on it by this court had been the settled law of this State for many years. The court had held that the legislative intent which would ordinarily attach to other statutes was modified by the provisions of the remedial statute. We are of the opinion that it should be said, with equal reason, that the ordinary testamentary intent would be modified by the statute as construed by the Supreme Court. The testator made his will in that state of the law and in the absence of provision to the contrary, the terms 'children or other descendants' as used by him would include illegitimate as well as legitimate children or descendants of his daughter. . . ."

Toler*, 15 Gratt (Va.) 588 (1860); Estate of Wardell, 57 Cal. 484 (1881); but cf. Will of Scholl, 100 Wis. 650, 76 N.W. 616 (1898).

2. In Brown v. Scherrer, 5 Colo.App. 255 (aff'd 21 Colo. 481) (1894), the issue was whether marriage, without birth of issue, operates to revoke a husband's will by operation of law. The common law required both marriage and the birth of an heir. Reason was that neither wives nor daughters could inherit lands. But modern statutes make surviving spouse an heir. "In accordance with what we believe to be the spirit and the reason of the doctrine, and in accordance with what we believe to be the purpose and spirit of our legislation, we hold that the marriage of a testator, whether or not it be followed by the birth of an heir, is operative to revoke any will which he had antecedently made."

See Karr v. Robinson, 107 Md. 375, 173 A. 584 (1934), where the court held that a will, executed after the testator's second marriage but before the birth of issue by that marriage, was impliedly revoked by the subsequent birth of a child for whom no provision was made in his will. The court said, "The facts of marriage, subsequent to the execution of a will, and the subsequent birth of a child, are now generally held to be sufficient to revoke a will by implication, subject to certain exceptions to the rule. The authorities, however, are not in accord upon the question whether or not the concurrence of such facts is essential to an implied revocation of the will. Some have held concurrence not essential, while others have taken a contrary view. In most of the states, statutes have been passed relative thereto. In this state no such statute has been passed, nor has there been any case before this court where this question has been raised upon facts similar to those in this case. . . . The court, so far as we are able to ascertain, has never passed upon the question here involved, and hence we are at liberty to follow either line of decisions, and, as those cases holding that the concurrence of the facts named are not essential appear to us to be most logical, we will hold that the will, in this case, was impliedly revoked."

Of this Maryland case it has been said, "The approach of the instant court, in determining that the common law of Maryland relating to implied revocation of wills shall be guided by this trend of legislative opinion in other jurisdictions, assumes a significance out of proportion to the holding." 35 Col.L.Rev. 787 (1935).

See also Colcord v. Conroy, 40 Fla. 97, (1898), and Teopfer v. Kaeufer, 12 N.M. 372 (1904), in both of which the court held that where a woman executed a will, then married, and thereafter died leaving only her husband surviving, the will was impliedly revoked by the marriage. In the latter case the court said, "By the marriage not only a husband or wife, but a new heir capable of inheriting all of the property comes into existence, and in accordance with what we think is the spirit and reasoning of the doctrine and the purpose and meaning of our laws, we hold that the marriage of a testator, whether or not it be followed by the birth of an heir, is operative to revoke any antenuptial will."

JUNG v. ST. PAUL FIRE DEPT. RELIEF ASS'N

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1947. — Minn. —, 27 N.W.2d 151.

MATSON, JUSTICE. Plaintiff, by his mother as guardian ad litem, appeals from a judgment entered for defendant in an action for the recovery of certain pension benefits alleged to be due him upon the death of his illegitimate father.

Plaintiff is a minor child and was born out of wedlock on December 19, 1938, to Dorothy Jung. Prior thereto, on November 1, 1938, Thomas James Kell, in writing and before a competent attesting witness, declared himself to be the father of plaintiff, who was then unborn, as part of a written stipulation for settlement entered into by the mother, the state board of control, and said Thomas J. Kell, whereby the latter agreed to pay and did pay $1,000 for and in consideration of being relieved from all further liability on account of plaintiff, pursuant to Minn.St.1945 and M.S.A. § 257.28. This stipulation was approved by the Ramsey county district court.

Thomas J. Kell, who during his lifetime was a member of the St. Paul fire department and also an active member in good standing of defendant association, was killed in the line of duty on January 9, 1942. According to the by-laws of defendant, if an active member dies leaving a widow who was his legally married wife or leaves a child or children, such widow and said child or children shall be entitled to a pension out of the association's benefit fund. In the case of a child, such pension would amount to $11.66 per month and would continue until the age of 16 years is attained. Defendant is organized under and subject to Minn.St.1945 and M.S.A. § 69.48, which provides:

"When . . . an active member of a relief association, dies, leaving

"(1) A widow . . . ; or

"(2) A child or children . . . [such] widow and the child or children shall be entitled to a pension . . . :"

Subject to certain limitations, which are not here material, such statute further provides that the pension shall be granted "in conformity with the by-laws" of the association.

After plaintiff's application for a pension had been rejected by defendant, the present suit was instituted on his behalf by his mother as guardian ad litem to compel defendant to pay plaintiff the aforesaid monthly pension. The trial court found specifically that plaintiff was not a child of Thomas James Kell within the meaning of the foregoing statute and within the meaning of defendant's by-laws. The only issue we need consider is whether plaintiff, born out of wedlock and whose parentage has been acknowledged by the father in writing and before a competent witness, is a child of the said father within the meaning of that term as used in § 69.48 and in defendant's by-laws.

1. At common law, a child born out of wedlock is said to be filius nullius, the child of nobody, or filius populi, the child of the people. The common law is in force in this state except as it has been abrogated by statute or is not adapted to our conditions. 1 Dunnell, Dig. & Supp. § 1503, and cases cited. Most states, including Minnesota, have enacted statutes mitigating to a greater or less degree the rigors of the common law and have conferred upon illegitimates certain limited rights. See, Minn.St.1945 and M.S.A. §§ 525.172 and 176.01, subd. 3; In re Snethun's Estate, 180 Minn. 202, 230 N.W. 483; Reilly v. Shapiro, 196 Minn. 376, 265 N.W. 284. In numerous cases, the question has arisen whether illegitimates are included within such terms as "child" or "children" as used in statutes, wills, deeds, and other instruments. By the weight of authority, when the word "child" or "children" is used in a statute it means a legitimate child or children, unless the statutory language reflects an intent to the contrary. A similar interpretation has been adopted with respect to deeds, wills, and similar instruments, unless the context requires, or the circumstances surrounding the execution import, a meaning inclusive of illegitimates.

2, 3. We come to a consideration of the extent to which the harshness of the common-law rule has been mitigated in this state with respect to the rights and status of children born out of wedlock.

"While the common law is flexible and adaptive, and may be applied to new conditions, the courts cannot abrogate its established rules any more than they can abrogate a statute." 1 Dunnell, Dig. § 1504.

It is the province of the legislature, not the courts, to modify the rules of the common law. Congdon v. Congdon, 160 Minn. 343, 200 N.W. 76; 1 Dunnell, Dig. § 1503. We must therefore turn to an examination of pertinent legislative enactments to determine the degree of modification. One line of authority holds that statutes in derogation of the common law are to be strictly construed; but the more modern view is that when legislation, even though in derogation of the common law, is remedial in character, a liberal construction should be adopted. . . . A statute conferring upon illegitimates rights which the common law denied them is remedial. Goodell v. Yezerski, 170 Mich. 578, 136 N.W. 451, 40 L.R.A., N.S., 516; Burris v. Burgett, 16 Del.Ch. 10, 139 A. 454; Crawford v. Masters, 98 S. C. 458, 82 S.E. 793; Edwards v. Beard, 77 Ind.App. 478, 134 N.E. 203; Wasmund v. Wasmund, 90 Wash. 274, 156 P. 3. The remedial nature of such legislation does not, however, justify a construction which gives to the statutory language an application and meaning not intended by the legislature. Gollnik v. Mengel, 112 Minn. 349, 128 N.W. 292; Minn.St.1945 and M.S.A. § 645.08. A legislative modification of the common law is limited in its application and by its necessary implication to the removal of the mischief against which the statute is directed. In determining the extent to which the common law has been abrogated, we are not at liberty, even though the purpose be worthy, to substitute the horizon of judicial imagination for that of legislative intent. See, Wasmund v. Wasmund, 90 Wash. 274, 156 P. 3.

4. Section 69.48 (quoted above), under which defendant is organized, in its use of the term "child" or "children," obviously does not by and of itself involve or effect any change in the common law so as to include illegitimates. Murrell v. Industrial Commission, 291 Ill. 334, 126 N.E. 189; see, Annotation, 30 A.L.R. 1075. Its reference to defendant's by-laws adds nothing. This court (following the rule of State v. McCurdy, 116 Me. 359, 102 A. 72), in construing the meaning of the term "child" in G.S.1923, § 10136, [now Minn.St.1945 and M.S.A. § 617.56.] has already determined that such term, without any qualifying language to the contrary, does not embrace illegitimate children. State v. Lindskog, 175 Minn. 533, 221 N.W. 911, 912. Although the meaning of the term "child" has thus already been determined, plaintiff, nevertheless, contends that the legislature, by reason of having enacted certain statutes extending to illegitimates certain specific rights denied to them at common law, has in reality determined that the term "child" includes an illegitimate child. The contention seems wholly untenable. Plaintiff first refers to § 525.172, which provides:

"An illegitimate child shall inherit from his mother the same as if born in lawful wedlock, and also from the person who in writing and before a competent attesting witness shall have declared himself to be his father; but such child shall not inherit from the kindred of either parent by right of representation."

Obviously, the foregoing statute pertains to, and confers only, the right of inheritance. It is not in pari materia with § 69.48 so as to provide any basis whatever for construing the two statutes with reference to each other. It is also clear that the legislature did not intend thereby to abrogate the common-law rule generally, but only with respect to the right of inheritance, and then in a limited degree. No recognized rule of construction permits this court to invade the province of the legislature by a process of destroying or distorting express statutory provisions intended to limit the application of a statute. Not only must this section be confined to the field of inheritance, but also to a restricted portion of that field. This court in Reilly v. Shapiro, 196 Minn. 376, 265 N.W. 284, denied an illegitimate the right to inherit under the foregoing statute from a father who in bastardy proceedings, in open court, in the presence of the prosecuting attorney, the judge, the reporter, and the complainant, pleaded guilty in writing and thereby admitted that he was the father. Although he had been duly adjudicated to be the father, his written plea of guilty had not been signed by any witness as expressly required in the foregoing statute, and therefore this court, speaking through Mr. Justice Julius J. Olson, denied his illegitimate child the right of inheritance, and in so doing said (196 Minn. at page 379, 265 N.W. at page 286):

"Nor can it be denied that a child born out of wedlock is as much in need of parental aid and the natural rights that go with the relationship of parent and child as those pertaining to a child born in wedlock. Every human instinct is moved toward extending a helping hand to such child, already laboring under a handicap impossible of removal. That is why the old and harsh rules of the common law have been modified and in many instances removed by statutory enactments. Our own statute is proof that we have made some progress in that direction. However, rights of inheritance are purely statutory. We as judges cannot make law. No matter what the individual judgment of a judge may be, his desire to aid in extending human rights cannot be employed to the extent of making law. Obviously, this matter is wholly one for the Legislature to regulate and define." (Italics supplied.)

We have made nothing more than "some progress" in ameliorating the harsh rule of the common law. See, In re Snethun's Estate, 180 Minn. 202, 230 N.W. 483. The cautious and specific manner in which the legislature granted to illegitimates a limited right of inheritance indicates that it intended thereby to establish, not a repeal of, but only an exception to, the general rule.

Plaintiff also cites § 176.01, subd. 3, whereby it is provided that the term "child" or "children" as used in the workmen's compensation act shall include all children who are entitled by law to inherit from the deceased. Again we have an express exception which only serves to illustrate the restricted manner in which the legislature has accorded rights to children born out of wedlock. If the legislature had intended to make anything more than exceptions to the general rule, it would have used a few simple words to accord to illegitimates all the rights enjoyed by children born of legitimate parents.

With respect to the issues herein discussed, we find it unnecessary to express any opinion as to the effect of the putative father's act in making a cash settlement pursuant to § 257.28, whereby he was relieved of all further liability for the care, maintenance, and education of his illegitimate child.

In a society which has barbarically handicapped and burdened children of illegitimate parents for sins in the commission of which they had no part, much remains to be done to humanize existing rules of law. As a court, however, we must take legislative enactments as we find them and not invade the legislative field.

The judgment of the lower court must be and is affirmed.

Affirmed.

SECTION 10. THE PROBLEM OF CODIFICATION AND RESTATEMENT

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A PERMANENT ORGANIZATION FOR IMPROVEMENT OF THE LAW PROPOSING THE ESTABLISHMENT OF AN AMERICAN LAW INSTITUTE.

Submitted to a meeting of representative judges, lawyers and law teachers, held February 23, 1923, in Washington, D.C. American Law Institute Proceedings Vol. 1, 6-11 (1923).

(C) Two Chief Defects in American Law.

Two chief defects in American law are its uncertainty and its complexity. These defects cause useless litigation, prevent resort to the courts to enforce just rights, make it often impossible to advise persons of their rights, and when litigation is begun, create delay and expense.

When the law is doubtful most persons are inclined to adopt the view most favorable to their own interests; and many are willing if necessary to test the matter in court while those willing to overreach their neighbors are encouraged to delay performing their obligations until some court has passed on all the novel legal theories which skilled ingenuity can invent to show that they need not be performed. In either case litigation is carried on, which but for the law's uncertainty would be avoided. Again, the present degree of uncertainty in many parts of the law tends to create the feeling that the outcome of all court proceedings is uncertain no matter how just the claim, the result being that many whose legal rights are clear indirectly encourage a failure of justice by compromising with opponents who are conscious of the lack of merit of their own contentions.

Furthermore, injuries caused by uncertainty in the law are not confined to situations in which controversies have arisen so that rights claimed must be either compromised or referred to the courts for their decision. Though one function of law is to provide rules by which disputes may be settled, its other equally important function is to provide rules of action. Because of the existing uncertainty in the law those who turn to it for guidance in conduct often find that it speaks with a doubtful voice. For example, the lawyer who assists in the combination of commercial enterprises, or the lawyer who draws a will with provisions suggestive of the rule against perpetuities, will often find that he cannot positively inform his clients of the legal consequences of their acts.

The same bad effects, though in a less degree, result from the law's complexity. Besides which, complex law tends to make the administration of justice a game in which knowledge and skill are more important for obtaining victory than a just cause.

The time consumed by the courts in disposing of cases is an obvious fact which all persons may note and criticise. Furthermore, everyone realizes that long-drawn-out litigation is, on account of the expense, a greater hardship on those of relatively small means than on the litigant with a long purse. It is therefore natural that the delays of the law rather than its uncertainties or complexities is the defect on which those who criticise the administration of justice usually lay stress; and yet, the most of these delays are due to uncertainties and complexities.

Perhaps, however, the most serious result of these defects is that they create a lack of respect for law. . . .

At the outset we realized that it was useless to attempt to come to any final conclusion in regard to the right way to reduce the present uncertainty and complexity of our law until we had made a thorough analysis of the principal forces now operating to make our law more or less certain or more or less complex. . . .

Our investigation shows that among the causes of the law's uncertainty are: lack of agreement among the members of the legal profession on the fundamental principles of the common law, lack of precision in the use of legal terms, conflicting and badly drawn statutory provisions, attempts to distinguish between two cases where the facts present no distinction in the legal principle applicable, the great volume of recorded decisions, the ignorance of judges and lawyers and the number and nature of novel legal cases. We also find that among the causes of complexity are, the complexity of the conditions of life, the lack of systematic development of the law, and the unnecessary multiplication of administrative provisions.

All these causes of the law's uncertainty would continue to exist were the Federal Constitution repealed and the United States made one state. The fact, however, that the nation is composed of forty-eight states, each of which as well as the Federal Government is an independent source of law, means that the law on any subject in any one jurisdiction may differ from the law of one or more or all of the other jurisdictions. These variations in law are themselves a potent cause of uncertainty and complexity, and because of this and for other reasons do much injury, not only where transactions are carried on in two or more states, but also where transactions are carried on wholly within one state.

Any practical plan devised and carried out by lawyers to promote certainty and simplicity in the law must meet those conditions causing uncertainty and complexity which it is possible for the profession to modify or eliminate. It is manifest that some of the causes are beyond the power of the bar to remedy. The number and nature of novel legal questions, and those differences in the law of different states due to differences in economic or social conditions, are entirely outside the control of the bar. Furthermore, the great volume of the annual increase to the already overwhelming mass of reported cases, which is another cause of the law's uncertainty, cannot be directly checked by any action which may be taken by the profession. . . .

On the other hand, many causes of the existing uncertainty and complexity are more or less within the power of the legal profession to control by intelligent united action. Bar associations have done and are now doing much to improve legal education and thereby create conditions which will tend to reduce one cause of the law's uncertainty—the ignorance of judges and lawyers.

Badly drawn statutory provisions and the unnecessary multiplication of administrative provisions set forth in statutes are, as stated, causes of uncertainty and complexity. The wisdom of the purpose which the substantive provisions of the statute law are intended to effect is beyond the province or the power of the profession. So, too, the means adopted to attain an end is also often largely a question of public policy. On the other hand, not only the principles of legislative draftsmanship but also the administrative details of many statutes, especially the provisions for the enforcement of regulatory statutes, are matters concerning which the public have a right to secure from the bar an informed opinion. Again, the procedural law is in great part expressed in statutes and rules of court, and this field of law, in so far as it applies to methods for the determination of rights and duties, is a subject on which the people have a right to expect from the profession more than an informed opinion; they have a right to efficient direction.

Finally, the more detailed study of the subject in Part II shows that lack of agreement among lawyers concerning the fundamental principles of the common law is the most potent cause of uncertainty. The bad effect of this lack of agreement is not confined to creating uncertainty in the law of each state. To it is due much of the unnecessary and harmful variation in the law of the different states. Closely interwoven with this cause is the lack of precision in the use of legal terms. Fortunately these two causes of uncertainty and complexity are precisely those over which the legal profession has the greatest control. The people through the legislatures are theoretically responsible for the uncertainties and complications of statutory enactments. The common law and its terminology, however, have been developed solely by lawyers. To say that the system of developing and applying law is primarily responsible for the lack of agreement on legal principles and the lack of precision in the use of legal terms does not excuse the profession which through the centuries of English history has evolved the system with all its great merits and also with all its defects. As the common law has been developed under the guidance of the legal profession, that profession has the power and the duty to reduce its principal defects. At present chief among them is this lack of agreement among lawyers concerning the principles of the law and lack of precision in the use of legal terms. The fact that lawyers have so far failed to appreciate the extent of the resulting evil or to recognize the responsibility of the profession to try to improve conditions is the sole reason that today these defects loom so large.

ROSCOE POUND, SOURCES AND FORMS OF LAW

22 Notre Dame Lawyer 1, 71-79 (1946).

Possibilities and Advisability of a Civil Code. 1. Purposes of codification. Three different ideas of a code have been urged. The first, which may be called the Benthamite idea, is really the idea of the eighteenth-century law of nature school. It regards a code as a complete legislative statement of the whole body of the law so as to put it authoritatively in one self-sufficing form.

A second view, at the other extreme, is that which was adopted by a number of the commissioners under Lord Westbury's plan and has been urged particularly by Holland and by Sir James Stephen. According to this idea, orderly arrangement, convenience of ascertainment, and publicity are the chief objects; so that preparation of a code involves (a) republication in systematic form of the whole mass of existing law of every kind, and (b) separate codification of statute and common law, adhering as closely as possible to the language, conceptions, and methods of the old law.

A third view, which was the one taken, on the whole, by the framers of the French Civil Code and by those who framed the German code, is that the purpose must be primarily to provide so far as possible a complete legislative statement of principles so as to furnish a legislative basis for juristic and judicial development along modern lines; laying down rules sparingly and for the analogies they furnish, except in the law of property and of inheritance where precise rules are called for.

Bentham and Austin following him conceived that it would be possible not only to make the law certain and accessible but to remove all ground for dispute as to the meaning of terms or interpretation of the code provisions. In other words, they conceived that the function of the judge could be limited to the application to concrete cases of rules so clearly formulated that nothing more than genuine interpretation would be necessary except for new and unforeseeable situations of fact. The notion that something of this sort can be done has been widespread but is refuted by all juristic and judicial experience. In Frederick the Great's Code the lawmaker's intention was to formulate with such careful minuteness that no possible doubt could arise in the future. Hence it was provided that the judges were not to have any discretion as to interpretation but were to consult a royal commission on any points they found doubtful and were to be absolutely bound by the answer of this commission. This stereotyping of the law was in accordance with the doctrine of the law of nature school which believed that a perfect and complete system could be worked out for which no changes would ever become necessary. Thus rational propositions could be laid down once for all so as to be available for every possible combination of circumstances. Perhaps it need not be said that the attempt to realize such an ideal proved impossible. After a time the royal commission was abolished and the right and duty of judges to interpret and develop by analogy had to be recognized.

Conceding that the first idea is impracticable, the second plan seems not worth while. Sir James Stephen's idea was that it would furnish a prelude to an eventual code in which the results of the development of the imperative element and of the traditional element were to be combined as was proposed by Lord Westbury. Justinian's codification shows us that a parallel compilation of the legislative-made and digest of judge-made law are likely to come into conflict not merely by overlapping of precepts but because the presupposition of a precept in the one way may not be that of a precept on the same point in the other. In this respect the codifier of Anglo-American law will encounter a difficulty in the distinction of our substantive law into law and equity. It would be much greater if he started with a compilation of statutes and a digest of decided cases. He would have much more to do than be sure to choose between all conflicting precepts. He would need to be sure that precepts presupposing divergent starting points for reasoning were not in his code side by side.

Those who drew up the French civil code made the first attempt to put the third idea into operation. In that code, on the whole, the attempt was made not to lay down minute rules on every conceivable point but to formulate broad principles. Of course this may be carried too far. On certain points and in certain fields of the law definite rules are expedient or even necessary. But in general, as has been seen in other connections, the lawmaker, whether legislative or judicial, must not be over-ambitious to lay down universal rules. . . .

2. Objections to codification. Many Anglo-American lawyers have insisted that codification of the common law would be, if not impossible, at least highly unfortunate. Almost everything which has been written in English in opposition to codification has its basis directly or indirectly in Savigny's tract on the Vocation of our Age for Legislation and Jurisprudence. Savigny's objections to codification were answered by Austin. But the weight of Austin's arguments is somewhat impaired by his acceptance of Bentham's idea of a code.

Savigny's objections resolve themselves to three. First, he argues that the growth of the law is likely to be impeded or diverted into unnatural directions. Experience, however, shows that this is not necessarily true. It can hardly be doubted that, on the whole, the French code brought about a juristic new start which has favored the development of the law in France. No doubt an ill drawn or too hastily drawn code might afford so poor a basis for further juristic or judicial development as to impede the progress of a system of law. There is no reason to suppose, however, that the carefully drawn codes of the present century have had any such effect.

Savigny's second objection is that a code made by one generation is likely to project directly or indirectly the intellectual and moral notions which existed at that time into days when such notions have become anachronisms. There is undoubted truth in this and it might well result from a code made on the basis of such a digest as was contemplated by Holland and by Sir James Stephen. But it must be observed that development of the law through juristic working over of the traditional element is open to the same objection. Our common law today can show more than one example of projection into the present of the ideas and modes of thought of the past. The law of the last part of the nineteenth century was full of such cases.

Savigny's third objection is based upon defects in the codes of the past. They may be summed up in two. (a) The codifiers but too often had only superficial knowledge of the law they tried to codify. Partly this was due to the eighteenth-century notion of natural law which made men think they could make a wholly new system by pure reason without regard to the juristic or judicial experience of the past. Partly it has been due to the attempt of one person or of a small number of persons to codify the whole law. The law of a modern state is too complex to be so thoroughly mastered in all its parts by one man or a few men as to enable that man or those few men to draw up a code. (b) In most cases codes in the past have been drawn too hurriedly. Justinian's commissioners set a bad precedent in that matter which was followed unhappily by those who drew the French civil code. The French code, the Georgia code, and the Negotiable Instruments Law in the United States are examples of the defects which necessarily result from undue haste. Field's civil code is an example of the defects which are sure to result from the attempt of one man to cover the whole field. The German code shows what may be accomplished by a sufficiently large commission taking sufficient time for its work and utilizing full criticism from every side.

To the points which Savigny made against the codes of the past, Austin added two others which are noteworthy. (1) He objected to them because they made no adequate provision for the incorporation from time to time of judicial interpretation. He insisted that there should be some provision whereby periodically the results of judicial application or interpretation of the code should be incorporated therein and in that way the traditional element which grows up around a code be made part of it. (2) He objected especially to the French code because it was not complete and was intended to be eked out by the pre-existing law. This is based largely on his idea that a code can be made substantially self-sufficing. It is probably impossible to draw up a code in such a way that all reference to the pre-existing law to throw light upon it will be obviated. It is true that so far as possible this necessity of looking into the law before the code should be done away with since otherwise a tendency will arise to treat the code sections as only declaratory. Herein is one of the chief defects of Field's civil code. It assumed at every point a pretty thorough knowledge of the common law, and was not in itself so clear and sound as to be any real help toward ascertaining the pre-existing law. On the other hand, the attempt to foreclose all judicial or juristic working over of the material of the code must in view of the experience of the past be pronounced futile. The most serious objection to a code in a common-law jurisdiction is that we have no well developed common-law technique of developing legislative texts. Our technique of statutory interpretation is not adequate to the application of a code.

3. Advisability of codifying Anglo-American law. If we apply to common-law jurisdictions what experience has shown as to the conditions which lead to codes, it must be evident that, especially in America, we are rapidly approaching a condition in which codification is likely to be resorted to.

(1) It can hardly be questioned that our case law is by no means able to rise to new situations as it could do in the past. Practically it broke down on the important subject of employer's liability and workmen's compensation. There was clear failure in holding promoters to their duties. Development was too slow in the law of public service agencies and conspicuously too slow in labor law. In these fields legislation and administrative commissions and boards have replaced common law and adjudication. Even in legal procedure it took legislation in England, Canada, and Australia to provide a modern system, although judicial rule-making has done the most for that subject in the present century. It must be admitted that the traditional element has shown signs for a time of having exhausted its possibilities.

(2) The defects of form in Anglo-American law of today are obvious. They may be summed up as five. (a) Want of certainty. . . .

(b) Waste of labor entailed by the unwieldy form of the law. As Chief Justice Sharswood put the matter, the difficulty is not so much to know the law as to know where to find it. . . . From personal experience I can testify that the labor is very heavy. The judges in important appellate courts today must have law secretaries to enable them to reduce this task to reasonable proportions.

(c) Lack of knowledge of the law on the part of those who amend it. It must be admitted that the fault in our sometimes crude legislation on matters of private law is not all with the legislators. It is sometimes an almost impossible task in jurisdictions where many controverted questions, often fundamental, are still open, to ascertain with assurance what the law is which is to be changed or amended or abrogated.

(d) Irrationality, due to partial survival of obsolete precepts. In Illinois in 1910, the Supreme Court had to decide that contingent remainders could still be barred by merger. After that, real property lawyers in Chicago trembled for a decade. What other supposedly obsolete common-law rules must they reckon with? No one knew. . . .

(e) Confusion. Courts are frequently led into mistakes between the two parallel lines of case law and statute law, dealing with the same subjects, the one potentially with the whole, the other unsystematically with parts here and there. No court has authority and no legislature, as a rule, undertakes to reduce any subject to systematic and complete orderly statement.

(3) Passing to the third point . . . in connection with the enactment of codes, we come to a matter which is likely longest to retard effective codification in the United States. Where significant codes have been enacted the growing point of the legal system had shifted to legislation and an efficient organ of legislation on matters of law had developed. Undoubtedly with us the growing point has largely shifted to legislation. But we have not developed an efficient organ of lawmaking for the ordinary civil side of the law. In England, if the government takes up a proposal for legislation it has the machinery for pushing it through Parliament. Also through the institution of parliamentary counsel England has got rid of some of the causes of crudity in legislation as to private law. But as has been said, Parliament is not interested in "lawyer's law." In the United States, both houses of Congress now have competent legislative counsel and this is true in some states. This, however, does not suffice to do more than insure the form of statutes. It seldom involves grasp of the legal difficulties at the root of a question. Moreover, there is nothing with us comparable to the taking up of a measure of detailed law reform by the cabinet in England and thus giving it the right of way in a crowded session. .

(4) On the other hand, the fourth point, the need of one law, is of more importance with us today than any of the others. It is suggestive that with the economic unification of the country conflict of laws is becoming one of the most important everyday subjects in the average American practice. The demand for one law was behind the growth of the common law. Prior to the Conquest there was no one law of England. Local customary law differed greatly. As one of the demands in Magna Carta was for one measure of corn and one measure of ale for all England, so another demand of the time was for one measure of law. Such a demand may some day lead to codification of the common law in the United States.

Our condition is much worse than that of England in respect of uncertainty, unwieldy bulk, and need of unification.

Attempt to reshape the law by judicial overruling of leading cases is no substitute for well drawn, comprehensive legislation. The English have an advantage in that down to the nineteenth century, and indeed till the second half of that century, relatively few cases were decided by the House of Lords. Hence old cases decided by tribunals not of ultimate authority may be questioned, whereas with us the ultimate reviewing court is likely to have fixed a century ago or more the law we should like to see changed or given up. Patchwork overruling along with patchwork legislative tinkering often does at least as much harm to the legal system as it does good. Our situation calls for a ministry of justice or a code; and a code will need a ministry of justice also.

ERNST FREUND, LEGISLATIVE REGULATION

New York: 1932. The Commonwealth Fund, pp. 5-10.

In comparing code law with unwritten common law, we have to consider the relation of code law to interpretation, to law reform, and to regulative legislation.

1. The interpretative elaboration of code provisions. The outstanding difference between a civil code and the Anglo-American system of case law is that code provisions are limited in number while the number of cases is unlimited. The accumulation of case law shows that the process of elaborating principles and rules can be extended almost indefinitely, stopping only at the point, often arbitrarily assumed, where subdifferentiation of type situations yields to individuation in the form of what is called a question of fact. . . . It is interesting, . . . to compare statements of the law of torts—a branch of the law which necessarily operates with abstractions (such as negligence or proximate cause) which at the core are matters of common sense, but have an extremely wide margin of uncertainty. The French Code has only five sections, as against thirty-one sections of the German Code, while the Swiss Code, with twenty-one sections, stands between them. On the other hand, the more didactically worded Code of Georgia has one hundred and nineteen sections; and unofficial statements are even more elaborate: Jenks' Digest of English Civil Law has three hundred and fifteen sections on torts, and the Restatement of the American Law Institute (not claiming to be intended for legislative enactment) gives in one of the tentative drafts two hundred and forty-nine sections to only a fragment of the subject. . . .

If legislation cannot rival the unwritten law in the mass production of declaratory rules, what is the object of codification? Of the three impelling reasons that historically have made for codification: unification, law reform, and clarification, it is the latter which is most likely to be drawn in question. Opponents of codification may contend that rules which must avoid the detail of case law make a pretense at clarification which must be illusory, and that the pretended benefit is paid for by the loss of flexibility which is the great merit of unwritten law. The lack of certainty may well be conceded, and no lawyer will be misled by the apparently categorical form of the rule; but the layman's purpose will often be served by intelligible explicitness falling short of absolute certainty; and this gives the written rule a political and educational value which nations living under codes fully appreciate.

On the other hand, the difference in flexibility between the written and unwritten law is apt to be greatly overestimated: so far as the argumentative form of a judicial conclusion implies elasticity, it must be remembered that judicial decisions generally turn on points which codes leave to interpretation, likewise expressed in inconclusive and therefore elastic form, whether through judicial decisions or through the writing of jurists. And in so far as the imperative form of a legislative conclusion may seem to imply inelasticity, it seems relevant to make two observations: first, that rules of unwritten law which correspond to code provisions are often accepted as settled with a rigidity hardly inferior to that of an imperative statement; and, second, that the legislative statement is flexible at least within the limits of inevitable expressional ambiguity and implication, and that the codifier has it within his power to choose latitudinarian terms to suit his purpose. The value of the provisions of the German Code concerning malice (§ 226), good faith (§ 157), and acts contro bonos mores (§ 826) lies in their intentional generality. . . .

2. Codification and law reform. One of the incidental benefits of codification is that it affords opportunities of correcting sporadic forms of anomaly or injustice which make no appeal to class interest or to popular imagination, and which are therefore likely to remain unremedied in the ordinary course of legislation. . . . Where law reform has strong social implications, the practical tendency, whatever the possibilities of unwritten law, will be to transfer the scene of the change from the relative obscurity of the court room to the political atmosphere of the halls of the legislature, although it is also true that occasionally the relative obscurity of the court room will serve the purposes of law reform better than an open legislative struggle.

3. Regulative rules in private law. In order to assign to legislation its proper place in private law, it must be realized, that, normally speaking, the judicial process cannot produce the rule that is regulative in character. . . . As the law becomes more socialized, the demand for qualified, in preference to absolute, rights increases; and in satisfying this demand, the uncompromising logic of the courts has proved inferior to legislation.

In any of the European civil codes it is possible to distinguish the relatively permanent stock of abstract and conceptual doctrines, largely the inheritance from Roman jurisprudence, from the innovations which involve administrative arrangements. The progress of the law lies largely in the latter, and a considerable part of this more modern law (title registry, corporation law, etc.) has been built up outside of the codes. Accident liability is transformed into schemes of compensation and of social insurance, the labor law becomes a system of administration, and many commercial transactions are placed under some form of official supervision. The declaratory part of the private law retains its absolute importance, but, in comparison with the regulative part, its relative importance is constantly diminishing.

NOTE

In Stone, "Some Aspects of the Problem of Law Simplification", 23 Colum.L.Rev. 319, 320-321 (1923), the author states:

"But the problem of simplifying our law in its statement and in its mechanism is due not alone or principally to the volume and character of its literature. It is one which is inherent in the nature of the common law and the method of its creation. The common law doctrine of precedent, whereby the judicial decision not only determines the rights of litigants who invoke it, but becomes the authoritative source of legal precepts to govern future cases, is at once the secret of its strength and the source of some of its weaknesses.

"Its rules and doctrines, unlike those of other systems, are forged between the hammer and anvil of opposing counsel in the judicial settlement of actual controversies. They are wrought to fit the very facts which call for the application of legal rules and inspire that creative spirit which more than in any other system has dominated the common law. Hence it is that in the course of its long history and experience the common law has developed, by its method and in the substance of its precepts and doctrines, a technical excellence and a capacity to adapt itself to new situations which have given to it an extraordinary vitality—a vitality which has enabled it to spread its influence over a large part of the civilized globe and is enabling it today to supplant other systems of law whenever it comes into conflict with them."

A. L. GOODHART, PRECEDENT IN ENGLISH AND CONTINENTAL LAW

50 Law Q.Rev. 40, 42, 61-63 (1934).

W. M. Best, the author of the well-known work on "Evidence" . . . says [The Juridical Society's Papers 213-215 (1856)]:

"Every system of law, whether in the shape of a code or not, contains some provisions for its own interpretation, and if a code for this country were resolved upon, one of the first questions its framers would have to settle would be, whether the decisions of judges on the meaning of expressions in it should have the force which judicial decisions have at present; or whether, as in France, the judges should be forbidden to lay down general principles. I cannot help thinking that the balance of advantage is on our side." . . .

I believe that the development of the common law doctrine is not due merely to the existence of convenient judicial machinery, but primarily to the fact that it satisfied a need which existed, and which still exists, in English law to a degree unknown on the Continent.

This need is the need for certainty—the need for definite fixed rules which shall bind the judges. On the Continent, even before the establishment of the Codes, there was a background of Roman law which furnished a legal system of developed doctrines and principles. With the codes we get an even stronger framework into which cases could be fitted by the judges, although, of course, creative interpretation, as it has been called, remained part of the judicial function. But in England, the judges had to create this structure almost entirely for themselves, and English justice if it were not to remain fluid and unstable, required a strong cement. This was found in the common law doctrine of precedent with its essential and peculiar emphasis on rigidity and certainty. It is here that we find both the cause and the justification for the English system, and an explanation, which is more than merely historical, of the fundamental difference between it and Continental jurisprudence.

This may also explain why the English system is less satisfactory when applied to statute law than it is in the case of judge-made law. Some years ago Sir Frederick Pollock wrote:

"The best and most rational portion of English law is in the main judge-made law. Our judges have always shown, and still show, a really marvellous capacity for developing the principles of the unwritten law, and applying them to the solution of questions raised by novel circumstances. Unfortunately they have, for reasons which it is not perhaps very easy to define, been far less successful in their interpretation of the written law, or in other words, of statutes." [(1893) 9 L.Q.R. 106.]

Perhaps one reason that may be suggested is that the rigidity of strict precedent, when superimposed on the rigidity of a statute, is unnecessary and inconvenient. The history of the Workmen's Compensation Acts, which by their nature demand simple interpretation but have, instead, become encrusted by a thick layer of binding cases, is hardly an illustration in favour of the English system. As Professor Allen has said:

"When the English judge has to apply a statute—and this nowadays is a great part of his task—he is, it would seem, in exactly the same position as the Continental judge who has to apply a code. But here too—so deeply rooted is our principle of judicial analogy—our judges are governed by precedents of interpretation. An English statute is not very old before it ceases to be a dry generalization and is seen through the medium of a number of concrete examples. The result is often startlingly different from what the enactment would seem to have intended." [Law in the Making (2nd ed.) 1930, at p. 110.]

In France, on the other hand, it has been possible to adapt the Code Napoleon to changing conditions by a gradual variation in the interpretation of the different sections—a variation which would have been far more difficult, if not impossible, if precedent cases had been absolutely binding.

I, therefore, disagree with Best's view, with which I began this paper, that if the English law were codified, the common law doctrine of precedent would still be the best method of interpretation, for this rigid, unyielding system is unnecessary when a statute or a code supplies in itself an adequate and definite framework. It has, however, in the past proved itself an admirable and essential material in the building up of the English law, supplying, as I have said, that cement of certainty which was required by the otherwise fluid judge-made law. Whether it is as useful at the present time, especially in the extreme form it has assumed since the beginning of the nineteenth century, is open to some doubt, for English law, in most of its branches, is no longer in the formative period but has become a mature and fully developed system.

ROSCOE POUND, SOURCES AND FORMS OF LAW

22 Notre Dame Lawyer 1, 63-66 (1946).

The New York Code. Agitation for codification in New York was in part a phase of the legislative reform movement of the fore part of the nineteenth century and influenced by the wide attention given to the writings of Bentham. In part it grew out of the hostility toward English institutions and English law in the period after the Revolution and favor toward things French which went along with Jeffersonian democracy. Both were well marked in New York. The French civil code had fascinated many, as it had almost every one abroad. Lay discussions of American law in the first quarter of the nineteenth century abound in demands for an American code. Very likely the connection of Livingston with the code in Louisiana was an influence also. But the prime mover was David Dudley Field. Before the New York Constitutional Convention in 1846, he had urged a general code. Largely as a result of his agitation, the constitution in 1847 provided for commissioners to reform procedure and codify the law. The commission to reform procedure was appointed in 1847 and in 1848 reported the first installment of the code of civil procedure, which was enacted in April of that year and put in effect in July. The rest of the code was reported from time to time in four different reports until in 1850 complete codes of civil and criminal procedure were submitted to the legislature. The history of the code of civil procedure is well known. Either substantially as reported by Field's commission or in the form of codes based upon his draft, it came to be in force in about thirty jurisdictions. After the adoption of the code of civil procedure the enthusiasm for law reform in New York waned, and in 1850 the legislature repealed the act appointing a commission to reform procedure and codify the law. One reason seems to have been that the commission on codifying the substantive law, which was headed by Chancellor Walworth, had proceeded with a deliberation which was not satisfactory to the public.

Upon this Field renewed his agitation for codification of the common law, and in 1857 the legislature provided for a new commission "to reduce into a written and systematic code the whole body of the law of this state or so much and such parts thereof as shall seem to them practical and expedient." The commissioners were David Dudley Field, William Curtis Noyes, and Alexander W. Bradford; obviously too small a commission for such a purpose. Noyes undertook the penal code and Field the political and civil codes. In preparing the civil code Field was assisted by Thomas G. Shearman and Austin

Abbott, both well known as text writers. This commission put forth the first draft of a civil code in 1862. The draft of the penal code, which had been assigned to Noyes, was presented in 1864. The political code was reported by Field in 1860.

In 1865, after Field had been at work upon these codes for eighteen years, the full text of the five codes, namely, the code of civil procedure, the code of criminal procedure, the penal code, the civil code, and the political code, were submitted in the ninth and last report of the commission. Of the eighteen years in which Field devoted a large part of his time to these codes, he received no compensation except for the first two years.

The original code of civil procedure adopted in New York was Field's first draft. His final draft was not adopted, but a different one, prepared on a different plan, although founded on Field's code, was adopted between 1876 and 1880. This code, which was prepared by Throop, went into great detail. Whereas there were 392 sections in Field's original code, in Throop's version this was extended to 3356, and further additions in 1890 and 1897 made the whole number of sections 3441. A great deal of the deservedly severe criticism which has been directed against the New York Code of Civil Procedure applies rather to this attempt to regulate by precise rule every action of the judge from the time he enters the court room than to the original Field draft. The Civil Practice Act of 1920 reduced this to 1540 sections (still too much detail) and further simplification has been going on.

In 1881, the code of criminal procedure was enacted, but the other codes failed of adoption in New York. As has been said above, some thirty jurisdictions adopted the code of civil procedure. Sixteen jurisdictions adopted the penal code and the code of criminal procedure. California, Montana, and North and South Dakota adopted all five of Field's codes. California, North Dakota and South Dakota have in addition a code of probate law. But it should be said in this connection that the civil code has accomplished little in the four jurisdictions which adopted it. The courts, especially in California, frequently ignored the civil code, deciding questions as matters of common law, seldom referring to the code or, if they did, assuming that it was merely declaratory. This attitude of the courts, however, was not the sole cause of the comparative failure of Field's civil code. It must be admitted that the code was by no means well drawn. The work was too much for one man, even though as good a lawyer and tireless a worker as David Dudley Field. It was fortunate both for the substantive law of New York and for the cause of codification that that state did not adopt his draft.

protection of private rights and the redress or prevention of private wrongs, which shall be denominated a civil action."

"It is idle to say that the distinction between legal and equitable actions has been wiped out by the modern practice. . . . See W. B. Hornblower, quoted in 2 Andrews, American Law (2nd ed.) § 635, n. 29 "You have the State of New York before you as a terrible example. I believe our practice today is infinitely more technical than that in New Jersey. Even the attempt to abolish forms of action and especially the attempt to abolish the distinction between law and equity practice have been dismal failures. . . ." FINAL REPORT OF THE NEW YORK CODE COMMISSION, FEBRUARY 13, 1865.

The Commissioners of the Code, appointed by the Act of April 6, 1857, having completed their labors, beg leave to make this their ninth and final report:

They have already reported, from time to time, the various steps taken by them in the progress of their work. Their duty, it will be remembered, as expressed in the act by which they were appointed, was "to reduce into a written and systematic code the whole body of the law of this State, or so much and such parts thereof as shall seem to them practicable and expedient, excepting always such portions of the law as have been already reported upon by the Commissioners of Practice and Pleadings, or are embraced within the scope of their reports." This work was to be divided into three portions; one containing the Political Code, another the Civil Code, and a third the Penal Code.

The Codes of Civil and Criminal Procedure, as reported complete by the Commissioners on Practice and Pleadings, were designed to embrace all the law of this State, respecting remedies in the judicial tribunals, civil and criminal, including the law of evidence. There then remained the vast body of substantive law; that is to say, the law of civil rights and obligations affecting all the transactions of men with each other and the law of government, including every branch of administrative and political action. This body of substantive law, the Legislature, by the Act of 1857, declared should be contained in the three codes—Political, Civil, and Penal—and to them the Commissioners of the Code have ever since devoted themselves.

READ & MACDONALD U.C.B.LEG.

Their first act was to prepare and report to the Legislature a general analysis of the codes projected by them. After this their efforts were next directed to the preparation of the Political Code. This was next divided into four parts: The first declared what persons composed the people of the State, and the political rights and duties of all persons subject to its jurisdiction; the second defined the territory of the State and its civil divisions; the third related to the general government of the State, the functions of its public officers, its general police, and civil polity; and the fourth related to the local government of counties, cities, towns, and villages. The draft having been made, was distributed among the Judges and other competent persons for examination; and after that the Commissioners reexamined their work and considered such suggestions as had been made to them; and the whole, as finally agreed upon by them, was reprinted and distributed to the Judges and other officers before being presented to the Legislature. The Political Code, thus drawn and revised, was presented to the Legislature on the 10th of April, 1860.

A few days afterward, by an act passed on the 16th of April, 1860, they were requested to prepare a Book of Forms adapted to the Code of Civil Procedure. This duty was performed by them, and the required forms were submitted to the Legislature on the 30th of March, 1861.

On the 5th of April, 1862, the Commissioners having prepared the draft of the Civil Code, distributed it to the Judges and others for examination, and, on the 2d of April, 1864, they in like manner distributed the drafts of the Penal Code.

Having reexamined these two codes, and considered such suggestions as had been made, they have finally revised and agreed upon them.

The Penal Code is herewith laid upon the tables of the members of the Senate and Assembly. The Civil Code is in the hands of the printer, and will shortly be completed, and in like manner furnished to the members of the two Houses. But, as the term of office of the Commissioners will expire before the close of the present session of the Legislature, it is not possible to make the required distribution among the Judge, surrogates, and county clerks, in time for the more formal presentation of the Civil and Penal Codes to the Legislature for adoption.

The Penal Code, thus prepared, defines all the crimes for which, according to the law of this State, persons can be punished, and the punishment for the same. In preparing it, the Commissioners kept the following objects in view: first, to bring within the compass of a single volume the whole body of the law of crimes and punishments; second, to supply deficiencies and correct errors in the present definitions of crimes; third, to make the relative degrees of punishment more nearly equal to the relative degrees of crime; and, fourth, to define and punish acts deserving of punishment, but not punishable by the existing law.

The Civil Code was required to embrace the laws of personal rights and relations, or property and of obligations.

It has four general divisions; the first relating to persons, the second to property, the third to obligations, and the fourth containing general provisions relating to these different subjects. In the execution of this vast undertaking, the Commissioners have endeavored to bring together and arrange in order all the general rules known to our law upon the subjects contained within the scope of such a code, rejecting those which are obsolete or unsuitable to our present condition, and adding such others as appeared necessary or desirable.

The first division, it will be seen, defines the civil condition of different persons in the State, adults, minors, persons of unsound mind, and Indians; enumerates their personal rights; declares their personal relations, under the various topics of marriage, divorce, husband, wife, parent, child, guardian, ward, master, and servant.

The second division contains the laws respecting property, real and personal, the various interests or estates therein, the modes of acquisition by occupancy, accession, transfer, will, or succession; the restrictions on alienation and accumulation, the conditions and qualifications of ownership uses and powers; the making, interpretation, and execution of wills, and various special provisions relating to corporations, copyright, shipping, and the rules of navigation. The third division embraces the whole subject of obligations, whether arising from contract or the operation of law, their definition, interpretation, transfer, and extinction, whether by performance, offer of performance, prevention of performance, or otherwise; the object and consideration of contracts, the parties thereto and their consent, whether freely given or obtained by duress, menace, fraud, undue influence, or mistake; and, after these general subjects, the particular subjects are considered of sale, exchange, deposit, loan, hiring, employment, service, carriage, trust, agency, partnership, insurance, indemnity, suretyship, pledge, mortgage, lien, and commercial paper. The fourth division specifies the different kinds of relief afforded for the violation of private rights, and the means of securing their observance, whether compensatory, specific, or preventive, and the measure of damages when compensation is the rule. This division contains, also, provisions concerning the special relations of debtor and creditor, and concerning nuisances, and enumerates and explains various maxims of jurisprudence.

In all this immense range of subjects, while it has been the general purpose of the Commissioners to give the law as it now exists, they have kept in mind the injunction of the Constitution to "specify such alterations and amendments therein as they shall deem proper." In obedience to this command of the organic law, they have specified various alterations and amendments which they consider proper to be adopted. These are mentioned in the notes to the different sections, where the reasons for recommending them are generally given. . . .

The Commissioners will not presume to think that in the preparation of the codes they have foreseen all the cases which can arise in the multifarious affairs of men, or that they have even collected all the general rules which have been announced from the bench in the history of our law. Some may have been overlooked, some may have been omitted from a mistaken belief that they were obsolete or inapplicable to our present condition, or were contrary to other rules of greater importance that ought to be retained.

All that the Commissioners profess is, that they have endeavored to collect those general rules known to our law which are applicable to our present circumstances, and ought to be continued. They trust that they have arranged these rules in a manner which will be approved by the scientific student, while it will help the lawyer and the citizen to an easier if not a better knowledge of the law. And they flatter themselves that, for the unforeseen cases which are certain to arise, there are general principles, rules of interpretation, and analogies, which will serve as guides for judicial decision.

The question whether a code is desirable is simply a question between written and unwritten law.

That this was ever debatable is one of the most remarkable facts in the history of jurisprudence. If the law is a thing to be obeyed, it is a thing to be known; and, if it is to be known, there can be no better, not to say no other, method of making it known than of writing and publishing it. If a written constitution is desirable, so are written laws.

There are those who argue that an unwritten law is more favorable to liberty than a written one. The contrary should seem to be more consonant with reason. It can scarcely be thought favorable to the liberty of the citizen that he should be governed by laws of which he is ignorant, and it can as little be thought that his knowledge of the laws is promoted by their being kept from print or from authentic statement in a written form.

Whatever is known to the Judge or to the lawyer can be written, and whatever has been written in the treatises of lawyers or the opinions of Judges can be written in a systematic code.

It is no answer to say that nothing can be written which will not be susceptible of different interpretations. That may be true. But it is no more susceptible of different interpretations when written in a code than when written in the reports. On the contrary, when expressed with care, for the very purpose of stating a rule which is to govern all cases alike, there is more likelihood of precision in language than when expressed with reference to a particular case.

For these eight years the Commissioners have been engaged in the preparation of the codes with which they were charged by the Legislature of 1857. The task which they undertook was untried and difficult. No code of the common law of America or of England had ever before been attempted. How they have acquitted themselves it is not for them to say. Their work is before the Legislature and the people. If it shall effect half the good which the Commissioners have ventured to hope from it, and the thought of which has cheered them through their long task, they will be rewarded. . . .

1. David Dudley Field, The Codes of New York and Codification in General (An Address to the law students of Buffalo, N. Y., February 6, 1879). Speeches, Arguments and Miscellaneous Papers of David Dudley Field (1884) p. 374. ". . . I am to speak of the Codes of New York and codification in general. By the Codes of New York I mean not the Code of Procedure, under which we worked from 1848 to 1877, nor the Code of Civil Procedure under which we have worked, or tried to work, since, but the five Codes, which were prepared by commissioners appointed by the Legislature, pursuant to the Constitution of 1846. What I have to say to you, therefore, will relate to those Codes and to codification.

"Why these Codes have been neglected in New York, it would not be difficult to say. The resistance which the first Code provoked, the conservatism, or, as I prefer to call it, the inertia of the profession, and the late revision of the statutes, have been the causes. It is not surprising that such a change as the first Code produced should have encountered vehement opposition. Most of the lawyers looked upon it with disfavor, some for one reason, some for another: the equity lawyers because it had so much of the common law, and the common lawyers because it had so much of equity; the admirers of special pleading because it made useless their favorite learning; and all, or almost all, who had learned and loved the old ways, were adverse to treading in the new. The resistance, however, gradually lessened and at last died away; but in the meantime the old had forgotten, while the young, had never learned, that the fragment of 1848 had been completed by the same codifiers, and that four other codes had been added for the purpose of completing the codification of all the law of the land. . . .

"In 1870, twenty-two years after the enactment of the Code, the Legislature ordained a revision of the statutes. The revisers, ignoring the completed Code which the codifiers had prepared, and passing by the shapeless and tangled mass of statutes which cumbered the shelves of law libraries and made the heart of the searcher sick every day of his life, began, with the Code, and after six years produced 1,496 sections, which they represented as part of a system of civil practice and convenient to be enacted before the remainder. Those sections the Legislature enacted, to take effect after another session. That other session came, the two Houses disagreed, and thus, while one Legislature was sitting, a law went into effect against the will of one of its Houses, solely because a Legislature that had gone out of office had so willed it. The second installment then came, with more than 1,800 sections. This has not yet been passed. It is not my purpose to make the present an occasion to criticise this work, either the first installment or the last, further than to show its effect upon general codification. That it has seriously interfered with the plan of codifying our law can hardly be denied by an intelligent observer. It is not comprehensive, which a code must be, and it is minute, which a code must not be. It professes to be what it is not, a code. This, as I have said, is a digest of all the law upon a given subject. This work, while it takes a name which implies comprehensiveness, is avowedly incomplete. Thus the fourth section, instead of defining the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, declares that it shall continue to exercise the jurisdiction now vested in it by law, except as otherwise here prescribed; in other words, enacting that the Court has the jurisdiction which it has, and what that is must be gathered from, I know not how many ordinances, statutes, and reports. The work contradicts the theory in another respect; it is particular and minute, while a code is general and comprehensive; it undertakes to provide for every case by an enumeration of particulars, while a code provides for the same things by general description. Meantime the contest over it has made the name of code odious to many who, by a natural mistake, have made the particular instance to stand for the general principle. While the thirteen chapters now on the statute book are a serious hindrance to codification, the nine chapters would be greater, and so long as either or both stand in the way, though the other branches of the law might be reduced to a code, the civil practice would remain without codification, and before it could be undertaken with success these thirteen or two-and-twenty chapters would have to be taken to pieces, enlarged on the one hand and diminished on the other, so as to include every general rule and exclude every unnecessary particular. . . ."

CHARLES PAYNE FENNER, THE JURISPRUDENCE OF THE SUPREME COURT OF LOUISIANA

133 La. lxi, lxiii (1913).

I do not think in the first place, that it can be justly claimed that as the result of codification, we have attained a greater certainty in the law which has relatively diminished the volume of litigation, even as regards those subjects which are specifically covered by the Code. Our experience and that of France in this respect would seem to justify the claim of the opponents of codification that the limitations of human capacity for written expression are such as to make the attainment of certainty in a written code of substantive law well-nigh impossible.

In France, for instance, I think the following statement by an eminent advocate of the theory of codification, Mr. Sheldon Amos, must be admitted to be well founded. He says:

"It is well known, for instance, that the set of French Codes, which in time became the most comprehensive and self-dependent of all, have been completely overridden by the interpretations of successive and voluminous commentators, as well as by the constantly accruing decisions of the Court of Cassation. In France, as was intimated before, in treating of another subject, there can be no reliance in any given case as to whether a judge will defer to the authority of his predecessors, or will rather recognize the current weight attached to an eminent commentator, or will extemporize an entirely novel view of the law. The greatest possible uncertainty and vacillation that have ever been charged against English law are little more than insignificant aberrations when compared with what a French advocate has to prepare himself for when called upon to advise a client."

With us, partly, perhaps, because we have had no commentators, but principally because we have fully adopted the common law rule of stare decisis, the uncertainties of codal interpretation have not been so marked. Speaking relatively, however, I do not think it can be justly claimed that our jurisprudence exhibits any material gain in legal certainty as the result of codification.

It is certainly not true either that our jurisprudence consists wholly, or indeed in the main, of mere codal interpretations, or "in the interpretation of words." The most cursory examination of our reports, particularly those of comparatively recent years, will discover that in a very large proportion of the decided cases the rule of law applied has been deduced from the same sources and by exactly the same process as would be resorted to in a similar case in any common-law state, and there are lawyers in this city engaged in important branches of practice who rarely have occasion to consult the Code.

That this is due in some measure to the fact that both our judges and lawyers too frequently "sin the sin" of resorting to common-law authorities when the true rule for decision might be found in the Code I think must be admitted. Forming as we do, in effect, an integral part of a much larger community with the other component parts of which we are united by the strongest ties of race, blood, and common interest, and in all of which the common-law system prevails, there is naturally manifested in our jurisprudence a strong and ever-present tendency to conform to common-law standards. And that this has resulted not infrequently in unjustified departures from the letter of the Code is doubtless true. It is to this tendency which Mr. James C. Carter, sometime leader of the American bar, referred, when in one of his philippics against the theory of codification, he said in reference to Louisiana:

"The defects so strikingly characteristic of French jurisprudence would have been repeated here (in Louisiana) but for the practical good sense which has been exhibited by the bench and bar of that state. Largely imbued with the principles and methods of the English common law, they have looked to that body of jurisprudence, so far as the Code permitted them, as containing the real sources of the law, and have fully adopted its maxim of stare decisis. Nothing is more observable than the extent to which the English and American reports and text-books are cited as authoritative in that state. It would seem that the courts, except where there is some provision of the Code directly in point, and except in those cases where the civil law, which lies at the basis of the legal system of Louisiana, notoriously differs from the common law, seek the rule in any given case, in the same quarters in which it is sought by us, and then inquire, if the occasion arises, whether there is anything in the Code inconsistent with the rule thus found."

The appeal here to common-law authorities is justified, moreover, in many cases, because upon many subjects, as the result of the extent to which the earlier common-law judges, in the formative period of English jurisprudence, adopted the principles of the civil law, there are no very material differences between the two systems.

The very liberal admixture of common-law principles and methods of decision in our jurisprudence is, I think, due, in the main, however, to quite another cause, viz., that in a very large proportion of the cases which are presented to our courts our Code furnishes no definite rule for decision.

And this must ever be true with any code of substantive law. Civilization has certainly not yet attained a condition of stability in which it is possible, in the nature of things, that statutory rules can be enacted at any one time to cover all the varying groupings of fact which may arise in the future, and it is therefore entirely impossible to wholly supplant the unwritten law.

FRANCIS M. BURDICK, A REVIVAL OF CODIFICATION

10 Colum.L Rev 118 (1910)

Almost a century has passed, since Jeremy Bentham addressed to President Madison his famous proposal to prepare a complete code of law for the United States.

"Give me, Sir," wrote Bentham, "the necessary encouragement—I mean a letter importing approbation of this my humble proposal; and, as far as depends upon yourself, acceptance. I will forthwith set about drawing up for the use of the United States, or such of them, if any, as may see reason to give their acceptance to it, a complete body of proposed law, in the form of Statute law; say, in one word, a Pannomion,—a body of statute law, including a succedaneum to that mass of foreign law, the yoke of which, in the wordless, as well as boundless, and shapeless shape of common, alias unwritten law, remains still about your necks."

The letter went unanswered for a number of years; and the answer, when made, though very courteous, was a virtual declination of the great codifier's offer, on the ground, that "a compliance with your proposals would not be within the scope of my proper functions." Meanwhile, Bentham had extended similar proposals to the Governors of several States; and, shortly after the receipt of President Madison's answer, he proffered his services "to the citizens of the several American United States."

Two of the Governors—Snyder of Pennsylvania and Plumer of New Hampshire—were captivated by the "philanthropic communication." They urged its consideration upon their respective legislatures, but without favorable result. Governor Plumer promptly intimated to Bentham his own lack of power in the matter, as well as his misgivings about the attitude of the legislature. "How far it is practicable to establish such a system in New Hampshire, I cannot determine," he writes. "We have not only a host of prejudices to encounter, but the interests of a body of lawyers, many of whom here, as in all other countries, dread reform, fearing it would diminish their individual profits."

That the Governor's misgivings were well founded is shown by an extract, published by Bentham from a private letter, written to him by one whom he styles, "distinguished Functionary in the United States, Member of the House of Representatives in his State, and Delegate therefrom to Congress." This letter assures Bentham that his proposal was fairly brought before the legislature by Governor Plumer; that to give it a better chance of success, a son of the Governor, who was a member, caused the greater part of an article on this subject, in a late Edinburgh Review, to be published and distributed among the legislators, but that all the lawyers of that body, except the Governor's son, declared it inexpedient to accept the codification proposal. These lawyers, Bentham's distinguished friend assured him, were actuated by various motives. Some believed that the common law was the perfection of reason. Others, who were advanced in years, did not like the idea of adopting a new system which would compel them to learn the law over again. Still others "were perhaps swayed by the persuasion, that the new system would prove injurious to the profession, by rendering the law more clear and explicit, and thus diminishing the profits which are at present derived from its uncertainty and obscurity." . . .

Notwithstanding this traditional attitude of the legal profession its members seem to be growing more and more tolerant of the idea of enacting, what Bentham styled, "particular codes": that is, codes containing "such matters only, with which some one class or denomination of persons only have concern." Advocates of scientific codification, like Sheldon Amos, are as stoutly opposed to such enactments as they are to the old policy, (as they conceive it) of allowing law to be made by judicial legislation. Mr. Amos refers to the "particular" codifiers as those who are fond of speaking of "gradual" or "progressive" codification. "They desire to reconstruct large portions of the law, each severally by itself—in face, converting all the law on each separate topic into a statute, the statutes being quite independent of one another, or only casually related. The subjects to be thus codified in turn would be chosen either in view of their apparent importance, or of the pressing need they stand in of having some process of reorganization performed upon them." Mr. Amos fears that the codifier of this sort may "interpose permanent barriers in his path which shall forever prevent him from progressing to the highest point of perfection," viz., the production of the ideal code, which he declares, "is eminently a product of logical art."

In the face of this and abundant other criticism, the "progressive codifiers" have been making considerable progress, both in England and on this side of the Atlantic. The first of their productions to secure Parliamentary sanction was the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, although several years earlier, Sir James Fitz-James Stephen had done pioneer service in the cause, by his Digest of the Law of Evidence and had been followed by Sir Frederick Pollock with his Digest of the Law of Partnership. Judge Chalmers tells us that the idea of codifying the law of negotiable instruments was first suggested by the Digest of the Law of Evidence; and he ascribes the success of his Bill to the "wise lines laid down by Lord Herschell who insisted that the Bill should be introduced in a form which did nothing more than codify existing law, and that all amendments should be left to Parliament. A Bill," he adds, "which merely improves the form, without altering the substance, of the law creates no opposition, and gives very little room for controversy. . . . I am sure that further codifying measures can be got through Parliament, if those in charge of them will not attempt too much, but will be content to follow the lines laid down by Lord Herschell. Let a codifying Bill in the first instance simply reproduce existing law, however defective. If the defects are patent and glaring it will be easy to get them amended. If an amendment be opposed, it can be dropped without sacrificing the Bill. The form of the law at any rate is improved, and its substance can always be amended by subsequent legislation. If a Bill when introduced proposes to effect changes in the law, every clause is looked at askance, and it is sure to encounter opposition."

This policy was adopted by Sir Frederick Pollock, whose Partnership Bill, considerably amended, became The Partnership Act, 1890; and by Judge Chalmers again, in the Bill which became the Sale of Goods Act, 1893.

Another fundamental tenet of these successful codifiers is that, "while any branch of the law is in process of formation, it is unwise to attempt to codify it." To quote Judge Chalmers again:

"A code should be formed on a firm basis of experience. You then know what you are doing. A practical and working code cannot spring from the head of the draftsman, as Pallas Athene is fabled to have sprung, fully equipped, from the head of her father Zeus. In legislation, as in other sciences, the a priori road is a dangerous one to tread. When the principles of the law are well settled, and when the decided cases that accumulate are in the main mere illustrations of accepted general rules, then the law is ripe for codification. A code can usefully settle disputed points, and fill up small lacunae in the law, but it should always have its feet on the ground. If you go above and beyond experience, you are codifying in the air, and will probably do more harm than good to commerce and mercantile law. No service is done to the cause of codification by putting the case for it too high. The province of a code, I venture to think, is to set out, in concise language and logical form, those principles of the law which have already stood the test of time."

It is quite clear that the revival of codification in England is due to the fact that its promoters have been content to act upon the discreet and unambitious principles enunciated above by Judge Chalmers. They have not posed as iconoclasts of the common law. They have not proclaimed themselves law reformers. They have not undertaken the task of substituting for existing law, the law as it ought to be. It has not been their aim to show themselves wiser than the courts. On the other hand, it will be observed, they do not attempt to codify any branch of the law, until its principles have become well settled. And then, their codes are not to contain experiments, but are to embody experience.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A PERMANENT ORGANIZATION FOR IMPROVEMENT OF THE LAW PROPOSING THE ESTABLISHMENT OF AN AMERICAN LAW INSTITUTE

A.L.I.Proc., Vol. 1, 12-28 (1923).

(D) Need for a Restatement of the Law

The American legal encyclopedias summarize the decisions of the courts, and to a limited extent the statutes, in such manner as usually to enable the lawyer to learn without the necessity of consulting further authority the simple and certain matters of the law.

On single branches of the law, as corporations, property, torts, there is also a large number of books, the object of which is to do for one topic what the encyclopedia undertakes somewhat summarily to do for all. These treatises and textbooks vary in excellence. The majority are poor, but there are some which are well written, and from which a full and accurate knowledge of the law may be obtained.

The law encyclopedia, being a collection of treatises written by different persons, also varies greatly from topic to topic, both as to the completeness and accuracy with which the authorities are cited and, as to the skill with which the law is analyzed and stated. It is not, and from the very nature of its objects and uses should not be either critical or constructive. While properly calling the reader's attention to direct conflicts between cases, especially where the courts making the decisions have expressly recognized the conflicts, the object of the work is not to point out conflicts and uncertainties that do not lie on the surface and to suggest solutions, or to make a critical analysis of the law, or to enter upon a learned discussion of what is or ought to be the law. What is true concerning the legal encyclopedia is also very largely true in regard to most American legal treatises. . . .

One reason for the absence of critical and constructive features from the law treatise that cites all the decisions is the great volume of case law. Legal authors of the requisite ability are rare who at once have the time and patience to collect, examine and arrange thousands of decisions and, when this labor is accomplished, have left sufficient energy to do high-class analytical and constructive legal work. Indeed the mere task of collecting and examining the material on a legal topic of any scope is rapidly becoming too great for any one person, no matter how great his patience and his capacity for work; while even in topics of comparatively narrow scope, the necessary expenditure for type-writing and secretarial assistance is so great as usually to eliminate the probability of financial return. And yet our examination of the causes of the present uncertainty of the law shows conclusively the need of a restatement of the law that will have an authority much greater than that now accorded to any existing encyclopedia or treatise. We are convinced therefore that the specific work which any organization created by the legal profession to improve the law should undertake on its formation is the production of such a "Restatement of the Law."

We speak of the work which the organization should undertake as a restatement; its object should not only be to help make certain much that is now uncertain and to simplify unnecessary complexities, but also to promote those changes which will tend better to adapt the laws to the needs of life. The character of the restatement which we have in mind can be best described by saying that it should be at once analytical, critical and constructive. . . .

Again, where the law is uncertain or where differences in the law of different jurisdictions exist not due to differences in economic and social conditions, the restatement, while setting forth the existing uncertainty, should make clear what is believed to be the proper rule of law. The degree of existing uncertainty in the law should not necessarily be reduced by a mere explanation of rival legal theories. Indeed, a restatement which confined itself to such an explanation would reduce the degree of existing uncertainty only in those instances where but one line of decisions was supported by reasons worthy of consideration. Where the uncertainty is due, as it often is, to the existence of situations presenting legal problems on the proper solution of which trained lawyers may differ, the courts can best be helped by support given to one definite answer to the problem.

Furthermore, there can be little doubt that the law is not always well adapted to promote what the preponderating thought of the community regards as the needs of life. The limitation on the character of any reformation of the law by an organization formed to carry out the public obligation of the legal profession to improve the law is reasonably definite. Changes in the law which are, or which would, if proposed, become a matter of general public concern and discussion should not be considered, much less set forth, in any restatement of the law such as we have in mind. Changes which do not fall under the ban of this limitation, and which will carry out more efficiently ends generally accepted as desirable are within the province of the restatement to suggest.

The limitation just stated would exclude suggestions of changes in governmental organization, except possible changes in the details of court organization. It would also bar the suggestion of any change in the law pertaining to taxation and other fiscal matters and matters connected with governmental administrative policy, as well as advocacy of novel social legislation, such as old age or sickness pensions, or a method of improving the relations between capital and labor, or of protecting the public from industrial controversies by the establishment of arbitration tribunals. . . .

The restatement here described, if adequately done, will do more to improve the law than any other thing the legal profession can undertake. It will operate to produce agreement on the fundamental principles of the common law, give precision to use of legal terms, and make the law more uniform throughout the country. Such a restatement will also effect changes in the law, which it is proper for an organization of lawyers to promote and which will make the law better adapted to the needs of life.

(E) Form of the Restatement

Though there necessarily will be minor variations in the manner of presentation of different parts of the restatement due to the special exigencies of particular topics, general uniformity of type throughout the restatement is important.

The profession would find great difficulty in the use of the publications of the organization if each topic was treated in a different manner. Again radical differences in form would rightly be taken to indicate a lack of agreement among those preparing the restatement as to its objects.

As the restatement will be the work of a number of persons all fundamental questions of form must be determined before the work on any topic is begun. These questions of form are of the first importance. The form adopted should reflect the objects of the restatement, and if it does so will materially aid the attainment of those objects.

The chief characteristic of the form of presentation should be the separation by typographical or other device of the statement of the principles of law from the analysis of the legal problems involved, the statement of the present condition of the law and the reasons in support of the principles as stated.

The statement of principles should be made with the care and precision of a well-drawn statute, though it will not be necessary and may often not be advisable to adopt language appropriate for statutory enactment. The adoption of a statutory form might be understood to imply a lack of flexibility in the application of the principle, a result which is not intended.

This separation of the statement of the principles of law from the discussion of legal problems, authorities and reasons, lends itself to the constructive objects of the work far better than that mixture of statement of present law, historical description and discussion of legal theory which is characteristic of the law treatise. It is essential that the attitude of mind of those doing the work shall not be that of those who are writing a treatise solely based on the existing decisions of the courts and some knowledge of the statutes. The mental attitude should be more like that of those who desire to express the law in statutory form. Even though those who draft such a statement may not be doing more than express the existing law as found in the decisions and scattered statutes, they think primarily of the topic, and therefore deal, as we have pointed out the restatement should deal, with situations that have not as yet been passed on by the court or made the subject of statutory enactment. Again, a group of persons primarily absorbed in setting forth a complete body of principles are perhaps more apt to perceive possible improvements. Each change, however, before being suggested, must pass through the test of precise statement. This necessity for precise statement will tend to make the writers give careful examination to the effect of the proposed change in view of the law as set forth in other related parts of the restatement. We do not intend to imply that the treatise form of restatement precludes the possibility of care; rather that the separation of the statement of principles from the body of the accompanying analytical and expository treatise is more apt to impel its exercise.

The statement of principles should be much more complete than that found in European continental codes. The common law student of foreign codes is impressed with the fact that the statements of law are for the most part expressed in such general terms that the court, in applying the principles without other control than the code has a much wider discretion than the judges of our own courts, who are usually guided in the most minute details by former decisions in cases presenting almost every phase of the case before them. The difference between the position of the continental European court and that of the American court in determining a case is that the former is bound by every statement made in the code, but these statements are expressed in such general language that the court has wide discretion in their application; the American court, on the other hand, though always in the position of being able to change and modify the common law, practically, because of the detail in which the law is set forth in prior decisions and its respect for such precedent, has usually a far narrower field for the exercise of discretion. We believe any restatement of our law to be of practical use should follow this characteristic of our law, and that therefore the principles of law should be set forth with a fullness made possible by the care with which rules pertaining to the application of more general principles have been considered in the decisions of our courts.

As intimated, the statement of principles should be accompanied by a thorough discussion of legal theory. Principles cannot be properly applied without full knowledge of the legal theories on which they are based. While this discussion of legal theory should be separate from the statement of principles, to refer to it as notes or annotations will convey the erroneous impression that the discussion intended is a mere explanation or expansion of the principles, rather than what we believe it should be in a thorough and scientific discussion of the legal theories underlying the principles made in the light of a full knowledge of the authorities. . . .

We here also desire to call attention to the importance of expressing the restatement in clear and simple English avoiding so far as possible, the use of technical and unusual terms. The restatement should be understandable by an intelligent, educated person who is not a trained lawyer. This, of course, does not imply that any restatement would enable a man to act as his own lawyer or that the need of trained lawyers would be diminished to any considerable extent.

(F) Legislative Enactment of the Restatement as a Code of Law
Not Desirable.

From what has been said in regard to the form of the restatement it is clear that we do not look forward to the principles of law therein set forth being adopted as a code.

Two features distinguish the common law from statute and code. The first of these features is its flexibility where the law has been made statutory and the statute covers the facts of a case presented to the court, the court has no discretion; the judges must apply the statute even though they feel that the rule of law stated in the statute as applied to the facts does a real injustice. Where, however, the same statement of law is the clear result of prior decisions, but has not been made part of the statutory law, if the members of the court feel that the application of the law as found in prior cases will produce injustice, they frequently announce a modification or exception to the universality of the previously accepted statement of law; the modification or exception being based on those facts which made a real difference between the case before them and the ordinary case in which the rule of law as previously stated is applied. The second feature of the common law and one which we have just explained is the greater fullness with which it is possible by an examination of the decisions of the courts to express the law.

If the "principles" in the restatement of the law were made with a view to their adoption by legislatures as a formal statutory codification of the law, one or other of these two distinctive features of the common law, its flexibility or its fullness of detail, would have to be sacrificed. We have already stated our belief that the principles of law should be set forth with a fullness made possible by decisions of the courts. We fear that if the law stated in this detail were given the rigidity of a statute, injustice would result in many cases presenting unforeseen facts.

If the principles of law set forth in the restatement are not to be adopted as a formal code it is nevertheless not impossible that they may be adopted by state legislatures with the proviso that they shall have the force of principles enunciated as the basis of the decisions of the highest court of the state, the courts having power to declare modifications and exceptions. It has been suggested that such action on the part of a state legislature would at once give an authority to the restatement which it otherwise would not possess, and at the same time would not fetter the courts as would a formal legislative code; and furthermore, that the courts would have greater freedom in adopting the rules laid down in the restatement, and at the same time would be free to deal with those cases which inevitably will arise wherein the rigid application of the principles set forth in the restatement would result in injustice. The possibility that the proposed restatement of the law may receive quasi statutory sanction, either in whole or in part, as a "guide and aid" to the courts is one that we should keep before our minds while the work is in progress as a possible outcome of our labors. The suggestion is at least an interesting one, though at this stage of the project we are not required to commit ourselves to an approval of it. The important thing now is so to plan the work that the restatement from its inception shall be recognized as a work of great public importance for the execution of which the American legal profession as represented by its leaders on the bench, in practice, and in the schools, is responsible. The way in which these things may be accomplished is the subject of later sections of this Report.

If the organization which we suggest can be formed and supported there is reasonable assurance that the restatement, even though it may not be formally adopted by legislatures as a guide to the courts, will be given by courts not already committed to a contrary rule approximately such authority as is now accorded a prior decision of the highest court of the jurisdiction, and therefore that its effect in correcting existing uncertainties and otherwise improving the law will be very great.

(G) Extent to Which Legislative Action will be Necessary to Carry Out the Purposes of the Restatement.

The principles of law set forth in the restatement will not include deformities, but will eliminate many uncertainties of the existing law, and make improvements which will further the administration of justice.

Where the law is uncertain the courts can adopt the solution suggested in the restatement without waiting for statutory authority. Where the statement of the law set forth is against the weight of authority in most of the states, but the matter has not been the subject of a prior decision by the courts in some one or more of the states, the courts in these jurisdictions, likewise without waiting for any legislative authority, may follow the law as set forth in the restatement. A somewhat different situation will arise in any jurisdiction where the principle set forth in the restatement is clearly contrary to previous decisions of the courts of that jurisdiction. Whether in such a situation the courts will, without legislative action, follow the law as suggested in the restatement rather than the law as embodied in their own prior decisions will depend upon the particular circumstances of each case. Where the cases opposed to the rule laid down in the restatement are numerous, and especially where some of the decisions are of long standing and the rule suggested in the restatement is not found in any prior decision, the courts will be likely to take the position that, though the rule as stated in the case may be subject to adverse criticism it has become so far a part of the accepted law that it can now be changed only by legislative action. This legislative action may be the adoption as a statute of that part of the statement of principles embodying the proposed change in the law. As already explained, however, it is possible for the legislature, instead of giving the change the rigidity of a statute, to adopt the law as set forth in the restatement as a guide to the courts. Such action would warrant the court adopting the law as set forth in the restatement even though the rule there stated was admittedly contra to the prior decisions of the court.

Where the change proposed in the restatement is a change in the present statute law, the mere adoption of the principles set forth in the restatement as a guide to the courts would not warrant the courts disregarding the statute. Furthermore there are topics of our law where the very rigidity resulting from the embodiment of the law in a legislative enactment is a distinct gain. If, for instance, there is little or no change in the essential conditions which make the law pertaining to a particular topic, and if in many situations constantly arising it is more important that the law should be certain than that one rule rather than another should be adopted, then it is probable that the statement of principles dealing with the topic should be made a part of the statute law. Thus the action of the commissioners on uniform state laws in presenting to the state legislatures statutes to codify the law of sales, the laws pertaining to commercial paper and the law pertaining to some of our business associations is justified not only because uniform statutes on these subjects correct the unfortunate effect of varying commercial law as between the different states, but also because the law on these topics, presenting as they do many of the characteristics just referred to, may with advantage be the subject of legislative enactment.

Outside, however, of those changes which of necessity require legislative action and of those legal topics which, because of their peculiar characteristics, are perhaps best embodied in a statute, lie the great fields of the common law and that common law of the statutes which consists of the rules for the application of ancient and generally adopted statutes. For the greater portion of these fields the statement of principles, though made with the care and precision of a well-drawn statute, should be made without thought of its adoption by state legislatures or Congress as a code each provision of which was in all cases binding on the courts. As we have said, we are opposed to any attempt at the general codification of the law in the usual sense of the word.

THE AMERICAN LAW INSTITUTE PROCEEDINGS

Discussion of Conflict of Laws Restatement Tentative Draft,
Vol. 7, pp. 86-89 (1929).

"Section 624. Action for Trespass upon Foreign Land.

"Except as stated in Sections 625 and 626, no action can be maintained in one state to recover compensation for a trespass upon or injury to land in another state."

Mr. Rose: I wish to enter a protest against Section 624. Arkansas has on the west the barbarous community of Oklahoma and also the barbarous community of Texas. Now, those people from that country can come into Arkansas according to this rule and burn up all of our houses and go back home and ever after be absolutely free from punishment. A man can come over from Oklahoma and burn up my house, in fact, burn up all I have in the world, and I have no way of pursuing him and making him pay. I do not believe that that is the law. There may be some decisions to that effect, but law and common sense and justice ought to be the same, and I do not believe that we ought to give our sanction to a rule like that, even if there be decisions to that effect. Eliminate it and let the courts come to a reasonable conclusion. If a man comes from Oklahoma and burns up my house I ought to be allowed to go to Oklahoma and sue him for the loss. Furthermore, the rule is inconsistent with the rule in Section 626, which reads:

READ & MACDONALD U.C.B.LEG.

"If an act is done in one state causing injury to land in another state, an action can be maintained in the former state as well as in the latter."

If, on knowing that the wind is blowing toward Arkansas, and I have a house on the border, he sets fire to a piece of property in Oklahoma and the sparks are carried over into Arkansas, I can go into Oklahoma and recover judgment against him for the amount. Now, I do not see that it makes any difference whether he sets fire in Oklahoma and it goes into Arkansas and burns my property, or whether he comes into Arkansas and burns my property. Those two rules are inconsistent in principle, and while there may be cases which support either or both of them, the cases supporting the latter are certainly correct, and the cases supporting the former are certainly a parody upon justice and common sense. If a man can come over from Oklahoma into Arkansas and burn up my house and go back and I am absolutely without redress, that is something that we ought not to give our sanction to.

Mr. Beale: I am very happy to find myself in agreement with everything Judge Rose says here. This is one of the most obnoxious rules of law that I have found in the books, and I always occupy ten minutes of very valuable time in my classes each year in saying exactly what Judge Rose has said, but unfortunately this is the law and is laid down not by one authority or two, but by hundreds in every state in this country except Minnesota. It is inconsistent with Section 626. That is why I make Section 626 an exception, but you have given us a commission to state the law as it is, not as we should like to have it. This body a year or two ago, much to my pleasure, voted to change our statement of law on one point against the authorities in favor of what was just. If this body will vote the same now, and the bar of this country will stand by us, I believe we can do away with this horrid thing; but we are now stating what we find to be the law.

R. L. Tullis (Louisiana): Am I to understand that what is now under discussion is substantially the rule as stated in Livingston v. Jefferson, as I wish to express my hearty agreement with what Judge Rose has said and with what the Reporter has said, and to take some little pride in the emancipation of my own state from so pernicious an adoption, and it does seem to me that if this body can ever with propriety assume a quasi legislative function, it is now and I move, therefore, that we express ourselves in favor of the abolition of this rule and a statement of a rule that where one who has trespassed upon land in another jurisdiction is found in a certain jurisdiction he may be there sued, of course, if personal service can be obtained.

Mr. Wickersham: I take it what the gentleman means is that the Institute in the Comment upon this Section states what it thinks the rule should be and what rule should be adopted, and that is already stated. Of course, it is the duty of the Institute to state the prevailing rule of law on a particular subject. There have been a number of instances where the authorities are about evenly divided where the Institute has made a choice. Of course, in the selection of a rule to be adopted by the Institute, the choice must necessarily be right.

Mr. Rose: What we should move is not what the Chairman suggests. That is stated in the Comment that the rule is unjust, but what we want is a statement of the law the other way, and that is the motion before the house. I move that the law as laid down in those three states which is humane and reasonable be declared to be the common law.

Judge Mack: I sympathize entirely with Judge Rose's view as to what the law should be of course, but I oppose just as decidedly this last motion. If this body is to change itself from one to restate the law into one to codify the law, we are entering upon an enormous task. It seems to me that the work of this body in regard to the development of the law can be fully performed by a statement such as is contained in the Comment or the note to this Section. That expresses a strong disapproval of the law as it is. It ought to influence legislators to follow the example of New York, and it may influence courts in those states that are not precluded by express decisions. The highest courts have been known to listen to reason and to change prior decisions. That influence will come about in a way that it seems to me is entirely proper on the part of this body, but to state as the law something which we know is entirely contrary to the great weight of authority would seem to me entirely improper.

Charles Warren (Washington, D. C.): I would like to make a substitute motion to Judge Rose's motion, and that is that the Institute place itself on record as strongly recommending that courts and legislatures change the rule.

Mr. Wickersham: Mr. Warren's substitute motion is that the Institute strongly recommend to courts and legislatures to adopt the other rule from that stated in the Restatement.

(Seconded and carried.)

HERBERT F. GOODRICH, RESTATEMENT

36 Neb.S.B.A.J. 159, 160-168 (1945).

For quite a number of years the American Law Institute has worked upon the Restatement of the Law, and last year, as the chairman of your committee said, we got it done. It has been offered, as you know, year by year a volume at a time. Just let me run through the subjects: Two volumes on Agency, two volumes on Contracts, one on Judgments, five volumes on Property, one on Restitution, one on Security, four on Torts, and two on Trusts, plus the General Index and a volume which I will describe a little later called "Restatement in the Courts." It is quite a batch of books. So what? Why are they of any more consequence than any more books on the shelves?

An important and rather surprising result of the preparation of the Restatement has been to prove two things not previously realized, and contrary to generally accepted beliefs. They are: First, there does exist in this country a body of general law in the common law subjects treated, the principles and rules of which are recognized and accepted and applied by almost all courts, with variations in form rather than substance or effect. This applies to all excepting a small percentage of the rules enunciated in the Restatement and is conclusively proved by a careful and detailed analysis which has been made of the first 100 or more State Annotations published. This analysis has developed the unexpected fact that the much discussed and widely publicized confusion in the law, so far as it relates to common law subjects, is not in fact a confusion as to principle or particular rule, but rather a differentiation due to application of particular states of fact.

In the vast majority of instances you will find, I think, that the courts are in essential agreement as to the existence and validity of the rule of law under consideration, although they often differ in their application of such rule to almost identical statements of fact—exactly as they differ in the interpretation and application of identical or closely similar statutes.

And, second, even in our largest states, with an enormous body of case law, such as New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Illinois, Texas and California, where lawyers are inclined to regard their local law as covering the total field of such subjects, there are numerous gaps in these basic subjects which are included in the Restatement. These gaps are found in many sections and upon them the lawyer will find no local decisions at all. When a case arises within one of these gaps the court is wholly free to adopt the rules set forth in the Restatement. With the rapid development of and recognition of the Restatement there is a strong and rapidly growing tendency on the part of the appellate courts to do this and a number of important courts have expressly stated such an intention. . . .

This Restatement should not be regarded as a Code. It is not a codification nor even a step toward codification. Its object is to preserve and perpetuate the flexibility which characterizes the common law method of developing law through judicial determination of cases and at the same time maintain and improve its definiteness and certainty.

Too many of our textbooks have simply been put together with a paste-pot. We have, of course, Wigmore on Evidence, Scott on Trusts, and a few others. They are considered eminent scholars, which is worth a good deal. The object of the American Law Institute in preparing the Restatement has been to present an orderly statement of the basic subjects of our general Common Law. Included in this term is both the law developed solely by judicial decision and the law that has grown from the application by the courts of important statutes which have been generally enacted and in force for long periods of time.

The principles and rules already developed, or in process of development, are presented with certainty and clarity, yet leaving room for flexibility in meeting new and unforeseeable situations responsively to our rapidly changing and growing civilization.

When the Institute was formed the idea came into the heads of the founders, "Can't we get some sort of series of statements to be our common law until such principles will be not simply the view of one author but rather the consensus of opinion from among the legal profession"—that is, modern present-day views of the different principles of law. We tried it for something more than 20 years. I read off a list of the books a few minutes ago. Why should we say that this set of books brings anything more to the practitioner and the judge than any other set of books? Perhaps you would let me give you very briefly the reason why this particular set of books has found such favor with the courts, both State and Federal. This is clearly evidenced by the record showing how and to what degree the several state appellate and federal courts have regarded and cited the rules stated in the Restatement.

In the first place, this job of compiling these books has been accomplished by as competent people as could be secured for this purpose. . . .

The second point is the care in which the work has been done. It was adequately financed. From its beginning the work of the Institute on the Restatement of the Law has been rendered possible by the generous and frequently renewed donations of the Carnegie Corporation. Sufficient funds are now available to insure the completion of the set of 21 volumes.

The members of the Council do not get paid, but the academic people were paid a reasonable amount for their work. We got from them a great deal more than they got paid for; but on the material written by the chairman or the reporter, he would go to his committee and have it worked over two or three times before he even went to the Council, and sometimes twice to the Council, before it finally went to the floor of the Institute; and it was also sent out to the members of the cooperative committee of the various states and talked over, until it was finally adopted as a statement of the law in any particular chapter or subject by the American Law Institute.

Now, that kind of work would be utterly impossible if you are going to put out a book and make it pay for itself commercially. Of course, we are not trying to do that. We had a subsidy and, therefore, did the job as well as it could be done.

I suppose one great weakness which lawyers and judges are addicted to is the lack of care in the use of words, don't you think? We use a word meaning one thing in one place and use the same word meaning a different thing in another place. In the first place, we get confused in our words and ideas. It is the habit of judges to express their own legal conclusions in their own way, and the first thing you will find the same legal conclusions being expressed in half a dozen different ways in the same opinion of the same court—the same opinion expressed half a dozen different ways by half a dozen different judges. And I am mentioning no names!

One of our dangers is and was very definitely a carelessness or non-common use in connection with language, bringing us in danger of losing continuity and consistency in our common law. That was a very real danger and still is a danger. I think the American Law Institute work will be the strongest cure for that kind of thing that I know of. We have tried hard to use words in a definite sense from one place to another where the terms are used. We have tried to do it without introducing a lot of new and strange terminology, as Mr. Wigmore did in his book on Evidence. His terms, however, no longer bother me, but I am sure that is not the case with any lawyer first starting out, who finds the terms strange and so upsetting and confusing that he sometimes fails to travel through a very good thought that the author had put in. We try to stay away from strange terms. We have tried to use terms with which the bar is familiar and to use them more precisely than the bar has been in the habit of using them. Now, I do not mean by that that it is all easy. . . .

When you are getting a piece of technical work you must not expect it to read like a novel. You must not expect to understand what it is trying to get at and what it says without being a little bit patient to learn its technique, its use of terms, and then the application will come along quite smoothly.

The third thing and the third reason that I would call your attention to this work as something which has significance for you is not only the way in which it is done and the people who did it, but what has happened to it in the course of its production. Up to October 1, 1945, the various volumes of the Restatement have been cited by the courts of the United States, as I have indicated before, whose opinions are reported in the National Reporter System, 12,356 times. . . .

Now, there is a great deal that comes up in the practice of the law that this Restatement does not purport to cover. It won't solve problems of federal taxation. It won't help you any on the question of the issuance of security, either under a state "Blue Sky" law or the Secuurities Exchange Act. It won't help you very much with problems under the Labor Act in any particular state, or the National Labor Relations Act, although there is a chapter in Torts that would prove some help in that respect. We don't purport to cover all the law, and we certainly stayed clear away from federal taxation. Our effort was to give a statement of the fundamentals of the common law which were back of all the statutory things I have just mentioned and give the lawyer a starting point for all cases that have a common law bearing and a finishing stop for some. But there are, too, of course, many, many cases where a statement of the fundamentals will not settle the application of the fundamental rule to a particular fact. We think we have done a good part of the job when we start the lawyer off with a citation statement of what the bench and bar of the country think the common law rule of the land is. . . .

We have had quite a successful program of voluntary help through local annotation, which has in some states been highly successful. In Pennsylvania we have either finished or have in course of preparation annotations on all of the subjects which the Restatement has appeared upon. Despite the fact already mentioned that in the majority of instances decisions of the courts show them to be in accord upon principles and rules of law, there are a substantial number of exceptions to this general rule, though they center largely upon a very limited number of highly debatable sections. Even more important, the courts differ quite frequently upon the application of accepted rules. And to render the Restatement a uniformly useful and dependable working tool for the profession, we find it has been desirable that members of the bench and bar shall have convenient means of learning the attitude of their local law toward any section of the Restatement.

So I think those annotations have a significance other than their actual use in the state. I think they show something about the possibility of generalizing in regard to the general law. People who practice locally frequently urge that such and such may be all right in general, "but the law in our state is different." But I remember as we worked through several of the subjects, where we had a Pennsylvanian on the committee, he would always be telling us that "Well, that isn't Pennsylvania law," and others from other states would say that wasn't their law, although it might do as a statement of general common law.

As these annotations began to appear we kept track of three things. We went through each annotation by itself in each case and compiled our table. We wanted to see in how many sections of a given subject of the Restatement the local study would show that the local decisions were in accordance with the rule that we had stated in the Restatement, and we wanted to see in what proportion the cases had been proven to the contrary to what we had stated. Third: We wanted to see where there was no local authority at all.

It doesn't follow that the court is going to change its mind, although we have had some experience where the courts have made a complete turnabout when confronted with Restatement on the subject. But the most significant thing, it seems to me, was not that so much as to try to find out from an analysis of all its annotations how closely we could tell a lawyer or a judge that the Restatement here would represent the common law rule in any particular state. While this was the combined effect, yet it does not represent all annotations but only enough to make a generalization of this.

In Agency we found that the percentage of state decisions in general in accord with the Restatement was 62.6 per cent; that the percentage of decisions contrary to the Restatement was 1.4 per cent; no local authority, 35.1 per cent. On Contracts we had many, many more annotations to go on. The percentage in accord, 69.8 per cent; percentage contrary, 2.6; no local authority, 25.9. I am not going to read you the statistics from the other subjects, although I have them here and would be glad to show them to anybody that wants to see them. I make this generalization, that the Restatement is out of accord with local authority in any particular state in, oh I would say, about one and a half to two per cent of the time. In other words, it will represent 98 out of 100 chances of being not out of line with local authority. It will be "dead on the nose" with local authority on one-half to two-thirds, and the rest of the gap or unaccounted for percentages are situations in which there is no local authority of the particular state on the subject. That was a great surprise to me and maybe to you. Even in jurisprudence as old as Pennsylvania there are immense gaps even in a subject like Contracts, where there is no local authority.

Of course, you can see the obvious thing that we urge. If there is no local authority, the court is free if it pleases to accept the statement of law as general in the Restatement, and the statement of law as shown in the Restatement is, we think, hope and trust, as sound and accurate and well-considered a statement of law as American legal brains can make it. . . .

That is the product so far. Oh, we have done some other things. We wrote a Code on Evidence, which you could have an awful good time with. It would probably get some people excited. But, of course, lawyers are apt to be where any change is being discussed. We have done some other things in the statutory field. I wrote a Youth Correction Authority Act, which in California I am told is working very, very satisfactorily.

Now, . . . we are starting on the Code of Commercial Law. I hope you won't completely discharge your state committees, because pretty soon we will have something for them—something that we hope will be important. We hope it is going to be a modern, well-done, carefully integrated Code of Commercial Law, which will, of course, if you like it and adopt it in the various states, take the place of the present Negotiable Instruments Law. . . .
